The Outlook

1896
12/1895 to Nov.

Silverton Public Library
Silverton, Colorado

RULES

1. Books may be kept two weeks and may be renewed once for the same period, except 7-day books and magazines.

2. A fine of two cents a day will be charged on each book which is not returned according to the above rule. No book will be issued to any person incurring such a fine until it has been paid.

3. All injuries to books, beyond reasonable wear, and all losses shall be made good to the satisfaction of the Librarian.

4. Each borrower is held responsible for all books drawn on his card and for all fines accruing on the same.

This book may be kept

FOURTEEN DAYS

A fine will be charged for each day the book is kept overtime.

APR 3	APR 17 '69
GAYLORD 142			PRINTED IN U.S.A.

Digitized by the Internet Archive
in 2025

https://archive.org/details/outlookillustrat0000vari

The Outlook

ILLUSTRATED MONTHLY MAGAZINE NUMBERS

December, 1895—November, 1896

THE OUTLOOK COMPANY
13 Astor Place, New York

Copyright, 1896, The Outlook Company

IMPORTANT ILLUSTRATED ARTICLES

Magazine Numbers, December, 1895—November, 1896

KATE CARNEGIE. By IAN MACLAREN. Complete in the Twelve Magazine Numbers

	PAGE	MONTH
The Higher Life of American Cities By Theodore Roosevelt	1083	(December)
The Higher Life of New York City By Albert Shaw	132	(January)
The Higher Life of Chicago By Melville E. Stone	326	(February)
The Higher Life of Boston By Edward Everett Hale	554	(March)
The Higher Life of New Orleans By Grace King	754	(April)
Buffalo, the City of Homes By the Rev. W. B. Wright	1195	(May)
The Higher Life of Philadelphia By Talcott Williams	144	(July)
The Higher Life of St. Louis By the Rev. John Snyder	372	(August)
Edward Everett Hale: A Chapter of Autobiography	1064	(December)
Clara Barton and the Red Cross By Myrtis Willmot Barton	141	(January)
Alfred Austin: The New Poet Laureate By Hamilton W. Mabie	148	(January)
Recollections of My Boyhood By John Burroughs	332	(February)
Martin Luther, the Prophet of the Reformation By Adolph Harnack	564	(March)
Martin Luther's Life By the Rev. James M. Whiton, Ph.D.	567	(March)
Adolph Harnack: A Sketch By Elbert F. Baldwin	569	(March)
William H. Prescott By Kenyon West	745	(March)
Frances E. Willard By Lady Henry Somerset	1184	(June)
A Friend of Letters: Alexander Macmillan By Hamilton W. Mabie	1200	(June)
William McKinley By Murat Halstead	132	(July)
William J. Bryan By Richard Linthicum	135	(July)
Harriet Beecher Stowe By J. R. Howard	138	(July)
Francis E. Clark By John Willis Baer	151	(July)
Li Hung Chang and General Grant By Colonel F. D. Grant	367	(August)
Mr. Moody and Northfield By the Rev. H. W. Webb-Peploe, D.D.	379	(August)
Mr. Moody's Life and Work By James M. Whiton	382	(August)
The Founder of Chautauqua By W. R. Harper, D.D.	546	(September)
Sir George Williams, Founder of Young Men's Christian Associations By Lord Kinnaird	774	(October)
Margaret Ogilvy By Ellen P. Cunningham	552	(September)
A Visit to William Morris's Factory By Rho Fisk Zueblin	770	(October)
Three Scots Worthies in America By James MacArthur	956	(November)
Prophets of the Christian Faith: The Apostle Paul By the Rev. George Matheson, D.D.	1080	(December)
John Wesley By the Very Rev. F. W. Farrar, D.D.	761	(April)
From Atlanta to the Sea. I.—Atlanta and Macon By W. J. Abbot	151	(January)
II.	338	(February)
III.	569	(March)

	PAGE	MONTH
The Rural Church—I. By J. Cleveland Cady	551	(September)
II.		(October)
III.		(November)
Thrilling Moments By Henry van Dyke, A. W. Greely, Poultney Bigelow, C. F. Lummis, J. H. Sears, Kirk Munroe, C. H. Parkhurst, Walter Camp, Ernest Ingersoll, T. W. Knox, and C. L. Norton	976–985	(May)
Photographing in the High Alps By Marie Gozzaldi	986	(May)
Photography on the Greenland Ice-Cap By R. E. Peary, U. S. N.	987	(May)
With the Mazama Club on Mount Adams By W. D. Lyman	989	(May)
The Olympic Games By Miss Maynard Butler	993	(May)
The Real Broadway By Henrietta S. Lathrop	996	(May)
The Spectator Awheel	998	(May)
The Spectator in New Orleans	548	(March)
The Spectator on the East Side	364	(August)
The Spectator on the Great Lakes	544	(September)
The Spectator in the Northwest	764	(October)
Bicycling for Women By R. L. Dickinson, M.D.	550	(March)
Bicycling for Women: Costumes By R. L. Dickinson, M.D.	751	(April)
The Salvation Army:
I. Its Beginning, Growth, and Achievements By the Rev. J. M. Whiton, Ph.D.	320	(February)
II. Commander and Mrs. Ballington Booth By a Member of Commander Booth's Staff	322	(February)
III. The Founder of the Army By Commissioner George S. Railton	324	(February)
"Baddeck and That Sort of Thing"—Twenty Years After By William W. Ellsworth	1075	(December)
Albrecht Dürer and the Nativity By Elbert Francis Baldwin	1079	(December)
Colonel Waring's "White Angels" By W. W. Ellsworth	1191	(June)
The Cincinnati Musical Festival By H. E. Krehbiel	740	(April)
Rembrandt Harmensz van Rijn By Elbert F. Baldwin	146	(January)
Some Illustrated Books By John C. Van Dyke	960	(November)
Old Books in New Dress By Hamilton W. Mabie	964	(November)
Other Holiday Books	966	(November)
The Heart of Christmas: A Play for the Children, in One Act By Margaret E. Sangster and Caroline A. Creevey	1086	(December)
Children in the Public Library By John C. Dana	555	(September)
Basket-Ball at Smith College By Elizabeth F. Read	557	(September)
Hyderabad By W. F. Dix	559	(September)
The Institutional Church By Rufus R. Wilson	384	(August)
How Shall a Boy be Introduced to Tools? By Charles A. Bennett	155	(January)
The Junior Republic at Freeville By Washington Gladden	778	(October)
A Visit to Penzance By A. R. Kimball	561	(March)
Princeton, 1746–1896 By Henry van Dyke, D.D.	766	(October)
Three Poems By Emily Dickinson	140	(January)

EDITORIAL STAFF OF THE OUTLOOK

Rev. Lyman Abbott, D.D., Editor-in-Chief
Hamilton W. Mabie, L.H.D., Associate Editor

Robert D. Townsend, Managing Editor
Charles B. Spahr, Ph.D.
Elbert F. Baldwin
Rev. Amory H Bradford, D.D.
Mrs. Lillian W. Betts.
Rev. James M. Whiton, Ph.D.

Has the endorsement of every physician who understands the nature of its ingredients, and the care with which they are compounded.
For keeping the pores free from obstruction and normally active in their important work, at the same time rendering the skin soft and beautiful, there is nothing more delightfully effective.

The Palisade M'f'g Co., Yonkers, N. Y.

A TRIUMPH OF CHOCOLATE MAKING

VANILLA CHOCOLATE

MADE BY WALTER BAKER & CO. LIMITED, DORCHESTER, MASS.

UNEQUALED FOR

SMOOTHNESS, DELICACY & FLAVOR.—GOOD TO EAT & GOOD TO DRINK.

ALWAYS ASK FOR

WALTER BAKER & CO'S. VANILLA CHOCOLATE.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS

SAMPLE SENT ON RECEIPT OF A 2 ct STAMP TO COVER POSTAGE.

OUR NEW CATALOGUE will give you full information about the Caligraph
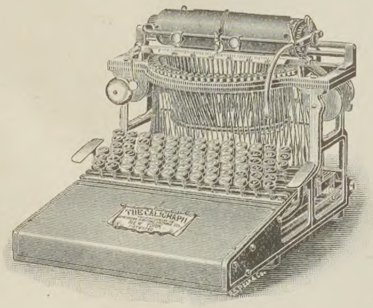
Typewriter



When you send for a copy, ask for our new Paper Sample Book and Catalogue of Typewriter Supplies.

American Writing Machine Co.
237 Broadway, New York

IF YOU'VE NEVER WORN THE FERRIS
GOOD SENSE CORSET WAIST
you don't know how easy it is to be comfortable gracefully. Every waist is carefully made with regard to the most approved rules of health, to fit all shapes, long or short waist, full or slim bust.
Children's 25c. to 50c. Misses' 50c. to $1.00. Ladies' $1.00 to $2.00.
For sale by all Leading Retailers

For the Holidays.

Evening Dress Fabrics, Rich Laces,
Fine Millinery,
Jewelry, Fans, Leather Goods,
Toilet Articles, Bric-a-Brac,
Men's Furnishings.

James McCreery & Co.
64, 66, 68 West 23d Street,
New York.

OUR CONSTANT AIM
TO MAKE THE FERRIS HAMS
THE FINEST!

The Outlook

A·Family Paper

Volume 52 21 December, 1895 Number 25

A Christmas Song

By Tudor Jenks

When mother-love makes all things bright,
When joy comes with the morning light,
When children gather round their tree,
Thou Christmas Babe,
We sing of Thee!

When manhood's brows are bent in thought
To learn what men of old have taught,
When eager hands seek wisdom's key,
Wise Temple Child,
We learn of Thee!

When doubts assail, and perils fright,
When, groping blindly in the night,
We strive to read life's mystery,
Man of the Mount,
We turn to Thee!

When shadows of the valley fall,
When sin and death the soul appall,
One light we through the darkness see—
Christ on the Cross,
We cry to Thee!

And when the world shall pass away,
And dawns at length the perfect day,
In glory shall our souls made free,
Thou God enthroned,
Then worship Thee!

* * *

AS we go to press, the report comes to hand of a special message from the President to Congress on the Venezuela matter, in which, after recounting the correspondence with the British Government, the President says that the reply of that Government has been received; that it recognizes the justice of the "Monroe Doctrine," but denies that it is applicable to the controversy involving the boundary line between Great Britain and Venezuela, and declines the proposition made by this Government to refer the boundary question to settlement by arbitration.

"Assuming, however," adds the President, "that the attitude of Venezuela will remain unchanged, the dispute has reached such a stage as to make it now incumbent upon the United States to take measures to determine with sufficient certainty for its justification what is the true divisional line between the Republic of Venezuela and British Guiana. The inquiry to that end should, of course, be conducted carefully and judicially, and due weight should be given to all available evidence, records, and facts in support of the claims of both parties. In order that such an examination should be prosecuted in a thorough and satisfactory manner, I suggest that the Congress make an adequate appropriation for the expenses of a commission, to be appointed by the Executive, who shall make the necessary investigation and report upon the matter with the least possible delay. When such report is made and accepted, it will, in my opinion, be the duty of the United States to resist, by every means in its power, as a willful aggression upon its rights and interests, the appropriation by Great Britain of any lands or the exercise of governmental jurisdiction over any territory which, after investigation, we have determined of right belong to Venezuela."

The message is received too late for comment this week.

* * *

Secretary Carlisle reports a deficit of $43,000,000 for last year; estimates a deficit of $17,000,000 for the present year; and prophesies a surplus of $7,000,000 for next year. The realization of this predicted surplus in 1897 seems to depend upon the return of normal prices and normal business conditions. To this end he urges the pursuit of the policy outlined in his Chamber of Commerce speech and in the President's message. He would have the Government issue interest-bearing bonds for the retirement of the Government notes, and would allow the National banks, on deposit of bonds, to issue notes up to their full par value, subject to no tax at all. He would at the same time transfer from the Government to the banks the obligation to maintain at Washington a gold reserve for the redemption of the "endless chain" of notes that would still be outstanding. He does not expect the proposed issues of National bank notes to fully take the place of the $400,000,000 of Government currency the cancellation of which he urges, but looks rather to importations of gold to fill the gap that would be created. To an extent, he is doubtless right in believing that gold would flow in to fill this gap, but, in the belief of all bimetallists, this could take place only after prices in this country were again reduced below the European level, while that level itself would be reduced by the increased demand for gold the whole world over.

* * *

Mr. Bayard's speech on Individual Freedom, parts of which have been so widely criticised, was a very able exposition of the fundamental doctrine of American political life. He commented on the expansion of the United States, on the great place which personal conscience holds, on freedom as the fundamental principle of the American State, on the growing weight of taxation, and the movement of unrest. He declared himself strongly opposed to State Socialism, and he proceeded to add that, in his judgment, protection is a form of State Socialism, and one that tends to create inequality of condition, to foster class legislation, and to corrupt public life. He also declared that it was incorrect to speak of protection as a National policy, because it never could be other than the fostering of special interests at the expense of the rest. This may fairly be said to be the substance of the remarks which have given offense in this country; whether true or not, they were certainly out of place in the public utterance of an Ambassador. On this point the traditions of diplomacy are scrupulous and exacting to the last degree. As the English papers have pointed out, a parallel would be furnished if the English Minister in this country were to take ground here, in a public speech, for or against Irish Home Rule or the abolition of the House of Lords. In Mr. Bayard's case the soundness of his position is not in question; it was the impropriety of stating it under the circumstances which has furnished his political enemies with material for severe criticism. Of course the proposition to impeach him was a piece of political buncombe, not seriously intended, and adopted simply to secure the opportunity of speech on the floor of the House of Representatives.

◆

The most significant event in Congress last week was the reorganization of the Senate Finance Committee so as to give the free-coinage men eight of the thirteen members. The names agreed upon by the Committee on Committees are Morrill of Vermont, Sherman of Ohio, Allison of Iowa, Aldrich of Rhode Island, and Platt of Connecticut, representing the monometallists and international bimetallists; and Voorhees of Indiana, Harris of Tennessee, Vest of Missouri, Jones of Arkansas, White of California, Daniel of Virginia, Wolcott of Colorado, and Jones of Nevada, representing the supporters of free coinage. Senators Jones and Stewart of Nevada have ratified their allegiance to the Populist party by entering into a caucus with Senators Allen of Nebraska, Kyle of South Dakota, Peffer of Kansas, and Butler of North Carolina. Several tariff bills have been introduced, most of which have as their keystone the restoration of the tax on raw wool. Senator Call (Dem., Fla.) has introduced a bill to reduce passenger rates on inter-State railroads to one cent a mile, and Senator Thurston, of Nebraska, has introduced one to raise the rates of all pensions twenty-five per cent. It is not likely that either of these sweeping measures will ever be reported. Perhaps neither was ever intended to be. Senator Lodge, of Massachusetts, has kept himself at the head of the Jingoes by introducing a resolution which not only reaffirms the Monroe Doctrine that the American Republic will intervene in case of foreign interference to overthrow republicanism in America, but goes on to declare that the United States will regard "any attempt on the part of any European power to take or acquire new territory on the American continent, whether under the pretense of boundary disputes or otherwise, as an act of hostility to the United States."

◆

The municipal elections in Massachusetts last week attracted a good deal of attention because of the hotly contested campaign in Boston, which resulted in the return of that city to the Democratic fold. Mr. Josiah Quincy, whose grandfather and great-grandfather were Mayors of Boston, was elected to the same post by a majority of four thousand over Mayor Curtis. The elements, however, that would naturally have supported Mr. Quincy because of his family and of his unquestioned ability and culture, generally supported his opponent. This was partly due to the excellence of Mayor Curtis's record as Mayor, but chiefly to the badness of Mr. Quincy's record as Assistant Secretary of State at the beginning of President Cleveland's present administration. Whether of his own motion or not, Mr. Quincy treated the offices at his disposal as factional patronage, with no other excuse than the supposed necessity of getting the Administration's financial measure through Congress. The Massachusetts Civil Service Reformers consistently protested against this policy, and naturally felt more bitterly toward Mr. Quincy for his concessions to the spoils system than if he had not been by his culture and associations identified with their reform. Outside of the city of Boston the Republicans again made gains, and so, by the way, did the American Protective Association. In the license elections only one city—Haverhill—which voted last year to close the saloons voted this year to open them, while four cities—Lynn, Gloucester, Salem, and Waltham—which last year voted for license, this year voted for local prohibition. Outside of Boston, one-half of the cities of the State, and a much larger proportion of the towns, now prohibit bar-rooms. Boston itself, though giving a majority of fifteen thousand for license, is surrounded by a wide belt of no-license municipalities, including the cities of Somerville, Cambridge, Chelsea, Newton, Malden, Everett, Quincy, Medford, and Beverly. Cambridge this year increased her no-license majority from six hundred to fifteen hundred, and Somerville hers from eighteen hundred to twenty-eight hundred. If the Massachusetts Legislature should add ward option to town option, there is no doubt that many of the residence districts within the city could also be freed from the saloons.

◆

In Philadelphia, the city of small property-owners, the anti-monopoly movement is apparently stronger than in New York, the city of propertyless wage-earners. The action of the newly consolidated Traction Company in raising fares, in case of transfers, from five to eight cents, has brought to the surface an unexpected amount of public sentiment, not only against the advance but against the charges previously borne without organized complaint. At the mass-meeting held in the Academy of Music, the great hall was thronged with people of all classes, demanding definite and aggressive action. Chairman Martindale, in his opening address, said of the Company's action:

> "It is an attempt to make the citizens who own the streets pay interest upon over $100,000,000 of watered stock for the privilege of riding in the cars of the Traction Company on highways that belong not to the company but to the people.
>
> "We believe the managers will meet us in the spirit of fair play and moderation which we desire to adopt. But should our 'olive branch' which we hold out be rejected, then, then, will come the fight for municipal control of the streets, which may be long or may be short, but in the end three-cent fares and five-cent transfers will be yours and mine."

The Hon. Charles Emory Smith, who followed, reminded the companies of the mass-meeting in the same hall eight years before to demand five-cent fares and anti-monopoly legislation. "That battle," he said, "saved the rights of the people at the time, and inflicted no wrong or hardship on the companies. We were better friends to them than they were to themselves. Reduced fares brought increased passengers; and no man, not even a Traction manager himself, would venture to stand forth to-day and deny that our demands were reasonable." Ex-Governor Pattison called attention to the violation of the spirit and letter of the Constitution involved in the act of the last Legislature under which the street railroads of Philadelphia had consolidated. Almost alone among the speakers, he confined himself to merely requesting the managers of the Company for the restoration of the old fares.

◆

One of the best and also one of the most aggressive speeches made was that of the Rev. Dr. George D. Baker, of the First Presbyterian Church. Among other things, Dr. Baker said: "One of the directors of the Traction Company is reported as saying that they proposed to attend to their own business, and would like to have the Church do the same! That is precisely what the Church is doing. For if it be not the business of the Church to protect the weak against the strong, and the oppressed against the oppressor, pray what is her business?" Dr. Baker urged that the outcome of the present movement should be immediately the reduction of fares and ultimately municipal ownership. "Meanwhile," he said, "while the Company is considering, let us, who are strong and able to do it, walk. These are glorious days for walking." When he concluded, some one in the audience called out, "Walk we will!" "The cry was taken up all over the house," says the "Press," "and a chorus was formed whose burden was "Walk! walk! walk we will!" Mr. G. M. Eldridge strongly urged municipal ownership if the present demand was not complied with, and read the ordinance giving the city power to purchase of the street railways at a fair estimate of their original cost of construction. The resolutions, read by ex-Postmaster John Field, demanded the immediate restoration of five-cent fares and the immediate concession of six tickets for twenty-five cents. If these demands were not complied with, the final resolution directed that a committee representing the mass-meeting should "be charged with the duty of considering whether the people should not assert their primary right and exercise their reserved power of purchasing the street railways."

◆

Allen G. Thurman

A picturesque and interesting figure disappears from American politics with the death of ex-Senator Allen G. Thurman, which took place at his home in Columbus, O., on Thursday of last week. Mr. Thurman was born eighty-two years ago in Lynchburg, Va.; both his parents were of well-known Southern families. His father was a Methodist preacher, but his uncle, William Allen, was a successful lawyer and politician, and through the latter Mr. Thurman obtained his early training in both directions. The Thurman family had moved to Ohio when the future Senator was a boy, and, when Mr. Allen was elected United States Senator, the nephew took charge of the uncle's large law practice. In 1851 he was elected to the Supreme Court bench of Ohio, but declined a renomination. From early days he took an active interest in politics, and was a strong opponent of secession. In 1867 he was defeated by a small majority as Democratic candidate for the Governorship of Ohio by Mr. Hayes, but in the following year was elected to the United States Senate, and on the expiration of his term was re-elected. There his personal force was recognized by all; when he retired, his political opponent, James G. Blaine, declared that his retirement was a serious loss, not only to his party, but to the whole Senate. His ability as a speaker and as a constitutional lawyer was never questioned. While he was generally classed as a strict party man and as essentially a conservative, his consistency of purpose and integrity of motive were always evident. He opposed the Civil Rights Act on the grounds upon which it was afterwards overthrown by the Supreme Court, opposed the Resumption Act, supported the Bland-Allison Act, supported anti-Chinese legislation, took an active part in settling the Presidential dispute of 1876, and was prominent in other important matters. Mr. Thurman's defeat as a candidate for the Presidency in 1884 and his nomination as Vice-President in 1888 were the best-known incidents in his political career after his retiring from the Senate. In many ways he was a good example of the better type of politician. While he hardly rose to the higher conceptions of statesmanship, his public life was free from jobbery and trickery, and his private life was amiable and beyond reproach.

◆

Rev. H. Y. Satterlee, D.D.

The election of the Rev Dr. Henry Yates Satterlee to the bishopric of the new Protestant Episcopal diocese of Washington (D. C.) is an altogether admirable one. Dr. Satterlee has already declined two similar honors, and much pressure will undoubtedly be brought to bear by those interested to induce an acceptance of the high office. This is one of the few preferments which will not displease any one in the Episcopal communion, for Dr. Satterlee has steadily refused to be labeled High, Low, Broad, or any other particular kind of Churchman. He has reiterated the right of every man to live up to the comprehensiveness allowed by the Church and to hold the truth as the individual soul discerns it, no matter by what name it be called. Dr. Satterlee has wisely turned his energies toward the development of the active side of church life, and is well known as a strong sympathizer in sociological movements. He is about fifty years old, and is a graduate of Columbia and of the General Theological Seminary.

◆

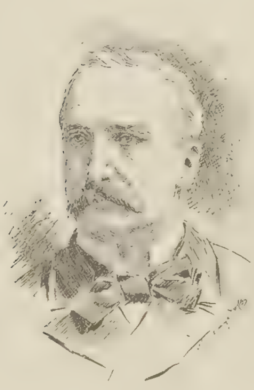
Rev. Joseph H. Johnson, D.D.

The Rev. Joseph H. Johnson, D.D, rector of Christ Church, Detroit, who was unanimously chosen on the first ballot as Bishop of the new diocese of Southern California, is in his early prime, a graduate of Williams College and of the General Theological Seminary. His first charge was at Highland, in this State; from thence he went to Bristol, later to Westchester, N. Y., and in 1886 removed to Detroit, where, as the rector of one of the oldest and most influential churches in the Middle West, he has shown executive ability of a very high order, fervor of spirit, tact, judgment, and talents of various kinds. Dr. Johnson has had many opportunities in the Episcopal Church, having been called to a number of very prominent parishes, and once or twice elected to the episcopate—a success due to his fine character, his notable ability, and the charm of his personality. He combines energy, geniality, and sound judgment in a rare degree.

◆

The Sultan remains master of the situation at Constantinople. Two weeks have been spent by the six Great Powers of Europe in trying to persuade a ruler without money, with a disorganized empire, surrounded by foes who could crush him in an instant, to permit the entrance into the Dardanelles of six additional gunboats. This permission has at last been given by the Sultan in response to the pleading of the Powers, but the gunboats, with the exception of a single English vessel, have not yet approached Constantinople. Meanwhile the riot of blood goes on in the provinces, the latest slaughter having taken place in Cæsarea, where, it is reported, fully a thousand men, women, and children have been killed because they were Christians. In this work of murdering men, outraging women, pillaging and firing buildings, the Turkish troops have had their full share. As a single illustration of the way in which the work is done, the fate of sixty Christians, who fled for safety to a church in Harpoot, may be mentioned. These unfortunate people were for a little while permitted to believe themselves secure, but finally the edifice was surrounded by a crowd of Kurds, the doors blown in, the fugitives taken out of the church one by one, and stabbed or shot in the presence of their wives or children, until the whole building had been emptied. The first victim was the Protestant pastor, who met his death like a martyr, urging his fellow-Christians to die as became their calling. The correspondent in Constantinople of the London "Speaker," who has shown himself to possess exceptionally full and accurate information, declares that "these massacres are the deliberate work of the Palace Government, and the simple object is to exterminate the Christian population," and he adds that the judgment of God must fall, not only upon the Turk, but upon Europe also. For while this horrible dance of death goes on in Asia, the diplomatists are fiddling at Constantinople. The Sultan has deliberately hoodwinked, deceived, and insulted the Great Powers. With every possible advantage in their hands, they have suffered defeat through their ignoble jealousies. Never before in the long relations of Christendom and the Mohammedan world has Christendom taken an attitude so subservient and humiliating. The correspondent of the "Speaker" declared not long ago that, if the facts were known about the slaughter of Christians in the Turkish Empire, Lord Salisbury could not walk the streets of London without being mobbed. While in power, Mr. Gladstone was often criticised for what his enemies called a lack of a strong foreign policy, but it is impossible to believe that, if he were now in power, England would remain silent and passive while the blood of the Armenian Christians cries from the very ground for vengeance.

⁂



President Faure

It is the misfortune of a country governed by small cliques and groups of men that politics, which are soiled enough in every country, become uncompromisingly dirty. This is true in France, where intrigue of the subterranean sort plays too great a part in the relations of parties in the Assembly and the attitude of the various groups of the Assembly towards the President. The most despicable of recent intrigues of this sort has just come to light, and the discovery has added not a little to the strength of President Faure's position. It appears that an ignoble crowd of politicians have actually been trying to blackmail the French President by threatening him with the disclosure of a domestic scandal unless he gave up his office. Nothing baser can be imagined than the plan of operation, which was to drive M. Faure out of power by assailing his wife. Unlike his immediate predecessor, the present President showed a fine control of natural sensitiveness, and declined to yield an inch, and so the long-threatened scandal has burst upon him. The result is the most absurd fiasco in recent politics, for the scandal was nothing other than the fact that Madame Faure's father, before she was born, had committed a breach of trust and become an absconder. Twenty years and more later, when M. Faure became interested in the woman who subsequently became his wife, she told him these facts, and he, instead of being repelled by this shadow on the family name, married her, as an honorable and loyal gentleman ought to have done. Thus it appears that neither the President nor his wife is in any way affected by this long-impending scandal. On the contrary, France has gained a new appreciation of a man who was first honorable in private life and who is now brave in public office. The enemies of the present administration will do well to change the character of the weapons with which they are fighting.

⁂

What has been called the suppressed crisis in Germany is coming to the surface in many ways, and the Emperor, who is so fond of asserting his divine right to do as he pleases, is discovering that the Germans will not submit to Russian methods of government. The Reichstag has already planted itself squarely on the ground of legislative freedom of speech and action. It will not allow its members to be prosecuted because they exercise those rights of difference from Imperial opinion and criticism of Imperial policy the surrender of which would involve the extinction of the House as a serious body. Herr Bebel, the Socialist leader, made a significant speech in the Reichstag on Wednesday of last week—significant, that is, of the temper of the House. He declared that the Socialists were only doing what other parties were permitted to do; that they had never been hostile to the unification of Germany; that they were the fruit of the national development, and that the country will be glad to reckon upon their assistance whenever its enemies assail it. His criticisms of the Emperor's repressive policy were so outspoken that he was twice called to order; but his speech may be taken as notice, formally served on the Imperial Government, that freedom of speech, which may be curtailed in the universities by harassing the professors, will not be surrendered on the floor of the Reichstag without a desperate struggle. On no other point are deliberative bodies so sensitive, and any attempt to arrest a member of the Reichstag for the utterances within its walls would probably antagonize that body almost as a unit. Editors, agitators, and orators outside the Reichstag will no doubt fall into the hands of the Emperor, and will be summarily dealt with. The Emperor is apparently determined not only to continue the exploded tradition that public opinion can be directed by repression, but to place the Socialists in such a position that they will appear before the German people as the champions of the fundamental rights of man. Meanwhile, it is to be noted as an important factor in the situation that there is great restiveness among some of the German States under the pressure of Prussian rule.

⁂

The defeat of the Italians in Abyssinia last week brings to mind that of ten years ago in the same region; in both cases there was a sudden massacre. At last accounts, of over one thousand native troops with sixty commissioned and non-commissioned Italian officers, only two hundred men had made good their retreat. Among the killed was Major Toselli, the commander of the column. The scene in the Chamber of Deputies at Rome when tributes were offered to the memory of the commander and his troops was a remarkable one, since, for the first time in years, all the members of Parliament found themselves in perfect patriotic accord. Much enthusiasm is shown in all the Italian towns from which troops have been ordered to reinforce the army in Abyssinia (7,000 are leaving Italy), and every measure has been taken to insure final victory. The Government has requested the Budget Committee of the Chamber of Deputies that the sum of four million lire ($800,000), in excess of the three million lire already provided for that purpose, be assigned to the expenses of carrying out Italy's military campaign in Africa, and the Committee has unanimously granted that request. Because Italy has received some checks to her advance in Africa, it must not be thought that her entire history has been of this order. On the contrary, her experience in Abyssinia, since the transfer by England of Massaua and the outlying districts to her, has been one of considerable progress. After gaining possession of the highlands above the low coast strip originally granted, Italy made a profitable alliance with King Menelek, by which she became the sole representative of Abyssinia in foreign relations. Some think that Menelek was influenced by Russia, and point to the recent Abyssinian pilgrimage to St. Petersburg as a proof. But, at all events, Menelek finally broke his treaty and by his hostile actions compelled General Baratieri (who had already defeated the Mahdists on the Atbara and occupied Kassala) to march against the unruly Abyssinians of the Tigré country. They were defeated in two notable engagements, and these victories, like those above mentioned, were the means of civilization in checking the criminal Arab slave trade. As Governor of the new colony of Erythrea, General Baratieri has had no easy task before him. The colony now extends from the eighteenth parallel of north latitude as far south as the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb, and as far west as the thirty-fifth meridian. South of this Italy has a protectorate over the Somali coast. In Africa, England and Italy are the only Great Powers which have thus far acted in concert. It may be said that it is a case of the lion and the lamb again, but at all events there has been some profit on either side by the transaction.

The Life of the Spirit

The Christmas Vision

And there were in the same country shepherds abiding in the field, keeping watch over their flocks by night.

And, lo, the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them: and they were sore afraid.

And the angel said unto them, Fear not: for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord.

And this shall be a sign unto you: Ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger.

And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host praising God, and saying:

Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men.

A child in his mother's arms, a company of shepherds on the hillside, and a sudden splendor of angels in the quiet night—could any grouping of persons bring out more clearly the immense range of man's life and its wonderful possibilities! The manger for poverty of condition, the babe for the common helplessness, the shepherds for the drudgery of universal occupations—and, suddenly, in the night which had darkened the world a thousand thousand unremembered times, out of the old, familiar sky, the glory of heavenly faces and the unspeakable melody of angelic voices! So man has always lived, even in rags and sin, with the radiance of the sky over him; so every cradle has rocked a son of God; so every mother has held the child of God in her arms; so every common duty of common men has been an opportunity for heavenly revelation; so every night the glory of the invisible God has been but thinly veiled from the plains where grain ripens, and the hillside where flocks are feeding. The miracle is so wonderful and so familiar that men have never yet really believed that it has been wrought. A few in every generation have seen the splendor on sorrowful, suffering humanity; many have hoped and have said that they believed; but the great mass of men have never yet dared to live in the joy and peace which must come to those who believe that the world is the Lord's and the fullness thereof. Humanity will not accept its divine parentage, because it seems a fortune beyond its deserts; out of sheer consciousness of unworthiness, as well as out of spiritual dullness of vision, men doubt their heavenly origin and destiny. There is no more appalling evidence of the devastation wrought by evil in the soul of man than the fact that he still finds the promise of Christ incredible.

And yet every twelfth month the Christian world gathers round the manger at Bethlehem, and listens, in the stillness of the night, to hear the angels sing; and out of the windows, in the frosty air, it still seems to many, for a moment, as if there were a glow upon the snow and a sudden splendor among the stars. Little children, pure in heart, look at the lighted tree and hear the familiar carols, and know that long ago, on the plain of Bethlehem, there came a sudden rush of melody down from the silent stars, with words few, beautiful, and loving, which men cannot forget, and they know that the shepherds really saw and heard. And their elders, crowded about them, are stirred in their hearts, and the beautiful old story lives again, and has its balm for pain and its sweetness for the bitterness of life. But when the morrow comes the glory has faded, and the world is gray and cold and sad. Men do not believe, because their own hearts do not justify a faith so simple, so transcendent, so divine.

The wonderful element in the story of the Birth is its perfect simplicity and naturalness. It deals only with the most familiar situations, it introduces only the most humble figures, it uses only the most elementary speech. The manger, the babe, the mother, the shepherd, the flocks, the quiet night, the few, simple words: could the divine drama have been put on a more unpretending stage, committed to more unskilled actors, employed a speech more common and readily understood? There is no selection of the places, persons, and moments which seem to us noble, elect, significant; there is, on the contrary, entire disregard of all our distinctions of quality and differences of degree; life is taken in most common and homely aspects, man in his feeblest moment, witnesses in the humblest occupations, language in its most obvious and universal significance. And over all this obscurity, homeliness, and commonplaceness, behold! the splendor of God shines, and the manger is forever a place of pilgrimage, and the helpless child the mightiest force known among men, and the shepherds hear voices for whose music the great and wise have listened in vain, and the veil is rent asunder and the earth and the heavens are as one. There are no common men, there is no hopeless drudgery, there is no forsaken world whirling through dreary night to a night still darker and to dreams more awful. The earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof; and every birth is a miracle, every manger a holy place, every child a son of the Highest, every occupation an education for immortality.

A divine Father, a divine Son, a divine world—so ran the meaning of the first Christmas day when angels broke their silence and declared the mind of heaven to earth; when the redeemed in their toil and the redeemed in their glory met for one brief but eternal moment about the manger, to prove that heaven shines on every birth, and that in every cradle a child of God sleeps and wakes.

Such a story must be incredible to all save the pure in heart. Little children do not question it; to them it is natural, historic, simple—as much a part of their lives as the love of parents and the comfort of home. For them the Star of Bethlehem is like every other star, and the wise men travel from afar because they are wise, and the angels sing because they are always singing; and for those who stand about them, and watch their bright faces and the light of the star in their eyes, they are not only the custodians of the Christmas story, but its revealers as well. The highest things are credible to those only whose lives respond to and fulfill them. To believe in Christmas and the truth which comes with it, borne on such splendor of common things, one needs not to study historic evidence, but to become as a little child in purity of heart. For the Christ in the heart recognizes the Christ in the manger.

The Magazine Numbers

Six years ago The Outlook published its first Illustrated Book Number—the first issue of the kind, so far as we know, brought out by any weekly journal. That number, illustrated and printed in a superior manner, was followed by subsequent issues containing illustrated features, among the earliest of which was a special article on General Armstrong and his work at Hampton Institute. Then came in due order of evolution the Outing Numbers, and by natural process of growth the illustrative features of The Outlook have become steadily more numerous, more varied, and more frequent. What The Outlook has been doing at irregular intervals it proposes hereafter to do once every month, putting into the hands of its readers the very best material it can secure, illustrated with intelligence and skill, and printed in the best possible manner. It has been the policy of the paper from its start to make all its readers partners in the enterprise without imposing upon them a share of its responsibilities; it has divided its profits among its readers without laying upon them any share of its obligations. It is in pursuance of this policy that it begins with this issue the publication of a Monthly Illustrated Magazine Number, which shall give more space to religion, to questions affecting home life, to literature, to art, and to practical philanthropy than it is able to devote in its ordinary issues. The Illustrated Magazine Number will not differ in essential character from the other issues of the month; it will be the weekly issue greatly enlarged and beautified. To the great work of interpreting all life from the divine standpoint, and of infusing religion into the entire round of human activity, The Outlook has been dedicated from its first number. That work it means to perform with greater zeal and with larger opportunities in the future, accepting the prosperity which has waited upon its effort as imposing a new obligation to make its aims more distinctive, its lines of endeavor more definite, and its standards of workmanship more exacting. The list of subjects presented in this issue, the names of the contributors, and the illustrative quality of the number, will give readers a definite idea of the character of the issues which will follow with each succeeding month.

Let Us Have Peace

What is war? "Murder in uniform," Douglas Jerrold calls it. "The trade of barbarians," Napoleon the Great designates it. Do the men who are so jauntily calling for war consider what it costs—in money, in human lives, in awful pain, in heart-anguish, in desolated fields, and homes more desolate?

Ruskin is right: there are evils greater than war. Anarchy is one of them. For anarchy is human passion lawless, and war is human passion under forms of law. The massacre of unoffending Armenians is worse than war, and the English Government will be held responsible before the judgment-bar of history for cowardly evasion of national responsibilities, by idling away the awful hours in diplomatic paltering while the unresisted and unchecked butchery is carried on. But though terrible necessity may justify resort to the always terrible measure of war, nothing less than terrible necessity can do so.

The American Jingo calls for an aggressive American policy. War is not an American policy. It is counter to American policies, traditions, history, instincts. It is distinctively un-American. The American policy is peaceful settlement of national disputes by arbitration. In our hundred and twenty years of history there has been but one war of aggression, and that furnishes one of the blackest pages in the foully un-American record of slave usurpation. It was because slavery was barbaric, aggressive, domineering, warlike, un-American, that we destroyed it in a costly but worthy war of defense against its aggressions. But, except the Mexican war, all our wars have been in self-defense. This is true even of our Indian wars, though too often the attacks of the Indians were originally provoked by the aggression of individual settlers.

The unparalleled prosperity of the United States has been due to the fact that we are a Nation of peace-lovers and peace-makers. During the last seventy-nine years seventy-nine great national controversies have been settled by arbitration, more than forty of them by the United States. During the past century of our history over thirty conflicts have arisen between the States of the Union which, on Jingo principles, would have been referred to "wager of battle" for settlement. They have been settled pacifically, because we live under a Constitution which provides that all such questions shall be settled by the arbitrament of the Supreme Court. Two-thirds of the taxes of Europe go to pay interest on war debts and the annual cost of war equipments in time of peace. The cost involved in withdrawing industry from production and devoting it to destruction cannot be estimated. The war expenses of the United States in time of peace are estimated by Augustus Mongredien at $50,000,000 and the enforced idleness of 27,000 men, against an annual expenditure in Europe of $780,000,000 and an enforced idleness of 3,500,000 men. That was in 1883. To-day the standing armies of Europe number over 4,000,000 men, and the national debts, chiefly incurred for war purposes, amount to $23,000,000,000. The brain is not able to conceive the appalling magnitude of such a burden, incurred solely for purposes of mutual destruction. The American Jingo wants to put a burden like that which impoverishes Europe on prosperous, because peaceful, America.

In 1775 the Jingoes of Great Britain were clamorous for war with their American colonies. Then the wisest statesman of that age, if not of English history, Edmund Burke, delivered in Parliament his famous speech on "Conciliation with America."

> "The proposition is peace. Not peace through the medium of war; not peace to be hunted through the labyrinth of intricate and endless negotiations; not peace to arise out of universal discord, fomented from principle, in all parts of the empire; not peace to depend on the juridical determination of perplexing questions, or the precise marking the shadowy boundaries of a complex government. It is simple peace; sought in its natural course, and in its ordinary haunts. It is peace sought in the spirit of peace; and laid in principles purely pacific."

The Jingoes voted down the statesmen; and the war which they provoked ended in the dismemberment of the British Empire, and the instigation of feelings of bitterness between the mother country and her child which even yet, after almost a century and a quarter, are not wholly allayed. Edmund Burke's magnificent eulogium of peace, uttered in the very birth-hour of the child born out of the travail-pains of war, remains a splendid counsel and a splendid inspiration. "Peace, sought in the spirit of peace, and laid in principles purely pacific," has been our heritage from the pre-natal days of the Republic, down to the characteristic benediction of America's greatest soldier, "Let us have peace." Whoever seeks to rob us of it violates America's noblest traditions, and proves himself her bitterest enemy.

The World's Great Need

Naturally the trend of thought at this season is toward the home. The rush and roar and tumult of life are hushed, and men and women soften and grow tender and thoughtful in presence of the new life so frail—the life that has given its strength in gladness and humility of spirit. This vision of the Child in Bethlehem has aroused the spirit of protective tenderness, and a new note is in the voices of all men, for "A little child shall lead them."

In the quiet of these days it is well to look at the great world and ask, "What does the world need most?" and the answer must be, "Mothering." From the thrill of joy that moves the mother with the consciousness that a child is the fruition of her love, the throb of pain whose pang is borne with a consciousness of the love that sanctifies it, through the days of lullabys, of prayerful guiding, of heroic renunciation, to the laying down of life in the quietness of old age, look where one will, in the world of business, education, pleasure, sickness, trial, it is mothering that the world needs. It needs strength combined with tenderness; hatred of evil, with mercy and wisdom for the sinner; self-sacrifice, with the insight to separate sentimentality from the divine spirit that makes a man give of himself to another; ambition that builds day by day the structure of character that makes for God and his people; courage that faces evil fearlessly and fights to overcome it. Most of all it needs love—the love that moves the mother when she forgets everything in life but that which ministers to the child, the crown of her love.

Recently a tender, gentle, refined woman who has identified herself with those movements which seek to improve the conditions of child life said: "I have had a new thought come to me that has made me accept the loss of my little girl with patience, almost with resignation. God never meant that a woman should be mother to just one little girl. He meant that every woman should be mother to every child in the world."

Could this impulse become the principle of every woman's life, the mission of the Babe of Bethlehem would be accomplished. The moan of injustice, the shriek of ignorance, the cry of sin, would be a call to a love which would inspire to activity the world's wisdom, the world's pity, the world's courage. Life would sweep on toward perfection unhindered by blind selfishness, unmarred by lust, unshadowed by ignorance. The soul of love is illumination, its impulse inspiration, and these divine qualities are the sign and seal of motherhood.

Editorial Notes

—If it be true, as reported, that Mr. "Coin" is going to establish a secret order in this country for the dissemination of free-coinage doctrines, he is in a fair way to do the cause which he espouses very great harm. Secret orders do not flourish in this atmosphere.

—Under President Harrison's administration duck-shooting was a legitimate and delightful recreation for an overworked official; under President Cleveland's administration it is an offense so heinous that one wonders that resolutions of impeachment have not been introduced into the House of Representatives by some zealous patriot.

—It is a matter of astonishment that so young a man as the Rev. Joseph H. Twichell, of Hartford, should have celebrated the thirtieth anniversary of his settlement as pastor of the Asylum Hill Congregational Church last week. If it be really true that Mr. Twichell has been thirty years in Hartford, it is not surprising that Hartford is so delightful a city.

—Mr. Hopkinson Smith has bravely come to the rescue of the Turk, who is just now greatly in need of friends on this side of the water. It is to be feared, however, that Mr. Smith's keen eye for the picturesque, which makes him one of the most effective of painters and one of the most delightful of companions, may affect somewhat the dispassionateness of his judgment. The modern Turk looks far more attractive in Mr. Smith's pictures than against the background of burning Armenian villages.

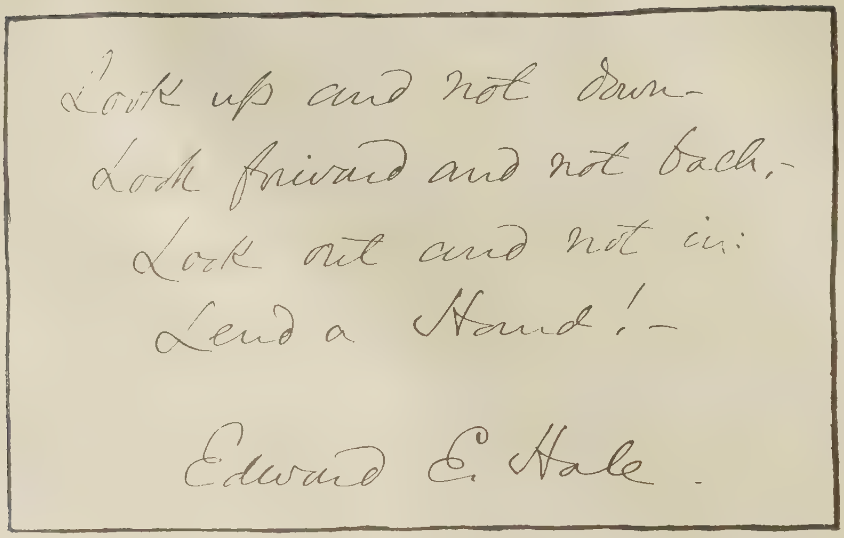
—Unless we are greatly mistaken, Mr. Ahlwardt, who comes to this country from Germany in order to preach hatred of the Jew, will address very cold and indifferent audiences. Our hope is that he will find the atmosphere too frigid for any oratorical exposition of the particular form of barbarism which he represents. It will be a great misfortune, however, if he does not secure from the people whom he attacks perfect freedom of utterance. The Jews of the country would do well to leave him alone. Every egg hurled at him will make more converts than all his oratory.

—The latent capacity of the world for follies is quite as great as its latent capacity for gullibility. Nothing more ridiculous has marked the present movement of some people in the Anglican and in the American Episcopal Church to shrivel up into old-fashioned ecclesiastics and mediæval tories than the endeavor to exalt Charles I. into a martyr. This effort, which was ridiculous in England, becomes hilariously funny in this country, where a serious attempt is being made to form a branch of the English Jacobite Association. If this Association is to do its work thoroughly, it will not only exalt to sainthood Charles I., but it ought actively to work for the restoration of the Stuarts to the throne of England. Our readers will remember that not long ago an account appeared in the columns of The Outlook of the lady who now represents the Stuart claims. "St. Charles, King and Martyr," painted in his coronation robes, is, we are informed, about to hang in state in the Lady Chapel of the new Church of St. Mary the Virgin in this city. For our part, if this kind of historical restoration is to go on, we shall elect a more picturesque character, and canonize St. Bomba, of sacred memory in Sicily.

—Principal Booker T. Washington, of Tuskegee Institute, in an address before the Hamilton Club of Chicago last week, formulated his attitude toward the Southern whites in a way that deserves the consideration of all the friends of his race at the North:

> "I am not ashamed to confess to you that I have the greatest sympathy for the South. I have grown to the point where I can love a Southern white man as much as a Northern white man. To me 'a man's a man for a' that.' As a race, I believe that we strengthen ourselves at every point by extending this sympathy, for no race can cherish ill will and hatred toward another race without its losing in all of those elements that tend to create and perpetuate a strong and healthy manhood. I propose that no man shall drag me down by making me hate him."

This is certainly as full of the spirit of the Sermon on the Mount as some Northern plans for the Southern negro are destitute of it. To us, it seems that in this spirit alone is the advancement of the negro race possible. It is worthy of note that the man who takes this attitude is so wrapped up in the cause of the advancement of the negro that he declines invitations to lecture on any other subject. In this regard also he sets an example.



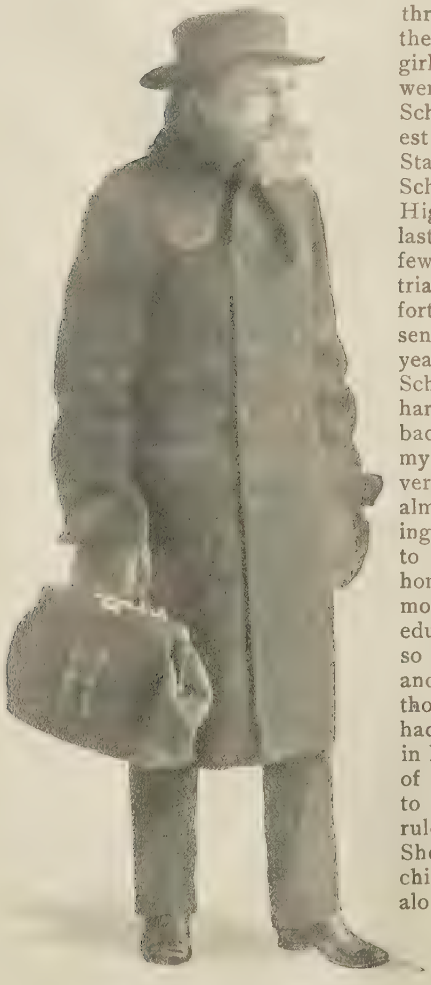
Look up and not down—
Look forward and not back,—
Look out and not in:
Lend a Hand!—

Edward E. Hale.

Edward Everett Hale: A Chapter of Autobiography

I.—Life at Home

When I was a boy, there was no proper school system of education in Boston. It was not till I came to manhood that the reforms were instituted which made the public schools of Boston, with three exceptions, fit for the training of any boy or girl. These exceptions were the Boston Latin School, which is the oldest school in the United States, the English High School, and the Girls' High School; and this last was given up after a few years of successful trial. For my part, I was fortunate enough to be sent, when I was nine years old, to the Latin School, where I was out of harm's way. But as I look back on the business of my own education, I see very distinctly that I owe almost all of the best training of my young life, not to school, but to life at home. I think that my mother was a remarkable educator. I did not think so when I was a child, and certainly she never thought so. But after she had become well advanced in life, the young mothers of her acquaintance used to come to ask what her rules were for education. She always said, "Dear child, the rule is to get along as well as you can." After Mr. Emerson came to the front, we used to tell her that in this rule she had anticipated some of his greatest utterances. But she never would admit that she was a Platonist. She considered that this was the practical rule of life. It is a very good rule for education and I may put it in as a text.



IN WINTER TIME

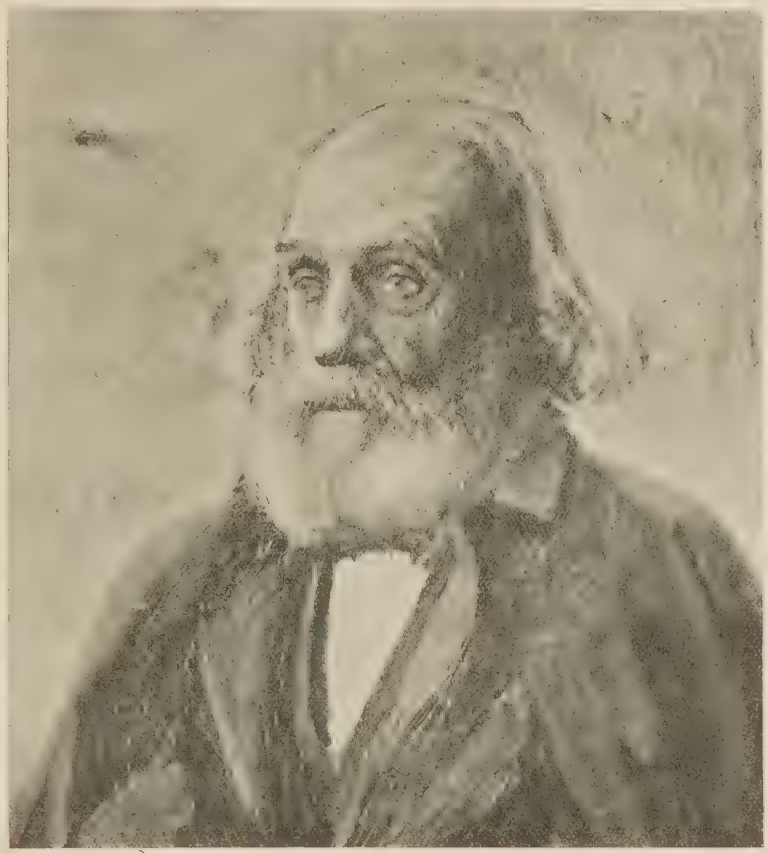
In a little book of mine called "A New England Boyhood," written because of the success of Miss Larcom's valuable "New England Girlhood," I went into this matter in some detail. I said somewhere there that if, by the time a boy is fifteen, home seems the most attractive place in the world to him, you need not have a great deal of anxiety about his future. I still think this is true. Now this will come about if the boy is the close companion of his father and of his mother, and, I think, only then.

In my case, my father, all through my boyhood, was engaged in driving up the people of New England to establish railways. Ninety-nine in a hundred of the sensible men in New England thought he was crazy. But he was not crazy; he was simply a pioneer in advance of his time. As such it became his business to build the railway from Boston to Worcester; that is, he was the president, and for some years the superintendent, of the company which built it. So it would happen that, from the time I was nine years old, he would take me with him in his chaise when he went to inspect the line, to talk with the engineers, or to superintend the contractors. He was not doubtful in the least about explaining to me everything that he was doing. He talked to me about grades, about curves, about the grip of iron upon iron, as he would have talked to a person three times my age. On my part, of course, I was perfectly happy in such companionship. Or, if I were left alone to hold the horse for an hour or two, I was thinking of something, not really above my comprehension, but which belonged to the life I was to lead afterward, and I was forming the habit of consulting with my father as with my best friend.

It was just so in the home intimacies. We children were never shipped off to a nursery in the evening. We sat in the parlor of the family, and we took our chances of the evening guests. In a place of sixty thousand people, where you could walk from one end of the town to the other in less than half an hour, there was a great deal more friendly visiting than there is in Brooklyn or New York or the Boston of to-day. So somebody might look in to make an evening visit; and if somebody did, we children could not play noisy games. We had to "take back seats"—not literally, but metaphorically—and when bedtime came, we had to shuffle off to bed without making a noise.

What happened was that we were sometimes awfully bored. And there are people, whom I will not name now, whom I shall meet with a certain curiosity in heaven, to know whether they deserved the black names which we gave them. We only judged of them because they were not entertaining to children. The tradition is that in 1820 my mother sat rocking her baby in the cradle while the people who made speeches in the Constitutional Convention came in to revise their proof-sheets. My father then edited the newspaper in which these speeches were reported; so that Mr. Webster, Judge Story, Judge Shaw, and younger men who engaged in that Convention, came round after tea to read proof-sheets or to bring their speeches in. This was before my appearance; but those pleasant habits of simple editorial life always continued, and the house, not a quarter of a mile from the printing-office, called in gentlemen, not to say gentlemen and ladies, who kept up an interest in the affairs of the day, or were, for any reason, family friends.

Foremost among them was the minister, John Gorham Palfrey, afterwards a distinguished critic of the Old Testament, and later yet the historian of New England and a founder and leader of the Free-Soil party. The Outlook published his portrait a year ago. The parsonage was not far from our house, and he would come in at any or all times. There was a tradition in our family that in 1825 he brought round "Ivanhoe" to suggest the copying of Rebecca's hymn into the new edition of the Brattle Square hymn-book. Of course our people approved, and this was the first hymn-book which printed it. In the index to all the editions it is marked as "anonymous" because Scott's authorship of "Ivanhoe" was in 1825 still concealed. Mr. Palfrey left out the last verse, as not needed in a Christian hymnbook.



DR. HALE. THE LATEST PHOTOGRAPH
Photographed for The Outlook from an oil painting by Mr. Philip Hale, Dr. Hale's son

Another intimate and favorite visitor was Dr. Jacob Bigelow, the botanist, an eminent physician, who had a modest habit of concealing his name when he printed his very funny poems in the "Advertiser." I was a very little boy when the other children or Mrs. Webster made Mr. Webster play "Commerce" with us one evening. I had lost all my counters, and said, sadly, "Have I not any friend who will help me?" Mr. Webster sat next me, and pushed across a heap of ivory for me, saying, "As long as I live, Edward, you shall have a friend." This must have been more than thirty years before he died. And another prime favorite was Jared Sparks. He would just refer to Revolutionary stories in a way which made the battles very near. He had visited Lafayette intimately at home, had literally followed the course of the Revolution from Maine to Georgia, and talked almost like one who had been an active participant in the scenes he described, and always with the utmost vivacity.

I was eleven years old, reading Pope's Odyssey aloud to my mother, when father brought in Mr. George Bancroft, whom I had then never seen. "Here is Mr. Bancroft. He has come to talk about putting the History to press." He was then just thirty-three years old, hair like a raven, light of step and with a certain gay, debonair habit which graced him until he was ninety.

II.—The American Revolution

I do not know how early I was taught to repeat, in words which I hardly understood, from a school geography, that Boston was "distinguished"—whatever that might be—"for the part taken by her people in the Revolutionary War." It is, therefore, curious enough that no teacher in the school where this sentence was gabbled over several hundred times in the year ever interrupted the exercise for thirty seconds to tell us that John Hancock, Sam Adams, and Ben Franklin were all schoolmates of ours, that several generals in the British army had been trained to Latin on our benches—no, nor even that, within a few years, a British Admiral had come in to point out the bench where, as a boy, he had cut his name. The boys who in 1775 pleaded their inalienable right to coast down School Street were of my school; our first class appointed the committee to wait on the English general. It was not General Gage, but General Haldimand. Jonathan Robins, the oldest survivor of the party, told me the story in 1845, seventy years after the interview. It ended in Haldimand's sending for his servant, who had put ashes on the coast, giving him a blowing-up in the presence of the boys, and instructing him not to interfere in the future. This was told me, however, when I was a man; the school did not preserve the tradition.

This experience with Mr. Robins led me afterwards to count up the points where I may be said to have touched the Revolution myself. It is curious to me now, as a student of history and historical authorities, to see how few they are. I was born in the year 1822, of the independence of the United States the forty-sixth. When independence was declared, Lafayette, the youngest general of the war, was eighteen. In 1825 I was taken out of bed, a sick child, to see him on his way, escorted by soldiers, to lay the corner-stone of Bunker Hill Monument. He was then sixty-eight. I should have said that I must have seen in the next twenty years many other survivors of that war. But I recollect but two. It is now thirty-four years since the Civil War began, and not a day passes but I meet a hundred men who fought in it.

My two revolutionaries were Major Melville and Mr. Ebenezer Clapp, of Northampton. The first was said to have belonged to the "Boston Tea-Party." About such tradition a certain caution is to be observed. The men who personally agreed to throw the tea into Boston Harbor were formed into two parties, one of North-Enders, one of South-Enders. They took an oath of secrecy before they went to work. They went to work about sunset, on a night when the sun was followed by a full moon. Every man and boy in Boston who could leave the house went down to see this done, and saw it. Many men and boys who were not of the "Tea-Party" went on board the ships. The quantity of tea they carried home in their shoes must have been enormous, if tradition can be believed.

DR. HALE'S RESIDENCE
Highland Street, Roxbury

Fitly arrange these facts in mind, and you will see that if, fifty years after, when an old grandfather was asked if he belonged to the "Tea-Party," he smiled, and said nothing, he probably was one of the forty-five conspirators. If, on the other hand, he volubly said that he was present and "assisted," as the French say, he probably was not connected in form with the expedition.

Old Major Melville, however, was an authentic member of the honorable rebellious crew. He used to pass our school in top-boots and with a cocked hat, and we held him in high reverence.

Eben Clapp, the other of the two, was a boy of fifteen in Northampton when the Valley of the Connecticut was swept to take every man who could bear arms "agin Burgoyne." One feels the strain when he is told that Clapp's grandfather, an "exempt," was drafted to go. The boy begged that he might take his grandfather's place, and went. They had gone as far as "Number Six," now Charlestown, when they received the news of the surrender.

Nearly forty years ago I made the acquaintance of Mrs. Brown, an old lady of more than ninety, whose memory of the siege of Boston was perfect. She told me that on Staniford Street, the day of the battle of Bunker Hill, she saw the carts which brought the British wounded from the water to the hospitals, and that gouts of blood fell from the carts upon the roadway. I never pass through that little street without recalling that ghastly memory.

I once saw the bullet which was taken from Warren's body when it was removed from Bunker Hill to its present resting-place.

The English redoubts on the highest hill on Boston Common were left unchanged, except by time, until quite as late as the fifties of this century. And we used to trace the circles where Percy's brigade was encamped on the Common in the winter of 1775–6. The American works on Dorchester Heights were dug over again in the War of 1812. They were still formidable in my boyhood, in that form. It is a pity that we do not now rebuild the two "flèches" which the English erected where Blackstone Square and Franklin Square now are, which were their outer works. My friend and contemporary, Dr. Weld, told me that he had often driven his father's cows over them.

I wrote for the "Memorial History of Boston" the account of the siege of Boston. I did this as well as I could. I had the curiosity afterwards to count the number of incidents recorded in that article which had never been printed before. That means the number of incidents which may be represented by what is called "tradition," a century after the passage of the events described. There were twelve such incidents, of more or less importance. I mention this here as a comment on what is generally said in histories as to the value of the tradition of a century following the event of interest.

In this connection I should like to repeat what Josiah Quincy, the President of Harvard College, told me of George Washington. Quincy, I think, was on General Hancock's staff when Washington made his visit as President to the city of Boston. That is to say, a young man, scarcely eighteen years of age, met on somewhat intimate terms, for two or three days, the greatest man of his time. Mr. Quincy said that Washington, who at that time had met people of every rank and station in America, who was himself the peer of the best of men, and knew he was, still showed a certain shyness of manner. Mr. Quincy said to me: "You have met with gentlemen, who were through and through gentlemen, who came down to the Legislature from some remote country town. You have noticed a certain shyness of manner, as they dealt with people who had had larger intimacy with mankind. It is a curious thing to say, but General Washington, when he was President of the United States, showed this same shyness or diffidence, while in every regard he bore himself as the chief magistrate of the country." I think Mr. Quincy confirmed the remark which Timothy Pickering made with regard to Washington, that he had the largest hand of any man whom he ever saw.

In the same connection I will say that Hannibal Hamlin told me that, when he was first in Congress, he knew many men who had known Washington personally at Mount Vernon. They said to him that in the neighborhood—that is, in the counties around Mount Vernon—Washington was highly esteemed as a good neighbor, a man of practical sense, a person who could be relied upon in county affairs. I have never seen in print, since 1800, a statement made by my own grandfather in his address after Washington's death, which was printed that year. It is the statement that, after he was President, Washington served on the grand jury of the county, and was made the foreman of that grand jury.

III.—The Hopeful Years

When I left college, I found myself in the midst of a curious wave of feeling, the value of which was felt in all New England. It was more felt in Boston than anywhere else. Different people have spoken of it as the Transcendental movement, or as the Philanthropic movement. It passed on, and left its alluvial soil behind it. It did no harm, it did much good; and, generally speaking, it is now forgotten. I tried to give some account of it in one chapter of the "Life of the Late James Freeman Clarke." He was in it, as I was; and he was in it as a man of sense and courage, while I saw it as an amazed and amused boy.

Dr. Channing, since the year 1803, had been preaching in Boston the possible perfection of human nature, or the divinity of man. He began to preach in a little, rather forlorn church, which was the remnant of a foreigners' church, a church of Scotch Presbyterians, of which "Johnny Moorhead" was the minister in the years before the Revolution. Channing had gone to this church because it was small and weak, and because he was weak and small; but from the moment when his oracles were uttered there, the best people in Boston determined to hear him. And in 1840 Boston was led by the people who had been led by him. The foreign merchants of Boston, the men who were beginning to make Boston a manufacturing center, the men who were planning the great railroad system which now spreads over this nation, were people who believed in the ideas which Channing proclaimed, namely, ideas centering in the divinity of man.

These people showed their faith in various ways. They did or did not go to anti-slavery meetings in which Dr. Channing was interested. They did or did not think he was a fanatic when he proclaimed the wickedness of human slavery. But, all the same, they were men who believed in an Idea. In one way or another they showed their faith in their works. There were among them men who were used to victory. For instance, such men had created the fur trade on the northwest coast of America. This meant that they had sent out vessels loaded, you would say, with nothing, which came back after a three years' voyage filled with the most costly silks and spices and teas. They were men who remembered the time when they did the carrying trade for Europe, and when Napoleon himself had not been able to control them. They were men who knew that all things are possible to one who believes.

The population of Boston in 1840 was ninety-three thousand. It was to the statistician an insignificant commercial town. But the people who lived in Boston went and came like princes. Many of them had stood unawed before kings. And the leaders of them really believed that they could make the city of Boston the city of God, and they meant to do so.

DR. HALE IN HIS STUDY

By which I mean that when they had an enterprise in hand, the pattern for it was made full size. It was made on the largest scale. If they created the Massachusetts Hospital, it was to be large enough for all the people in the State of Massachusetts. When they created the Institution for the Blind, it was to be large enough for all the blind people in Massachusetts. When they established a House of Reformation, they really supposed that the vagrant boys in that House of Reformation were to be definitely and thoroughly Re-Formed. They knew no reason why they should not go forth to do such work as Benjamin Franklin had done in the world.

Such people, and the people under their lead, took an interest in what we should now call idealistic or sentimental enterprises such as has not been paralleled in what I have known of other cities. They were a little tired of the old drama, so they bought their old Boston Theater and changed it into the Odeon. They arranged for the performance there of Beethoven's symphonies within fifteen years after Beethoven's death. Two thousand people crowded this building whenever those symphonies were performed. At the same time, one of these leaders whom I have described died in his Eastern travels. This man, John Lowell, Jr., left a fund of three hundred thousand dollars for the establishment of a popular university in Boston, which has lasted from that day to this. It provides for the delivery of free lectures, by the best men in the world, on the most important subjects of human knowledge. In the years 1840, 1841, and 1842, to give a single instance of what this meant, one of these courses of lectures was on "The Being and Attributes of God." It was delivered by James Walker, afterwards President of Harvard College. In a town of forty or fifty thousand people who, you might say, were of the lecture-going age, more than two thousand people regularly attended on these thoughtful, recondite, scientific discourses.

At the same time, every vision of the future which was thrown upon the screen was watched and studied with eager enthusiasm. The anti-slavery people, the temperance people, the people who wanted to suppress Sunday, the Fourierites, all other Socialists, were sure of audiences at their conventions. You can open Faneuil Hall to-day, if fifty people sign a petition for the purpose, for the utterance of any reform fanatic; but when he and the janitor come there, they will find that there are not present twenty-five of the people who signed the call. In those days, if the call was uttered, people came. The Latter-Day Saints had their church; I do not believe they could find a congregation in Boston to-day.

It would be hard to say that there was any center to this

IN THE LEND-A-HAND OFFICE
By permission of the Alden Photograph Company eager movement. But a picturesque place, where one who was wise enough might watch some of its currents, was the modest book-shop, kept in a private house, No. 12 West Street, by Miss Elizabeth Peabody, her sisters and her father. Miss Peabody had been a teacher of a girls' school. I think that it did not know much of the mechanism of modern school-teaching, but I think there was there a good deal of the spirit of faith and hope and love. Perhaps people were tired of the school; I do not know. But she was herself on the very front edge of all advance movements, and somehow or other she and her sisters—afterwards Mrs. Horace Mann and Mrs. Nathaniel Hawthorne—opened a "foreign circulating library," and a book-shop for the sale of German and French books, in what was the front parlor of the house I have named. A counter ran across the parlor, the books of the circulating library stood on shelves in brown-paper covers, and such few books as they had in stock were pretty much anywhere as you looked around.

I am afraid that the subscription to the library did not amount to much; I am afraid that the sales of books did not amount to much. But what happened was this: if you had a vacant ten minutes, you went in there, for it was just in the middle of the Boston of that time. You met there, as might happen, Bronson Alcott, James Freeman Clarke, Waldo Emerson, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Horace Mann, George Bancroft, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Frederick Hedge, even Andrews Norton, Margaret Fuller, Lydia Maria Child or her husband, John Dwight, afterwards to be the musical critic; Christopher Cranch, better remembered as a painter than as a preacher; George Ripley and all the leaders of Brook Farm, James Lowell, William Story, William B. Greene, or the charming lady who was afterward his wife. Who was there that you did not meet who was wide awake and was interested in the future? You stood and talked there—gossiped if you please—with such people; and you carried off the "Revue de Deux Mondes" of the month before, or you looked between the leaves of the "Leben Jesu," or something else which had appeared from Europe.

Perhaps somebody told you that Margaret Fuller's conversation of that week would be on the myth of Juno, or the myth of Ceres, and wouldn't you like to come round on Thursday evening? Or somebody told you that Mr. Allston would be at home on Tuesday evening, and did not you want to walk out to Cambridge and see him? Or somebody said that thus-and-so would be going on in the preparations for Brook Farm. Or somebody asked you how you felt disposed toward the Anti-Sabbath Convention. Or you were asked to put your name down to a petition for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. If you had that ten minutes in the midst of a workaday life, and looked in at 12 West Street, you were made sure, if you had not known it before, that this world has a future, and that very probably it was true that the kingdom of God was at hand.

I do not know if young people of both sexes in Boston, in New York, or Chicago, have any such loafing-place now, where they can meet at haphazard, where a walk can begin or can end. Let the people of the small cities remember that it is their great joy that such simple things are possible with them. You met Margaret Fuller or Dr. Holmes or Mr. Bancroft, or some John or Mary, some Alva or Zebedee unknown to fame. "Are you going to walk?" or "Would you like to go round the Common?" or "Are you taking your constitutional?" And you two took your constitutional together. Some of Miss Fuller's conversations which have been made famous by the interest which attaches to her life were in the parlors upstairs. I do not recollect any machinery of tickets or of formal invitations. It seems as if the company were selected by the "law of attraction." This was the central phrase in Fourier's plans, then popular in all such circles, but now forgotten. I think the Brook Farm people all made their regular headquarters at the "Foreign Circulating Library." I am afraid that the helter-skelter in which everybody availed himself of its hospitalities did not promote its pecuniary success.

THE SOUTH CONGREGATIONAL (UNITARIAN) CHURCH, BOSTON
(DR. HALE'S CHURCH)

THE REV. JOHN WATSON
(Ian Maclaren)

KATE CARNEGIE[1]

By Ian Maclaren

Author of "Beside the Bonnie Brier-Bush," "The Days of Auld Lang Syne," etc., etc.

CHAPTER I.—PANDEMONIUM

IT was the morning before the Twelfth,[2] five and twenty years ago, and nothing like unto Muirtown Station could have been found in all the traveling world. For Muirtown, as everybody knows, is the center which receives the southern immigrants in autumn, and distributes them, with all their belongings of servants, horses, dogs, and luggage, over the north country, from Athole to Sutherland. All night through trains, whose ordinary formation had been reinforced by horse-boxes, carriage-trucks, saloons, and luggage-vans, drawn by two engines and pushed up inclines by another, had been careering along the three iron trunk roads that run from London to the North. Four hours ago they had forced the border that used to be more jealously guarded, and had begun to converge on their terminus. Passengers, awakened by the caller air, and looking out still half asleep, miss the undisciplined hedge-rows and many-shaped patches of pasture, the warm brick homesteads and shaded ponds. Square fields cultivated up to a foot of the stone dykes or wire fencing, the strong graystone farm-houses, the swift-running burns, and the never-distant hills, brace the mind. Local passengers come in with deliberation, whose austere faces condemn the luxurious disorder of night travel, and challenge the defense of Arminian doctrine. A voice shouts "Carstairs Junction" with a command of the letter r which is the bequest of an unconquerable past, and inspires one with the hope of some day hearing a freeborn Scot say "Auchterarder." The train runs over bleak moorlands with black peat-holes, through alluvial straths yielding their last pickle of corn, between iron-furnaces blazing strangely in the morning light, at the foot of historical castles on rocks that rise out of the fertile plains, and then, after a space of sudden darkness, any man with a soul counts the ten hours' dust and heat but a slight price for the sight of the Scottish Rhine, flowing deep, clear, and swift by the foot of its wooded hills and the "Fair City" in the heart of her meadows.

"Do you see the last wreath of mist floating off the summit of the hill, and the silver sheen of the river against the green of the woods? Quick, Dad," and the General, accustomed to obey, stood up beside Kate for the brief glimpse between the tunnel and a prison. Yet they had seen the snows of the Himalayas, and the great river that runs through the plains of India. But it is so with Scottish folk that they may have lived opposite the Jungfrau at Mürren, and walked among the big trees of the Yosemite Valley, and watched the blood-red afterglow on the Pyramids, and yet will value a sunset behind the Cuchullin hills, and the Pass of the Trossachs, and the mist shot through with light on the sides of Ben Nevis, and the Tay at Dunkeld—just above the bridge—better guerdon for their eyes.

"Aye, lassie"—the other people had left at Stirling, and the General fell back upon the past—"there's just one bonnier river, and that's the Tochty, at a bend below the Lodge as we shall see it, please God, this evening."

"Tickets," broke in a voice with authority. "This is no the station, an' ye 'ill hae to wait till the first diveesion o' yir train is emptied. Kildrummie? Ye change of coorse, but yir branch 'ill hae a lang wait the day. It 'ill be an awfu' fecht wi' the Hielant train. Muirtown platform 'ill be worth seein'; it 'ill juist be michty," and the collector departed, smacking his lips in prospect of the fray.

"Upon my word," said the General, taken aback for a moment by the easy manners of his countryman, but rejoicing in every new assurance of home, "our people are no blate!

"Isn't it delicious to be where character has not been worn smooth by centuries of oppression, but where each man is himself? Conversation has salt here, and tastes in the mouth. We've just heard two men speak this morning, and each face is bitten into my memory. Now our turn has come," and the train came in at last.

---

[1] Copyright, 1895, by John Watson. All rights reserved.

[2] August twelfth, the day when the English law allows grouse-shooting to begin.—THE EDITORS.

Porters, averaging six feet and with stentorian voices, were driving back the mixed multitude in order to afford foothold for the new arrivals on that marvelous landing-place, which served for all the trains which came in and all that went out, both north and south. One man tears open the door of a first with commanding gesture. "A' change, and hurry up! Na, na," rejecting the offer of a private engagement; "we hev nae time for that trade the day. Ye maun cairry yir bags yersels; the dogs and boxes 'll tak us a' oor time." He unlocks an under compartment and drags out a pair of pointers, who fawn upon him obsequiously, in gratitude for their release. "Doon wi' ye," as one to whom duty denies the ordinary courtesies of life, and he fastens them to the base of an iron pillar. Deserted immediately by their deliverer, the pointers make overtures to two elderly ladies, standing bewildered in the crush, to be repulsed with umbrellas, and then sit down upon their tails in despair. Their forlorn condition, left friendless amid this babel, gets upon their nerves, and after a slight rehearsal, just to make certain of the tune, they lift up their voices in melodious concert, to the scandal of the two females, who cannot escape the neighborhood, and regard the pointers with horror. Distant friends, also in bonds and distress of mind, feel comforted and join cheerfully, while a large black retriever, who had foolishly attempted to obstruct a luggage-barrow with his tail, breaks in with a high solo. Two collies—their tempers irritated by obstacles as they followed their masters, who had been taking their morning in the second-class refreshment-room—fall out by the way, and obtain as by magic a clear space in which to settle details; while a fox-terrier, escaping from his anxious mistress, has mounted a pile of boxes and gives a general challenge.

Porters fling open packed luggage-vans with a swing, setting free a cataract of portmanteaus, boxes, hampers, baskets, which pours across the platform for yards, led by a frolicsome black leather valise, whose anxious owner has fought her adventurous way to the van for the purpose of explaining to a phlegmatic Scott that he would know it by a broken strap, and must lift it out gently, for it contained breakables.

"It can gang itsel, that ane," as the afflicted woman followed its reckless progress with a wail. "Sall, if they were a' as clever on their feet as yon box, there wud be less tribble," and, with two assistants, he falls upon the congested mass within. They perform prodigies of strength, handling huge trunks, that ought to have filled some woman with repentance, as if they were Gladstone bags, and light weights as if they were paper parcels. With unerring scent they detect the latest label among the remains of past history, and the air resounds with "Hielant train!" "Aiberdeen fast!" "Aiberdeen slow!" "Muirtown!"—this with indifference—and at a time "Dunleith!" and once "Kildrummie!" with much contempt. By this time stacks of baggage of varying size have been erected, the largest of which is a pyramid in shape, with a very uncertain apex.

Male passengers—heads of families and new to Muirtown—hover anxiously round the outskirts, and, goaded on by female commands, rush into the heat of the fray for the purpose of claiming a piece of luggage, which turns out to be some other person's, and retire hastily after a fair-sized portmanteau descends on their toes and the sharp edge of a trunk takes them in the small of the back. Footmen with gloves and superior airs make gentlemanly efforts to collect the family luggage, and are rewarded by having some hopelessly vulgar tin boxes, heavily roped, deposited among its initialed glory. One elderly female, who had been wise to choose some other day to revisit her native town, discovers her basket flung up against a pillar, like wreckage from a storm, and settles herself down upon it with a sigh of relief. She remains unmoved amid the turmoil, save when a passing gun-case tips her bonnet to one side, giving her a very rakish air, and a good-natured retriever on a neighboring box is so much taken with her appearance that he offers her a friendly caress. Restless people—who remember that their train ought to have left half an hour ago, and cannot realize that all bonds are loosed on the eleventh—fasten on any man in a uniform, and suffer many rebuffs.

"There's nae use asking me," answers a guard, coming off duty and pushing his way through the crowd as one accustomed to such spectacles; "a'm juist in frae Carlisle; get haud o' a porter."

"Cupar Angus?"—this from the porter—"that's the Aiberdeen slow; it's no made up yet, and little chance o't till the express an' the Hielant be aff. Whar 'ill it start frae?" breaking away; "forrit, a' tell ye, forrit."

Fathers of families, left on guard and misled by a sudden movement "forrit," rush to the waiting-room and bring out, for the third time, the whole expedition, to escort them back again with shame. Barrows with towering piles of luggage are pushed through the human mass by two porters, who allow their engine to make its own way with much confidence, condescending only at a time to shout, "A' say, hey, oot o' there," and treating any testy complaint with the silent contempt of a drayman for a costermonger. Old hands, having fed at their leisure in callous indifference to all alarms, lounge about in great content, and a group of sheep-farmers, having endeavored in vain, after one tasting, to settle the merits of a new sheep dip, take a glance in the "Hielant" quarter, and adjourn the conference once more to the refreshment-room. Groups of sportsmen discuss the prospects of to-morrow in detail, and tell stories of ancient twelfths, while chieftains from London, in full Highland dress, are painfully conscious of the whiteness of their legs.

During this time wonderful maneuvers have been executed on the lines of rail opposite the platform. Trains have left with all the air of a departure, and disappeared round a curve outside the station, only to return in fragments. Half a dozen carriages pass without an engine, as if they had started on their own account, break-vans that one saw presiding over expresses stand forsaken, a long procession of horse-boxes rattles through, and a saloon-carriage, with people, is so much in evidence that the name of an English Duke is freely mentioned, and every new passage relieves the tedium of the waiting.

Out of all this confusion trains begin to grow and take shape, and one, with green carriages, looks so complete that a rumor spreads that the Hielant train has been made up and may appear any minute in its place. The sunshine beating through the glass roof, the heat of travel, the dust of the station, the moving carriages with their various colors, the shouts of railway officials, the recurring panics of fussy passengers, begin to affect the nerves.

Over all this excitement and confusion one man is presiding, untiring, forceful, ubiquitous. A sturdy man, somewhere about five feet ten, whose lungs are brass, and nerves fine steel wire. He is dressed, as to his body, in brown corduroy trousers, a blue jacket and waistcoat with shining brass buttons, a gray flannel shirt, and a silver-braided cap, which, as time passes, he thrusts farther back on his head till its peak stands at last almost erect, a crest seen high above the conflict. As to the soul of him, this man is clothed with resolution, courage, authority, and an infectious enthusiasm. He is the brain and will of the whole organism, its driving power. Drivers lean out of their engines, one hand on the steam-throttle, their eyes fixed on this man; if he waved his hands, trains move; if he held them up, trains halt. Strings of carriages out in the open are carrying out his plans, and the porters toil like maniacs to meet his commands. Piles of luggage disappear as he directs the attack, and his scouts capture isolated boxes hidden among the people. Every horse-box has a place in his memory, and he has calculated how many carriages would clear the north traffic; he carries the destination of families in his head, and has made arrangements for their comfort. "Soon ready now, sir," as he passed swiftly down to receive the last southerner, "and a second compartment reserved for you," till people watched for him, and the sound of his voice, "forrit wi' the Hielant luggage," inspired bewildered tourists with confidence, and became an argument for Providence. There is a general movement towards the northern end of the station; five barrows, whose luggage swings dangerously and has to be held on, pass in procession; dogs are collected and trailed along in bundles; families pick up their bags and press after their luggage, cheered to recognize a familiar piece peeping out from strange goods; a bell is rung with insistence. The Aberdeen express leaves—its passengers regarding the platform with pity, and the guard of the last van slamming his door in triumph. The great man concentrates his forces with a wave of his hand for the tour de force of the year, the dispatch of the Hielant train.

The southern end of the platform is now deserted—the London express departed half an hour ago with thirteen passengers, very crestfallen and envious—and across the open center porters hustle barrows at headlong speed, with neglected pieces of luggage. Along the edge of the Highland platform there stretches a solid mass of life, close-packed, motionless, silent, composed of tourists, dogs, families, lords, dogs, sheep-farmers, keepers, clericals, dogs, footmen, commercials, ladies' maids, grooms, dogs, waiting for the empty train that, after deploying hither and thither, picking up some trifle, a horse-box or a duke's saloon, at every new raid, is now backing slowly in for its freight. The expectant crowd has ceased from conversation, sporting or otherwise; respectable elderly gentlemen brace themselves for the scramble, and examine their nearest neighbors suspiciously; heads of families gather their belongings round them by signs, and explain in a whisper how to act; one female tourist—of a certain age and severe aspect—refreshes her memory as to the best window for the view of Killiecrankie. The luggage has been piled in huge masses at each end of the siding; the porters rest themselves against it, taking off their caps and wiping their foreheads with handkerchiefs of many colors and uses. It is the stillness before the last charge; beyond the outermost luggage an arm is seen waving, and the long coil of carriages begins to twist into the station.

People who know their ancient Muirtown well, and have taken part in this day of days, will remember a harbor of refuge beside the book-stall, protected by the buffers of the Highland siding on one side and a breakwater of luggage on the other, and persons within this shelter could see the storming of the train to great advantage. Carmichael, the young Free Kirk minister of Drumtochty, who had been tasting the civilization of Muirtown overnight and was waiting for the Dunleith train, leant against the back of the book-stall, watching the scene with frank, boyish interest. Rather under six feet in height, he passed for more, because he stood so straight and looked so slight, for his limbs were as slender as a woman's, while women (in Muirtown) had envied his hands and feet. But in chest measure he was only two inches behind Saunders Baxter, the grieve of Drumsheugh, who was the standard of manhood by whom all others were tried and (mostly) condemned in Drumtochty. Chancing to come upon Saunders putting the stone one day with the bothy lads, Carmichael had taken his turn, with the result that his stone lay foremost in the final heat by an inch exactly. MacLure saw them kneeling together to measure, the Free Kirk minister and the plowmen all in a bunch, and went on his way rejoicing to tell the Free Kirk folk that their new minister was a man of his hands. His hair was fair, just touched with gold, and he wore it rather long, so that in the excitement of preaching a lock sometimes fell down on his forehead, which he would throw back with a toss of his head—a gesture Mrs. Macfadyen, our critic, thought very taking. His dark blue eyes used to enlarge with passion in the Sacrament and grow so tender, the healthy tan disappeared and left his cheeks so white, that the mothers were terrified lest he should die early, and sent offerings of cream on Monday morning. For though his name was Carmichael, he had Celtic blood in him, and was full of all kinds of emotion, but mostly those that were brave and pure and true. He had done well at the University, and was inclined to be philosophical, for he knew little of himself and nothing of the world. There were times when he allowed himself to be supercilious and sarcastic; but it was not for an occasional jingle of cleverness the people loved him, or, for that matter, any other man. It was his humanity that won their hearts, and this he had partly from his mother, partly from his training. Through a kind providence and his mother's countryness, he had been brought up among animals—birds, mice, dormice, guinea-pigs, rabbits, dogs, cattle, horses—till he knew all their ways, and loved God's creatures as did St. Francis d'Assisi, to whom every creature of God was dear, from Sister Swallow to Brother Wolf. So he learned, as he grew older, to love men and women and little children, even although they might be ugly, or stupid, or bad-tempered, or even wicked; and this sympathy cleansed away many a little fault of pride and self-conceit and impatience and hot temper, and in the end of the days made a man of John Carmichael. The dumb animals had an instinct about this young fellow, and would make overtures to him that were a certificate for any situation requiring character. Horses by the wayside neighed at his approach, and stretched out their velvet muzzles to be stroked. Dogs insisted upon sitting on his knees, unless quite prevented by their size, and then they put their paws on his chest. Hillocks was utterly scandalized by his collie's familiarity with the minister, and brought him to his senses by the application of a boot, but Carmichael waived all apologies. "Rover and I made friends two days ago on the road, and my clothes will take no injury." And indeed they could not, for Carmichael, except on Sundays and at funerals, wore a soft hat and suit of threadbare tweeds, on which a microscopist could have found traces of a peat bog, moss of dykes, the scale of a trout, and a tiny bit of heather.

His usual fortune befell him that day in Muirtown Station, for two retrievers, worming their way through the luggage, reached him, and made known their wants.

"Thirsty? I believe you. All the way from England, and heat enough to roast you alive. I've got no dish, else I'd soon get water.

"Inverness? Poor chaps, that's too far to go with your tongues like a lime-kiln. Down, good dogs; I'll be back in a minute."

You can have no idea, unless you have tried it, how much water a soft clerical hat can hold—if you turn up the edges and bash down the inside with your fist, and fill the space up to the brim. But it is difficult to convey such a vessel with undiminished content through a crowd, and altogether impossible to lift one's eyes. Carmichael was therefore quite unconscious that two newcomers to the shelter were watching him with keen delight as he came in bareheaded, flushed, triumphant—amid howls of welcome—and knelt down to hold the cup till—drinking time about in strict honor—the retrievers had reached the maker's name.

"Do you think they would like a biscuit?" said a clear, sweet, low voice, with an accent of pride and just a flavor of amusement in its tone. Carmichael rose in much embarrassment, and was quite confounded.

They were standing together—father and daughter, evidently—and there was no manner of doubt about him. A spare man, without an ounce of superfluous flesh, straight as a rod, and having an air of command, with keen gray eyes, close-cropped hair turning white, a clean-shaven face except where a heavy mustache covered a firm-set mouth—one recognized in him a retired army man of rank, a colonel at least, it might be a general; and the bronze on his face suggested long Indian service. But he might have been dressed in Rob Roy tartan, or been a naval officer in full uniform, for all Carmichael knew. A hundred thousand faces pass before your eyes and are forgotten, mere physical impressions; you see one, and it is in your heart forever, as you saw it the first time. Wavy black hair, a low, straight forehead, hazel eyes with long eyelashes, a perfectly shaped Grecian nose, a strong mouth, whose upper lip had a curve of softness, a clear-cut chin with one dimple, small ears set high in the head, and a rich creamy complexion—that was what flashed upon Carmichael as he turned from the retrievers. He was a man so unobservant of women that he could not have described a woman's dress to save his life or any other person's; and now that he is married—he is a middle-aged man now and threatened with stoutness—it is his wife's reproach that he does not know when she wears her new spring bonnet for the first time. Yet he took in this young woman's dress, from the smart hat, with a white bird's wing on the side, and the close-fitting tailor-made jacket, to the small, well-gloved hand in dogskin, the gray tweed skirt, and one shoe, with a tip on it, that peeped out below her frock. Critics might have hinted that her shoulders were too square, and that her figure wanted somewhat in softness of outline; but it seemed to Carmichael that he had never seen so winsome or high-bred a woman.

Carmichael was at that age when a man prides himself on dressing and thinking as he pleases, and had quite scandalized a Muirtown elder—a stout gentleman, who had come out in '43, and could with difficulty be weaned from Dr. Chalmers—by making his appearance on the preceding evening in amazing tweeds and a gray flannel shirt. He explained casually that for a fifteen-mile walk flannels were absolutely necessary, and that he was rather pleased to find that he had come from door to door in four hours and two minutes exactly. His host was at a loss for words, because he was comparing this unconventional youth with the fathers, who wore large white stocks and ambled along at about two and a half miles an hour, clearing their throats also in a very impressive way, and seasoning the principles of the Free Kirk with snuff of an excellent fragrance. It was hard even for the most generous charity to identify the spirit of the Disruption in such a figure, and the good elder grew so proper and so didactic that Carmichael went from bad to worse.

"Well, you would find the congregation in excellent order. The Professor was a most painstaking man, though retiring in disposition, and his sermons were thoroughly solid and edifying. They were possibly just a little above the heads of Drumtochty, but I always enjoyed Mr. Cunningham myself," nodding his head as one who understood all mysteries. "Did you ever happen to hear the advice Jamie Soutar gave the deputation from Muirtown when they came up to see whether Cunningham would be fit for the North Kirk, where two Bailies stand at the plate every day, and the Provost did not think himself good enough to be an elder?" for Carmichael was full of wickedness that day, and earning a judgment.

His host indicated that the deputation had given in a very full and satisfactory report—he was, in fact, on the Session of the North himself—but that no reference had been made to Jamie.

"Well, you must know," and Carmichael laid himself out for narration, "the people were harassed with raids from the Lowlands during Cunningham's time, and did their best in self-defense. Spying makes men cunning, and it was wonderful how many subterfuges the deputations used to practice. They would walk from Kildrummie as if they were staying in the district, and one retired tradesman talked about the crops as if he was a farmer, but it was a pity that he didn't know the difference between the cereals.

"'Yon man that wes up aifter yir minister, Elspeth,' Hillocks said to Mrs. Macfadyen, 'hesna hed muckle money spent on his eddication. "A graund field o' barley," he says, and, as sure as a'm stannin' here, it wes the haugh field o' aits.'

"'He's frae Glaisgie,' was all Elspeth answered, 'and by next Friday we 'ill hae his name an' kirk. He said he wes up for a walk an' juist dropped in, the wratch.'

"Some drove from Muirtown, giving out that they were English tourists, speaking with a fine East Coast accent, and were rebuked by Lachlan Campbell for breaking the Sabbath. Your men put up their trap at the last farm in Netheraird—which always has grudged Drumtochty its ministers and borne their removal with resignation—and came up in pairs, who pretended they did not know one another. Jamie was hearing the Professor's last lecture on Justification, and our people asked him to take charge of the strangers. He found out the town from their hats, and escorted them to the boundaries of the parish, assisting their confidences till one of your men—I think it was the Provost—admitted that it had taken them all their time to follow the sermon. 'A'm astonished at ye,' said Jamie, for the Netheraird man let it out; 'yon wes a sermon for young fouk, juist milk, ye ken, tae the ordinar discoorses. Surely,' as if the thought had just struck him, 'ye werena thinkin' o' callin' Maister Cunningham tae Muirtown.

"'Edinboorgh, noo; that micht dae gin the feck o' the members be professors, but Muirtown wud be clean havers. There's times when the Drumtochty fouk themsels canna understand the cratur, he's that deep. As for Muirtown'—here Jamie allowed himself a brief rest of enjoyment—'but ye've hed a fine drive, tae say naethin' o' the traivel.'"

Then, having begun, Carmichael retailed so many of Jamie's most wicked sayings, and so exalted the Glen as a place "where you can go up one side and down the other with your dogs, and every second man you meet will give you something to remember," that the city dignitary doubted afterwards to his wife "whether this young man was . . . quite what we have been accustomed to in a Free Church minister." Carmichael ought to have had repentances for shocking a worthy man, but instead thereof laughed in his room and slept soundly, not knowing that he would be humbled in the dust by midday to-morrow.

It seemed to him on the platform as if an hour passed while he who had played with a city father stood, clothed with shame, before this commanding young woman. Had she ever looked upon a more abject wretch? and Carmichael photographed himself with merciless accuracy, from his hair that he had not thrown back to an impress of dust which one knee had taken from the platform, and he registered a resolution that he would never be again boastfully indifferent to the loss of a button on his coat. She stooped and fed the dogs, who did her homage, and he marked that her profile was even finer—more delicate, more perfect, more bewitching—than her front face; but he still stood holding his shapeless hat in his hand, and for the first time in his life had no words to say.

"They are very polite dogs," and Miss Carnegie gave Carmichael one more chance; "they make as much of a biscuit as if it were a feast; but I do think dogs have such excellent manners; they are always so un-self-conscious."

"I wish I were a dog," said Carmichael, with much solemnity, and afterwards was filled with thankfulness that the baggage behind gave way at that moment, and that an exasperated porter was able to express his mind freely.

"Dinna try tae lift that box for ony sake, man. Sall, ye're no feared," as Carmichael, thirsting for action, swung it up unaided; and then, catching sight of the wisp of white, "A' didna see ye were a minister, an' the word cam oot sudden."

"You would find it a help to say Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Durham," and with a smile to Carmichael, still bare-headed and now redder than ever, Miss Carnegie went along the platform to see the Hielant train depart. It was worth waiting to see the two minutes' scrimmage, and to hear the great man say, as he took off his cap with deliberation and wiped his brow, "That's anither year ower; some o' you lads see tae that Dunleith train." There was a day when Carmichael would have enjoyed the scene to the full, but now he had eyes for nothing but that tall, slim figure and the white bird's wing.

When they disappeared into the Dunleith train, Carmichael had a wild idea of entering the same compartment, and in the end had to be pushed into the last second by the guard, who knew most of his regular people and every one of the Drumtochty men. He was so much engaged with his own thoughts that he gave two English tourists to understand that Lord Kilspindie's castle, standing amid its woods on the bank of the Tay, was a recently erected dyework, and that, as the train turned off the North trunk-line for Dunleith, they might at any moment enter the pass of Killiecrankie.

CHAPTER II.—PEACE

"The last stage now, Kit; in less than two hours we 'ill see Tochty woods. The very thought makes me a boy again, and it seems yesterday that I kissed your mother on the doorstep of the old lodge and went off to the Crimean War. That's Muirtown Castle over there in the wood—a grand place in its way, but nothing to our home, lassie. Kilspindie—he was Viscount Hay then—joined me at Muirtown, and we fought through the weary winter. He left the army after the war, with lots of honor. A good fellow was Hay, both in the trenches and the mess-room.

"I've never seen him since, and I dare say he's forgotten a battered old Indian. Besides, he's the big swell in this district, and I'm only a poor Hielant laird, with a wood and a tumble-down house and a couple of farms."

"You are also a shameless hypocrite and deceiver, for you believe that the Carnegies are as old as the Hays, and you know that, though you have only two farms, you have twelve medals and seven wounds. What does money matter? it simply makes people vulgar."

"Nonsense, lassie; if a Carnegie runs down money, it's because he has got none and wishes he had. If you and I had only had a few hundreds a year over the pay to rattle in our pockets, we should have lots of little pleasures, and you might have lived in England, with all sorts of variety and comfort, instead of wandering about India with a gang of stupid old chaps who have been so busy fighting that they never had time to read a book."

"You mean like yourself, dad, and V. C. and Colonel Kinloch? Where could a girl have found finer company than with my Knights of King Arthur? And do you dare to insinuate that I could have been content away from the regiment, that made me their daughter after mother died, and the army?

"Pleasure!" and Kate's cheek flushed. "I've had it since I was a little tot and could remember anything—the bugles sounding reveille in the clear air, and the sergeants drilling the new drafts in the morning, and the regiment coming out with the band before and you at its head, and hearing 'God Save the Queen' at a review, and seeing the companies passing like one man before the General.

"Don't you think that's better than tea-drinking, and gossiping, and sewing-meetings, and going for walks in some stupid little hole of a country town? Oh, you wicked, aggravating dad! Now, what more will money do?"

"Well," said the General, with much gravity, "if you were even a moderate heiress there is no saying but that we might pick up a presentable husband for you among the lairds. As it is, I fancy a country minister is all you could expect.

"Don't . . . my ears will come off some day; one was loosened by a cut in the Mutiny. No, I'll never do the like again. But some day you will marry, all the same," and Kate's father rubbed his ears.

"No, I'm not going to leave you, for nobody else could ever make a curry to please; and if I do, it will not be a Scotch minister—horrid, bigoted wretches, V. C. says. Am I like a minister's wife, to address mothers' meetings and write out sermons? By the way, is there a kirk at Drumtochty, or will you read prayers to Janet and Donald and me?"

"When I was a lad there was just one minister in Drumtochty—Dr. Davidson, a splendid specimen of the old school, who, on great occasions, wore gaiters and a frill with a diamond in the center; he carried a gold-headed stick, and took snuff out of a presentation box.

"His son Sandie was my age to a year, and many a ploy we had together; there was the jackdaw's nest in the ivy on the old tower we harried together," and the General could only indicate the delightful risk of the exploit. "My father and the Doctor were pacing the avenue at the time, and caught sight of us against the sky. 'It's your rascal and mine, Laird,' we heard the minister say, and they waited till we got down, and then each did his duty by his own for trying to break his neck; but they were secretly proud of the exploit, for I caught my father showing old Lord Kilspindie the spot, and next time Hay was up he tried to reach the place, and stuck where the wall hangs over. I'll point out the hole this evening; you can see it from the other side of the den quite plain.

"Sandie went to the church—I wish every parson were as straight—and Kilspindie appointed him to succeed the old gentleman, and when I saw him in his study last month, it seemed as if his father stood before you, except the breeches and the frill, but Sandie has a marvelous stock; what havers I'm deivin' you with, lassie!"

"Tell me about Sandie this minute—did he remember the raiding of the jackdaws?"

"He did," cried the General, in great spirits; "he just looked at me for an instant—no one knew of my visit—and then he gripped my hands, and, do you know, Kit, he was . . . well, and there was a lump in my throat, too; it would be about forty years, for one reason and another, since we met."

"What did he say? the very words, dad," and Kate held up her finger in command.

"'Jack, old man, is this really you?'—he held me at arm's length—'man, div ye mind the jackdaw's nest?'"

"Did he? And he's to be our padre I know I'll love him at once. Go on—everything, for you've never told me anything about Drumtochty."

'We had a glorious time going over old times. We fished up every trout again, and we shot our first day on the moor again with Peter Stewart, Kilspindie's head keeper, as fine an old Highlander as ever lived. Stewart said in the evening, 'You're a pair of prave boys, as becometh your fathers' sons,' and Sandie gave him two and fourpence he had scraped for a tip, but I had only one and elevenpence—we were both kept bare. But he knew better than to refuse our offerings, though he never saw less than gold or notes from the men that shot at the lodge, and Sandie remembered how he touched his Highland bonnet and said, 'I will be much obliged to you both; and you will be coming to the moor another day, for I hef his lordship's orders.'

"Boys are queer animals, lassie; we were prouder that Peter accepted our poor little tip than about the muirfowl we shot, though I had three brace and Sandie four. Highlanders are all gentlemen by birth, and be sure of this, Kit, it's only that breed which can manage boys and soldiers. But where am I now?"

"With Sandie—I beg his reverence's pardon—with the Rev. the padre of Drumtochty," and Kate went over and sat down beside the General to anticipate any rebellion, for it was a joy to see the warrior turning into a boy before her eyes. "Well?"

"We had a royal dinner, as it seemed to me. Sandie has a couple of servants, man and wife, who rule him with a rod of iron, but I would forgive that for the cooking and the loyalty. After dinner he disappeared with a look of mystery, and came back with a cobwebbed bottle of the old shape, short and bunchy, which he carried as if it were a baby.

"'Just two bottles of my father's port left; we 'ill have one to-day to welcome you back, and we 'ill keep the other to celebrate your daughter's marriage.' He had one sister, younger by ten years, and her death nearly broke his heart. It struck me, from something he said, that his love is with her; at any rate, he has never married. Sandie has just one fault—he would not touch a cheroot; but he snuffs handsomely out of his father's box.

"Of course I can't say anything about his preaching, but it's bound to be sensible stuff."

"Bother the sermons; he's an old dear himself, and I know we shall be great friends. We 'ill flirt together, and you will not have one word to say, so make up your mind to submit."

"We shall have good days in the old place, lassie; but you know we are poor, and must live quietly. What I have planned is a couple of handy women or so in the house with Donald. Janet is going to live at the gate where she was brought up, but she will look after you well, and we 'ill always have a bed and a glass of wine for a friend. Then you can have a run up to London and get your things, Kit," and the General looked wistfully at his daughter, as one who would have given her a kingdom.

"Do you think your girl cares so much about luxuries and dresses? Of course I like to look well; every woman does, and if she pretends otherwise she's a hypocrite; but money just seems to make some women hideous. It is enough for me to have you all to myself up in your old home, and to see you enjoying the rest you have earned. We 'ill be as happy as two lovers, dad," and Kate threw an arm round her father's neck and kissed him.

"We have to change here," as the train began to slow; "prepare to see the most remarkable railway in the Empire, and a guard to correspond." And then it came upon them, the first sight that made a Drumtochty man's heart warm, and assured him that he was nearing home.

An engine on a reduced scale, that had once served in the local goods department of a big station, and then, having grown old and asthmatic, was transferred on half-pay, as it were, to the Kildrummie branch, where it puffed between the junction and the terminus half a dozen times a day, with two carriages and an occasional coal-truck. Times there were when wood was exported from Kildrummie, and then the train was taken down in detachments, and it was a pleasant legend that, one market-day, when Drumtochty was down in force, the engine stuck, and Drumsheugh invited the Glen to get out and push. The two carriages were quite distinguished in construction, and had seen better days. One consisted of a single first-class compartment in the center, with a bulge of an imposing appearance, supported on either side by two seconds. As no native ever traveled second, one compartment had been employed as a reserve to the luggage van, so that Drumtochty might have a convenient place of deposit for calves, but the other was jealously reserved by Peter Bruce for strangers with second-class tickets, that his branch might not be put to confusion. The other carriage was three-fourths third-class and one-fourth luggage, and did the real work; on its steps Peter stood and dispensed wisdom, between the junction and Kildrummie.

But neither the carriages nor the engine could have made history without the guard, beside whom the guards of the main line—even of the expresses that ran to London—were as nothing—fribbles and weaklings. For the guard of the Kildrummie branch was absolute ruler, lording over man and beast without appeal, and treating the Kildrummie station-master as a federated power. Peter was a short man of great breadth, like unto the cutting of an oak-tree, with a penetrating gray eye, an immovable countenance, and bushy whiskers. It was understood that when the line was opened, and the directors were about to fill up the post of guard from a number of candidates qualified by long experience on various lines, Peter, who had been simply wasting his time driving a carrier's cart, came in, and, sitting down opposite the board—two lairds and a farmer—looked straight before him without making any application. It was felt by all in an instant that only one course was open, in the eternal fitness of things. Experience was well enough, but special creation was better, and Peter was immediately appointed, his name being asked by the chairman afterwards as a formality. From the beginning he took up a masterful position, receiving his cargo at the junction and discharging it at the station with a power that even Drumtochty did not resist, and a knowledge of individuals that was almost comprehensive. It is true that, boasting one Friday evening concerning the "crooded" state of the train, he admitted with reluctance that "there's a stranger in the second I canna mak oot," but it was understood that he solved the problem before the man got his luggage at Kildrummie.

Perhaps Peter's most famous achievement was his demolition of a south-country bagman, who had made himself unpleasant, and the story was much tasted by our guard's admirers. This self-important and vivacious gentleman, seated in the first, was watching Peter's leisurely movements on the Kildrummie platform with much impatience, and lost all self-control on Peter going outside to examine the road for any distant passenger.

"Look here, guard, this train ought to have left five minutes ago, and I give you notice that if we miss our connection I'll hold your company responsible."

At the sound of this foreign voice with its indecent clamor, Peter returned and took up his position opposite the speaker, while the staff and the whole body of passengers—four Kildrummie and three Drumtochty, quite sufficient for the situation—waited the issue. Not one word did Peter deign to reply, but he fixed the irate traveler with a gaze so searching, so awful, so irresistible, that the poor man fell back into his seat and pretended to look out at the opposite window. After a pause of thirty seconds, Peter turned to the engine-driver.

"They're a' here noo, an' there's nae use waitin' langer; ca' awa', but ye needna distress the engine."

It was noticed that the foolhardy traveler kept the full length of the junction between himself and Peter till the Dunleith train came in, while his very back was eloquent of humiliation, and Hillocks offered his snuff-box ostentatiously to Peter, which that worthy accepted as a public tribute of admiration.

"Look, Kate, there he is!" and there Peter was, standing in his favorite attitude, his legs wide apart and his thumbs in his armholes, superior, abstracted, motionless till the train stopped, when he came forward.

"Prood tae see ye, General, coming back at laist, an' the Miss wi' ye; it 'ill no be the blame o' the fouk up bye gin ye bena happy. Drumtochty hes an idea o' itsel', and peety the man 'at tries tae drive them, but they're couthy.

"This wy, an' a'll see tae yir luggage," and before Peter made for the Dunleith van it is said that he took off his cap to Kate; but if so, this was the only time he had ever shown such gallantry.

Certainly he must have been flustered by something, for he did not notice that Carmichael, overcome by shyness at the sight of the Carnegies in the first, had hid himself in the second, till he closed the doors; then the Carnegies heard it all.

"It's I, Peter," very quietly; "your first has passengers to-day, and . . . I'll just sit here."

"Come oot o' that," after a moment, during which Peter had simply looked; then the hat and the tweeds came stumbling into the first, making some sort of a bow and muttering an apology.

"A'll tak' yir ticket, Maister Carmichael," with severity. "General," suddenly relaxing, "this is the Free Kirk minister of yir pairish, an a'm jidgin' he 'ill no try the second again."

Carmichael lifted his head and caught Kate's eye, and at the meeting of humor they laughed aloud. Whereupon the General said, "My daughter, Miss Carnegie," and they became so friendly before they reached Kildrummie that Carmichael forgot his disgraceful appearance, and, when the General offered him a lift up, simply clutched at the opportunity.

The trap was a four-wheeled dog-cart. Kate drove, with her father by her side and Carmichael behind, but he found it necessary to turn round to give information of names and places, and he so managed that he could catch Kate's profile half the time.

When he got down at the foot of the hill by Hillock's farm, to go up the near road, instead thereof he scrambled along the ridge, and looked through the trees as the carriage passed below, and did not escape.

"What's he glowerin' at doon there?" Hillocks inquired of Jamie Soutar, to whom he was giving some directions about a dyke, and Hillocks made a reconnaisance. "A'll warrant that's the General and his dochter. She's a weel-faured lassie an' speerity-lookin'."

"It cowes a'," said Jamie to himself; "the first day he ever saw her; but it's aye the way, aince an' ever, or . . . never."

"What's the Free Kirk, dad?"—when Carmichael had gone. "Is it the same as the Methodists?"

"No, no, quite different. I'm not up in those things, but I've heard it was a lot of fellows who would not obey the laws, and so they left and made a kirk for themselves, where they do whatever they like. By the way, that was the young fellow we saw giving the dogs water at Muirtown. I rather like him; but why did he look such a fool, and try to escape us at the junction?"

"How should I know? I suppose because he is a . . . foolish boy. And now, dad, for the Lodge and Tochty Woods."

[To be continued in the January Magazine Number of The Outlook]

A STREET IN BADDECK

"Baddeck and That Sort of Thing"—Twenty Years After

By William W. Ellsworth

A MICMAC SQUAW, CAPE BRETON ISLAND

When one lands in Halifax, the first thing to do is not to change one's watch. Clever people who step up to the clerk's desk at the Halifax Hotel notice that the large clock points to an earlier hour than does their own watch. So they reason, "Ah, I am now in a place where they are an hour ahead of New York. I will change my watch." Then the trouble begins.

By and by they say to the clerk, "I am going away on the 7:20 train to-morrow morning."

"Yes," he says; "the 7:20 train leaves at twenty minutes after eight." "But the time-table says 7:20, and I have changed my time to yours." "The railway doesn't run on Halifax time, but on Eastern time. The train goes at 8:20."

You go up to your room not quite believing him—then you realize that you have forgotten to leave an order to be called. You ring the bell and tell the boy that you are to be awakened at 6. The boy does a little reckoning on his own account—reasoning that you have just come from New York—and at 5 the porter raps you up.

But if your steamer arrived after dark the day before, as mine did, you are glad of this additional hour, for it enables you to see a little of the town and to stroll before breakfast through its quiet, old-fashioned, hilly streets, with the citadel above, where British redcoats keep guard over the Nova Scotians, just as their great-grandfathers used to do over the Bostonians a century and a half ago.

For twenty years the charm of Charles Dudley Warner's "Baddeck and That Sort of Thing" had been lingering in my mind. As August came and brought with it the knowledge that if I were alive on the 25th I should be succumbing to hay-fever, and as the bicycle-fever had been possessing me for some months, the thought of using the latter as an antidote for the former came to my relief. I had read all the books in the circulating library at Bethlehem, N. H., the previous summer—and there is nothing to do at Bethlehem but to read books, and hear the "Maplewood" band play, and walk up and down the village street, and talk the latest hay-fever shop with the other "inmates." I had felt rather small, too, for my hay-fever is a matter of only two or three years' standing, and in Bethlehem a man who hasn't had hay-fever for at least twenty-five years has no rating.

So I thought of Nova Scotia, and wondered if its roads were adapted to the bicycle. Perhaps in the eastern part they might be, and I could wheel through the Basin of Midas and settle down at Grand Pré for a few days (Mem., read "Evangeline" again); but to reach the famed, mysterious Baddeck in the wilds of Cape Breton Island was hardly to be expected. I wrote to a friend in Baddeck—the only person I knew in Nova Scotia—asking about the roads. To my surprise, he told me that eastern Nova Scotia was flat and unprofitable, and that Cape Breton had not only the loveliest scenery on the Atlantic coast, but capital roads—and, moreover, that he himself was a wheelman, that he wanted to make some excursions through the Island, and that I was just the man he was looking for.

You can reach Nova Scotia in several ways: all rail through Portland and St. John, or by steamer to Yarmouth or to Halifax. I went by steamer to Halifax, and returned by rail, for the sake of variety. Leaving Boston Saturday noon, the steamer reaches Halifax Sunday afternoon or evening. The ocean may be like the proverbial mill-pond and it may not;—when I went it was decidedly not, but I had the satisfaction of knowing that it had been like a mill-pond on every previous trip. There is a deal of variety in the ocean.

From a photograph by William H. Watson, of Baddeck

THE LITTLE BRAS D'OR LAKE,

You leave Halifax at 7:20 (or 8:20) Monday morning. All trains leave Halifax in every direction between 7 and 9 o'clock. The inhabitants get trains off their minds the first thing in the morning, and then they lock up the railway station and go about their daily work. You travel all day through a charming land in a Pullman car—and there is nothing that adds more charm to scenery than a Pullman car—passing Truro, New Glasgow, and Antigonish (accent on the last syllable—like Auntie Gonísh), reaching the Strait of Canso, which makes Cape Breton an island, early in the afternoon. This Strait, or gut, as they used to call it in less refined days, is about fifteen miles long and a mile wide, and more ships pass through it every year than through the Straits of Gibraltar. You do not see them doing it, but the guide-book says so.

Another Pullman car meets you as you cross the ferry from Mulgrave, and you speed on toward Grand Narrows, where the little steamer for Baddeck is waiting. You are temporarily overcome, on consulting the time-table, to find that Grand Narrows will not be reached until the awful hour of "18:10," but you are relieved to find that this is only a vagary of the Intercolonial Railway, and that "18:10" is our harmless 6:10 in the afternoon. Before the steamer touched at the old wharf at Baddeck (pronounced Bad-dĕck) I was willing to admit that all my friend had said about the beauty of the Cape Breton scenery was true. The inland lakes of the Island are great salt seas, having a coast line of eight hundred miles; and this coast line is as beautiful as that which surrounds the Italian Lakes. There are always hills, villages occasionally, deep rich woods, lovely bays and promontories and bits of islands. The lakes have a tide of not more than six inches; there is good sailing everywhere, and there are channels from the ocean so deep that men-of-war come in and anchor off the village of Baddeck. It is a paradise for those who love sailing, but in spite of the fact that my friend owned several good boats, during my two weeks at Baddeck we were so much on our wheels that sails were seldom used. Every day we wheeled from ten to sixty miles, sometimes going away on excursions for a night or two, spent in the family of a Scotch farmer. The roads of Cape Breton Island are generally very good; they average much better than those of Litchfield County in Connecticut, over many of which I had wheeled in the early summer. The soil is clayey, and it packs well. There is at least a track wide enough for a wheel—and to the bicycler with a six-inch track it is as if the earth were covered with asphalt.

Our longest trip was to Ingonish (In-go-nísh)—and I shall never forget Ingonish, though until I reached it the village had had no place in my mental gazetteer. We wheeled twenty-two miles to North River, where we arrived about four o'clock in the afternoon, in time to unstrap our trout-rods from our wheels and have two hours of fishing in a stream where three and four pound trout were gamboling—and are still gamboling for all the harm I did them, but my companion was more fortunate, and he caught his supper and mine too. I was not properly prepared for the fray. Having no wading-boots, my outfit consisted of bathing-trunks and moccasins, with a sweater; and I waded over sharp and slippery rocks, casting flies galore, yellow flies and brown flies, until my legs nearly dropped off in the ice-cold water.

The Scotch farmer's wife cooked our trout deliciously, and with them she gave us small, new baked potatoes, and Mr. Huyler never originated a confection which could equal those potatoes. I ate more than a dozen of them. And in the morning there were more trout and more potatoes. Around the breakfast-room were several Gaelic Bibles, which the family had been using at early prayers; for nearly all the country people of Cape Breton Island are descendants of Scotch settlers, and they have brought their Bibles and many of their customs with them. Ten miles further up the road we passed a place where people were beginning to gather for the yearly sacrament, which was to take place on the following Sunday, and several hundred were there already, although the Sabbath was some days off. They sleep in farm-houses—sometimes fifty and sixty people in a small house—and after several days of frequent preaching services, the sacrament is administered out-of-doors on Sunday morning. Our wheels excited a great deal of interest among the people—only a few of them had ever seen bicycles before—and every horse in Cape Breton Island is afraid of them. We always stopped and got off when we met teams, and sometimes it would be necessary to hide the wheels in the bushes before the horse could summon courage to pass us.

A CAPE BRETON FERRY (ENGLISHTOWN)

FROM THE VILLAGE OF BADDECK

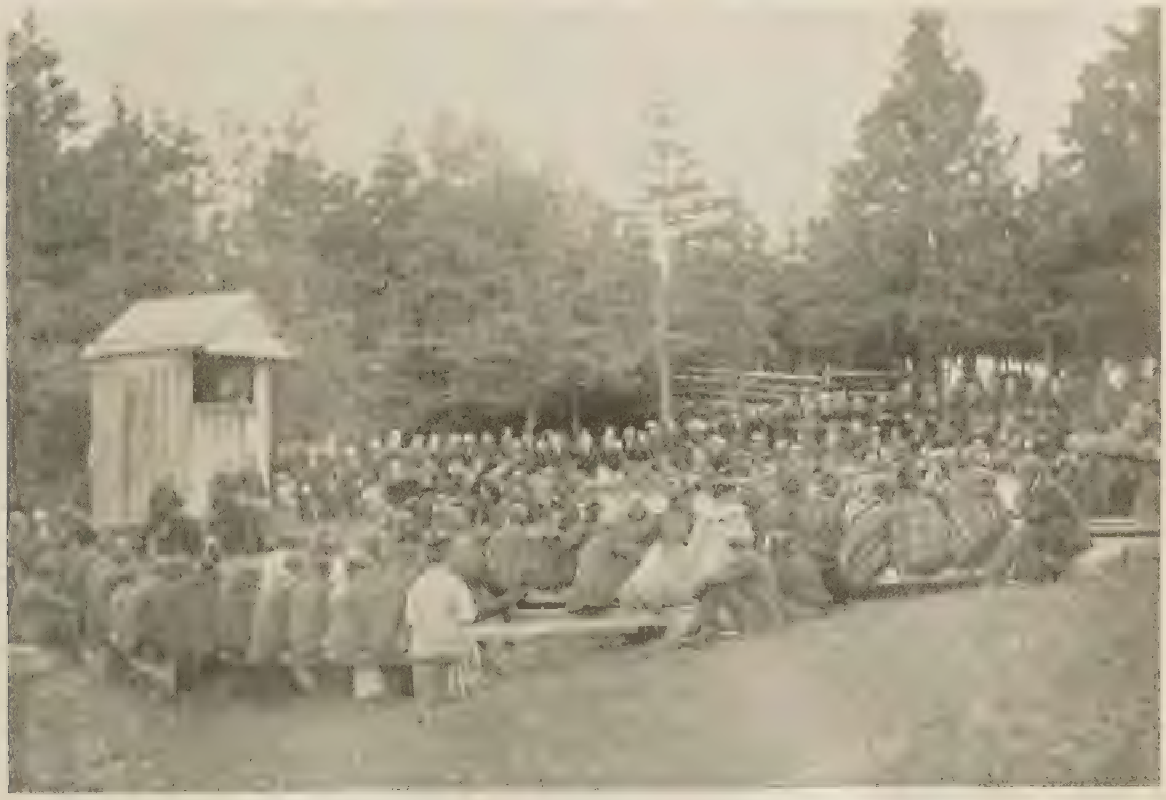
We rode on all that day from North River toward Ingonish, sixty miles north of Baddeck, coming to Smoky Mountain in the afternoon, and pushing our wheels for a mile up its steep and washed-out roadway. The view was exquisite. The mountain rises about nine hundred feet straight up from the Atlantic. Far across we could see the point where Sydney lay, and to the left was a beautiful double bay with the little village of Ingonish lying at the point of the furthest promontory. We coasted down the mountain, were ferried across the first bay—the road stopped there—and went on over a smooth, hard track eight miles to Ingonish, the first bicyclers to reach that far-away village on the North Atlantic.



THE OUT-OF DOOR SACRAMENT

We stayed at Ingonish in a delightful farm-house on the cliffs, with the two bays stretching beneath us and Smoky looming up beyond. In the evening the young fishermen played football on the lawn, and we sat on the grass in an old Indian graveyard close to the house, and watched them until the lamp from the lighthouse twinkled out over the water.

We had planned to take a steamer from Ingonish to Sydney, and wheel from there back to Baddeck, but the steamer was not expected on its regular trip for three days. There was a wreck at Cape North, twenty miles above us, and the steamer was there, and our hosts told us it was possible that it might stop at Ingonish in the afternoon on its way back, so we waited for it. But it did not come, and they thought it would perhaps come down at night and put in at the lower bay, for it blew too hard to cross to Sydney. We started early the next morning to get the steamer if it were there, or to wheel back over Smoky if it were not. Four miles from our starting-point we had our first mishap—my friend's rear tire gave out completely. And there we were, sixty miles from Baddeck. Now the question became very serious—was the steamer at the lower bay or not? We could not see, and the people around did not know, so I left my companion, and "scorched" till the wharf appeared in sight, and there was the "steamer"—a little tugboat—just putting out. I reached the shore in time to yell, "Friend on a bicycle—broken down—will you come around to North Bay and get us?"

THE OLDEST HOUSES IN BADDECK AND THE OLD GAELIC CHURCH

"No–o–o!"

"Give you five dollars!"

"No–o. Do it for ten."

"All right—ten it is. I'll be there as soon as you."

Back again over the road while the steamer crossed the bay. My friend was plodding along toward Ingonish. I passed him, and sent a wagon to pick him up, and soon we were in a dancing boat, with the spray wetting our wheels, pulling out to the anchored tug, and in four hours more we were at the comfortable Sydney Hotel. The next morning another steamer brought us back to Baddeck.

The captain would take only five dollars after all—said ten was too much. He was not a Yankee captain. His only other passengers were the captain and crew of the wrecked Norwegian bark, which had spent eight weeks crossing from Havre, then missed her reckoning, and had gone ashore just south of North Cape instead of clearing it for the mouth of the St. Lawrence. The crew were a queer lot of piratical-looking toughs from as many countries as there were men, and a French peasant cabin-boy with a big round face, a blue blouse, and wooden shoes. The little steamer tossed about, and there were strong smells of pantry combined with the odor of sailors sleeping with their shoes off on the seats and floor of a cabin by eight. I was wet through from my ride, and could not be on deck, but I eagerly sought the smells of the engine-room after a half-hour in the cabin. The Norwegian captain told me the story of his life. He owned the bark—she had cost him two thousand pounds, and was insured only for two-thirds, and the wreck had brought one hundred and sixty dollars at auction. The Norwegian consul at Sydney would send them all home, and at least he would have the chance of seeing his family, which he had not seen for three years, and then only for ten days, and not for four years before that.

We made a trip through the country on the east coast of the Island to Margaree, a beautiful rolling land of farms and quiet villages, and scenery like that of England. I doubt if there is such another country for Macs on the face of the earth, outside of Scotland. After stopping at McKay's store in Baddeck for some supplies, we rode on to dinner at the McLeods', getting a glass of milk at Mrs. McRae's, and staying over night with the hospitable McLeans at Lake Ainslee. There are forty John McLeods in and around Baddeck, none of them known as John McLeod, but each having a nickname usually derived from some small incident in his life. There is one who is associated with a mortgage, and he is known as "Mortgage McLeod," his oldest son being "First Mortgage McLeod," and his next son "Second Mortgage McLeod."

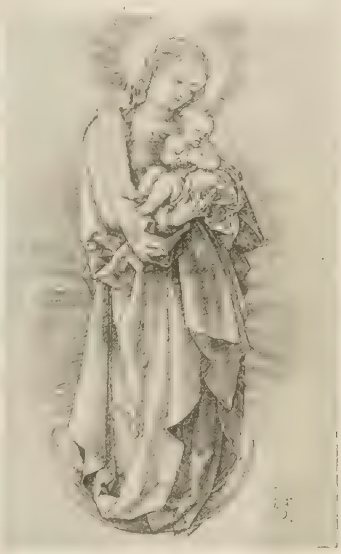
But I had not begun to exhaust the beauties of Cape Breton Island when I found myself getting up one morning at four o'clock, and the carriage coming to take me to the wharf. No, not to take me; it could have my trunk and other impedimenta, but I preferred the wheel, and took my final whirl over Cape Breton roads just as the day began to break, down past the old Gaelic church, along the smooth shore road to where the May Queen was showing signs of life. She was to start at five, but at that hour the captain had not appeared. We waited fifteen minutes for him, then fifteen for a passenger—a young man who seemed to have many friends among the fair sex, for a big wagon-load of them drove up to bid him good-by. When their farewells, hastened by the shrill whistles of the steamer, were thoroughly said, we started for a last trip over the beautiful Bras d'Or. Around the island point where the lamp of the tiny lighthouse had just finished its labors for the night, past Spectacle Island and "Washback" (spelled Watchabaktchkt), and Baddeck faded from view in the glory of the sun as it flushed the cloud-bank in the east with gold and red, and ushered in another day of clear skies and cool, delicious, life-giving air—a companion to all the days I had seen in two weeks of Cape Breton Island.

And not a touch of hay-fever.

ALONG THE SHORE, BADDECK

Albrecht Dürer and the Nativity

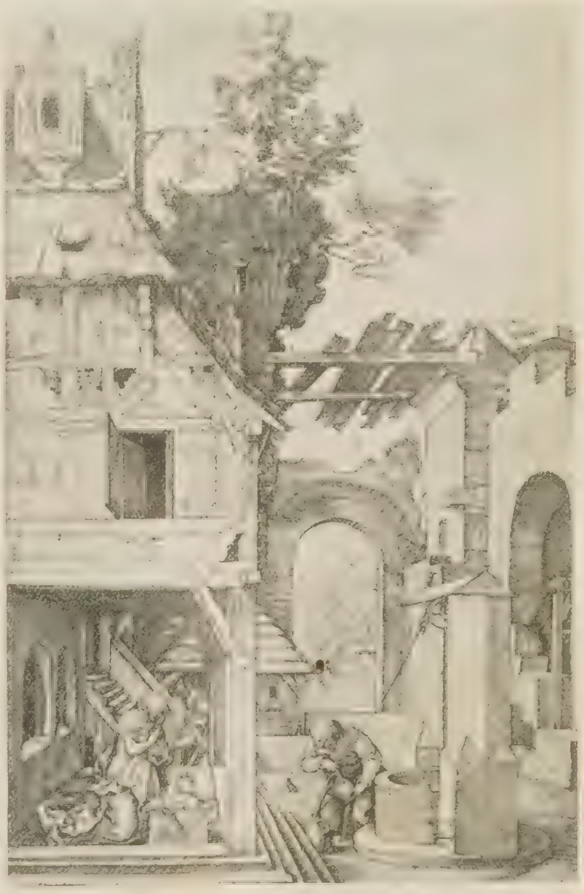
By Elbert Francis Baldwin



More than three hundred and fifty years ago there lived a man whose name and fame the world will not let die. He lived in troublous times, politically and religiously, in a society largely uncouth and unrefined, and in a country divided up into petty princedoms. But, like his rival, Holbein, he had the good fortune to reside in a town whose progress in the arts had excelled that of any other place in Germany—even that of Augsburg, Holbein's home. At the end of the fifteenth century Nuremberg was much as we see it to-day—a place of wonderful picturesqueness and character. Already that mother-art, architecture, had given to the town notable structures, ecclesiastical, municipal, domestic. Then, as everywhere else, architecture inevitably gave birth to sculpture. The Frauenkirche and the churches of St. Lawrence and St. Sebald now became famous, not so much as buildings, but because of their sculptured shrines in stone and wood, the noble work of Adam Krafft and Peter Vischer and Veit Stoss. It was an art-realism which was all about the young Dürer, when with him painting succeeded architecture and sculpture. How naturally his hand turned to the drawing of houses, gates, porches, walls, and how naturally he painted what he had seen as sculpture rather than what he had seen as life! That which had nourished his art-soul from infancy was stronger than he, and hence we find—especially in the second illustration herewith given—an almost literal reproduction of some altarpiece which he may have seen carved in wood.

Again, to the casual or to the careful observer the Dürer work is always expressive—often oppressively expressive—of homely Teutonic life, a quality nowhere more evident than in the artist's representations of the Nativity of our Lord. In them all we see his wife, Agnes, or some other Hausfrau model; in them all the naïveté of Nuremberg customs is evident, but in them all there is a profound harmony, which, coming straight from the heart of the ingenuous artist, comes straight through all the advance of art to our hearts, touching them with power. The idea of making art true to actual, not ideal, life, no matter how much beauty be sacrificed, is also shown in a series of pictures which lead up to the Nativity, namely, the "Life of the Virgin." Like Luther, Dürer was a true Teuton in glorifying family life whenever possible.

In the other accompanying illustrations we discover how painting in Germany was seeking to get away from conventional trammels, as, a century before, it had done in Italy and Flanders. In religious art there was a tendency to depict no longer the exclusively concrete, but to surround the subject with an environment which must needs be that of the painter and not of the subject—since the painter knew little of the costumes and customs of Palestine. Religious representations were now no longer merely altarpieces wherein should be figures only (as in the second of the accompanying illustrations), but veritable easel-pictures, to be shown or hung in guild-rooms as well as in convents, monasteries, and churches. In the well-known "Little Passion"—that monument of genuinely reverential art—we have the nearest approach ever made by any painter to reproducing the Bethlehem environment, as in its figures it seems the most really religious of all treatments. In the largest of the illustrations on this page, however, we see a "Nativity" where the actual scene is nearly lost in the large setting—a setting which represents Nuremberg—yes, and with many a feature of Dürer's own house—but not at all Bethlehem. This engraving on copper is one of the most valued of all the master's works. It was done about twenty years before Dürer's death, as will be seen from the monogram and date hanging where, in a German or English inn, the sign is swung.



No matter what the limitations, Dürer's pictures always show the justice of Grimm's judgment that Dürer was a thinker who painted; we might add, "a painter who thought." He was thus a force in the intellectual world; he was never the delineator of mere emotion. "An unlearned man is like an unpolished mirror," he once told Melanchthon. When told of Dürer's death, Luther said, "You may count him happy that Christ so enlightened him and took him in good time from stormy scenes, destined to become still stormier, so that he who was worthy of seeing only the best should not be compelled to experience the worst." These words transport us into that age when Germany's protesting religious faith was breaking away from Italian bonds, but when reflections from Italy's full sun of the Renaissance were lighting a few of the dark corners in the land beyond the Alps. Yet, interesting as were Dürer's relations with Italians, especially with the Bellini, we find in the Dürer work none of the glamour of southern skies, none of the exuberance of an Italian ideal. On the contrary, realist as he was—a true successor and contemporary of the realist sculptors, whose work compels our admiring wonder—Dürer was no materialist, no Jan Steen, no Zola. His mind was above muck-heaps and barnyards, his spirit was intuitively lofty, and even though his technical skill was not equal to his high thought, he has left us invaluable proofs of that thought in his oil paintings (the "Adoration of the Magi" at Florence deserving high rank among Nativity pictures), his engravings on wood and on copper, his etchings and his drawings. These last are naturally the most interesting of all the works in their revelation of the master.

Prophets of the Christian Faith

II.—The Apostle Paul

By the Rev. George Matheson, D.D.

Whoever has read Dr. Matheson's book, "The Spiritual Development of St. Paul," will understand the peculiar fitness of the choice of Dr. Matheson by The Outlook as writer of this paper in our general series. George Matheson is now about fifty-three years old, is a graduate of the University of Glasgow, has been nearly thirty years in the ministry, and for about ten years pastor of St. Bernard's Church, Edinburgh. His scholarly attainments are the more remarkable in that his sight was lost before he entered the University. Among his best-known books (besides that named above) are "Natural Elements of Revealed Religion," "The Religious Bearings of Evolution," "The Psalmist and the Scientist," "My Aspirations," "Voices of the Spirit," and a volume of "Sacred Songs." In The Outlook for September 7 last will be found, in an English letter from the senior editor, the account of a visit to St. Bernard's, and of the impression made by Dr. Matheson as a preacher. We quote a few words from that article: "In nine years' time he has made St. Bernard's Parish Church one of the famous churches of Edinburgh, and not only do men and women come from all over the city, but strangers come from afar, to hear the now famous blind preacher of Edinburgh. For he is blind—stone blind. A pathetic interest attaches to the service from the moment when he enters, led to the pulpit stairs by his attendant. Mr. Gladstone is reported to have said, 'What the audience give me in spray, I give them back in drops.' The audience can give nothing to the blind preacher, unless by some mysterious telepathic communication. He cannot know whether the church is full or empty, nor whether the congregation is attentive or listless. His inspiration must be in himself, his theme, or his God; it cannot be in his auditors." The first article in this series—"What is a Prophet?" by Lyman Abbott—will be found in The Outlook for December 14. Following articles in the series will be by Dr. Marcus Dods, Professor Adolph Harnack, Dean Fremantle, Dean Farrar, Principal Fairbairn, Dr. A. V. G. Allen, Dr. T. T. Munger, and Professor A. C. McGiffert.

Rev. George Matheson, D.D.

The figures of the New Testament are representative men; each stands for some phase of the soul. Matthew is the type of conservatism, "that it might be fulfilled." Mark is the symbol of present action, "straightway he commanded." Luke is the embodiment of human sympathy. John is the love of the ideal. Nathaniel is the child; Nicodemus is the student; Peter is the youth; Thomas is the reflective and somewhat careworn man. No portrait in this gallery is without its special significance.

What is Paul? It seems at first sight equivalent to asking "What is Shakespeare?" It appears as if the only word which would describe him is myriad-mindedness. And yet, to my mind, the remarkable feature about Paul is not variety but unity—not the diversity of his experiences, but the one thread which connects them. If I were asked to state in a single phrase what Paul represents, I would say, "The pilgrim's progress." I would say that his life, as indicated in the historical order of his epistles, describes the normal course through which each Christian is to journey in his passage from the scene of shadows into the happy land of Beulah.

I say, "the normal course." But the point I wish to emphasize is that to Paul himself it was very abnormal. He was the initiator of that which has since become chronic and habitual. The course proposed for the Old Testament pilgrims was the very opposite of that prescribed for Paul. Theirs was a march from the desert into the promised land; Paul's was a progress from the promised land into the desert. They began with the valley, passed up to the plain, and ended on the height; he began with the height, passed down to the plain, and ended with the valley. They proceeded from law to love; he descended from love to law. They set up their ladder on the earth and tried to reach the heavens; he fixed his ladder in the heavens and tried to reach the earth.

It was not only from the men of the Old Testament that Paul was thus distinguished; his experience was equally marked out from the original Apostles—the men of transition between the old and the new. These proceeded from the human to the divine. They gazed first on the Christ of the flesh. They followed the steps of the Son of man from the cradle to the cross; when the crown came, their pilgrimage was over. But Paul began with the crown. His first sight of the Christ was the Christ glorified. He knew the power of His resurrection before he felt the fellowship of His sufferings. His progress was a progress backward. He had begun with the light of immortality; he had to retrace his steps to take up the life of time. It was an abnormal experience, though it was to become universal. He was the first of the new régime, and for a while the only one. He says he was "born out of due time." I understand him to mean, not that he was born too late, but that he was born too soon. He claimed to have a vision of the Christian life which was above his age, before his day, in advance of his contemporaries. He claimed to be the follower of One whose progress had been from heaven to earth, who had begun with the form of God and ended with the form of a servant, who had emptied himself step by step into sympathy with things beneath him, and paused not, rested not, until he had made the human divine. The progress of St. Paul was like that of his Master—a progress downward.

He begins in the air—in the other world. He has been caught up to meet his Lord, and the earth disappears from his view. He sees nothing but the second advent; he hears nothing but the last trump. All perspective has vanished; the end is at the door. Christ is coming; in a little while he will be here. What is this world to any man? Before his descending shout of triumph its proudest pomps shall melt away. Before the first gaze of the man of Tarsus there floated the form of only one Christ—the Christ of resurrection. The light which smote him from heaven put out all the candles of earth. Everything below that sun became a thing of insignificance. The kingdoms of the world and the glory of them vanished like smoke. Their inhabitants became as grasshoppers, their events as water-drops. The only bells heard were the bells of the New Jerusalem, and they summoned all men to a cathedral above.

Then there came a cloud; I know not when, I know not how. I only know it was somewhere between the Thessalonians and the Galatians. In his letter to Corinth he speaks of it as a thorn; in his letter to Rome he describes it as a warfare; both are introduced as retrospects of a dark, and to some extent a surmounted, past. The cause of the cloud I cannot tell; probably it was something external. But the main point is that it was something which made Paul feel himself less ready for his change. The second advent moves further off; the world looms nearer. He finds that the light which fell upon him at Damascus was like the deluge; it had only covered the old world—not annihilated it. There were two natures within him—Saul and Paul. For the first time in his life he felt thoroughly bad. What right had he to struggle? Had he not tasted of the heavenly gift; had he not seen the Lord? Where was the blessedness he had known in Arabia? Where was the joy with which he had written to Thessalonica? Where was the exultation with which he had been taken up to the third heaven? What was this that had come to him—this flesh lusting against the spirit, this law in his members warring against the law of his mind? Was not this spiritual death? The strong soul of yesterday beat upon his breast and cried, "O wretched man that I am!"

RAPHAEL'S ST. PAUL. FROM THE SANTA BARBARA PAINTING IN THE BOLOGNA GALLERY

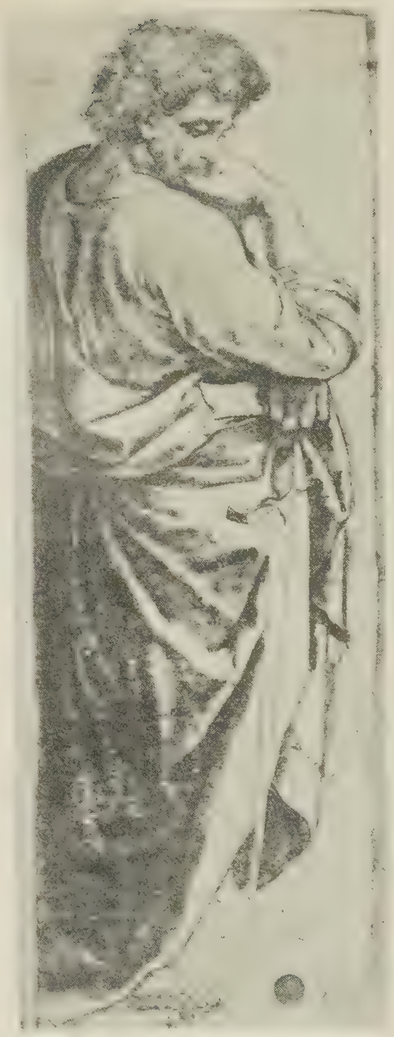
Then came a new gleam of glory, and it came, not from the third heaven, but from the very mist into which Paul had wandered. It brought a great message to his soul. It said: Your seeming fall is a rise. You are further removed from death now than you were in your hour of immediate vision. The true sign of spiritual life is spiritual dissatisfaction. There is nothing which justifies a man like his belief in the existence of a beauty which he himself cannot reach.

Paul has come a step down his ladder, which means a step up his pilgrimage. He has come nearer to the earth. He has passed from sight to faith—from an ideal of perfect satisfaction to an ideal which eludes him by its glory. But already another step was preparing. What was that glory in Christ which had hitherto eluded him? It was love. The moment Paul said, "I believe in love," he had put out his foot for a further step downward. Hitherto, however beautiful, his experience had been mainly personal. He had found rest to his own soul. But that is not the half of the Christian life. Paul's deepest Christianity was yet to come. He had begun with sight; his passage from the Thessalonians to the Galatians had been a passage from sight to faith; his passage from the Galatians to the Corinthians is a passage from faith to love. You say "it was a very short time in which to make such a transition." Yes; but the transitions of God's Spirit are, in their last result, almost momentary. I can well-nigh hear the very hour strike in which he passed over the line. The man who wrote the magnificent hymn of the thirteenth chapter of 1st Corinthians has made a leap; and when he touches the ground it is no longer the old ground, but a plane higher in God's sight, because lower in the sight of man.

Can you fail to observe that from this time onward the teaching of Paul takes another channel ? it becomes less personal, more humanitarian. Even his view of predestination is to my mind the result of his new breadth, not of his old narrowness. He sees that a mother's love is always predestinating love. When a mother foreknows that her child is about to come into the world, even before its birth, she conforms it to an image ; she figures to herself what she would like it to be. That is, in my opinion, the metaphor which glittered before the eyes of the great Apostle when he proclaimed that the All-Father had predestinated his children "to be conformed to the image of his Son." Divine Love, foreknowing that its children were about to be born, ere ever they had a character, ere ever they had a being, planned for them a destiny of glory, figured them in the likeness of the most beautiful thing it knew, and said within itself, "I baptize them into the name of Jesus." Nay, was not baptism into Christ's name itself simply the predestination of love—the expression in the heart of the Divine Parent of a great, an unquenchable desire that the new convert should rise to heights altogether unearthly, and attain to nothing less than the image of the Son ?



RAPHAEL'S ST. PAUL

The Entire Figure

Paul has now reached what he himself calls the glory of the cross. He had begun with the crown—the sight of the Christ of resurrection. He had passed from sight to faith—the vision of an ideal which was beyond him, and after which he must strive. He has now come from faith to love—the perception that others have an ideal as well as he. Has Paul now arrived at the terminus ? No. He has reached the knowledge that the cross is the glory of God ; but there is a step beyond even that—he must "rejoice in hope of the glory of God." Faith in Christ was the parent of love, because it was the belief in love ; but Paul makes the further discovery that love is the parent of hope. He says, in so many words, that the reason why he is not ashamed to hope is that the love of God is shed abroad in his heart (Romans v., 5). He was of a spirit not naturally sanguine ; I have heard him called a pessimist. In his Epistle to the Thessalonians his main hope for the world seems to have been that a divine power is keeping things from being worse ; and truly he was right. But when the enthusiasm of the cross burst upon him, hope had a deeper revelation to bring. We again hear the clock strike as he passes the line. He had spoken of justification by faith ; he had called love "a more excellent way ;" he was now to cry, "We are saved by hope." Love was the parent of hope. No doubt the parent was greater than the child ; yet the child was indispensable to the support of the parent. And, with this latest birth in the soul of Paul, there comes a widening of his horizon. There is nothing which tells such tales as a letter, and often most in the things it does not say. Already in the Epistle to the Romans we begin to catch breezes—currents of air which apprise us that there is an opening somewhere not far away. As we advance beyond the boundaries of that Epistle, the current freshens. He tells the Philippians in express terms that the purpose of God's heart was that every man in every place should bend his knee in prayer. A few miles more and we are out in the open, with the gusts of the great sea around us. As we pass from the coasts of Philippi we are in a new element—an element of breadth, I had almost said of secularism, an element which increases in strength, from the outpouring of the letter to Ephesus, until those notes of pastoral counsel which speak the last farewell.

What is this new element in Paul ? I have called it secularism ; it would be more correct to call it the extension of the sacred. Hitherto, Paul had seen in Christ merely the head of a body of members. But now he began to see more. Christ was the head of the Church, but was he not also head of the State—of all principalities and powers ? Was not this magnificent Roman Empire, however unconsciously to itself, already the kingdom of God ? Was not Cæsar as much the servant of Christ as he was, albeit he knew it not ? Was this world a secular system at all ? Was the distinction between Church and State a real one ? would not the fullness of time show that all things had been "gathered together in Christ"? As he approached Rome, and as the spectacle of Roman unity swam before his eyes, he asked himself if Christ's kingdom would be less incorporative than this kingdom of man. He asked himself if this Roman unity was really the work of Cæsar, if it was not itself only a product of that divine order which had arranged thrones and principalities and powers. So asking, so thinking, Paul stepped into the world again. He came back to the haunts from which his conversion had lifted him : he claimed them for Christ. He found the land of Beulah on the earthly side. For the second time in his life he preached the things which once had been alien to him. Very beautiful to my mind is the passage, Ephesians iii., 14 and 15, in which he declares that the idea of family life is modeled after the relationship of the Father in heaven. Beautiful, because I think there was a time when Paul would not have said it—a time of storm and stress below, of dazzling light above, when the radiance of the heavenly vision had blinded him to earthly ties. Beautiful, too, because it is no accidental utterance. It is the keynote of his latest song. If his morning carol is to the Christ of the heavens, his evening lay is to the Christ of the home ; if he begins with love on the wing, he ends with love in the nest. All his latest notes are of home.

I cannot better conclude than by placing side by side Paul's earliest and latest ideals of Christian joy—the one from his first letter, the other almost from his last. He says to the Thessalonians, "We shall be caught up together in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air ;" he says to Titus, "The grace that bringeth salvation hath appeared unto all men, teaching to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world." Do I say that at the close of his pilgrimage he has found his first experience to be untrue ? No ; rather for the first time has he discovered its real value. He has found that the advantage of going up is the new strength we get for coming down. The bird that at dawn sings in the uplands may be heard in the afternoon on the ledge of an office wall ; but the song on the office wall has been learned in the uplands. Moses had the vision of Nebo before coming down to the common lot of men ; but the vision of Nebo helped him to come down. Paul's first revelation was the sight of immortality, but the sight of immortality gave value to the earth ; and he who began with the vision of the ascending Christ was bound sooner or later to recognize the possibilities of "this present world."

The Higher Life of American Cities

By Theodore Roosevelt

Under this general title The Outlook will publish a series of illustrated articles on that part of the life of typical American cities which concerns united Christian and philanthropic work, the development of the Good Government idea and municipal reform of every kind, the efforts for a more wholesome and attractive home life for the people, and the extension of library, musical, and educational facilities. This introductory article by Mr. Roosevelt will be followed by an article on "The Higher Life of Chicago," by Mr. Melville E. Stone, Manager of the Associated Press; one on New York, by Dr. Albert Shaw, of the "Review of Reviews:" on Boston, by the Rev. Edward Everett Hale, D.D.; on New Orleans, by Miss Grace King; on Philadelphia, by Mr. Talcott Williams; and on St. Louis, by the Rev. John Snyder.

THE first lesson to be learned by every citizen who desires to bring about a higher life in our American cities is that he must take an active part in managing the affairs of his own city. He has got to take some little trouble to do this, but if he is worth his salt, and possesses that healthy combativeness which ought to be aroused in every decent man by the insolence of evil, he will soon find municipal politics extremely interesting. After he has helped inaugurate some philanthropic movement, or helped conduct two or three checkered campaigns, whether to carry through a particular measure of civic reform, to beat a particular rascal in public life, or to prevent other rascals from beating some given honest man, he will probably grow to feel that the duty of doing his share of the work of self-government has a pleasant side.

Such a citizen must keep steadily before him the fact that if he is going to accomplish anything of merit he must, on the one hand, keep a high ideal, and, on the other, remember always the words of Abraham Lincoln, and strive, when he cannot obtain the best, to obtain the best possible, instead of, through folly and vanity, choosing the worst.

The man must work, and not merely talk about working, or criticise workers. To sit at home, read one's favorite paper, and scoff at the misdeeds of the men who do things is easy, but is markedly ineffective. It is what evil men count upon the good men's doing; and hitherto there has been this justification for such a belief among bad men—namely, that, as a rule, the corrupt men have been perfectly content to let their opponents monopolize all the virtue, while they themselves have been permitted to monopolize all the efficiency. Rather than sit at home alone and do nothing, it is better that the friend of decent government should go out and meet other men who think as he does, and combine with them; but let him remember here also, that though occasionally good is done when two or three hundred excellent gentlemen of refined tastes meet in a parlor and listen to papers on city government, yet this is not in itself by any means sufficient. We need such work, and real good is accomplished by doing it; but it is ineffective if not supplemented by work of an entirely different kind. The man who in the long run will count for most in bettering municipal life is the man who actually steps down into the hurly-burly, who is not frightened by the sweat and the blood and the blows of friends and foes; who "haunts not the fringy edges of the fight, but the pell-mell of men." He must meet foes as well as friends, and, above all, he must get accustomed to acting with men who may be persuaded to work with him for a common object, but whose ideas are not identical with his own.

There are many different ways in which a man or a woman can work for the higher life of American cities, and it would be worse than folly to expect the one who can do most in a certain line to devote an equal amount of attention to another line. The field opened to intelligent philanthropy is almost boundless, and is continually widened by the antics of the unintelligent philanthropist. A very great field is opened to the man or woman devoted to educational reform. The published studies of Mr. Jacob Riis show what almost infinite labor could be expended with profit by those willing to devote a portion of their time to bettering the material conditions of life for the bulk of the populations of our large cities. The improvement of tenement-houses; the establishment of many small parks, of free libraries, baths, concerts, and picture shows; the larger development of the noble work now done by the social, college, and university settlements; in short, all movements in the interest of making the life of the day-laborer in our cities less onerous and more wholesome—these are subjects which may well claim the attention of all those who would advance the higher life of American cities.

The special and peculiar work—of constantly growing importance—now played by women, is a department to be treated by itself; so also the part played by clergymen.

There are not a few reforms so important that it would be hard to speak of any as pre-eminently necessary; but at least it can be said that there is greater room for reform in our political life than almost anywhere else. There are shortcomings enough and to spare on all sides; but compared to the proper standard we fall further below in politics than in almost any other branch of our life or labor. Moreover, political life is something in which every man, indeed every woman, should take an active and intelligent interest. There is no other reform for which the entire population should work, or indeed could work; but every man, worth being an American citizen at all, is bound, if he does his duty, to try to do his part in politics. The life of the home, the man's relation as husband and father, the woman's as wife and mother—these are all that should come before our political life. In the long run, no amount of material prosperity, no commercial success, can atone for the debasement of public life, for the lowering of political ideals.

Our politics have been in many ways so bad that it is necessary to go back to basic principles and to teach what should be elementary truths. To the first of these truths I have already alluded. Every man must work. In the long run it is the doer of deeds, not the critic, who counts. Again, he must work conscientiously. Not many years ago a then famous politician declared that the Decalogue and the Golden Rule had no place in political life. The flippant cynicism of such a statement commended it to a certain order of cheap intelligence; but, as a matter of fact, the first thing to be learned by any man who proposes to do decent work is that the Decalogue and Golden Rule have precisely the same place in public as in private life, and that until a man believes in applied morality he is certain to be a merely noxious public servant. Whether a man is a party man or an independent, he must, if a good citizen, make honesty the first requisite in a public officer, and must refuse to support any man who is not honest. Moreover, his virtue must not be of the milk-and-water kind, if he is going to do good work politically. If he does not possess the virile virtues, courage, hardiness, resolution; if he is not willing to give good blows and receive them, he cannot expect to accomplish anything of permanent good. In the third place, he must possess common sense. If he allows the friends of bad government to monopolize the intelligence of the community, he is going to get beaten most certainly.

The recent municipal election in New York shows this; for New York has been but a type of American cities in many ways, and, I regret to say, in no way more markedly than in the low tone of its municipal government. It has also been a typical American city in its occasional spasms of virtuous action. It is owing to one of these spasms that it now has a clean and decent administration of public affairs. But, unless honest men grow to learn that their interest in public affairs must be habitual and not spasmodic, and unless they learn further that when they do take habitual interest in what goes on in the city, they must show ordinary intelligence and common sense, no less than conscientiousness, all we can expect is what has been aptly called an occasional insurrection of virtue.

In 1894, by a combination of good citizens of all parties supporting a ticket which contained representatives of all parties, the corrupt ring government of the city was overthrown. In the following year this same corrupt ring triumphed. Its triumph was partly due to antagonisms aroused by a course of action which will be touched upon toward the end of this article. But it was in part due to the silliness of many excellent people, who could not see that it was worse than foolish to throw back the city into the hands of evil men because they themselves had ideas of civic morality so advanced that the mass of good men had not yet come to understand them. Most students of political life are a unit in their belief that municipal politics should be divorced from National or State politics, and many practical politicians of the better sort are inclined to agree with them. An immense mass of good people have not yet grown to understand this. There are plenty of Democrats and Republicans who will vote for a mixed ticket of honest and decent Democrats and Republicans, against a straight ticket of their own party machine, but who will not vote as yet for a ticket composed of men with whom their own party has nothing to do. It would be a good day for New York if its citizens, in municipal matters, would positively decline to take into account whether a man was a Democrat or a Republican. The way to bring this day about is obviously to get men accustomed to voting indiscriminately for Democrats and Republicans, if they are decent men. Such a ticket was put up in New York in 1895. Against it stood the old ring ticket, the ticket of that organization whose name has become the synonym of political corruption in every civilized town, so much so that when Carlyle, in writing of the Norsemen, wished to speak of a certain stage of unwholesome politics, he naturally turned for purposes of illustrative comparison to Tammany Hall. Every consideration of sound political morality dictated the hearty support of the ticket opposed to Tammany Hall. Nevertheless, a large number of the men who had been leaders in the effort to work the political regeneration of the city either declined to support this ticket in its entirety, or even supported some other of the various small tickets which are always run in every political contest. The effect of that action was to confuse the minds of many good voters. They failed to see clearly what the issue was, and for the most part did not vote at all. Many other men who, if the friends of decency had presented a united front, would have been shamed into supporting them, gladly took advantage of their division to support Tammany Hall. Yet other men announced that they would support certain names, but not all, the natural result being that the friends of the candidates whom these men did not support busied themselves industriously in knifing the candidates whom they did. The result was the defeat of the fusion ticket.

It would be difficult to wish a more excellent object-lesson upon the need of what may be called "team-play" in politics. There must be some loyalty and some organization among good men, or they are at the mercy of the bad. It is impossible that a thousand intelligent men can ever nominate a ticket every name on which will be acceptable to every one of the thousand men. But, if they are going to accomplish anything, they have got to support the ticket solidly. It is very necessary that the managers of the machine should understand that decent men will not tolerate dishonest action on their part, and stand ready to bolt any ticket if such action is rendered necessary by considerations of decency and morality. It is no less necessary, however, that it should be understood that this action of bolting is not normal, but is to be resorted to only when fully justified; and this applies quite as much to bolting a fusion ticket representing the best thought of the decent men of both parties as to bolting a regular party ticket in State or National affairs. In every case where a man bolts he does a certain amount of damage, if only by weakening his influence for good with the organization which he leaves, and he should always consider this and make up his mind whether the amount of good he does in some given case will or will not be outweighed by the impending evil. As a matter of fact, he will find that circumstances continually arise in which the conflicting elements have different weight, so that it would be right for him to bolt at one time and wrong for him to bolt at another. In the present instance serious harm was done, and, so far as any unprejudiced observer can see, not a particle of good accomplished. Many Republicans and Democrats who were reluctant to enter into any combination with one another found their views strengthened, and it will be a difficult matter to prevent them from running straight tickets in the future. If they do run such straight tickets the fault will rest primarily with those who failed to support the fusion ticket this year.

Above I alluded to one of the elements of weakness in the reform movement this year. By this I meant the alienation of a certain number of voters because of the attitude of the administration in honestly enforcing the laws. This brings me to the final branch of my subject.

Those who have read Dr. Shaw's excellent book on "Municipal Government in England," and who know anything of American municipal life, must have been struck by the extraordinary civic systems which seem to work so well in the English municipalities. Speaking roughly, and translating the English terminology into our own, it may be said that many of these municipalities are ruled by elective Boards of Aldermen which have absolute power of appointing and removing all the officers of the government. Imagine the condition of New York or Chicago if its Board of Aldermen could appoint and remove all the heads of departments and all subordinates! The wildest corruption of the days of Tweed would be surpassed if we introduced this feature of the English municipal system. There are various facts, especially those connected with the suffrage, which tend to produce an entirely different working of the system in England; but the great reason why the system works well there is that the men who administer it are honest and have traditions of good government behind them, and because the laws are enforced as a matter of course. Socially, the English cities make a much worse showing than ours as regards certain kinds of brutality and vice; but in official honesty they are far and away our superiors. In our American municipalities there are certain changes of law which should be made; but no change of the law will go to the root of the matter. We have got to have honest officials to administer the laws, and the laws themselves must be administered honestly and impartially before there can be any permanent betterment in our conditions of municipal life.

As to the first point, the need of honest officials, every one admits it theoretically; the trouble is we have got to insist upon the admission being practical. As a corollary to it we must insist upon all of the minor officials whose duties are merely ministerial being appointed purely for their merits, and being retained exactly as long as they do their duty well. Until we take it as a matter of course that a policeman, or a laborer on the public works, or a clerk in the Dock Department, is appointed purely because of capacity, and is retained without regard to his politics just so long as he does his duty faithfully, we cannot expect to get proper service from the Departments.

But, above all, public officers must enforce the laws. This, again, is one of those basic principles about which it seems hardly possible to argue. It is hard indeed for a man who is both honest and intelligent to tolerate the attitude of those men who deliberately claim the right to violate the laws and who demand that the sworn officials of the Government connive at such violation. Yet such was the attitude of an immense number of voters at the last election in New York City. Such was the attitude of many of the newspapers, even of those that were ostensibly anti-Tammany; and it was on this issue of the dishonest enforcement of the law that Tammany won its victory. The point upon which the battle happened to be waged in New York was the liquor law. Under the statute the sale of liquor in New York City is forbidden on Sundays. This particular law had always been partially and corruptly enforced in New York, immunity being given to the saloon-keepers who paid blackmail. The new Police Board, as in duty bound, enforced the law, and a very large number of voters, notably among the Germans, deliberately announced that they prized the right to drink beer at hours when it was forbidden by law more than honesty or decency, and that they would vote for any party, no matter how corrupt, if it would agree that its officials should violate their sworn oaths of office and connive at lawbreaking. It is hard to speak in temperate language of such a position.

The question at issue was really of infinitely more importance than whether beer shall or shall not be sold on Sundays—it was the question upon the final answer to which depends the continuance of the Republic. If public officers are to execute the laws at their caprice, or at the caprice of a section of their constituents, then we may not only expect to see corruption flourish in our great cities, to see the growth of a blackmailed and lawbreaking body of liquor-sellers, and the growth of venality among public officials and of indifference to law among citizens, but we may expect to see in other communities the white-capper and the lyncher flourish, and crimes of every kind go unpunished unless punished by the exercise of the right of private vengeance. The one all-important foundation of our system of orderly liberty is obedience to law.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT

Theodore Roosevelt: A Sketch

So distinct a personal impression of Mr. Roosevelt is conveyed by the member of The Outlook staff who secured the preceding article that we publish his informal report without further explanation:

This afternoon I called on Mr. Roosevelt with a stenographer. Although we had arranged the meeting by appointment, I found that a great many other people expected to see him at that time. A few moments after my card was taken to his inner office, the door opened and Mr. Roosevelt shot out, stopped short, and said, "Will you excuse me a moment?" Whereupon of course we said we would. In five or ten minutes he was back again with "Will you excuse me for another moment?" and again we said we would. This went on for three-quarters of an hour, but at last our opportunity came. We were no sooner seated in the private office, however, than Chief Conlin came in on some important matter. A policeman belonging to a distant precinct had been drunk, and drunk in his uniform, too. The idea of his reeling around the streets and disgracing the service was too much for Mr. Roosevelt, and this matter was dispatched very quickly and summarily. It was an interesting juxtaposition of two faces—those of Conlin and Roosevelt as they sat facing each other. The one had many marks of physical wear and tear, and yet was a face good to look upon. The face of the younger man spoke of splendid health, vigor, virility, everything that goes to make up the physical man; but it spoke far more clearly of that which does not always accompany physical well-being, namely, mental equipoise and will-power, decision quick and sharp and resolutely enforced.

One instinctively thought of Mr. Roosevelt's books on sport in the Rocky Mountains, and remembered how much such big-game hunting must have contributed to the development of a physique which would have been remarkable enough without any development. Who shall say that some of the rare personal force of this strong executive does not come from attention to athletics and outdoor life? This impression was further emphasized by the explosive way which the President of the Board of Police Commissioners has of talking. No sooner had Mr. Conlin put his face in the door than it was "Hello—Chief!" the syllables being projected like steam from the piston of a locomotive. This directness characterizes Mr. Roosevelt's every word and act. There is no trifling with a man who believes in such explosive syllables, monosyllables for the most part—the shorter the words the better for him.

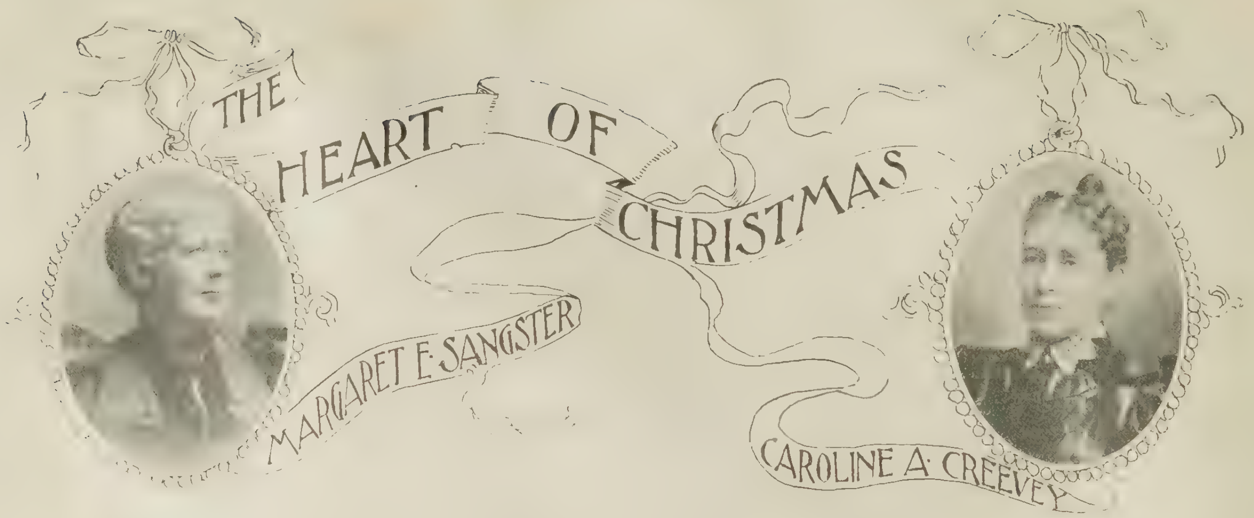
When he began to dictate his article, he stopped for a moment, looked at us, and said, "Yes," and then shouted, "I think I can—I will!"—with boyish glee, but certainly with a man's decision. It is sometimes alarming to see a man thus think aloud, but we learn to love a person for it. Mr. Roosevelt then began an interminable walk about his apartment, up and down, from side to side, and round and round. He would make several circuits of the room without saying a word, and then suddenly break out in a torrent of eloquence. At other times he would measure his words carefully.

Then the officer on guard came in with a bundle of letters, and Mr. Roosevelt would run through them for a moment. Once he looked up, and, with a contemptuous gesture, dashed the letter on the floor, and said, "There's another! Three-quarters of my mail to-day has consisted of anonymous letters."

"You see, my time is not my own," Mr. Roosevelt would always say at the frequent interruptions. Perhaps Commissioner Parker needed his counsel on some point that must be decided at once. Perhaps the telephone bell would ring and some bit of news would be communicated from a distant station. Then Mr. Roosevelt would put his mouth to the receiver standing on his desk, and we would hear one side of such a conversation: "Yes. Who is this? Tell me your name. Oh, yes! What do you want? What? Yes. All right. You send that roundsman here to-morrow morning at half-past nine and I'll fix him."

Mr. Roosevelt's own words elsewhere abundantly define his character, and show the value of the physical, mental, and moral integrity, force, and independence of the present President of the Board of Police Commissioners of New York City.

New York is a type of American cities, all of which are more or less misgoverned. The entire country is receiving an object-lesson from the strong sense of duty which Mr. Roosevelt shows in enforcing the laws at any cost.



A PLAY FOR THE CHILDREN, IN ONE ACT

CHARACTERS:

Catherine Watson, } Sisters.
May Watson, }
Lucinda Matthews.
Barbara Moore.
Heart of Christmas, a Fairy.
First Voice, }
Second Voice, } Christmas Music.
Third Voice, }
Spirit of Good Will, }
Spirit of Good Cheer, } Christmas Spirits.
Spirit of Love, }
Elf of Fun and Frolic, } Christmas Elves.
Elf of the Christmas Tree, }
Nita, } Two Poor Little Children.
Franz, }

Scene.—A parlor in the Watsons' house. Lucinda and Barbara in calling costume are sipping a cup of chocolate with the sisters. The four girls are members of the same Sunday-school class. A letter has been received from their teacher, which Lucinda reads:

Lucinda.

"My dear Girls: Christmas is very near. Do you not almost hear the joy-bells ringing? I know your hearts are full of the Christmas spirit. I want you to experience the joy of giving. And that you cannot do without sacrifice. I know a poor, respectable German family. Christmas means a great deal to them. But this year their papa is in the hospital with a broken hip. He was a painter, and fell from a high scaffold. The mother works out by the day, sometimes, when she can find work. There are a baby of ten months and two poor little waifs of six and eight years. Will you ask your parents to give you the money instead of the most expensive present they have purposed for you, and will you join me in giving these children a happy Christmas? Will you, dear girls, lovingly, cheerfully?—and gratify your devoted friend, Emma Brown."

Well, girls, what do you say?

May. I think it would be perfectly lovely.

Barbara. And I.

Lucinda. I guess I am willing.

Catherine. Now, what a set of geese you are! Give up your best Christmas present for those German brats? They have no business in this country, anyway. They wouldn't be here if I had the making of our immigrant laws.

Lucinda. They come here to better their condition.

May. Yes, poor things!

Catherine. Why, the matter is very simple. They are born in a low station, and Providence designs they should stay there.

Barbara. Oh, Kate, not if they can get out of it.

Catherine. They can't get out of it. They oughtn't to try. Let them know their place.

Barbara. How would you like it?

Catherine. That's idiotic. I wasn't born there, was I? Why, if they can rise, let them. But this man, now, is probably a worthless, beer-soaked German. He was drunk when he fell.

May. But the mother is to be pitied.

Catherine. How do you know she doesn't make a mighty good living at the wash-tub? It isn't a case that appeals to me.

May I'm awfully sorry for the baby.

Catherine. The baby would enjoy a Christmas-tree hugely at ten months old! Girls, do you know what my most expensive present is to be? A gold watch. Fancy! And May is to have a chain bracelet. Think we are going to give up those things?

Barbara. No, I suppose not. I was going to get a lovely blue rocking-chair for my room, and I need it awfully.

Catherine. Well, have it then, goosey! Miss Brown's a good enough teacher, but we can't pin to her in everything.

Lucinda. I suppose, unless we all do it, Miss Brown won't care to have any of us.

Catherine. Then it's settled. You write to her, May.

May. I don't quite like to. She will feel sorry.

Catherine. You write, Barb.

Barbara. Excuse me from an unpleasant task.

Lucinda. Kate, you write, and we'll all sign our names.

Catherine. All right. I'll do it to-night, and bring it to you to-morrow.

May. I am not sure I shall sign it.

Catherine. Oh, yes, you will. I'll talk her into it. I always do.

May. I'm afraid that's so.

[Lucinda and Barbara rising to go.

Barbara. Well, good-by, girls. Had we better think this over?

Catherine. Not a bit of it. We mustn't be fickle. (They kiss each other; Barbara and Lucinda go out, accompanied by May. Catherine resumes her seat, and begins to sew on some fancy-work.) I hope May will stay out a while. I want to finish this bureau-scarf for her. The idea! Give up my watch! If it had not been for my firmness, those girls would have yielded. I know I am a resolute character. I am born to lead. Not much of a trouble to lead May. She is much weaker than I. (A pause.)

Enter the Heart of Christmas, a fairy. She should be dressed in soft, white, flowing material, with flowers in her loose hair. She must carry a wand, to the lower end of which a stick of crayon is fastened. At first Kate does not see her.

Heart of Christmas.

'Tis living for others, not living for self,
That flushes the cheek, that brings light to the eye.
'Tis the miser, poor creature, who hoards up his pelf,
And withers and starves as the slow years creep by.

But the dear heart of Christmas can cradle the world.
Oh! list in the sky how the sweet angels sing!
'Tis the banner of Love that is widely unfurled,
And Love from the heavens the dear angels bring.

Good-afternoon, Miss Watson.

Catherine. Who speaks! I thought I was alone. Dear me, what a sweet creature! Who are you?

Heart of Christmas. My name is the Heart of Christmas. I have come to see you in order to enter your heart, if you will let me.

Catherine (aside. Sounds like a quotation from Miss Brown's letter.) I appreciate your good intentions, but decline with thanks.

H. of C. Then you can have no real Christmas.

Catherine. Oh, yes, I shall. I shall have lots of pretty presents.

H. of C. But Christmas is not all receiving.

Catherine. Of course I know that. I shall spend all my month's allowance for presents to give to May and everybody. And mamma will help me out if I need more money.

H. of C. Poor child! You know nothing, after all, about giving.

Catherine. Why, I could spend two months' allowance, if that would please you.

H. of C. No, no. Let the Christmas spirits enter your heart, and you will know what I mean. "Shall I give of that which costs me nothing?"

Catherine (coldly). I will ring for the maid to show you out. You are somewhat meddlesome.

H. of C. (sternly). Not yet. I have a mission to accomplish before I go. Know you not, child, that you are surrounded by three walls? (Draws a circle around Catherine with chalk.)

Poor captive, hemmed in iron bands,
Self-woven, linked in stubborn strands
The frost is lying on the wold,
But colder frost is here, so cold!

(Draws a second circle outside the first.)

One might escape through rift or break
In that first wall; the second shows

No loophole; child, you cannot shake
  This barrier down, so strong it grows.

(Draws a third circle outside the second.)

And sadly, sadly, now I see
This third and bristling abatis;
On every side it holds you fast,
Poor little prisoner, caged at last.

Catherine. What nonsense! I a prisoner! These are only chalk-marks.

H. of C. Overstep them, and come to me, if you can.

[Catherine tries. She must act as if there were a real wall around her, and find that she cannot overstep the chalk-line.

Catherine. Mamma! Help, mamma! May! I think I am bewitched.

H. of C. Mamma and May do not hear you. You are in my power.

Catherine. Oh, then, kind fairy, help me out.

H. of C. I cannot.

Catherine. Oh, please do. (Kneels.)

H. of C. No one can take down those walls except yourself. But I will see what I can do to help you. (Claps her hands and summons Christmas Music.)

Oh! the spirit, the sweet spirit, the kind spirit of the Child,
Of Him who came to Mary's arms, the Saviour undefiled,
It melts the ice within your breast, it helps you now to be
From sinful self's dominion safe, dear child, it sets you free.

Enter First Voice, Second Voice, Third Voice. They sing.[1] Outside there should be low, soft music, made by mandolins or violins. Chorus of bells.

Catherine (who has resumed her seat). How sweet! How lovely! I am strangely affected.

First Voice. This poor child has never had the real Christmas music in her heart.

Second Voice. I can hardly believe it.

Third Voice. It is on account of these dreadful walls. Inclosed within Self-Will, Pride, and Selfishness, one must be deaf to Christmas bells. (They pass to one side of the stage.)

Heart of Christmas. Thanks, sweet Voices. Well have you done your mission. (Claps her hands, and summons Christmas Spirits.)

Hither, come hither, fair band, at my call,
Good Cheer, and Good Will, and sweet Love, hasten all.
Here is work to be done that you only can do,
So genial, so ready, so faithful and true.
Hither, fair band, with your swift little feet,
Come laughing and flitting, so eager and sweet.

Enter three Spirits, Good Will, Good Cheer, and Love. They are little girls dressed preferably in white.

Spirit of Good Will.

That wondrous night in Bethlehem
  God sent me down to men.
The work he gives me now to do
  Began in earnest then.

Spirit of Good Cheer.

When skies are dark, and clouds are low,
  I bid the folk look up.
From heaven above God's blessings flow
  To brim each mortal's cup.

Spirit of Love.

Love is best and greatest, yes, love is better far
Than any gift or graces from thrilling star to star.
'Twas Love that in the manger lay, 'tis Love that wooes you now,
Love, with the shadow of the cross upon His baby brow.

Catherine. I see three beautiful children, and what they sing is strange and solemn. A tenderness is stealing into my heart, and a desire to be friends with these dear spirits. Will you come to me? (Stretches out her hands.)

Spirit of Good Will. Alas! we cannot.

Spirit of Good Cheer. Those dreadful walls!

Spirit of Love. They reach so high! They are so strong!

[Spirits bow their heads and sadly retire, standing near the Voices.

Catherine (covers her face with her hands). I am indeed a prisoner; and these dear spirits cannot help me.

Heart of Christmas. Thanks, good Christmas Spirits, you have shaken the horrid walls to their foundations. (Claps hands. Summons Christmas Elves.)

Hasten, tiny Christmas Elves,
Come and gambol 'mong yourselves.
Here's a little maiden fair,
Give her of your joy a share.
Hasten, tiny elfin crew,
Here is work just fit for you.

Enter two little boys, one carrying games and toys, the other a small, decorated Christmas-tree. They must come in with a jump and run, and be full of little pranks.

Elf of Fun and Frolic.

Heart of Christmas, here am I,
Full of mirth and jollity,
Such a pretty world it is,
Running o'er with fun and bliss.

Elf of the Christmas Tree.

I can't be as jolly as you are, Elf,
For I've so many toys on the highest shelf,
And so many trees to load to the ground,
And time flies so fast as the world goes round.
Stop dancing and prancing, and help me, pray,
To make this Christmas the happiest day!

Catherine. What funny, dear little fellows! How I would like to hug them! But there can be no Christmas fun for me, since I am a prisoner. I cannot even help to make others happy. I see my mistake. I am utterly selfish, proud, and self-willed. How hateful my character is! If I am ever free, I will care no longer for my own good times, but try to make others happy. (She bows her head on her arms on the table.)

Elf of Fun and Frolic. It's jolly to make her cry like that.

Elf of the Christmas-Tree. She's all right. (They run about and play.)

Heart of Christmas. The walls are crumbling fast. Catherine will soon be free. (She passes over the circles and waves her wand.)

The stony heart is melting, the stony walls down crumble,
The proud and stubborn spirit is growing meek and humble.
Come, darling little children, who have had your fill of sorrow,
This lovely girl will crown for you a very merry morrow.

Enter Nita and Franz, dressed poorly.

Nita. I don't see how we got here. Look, Franz, liebchen, see the lovely house, and the furniture and everything.

Franz. We just came, didn't we, sister? The door was open, and we walked right in. Will they put us out? We won't steal the pretty things.

Nita (indignantly). Of course not! (They walk about, and look at furniture, then go to the table where Catherine is seated. She smiles.)

Catherine. You poor little children! You look so cold and pinched.

Nita. We are cold, ma'am, most all the time, so we don't mind that.

Catherine. Are you hungry?

Nita. Yes'm, but we don't mind that.

Franz. Yes, we do mind it. Don't you believe Nita, ma'am. Only it doesn't do any good to mind.

Nita. Ssh! Where are your manners, Franz?

Catherine. Haven't you a father?

Nita. Yes, ma'am, but he's sick in the hospital; broke his hip. The doctor says he can't get out till spring, and then he'll be lame.

Franz. He can't paint no more, d'ye see? and paintin' 's his living.

Catherine. Where's your mother?

Nita. Please, ma'am, she's tending baby. She was out all day doin' a washin', and I took care of baby. He cried a lot.

Catherine. You are too little to tend baby.

Nita. Oh, no, ma'am! I have to do it. If mamma didn't go out to work, we'd starve.

Catherine. Dreadful!

Franz. Say, don't you have it lucky here?

Catherine. What do you mean?

Franz. Why, all them chairs and things. You don't be cold and hungry.

Catherine. No, never in my life have I been cold or hungry, and I don't mean that you shall be again.

Franz. But you can't do nuffin for us.

Catherine. I can, and I will. I was going to have beautiful Christmas presents, but I shall give them up, even my gold watch, and ask papa for the money instead. It will be a great deal of money, and I will get you lots of nice things. (Music soft and sweet outside is heard.) Children, have you ever had a Christmas-tree?

Franz. Not since we came over, and that's free years ago. We hadn't baby then.

Nita. I remember a lovely Christmas-tree in the fatherland; but we don't think they grow in America.

Catherine. Yes, they do, and you shall have one. (Rises and looks bewildered.) Why, how did you get over the walls?

Nita. What walls? We came right in just as easy.

Franz. And I'm awful glad we came.

Catherine. The walls! the walls! Are they down? Am I free?

Heart of Christmas. They are down, and I am coming to you, dear. I am already in your heart. (She embraces and kisses Catherine.)

Catherine. I was never so happy in my life. (Runs excitedly around the room. Spirits, Voices, and Elves lovingly surround her. She hugs them. The Elves give Nita and Franz all their games and toys, and place the Christmas-tree upon the table. They then play leap-frog. Finally, Catherine, taking a hand of Nita and Franz, walks to the front of the stage. The Heart of Christmas stands with them, and Elves, Voices, and Spirits group themselves around and behind.)

Catherine. I will write, as I agreed to do, the letter to Miss Brown, and the girls will sign it. I will make them. If I am a born leader, let me lead in the right direction. May and I will give up our watch and bracelet, and the money shall purchase for these children a happy Christmas. (Music outside.) I must do something for the sick father, too. How mean and selfish I have been, to care only for my own gifts, when others were cold and hungry! The air seems full of sweetness and music. I am strangely thrilled.

---

[1] Any Christmas music that can be sung by children should be introduced here; for example, Phillips Brooks's "Little Star of Bethlehem," or Gade's "Christmas Carol." These two are numbers 175 and 176 in the Plymouth Hymnal.

HEART OF CHRISTMAS. Catherine, you are changed indeed. You were shut up behind the walls of your own bad passions, and we could not get to you. The walls are down. You are possessed of the Heart of Christmas.

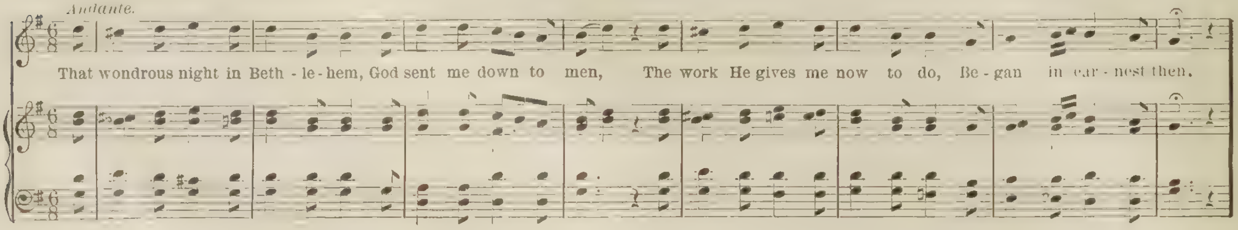
CATHERINE. I see. And all you dear little people, you Spirits of Good Cheer, Good Will, and Love, you sweet Voices, and even you, mischievous, funny little Elves, enter into the Heart of Christmas, as she enters into mine.

HEART OF CHRISTMAS. Dear child, you have learned the secret.

Who would be blessed, herself must bless
The world with grace and tenderness,
And thus, in love of God, and fear
Of sin, have Christmas all the year.

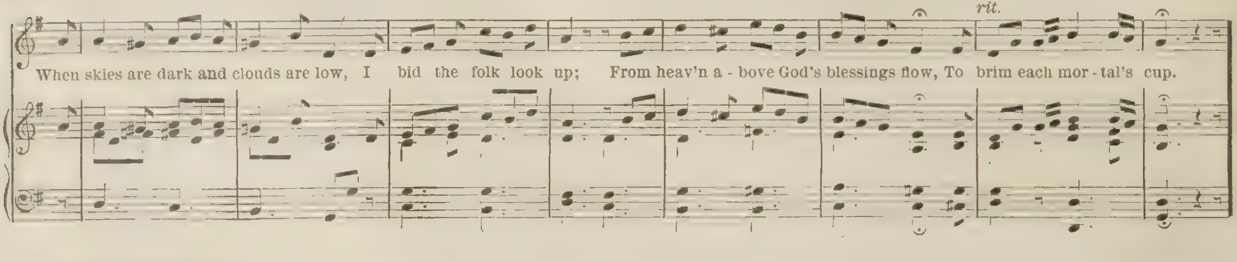
Music for the Play.

SPIRIT OF GOOD WILL.



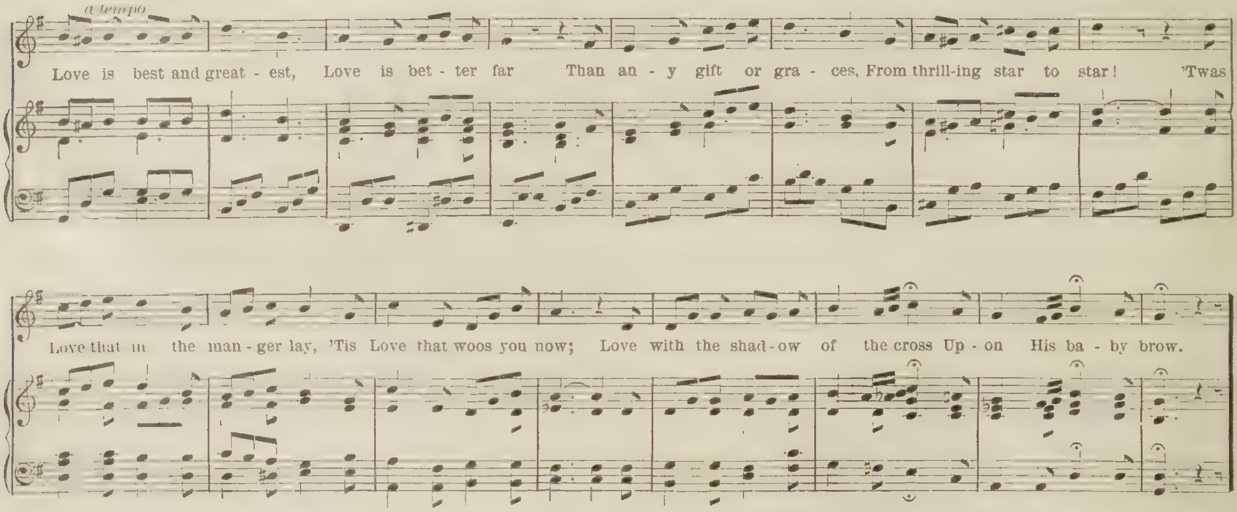
Andante.
That wondrous night in Beth - le - hem, God sent me down to men, The work He gives me now to do, Be - gan in ear - nest then.

SPIRIT OF GOOD CHEER.



rit.
When skies are dark and clouds are low, I bid the folk look up; From heav'n a - bove God's blessings flow, To brim each mor - tal's cup.

SPIRIT OF LOVE.



a tempo
Love is best and great - est, Love is bet - ter far Than an - y gift or gra - ces, From thrill-ing star to star! 'Twas Love that in the man - ger lay, 'Tis Love that woos you now; Love with the shad - ow of the cross Up - on His ba - by brow.

CHORUS (Sung by the Three Spirits and the Three Voices).

Love is best and great - est, Love is bet - ter far Than an - y gifts or gra - ces From thrill-ing star to star.

Books and Authors

Social Regeneration[1]

Washington Gladden

The Fletcher prize was awarded to Dr. Gladden by the Trustees of Dartmouth College in 1894 for an essay upon the question, "In what ways ought the conception of personal life and duty to be modified?" Under the title of "Ruling Ideas of the Present Age," his essay has been published. As one goes through its eleven chapters—"Change Your Minds," "The Doctrine of Fatherhood," "The Doctrine of Brotherhood," "The One and the Many," "The Sacred and the Secular," "The Law of Property," "Religion and Politics," "Public Opinion," "Pharisaism," "One but Twain," "Ruling Ideas"—it is plain that the title is not to be taken historically, as of ideas that have already established their rule, but prophetically, of ideas that are now advancing to rule—ideas which as yet have obtained ascendency only over some leaders of the world's advancing thought, and a minority that is growing toward a majority. The title is significant of the optimistic insight which is characteristic of the author.

The three ruling ideas of the present social movement are: (1) "The immanence of the Christ," a truth which, though radiant in the letters of Paul to the Ephesians and Colossians, the Church would hardly have comprehended until now—the idea that "those attributes of God which are revealed to the world in Christ were the molds in which the whole creation was shaped," so that Christianity, with its truths of Divine Fatherhood and human brotherhood, is not the antithesis but the fulfillment of nature. (2) "That the relations of men to one another in society are not contractual, but vital and organic," as of the members of one body; so that "the chief end of man is . . . the perfection of one in the blessedness of the many." (3) "The presence of the kingdom of God" in a growing ascendency as a kingdom, not of this world, but now in this world, gradually purifying it of its evils and wrong. These ideas are ruling the present because they are modifying it; they are the rudder which is slowly but surely swinging society round into the truly Christian line of progress.

Seeing this, that the rudder rules and swings the ship, Dr. Gladden is hopeful and patient. Of existing evils he says just enough to uncloak them and mark them for putting away; he is free from diatribe and invective; he is more concerned to put forward the truth, in whose presence error cannot live. But he does not hesitate to speak as plainly as the subject requires. Concerning "Pharisaism" he observes: "The disposition is strong in many quarters to condone the most monstrous iniquities—iniquities that strike at the vitals of the Nation—if the men who commit them will put on a cloak of religious observance, especially if the cloak has good capacious pockets, out of which liberal donations of hush-money are handed over now and then. Men who would certainly be in the penitentiary if they had their deserts are flattered and patted by the heads of great educational and religious institutions, and made to feel that they are regarded as the salt of the earth."

We earnestly bespeak for this book a place on the tables of families and in the studies of pastors. It might have been entitled "Thoughts on Practical Religion." It insists on the divineness of common duties, the sacramental reality of the calling in which we are given our daily bread. It draws a broad line between the religionism which ignorantly prays for help in doing wrong, and the religion which uses private possessions and powers as its public trust from God.

We have noted a few statements to which exception might fairly be taken, as, that belief in the Divine Fatherhood "undermined feudalism," and also gave birth to the doctrine of the equality of rights. This last is true for the Stoic sages of two thousand years ago, but not so true an account of its genesis in Calvinistic Christian thought. Likewise the statement (p. 260) that "the prevailing utilitarianism assumes that all virtue reduces to self-love; that right action is that which gives us greatest pleasure," is either wrong or liable to be wrongly taken. It may be true of vulgar hedonists, but these are not the genuine utilitarians for whom John Stuart Mill says that to sacrifice one's own to the general happiness is the noblest virtue.

These rare and casual blemishes do not impair the solidity of the argument. A sound philosophy of life is the condition of right conduct. That philosophy is given in the words Our Father. To him all things belong, and even the secular is sacred. The use of property is dictated through fellowship with him. The dignity of citizenship is in its trusteeship from him. This world, its institutions, laws, customs, parties, are the proper field of Christ's redeeming work, equally with the inner life of individual souls, and he is already here, gradually reducing them to his sway. These ideas, indeed, are not yet dominant, even in his Church. But they rule the development of his kingdom, now silently advancing in the Church and the world. To embrace them is to participate in the present struggle and the coming triumph. Hence the summons now, as in the first beginning of Christianity, "Change your minds!" Awake to divine conceptions of life and duty!

Novels and Tales

George Meredith

Mr. George Meredith does not write for the reader who likes to take his reading as he sips his coffee, without effort and without thought. Mr. Meredith requires thought. Sometimes, it is true, he disappoints it; oftener he stimulates it. The vices of his style and the extraordinary interest of his mind do not, however, need comment in this place. His latest novel, The Amazing Marriage, is full of his quality and his defects. It is what might be called a provoking story, suggesting in the first volume that which the second volume does not develop, and alienating the reader at the end by a dénouement which must be, for the great majority of readers, incredible. He describes the book as an attempt "to render events as consequent to your understanding as a piece of logic, through exposure of character;" but he clearly fails in the endeavor, because, although he invests the events with interest, he does not make us feel their essential connection. In point of style the first half of the story is much superior to the second. As a whole, the novel will add nothing to Mr. Meredith's reputation, although it is full of ideas and of that intellectual force which one so constantly misses in most contemporary fiction. (Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.)

It is a rare thing in fiction that a second book on a given subject equals its predecessor. To say this of Ian Maclaren's The Days of Auld Lang Syne is, therefore, high praise; and it is emphatically true praise. Drumtochty continues to furnish the author of "The Bonnie Brier-Bush" with capital subjects for character-sketches, and in each is a slender but strong thread of story interest. The stories first printed in this new volume rival in strength those famous tales in the earlier book which have lately been printed under the title of "A Doctor of the Old School." In a different way, Burnbrae appeals to our love and admiration as greatly as did William McClure; "For Conscience Sake" tells how the sturdy, God-fearing Burnbrae refused to abandon his church at the bidding of an upstart land-agent, and prepared to leave the home where his life and heart were rooted rather than to give up the right. The undoing of the wrong and the practical expression of his neighbors' love and sympathy round out the little series charmingly and with real feeling. With Mr. Watson it is this sincerity of feeling that keeps the pathos always pure and strong. There is never the slightest sign of artificiality or of writing for effect. The abundant humor, also, is never forced, but always spontaneous and fresh. Readers of his two books will note with interest that in the first installment of his novel "Kate Carnegie," printed elsewhere in this issue of The Outlook, some of the old Drumtochty friends appear once more. (Dodd, Mead & Co., New York.)

---

[1] Ruling Ideas of the Present Age. By Washington Gladden. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston. $1.25.

Mr. F. Marion Crawford's Casa Braccio cannot be criticised, as have been certain of his recent novels, for the lack of story interest. In this respect it contrasts strongly with "Katharine Lauderdale" and "The Ralstons," with both of which books it has some plot-connection; so far as this connection in theme exists, we may add, the present story precedes the two just named, and in it is solved the mystery of the origin of the unpleasant Walter Crowdie. The first part of "Casa Braccio" is a tale of passion and crime almost too condensed and too crowded with tragic incident. The rest of the book deals with force and subtlety with the moral punishment and inevitable results of the revolt against social laws depicted in the first period. The power and skill of the author are in this novel beyond question. It is a tribute to his ability to say that in character the book is quite different from any of the many that the prolific novelist has written. We have, it is true, a careful study of Italian society life, but only in that respect does the novel resemble the "Saracinesca" series. There is nothing but the slight structural connection to remind one of "Katharine Lauderdale" and "The Ralstons." "The Roman Singer" and "Mr. Isaacs," again, are quite as unlike this story as they are unlike each other. In short, Mr. Crawford is still as original as ever in subject and treatment, and his latest novel awakes quite a new interest. It is essentially serious in its treatment of sin and heredity, and if it does not specifically amuse, it certainly incites thought and analyzes motive. (Macmillan & Co., New York.)

Mr. Brander Matthews has done nothing better in the way of story-writing than his latest novel, His Father's Son, a piece of work which, for general skill of treatment, must take a very high place among the novels of the year. The motive of the story is singularly effective—so effective that it is astonishing that no one has used it before. In this case, as in many others, Mr. Matthews has shown his uncommon fertility and inventiveness. He has illustrated the vicious quality of some Wall Street methods, and the curious confusion of morals which exists in the minds of some Wall Street men, by turning them into concrete moral action and character. It is a long time since any story has surpassed "His Father's Son" in definiteness of ethical teaching and entire absence of the didactic method. The story is told with rare sympathy both for the father and the son, with a great deal of suppressed feeling, with a delicacy and reticence which are in the highest degree admirable. Nothing which Mr. Matthews has done shows so much ability of a high order and so much of the spirit of the artist. (Harper & Brothers, New York.)

The quiet studies of New England life which Miss Sarah Orne Jewett adds year by year to our literature of fiction seem to many readers to disclose the same staying power which one finds in "Cranford" and other tales of like quality. In a time when exaggeration and hysteria in so many forms appear in art Miss Jewett has never failed to exhibit the self-control, the poise, the balance, and the moderation of a true artist. If her range is not of the widest, her insight is of the surest, her feeling of the truest, and her touch clear, definite, and sympathetic. She gives us always sane and wholesome conceptions of life. Her work discloses the faithful study of the conscientious craftsman. Her style retains its old-time charm of simplicity and purity, and her quiet humor, which is one of her most charming gifts, loses none of its freshness as the tale of her volumes grows in length. The group of stories which appear this year under the title of The Life of Nancy (Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston) will confirm a reputation long ago securely founded upon work of the truest and most genuine kind.

In The Cup of Trembling, and Other Stories, by Mary Hallock Foote (Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston), the reader finds himself among scenes with which this interesting novelist has already thoroughly familiarized her readers. She has, however, in the story which gives its title to this volume, sounded a deeper note than in some of her previous stories. She has, indeed, dealt with a tragical situation, and with considerable reticence and effectiveness. The story is vividly conceived, the background seems to contribute to the isolation of the moral conflict, and the dénouement, if a little too timely and complete in its arrangement, has nevertheless a considerable effectiveness.

Mrs. Kate Douglas Wiggin's Village Watch-Tower contains six short stories by a writer whose quiet and steady growth in artistic skill it is a pleasure to record. "The Birds' Christmas Carol" and "Timothy's Quest" had a brightness, a freshness, and a general vivacity which at once insured a wide reading, but left the question of the development of lasting powers of construction and style somewhat in abeyance. In "The Village Watch-Tower" that question may be said to be settled, for in several of these stories there is shown not only the old-time qualities of humor, keenness of observation, and the overflow of intellectual good spirits, but delicacy of feeling, refinement of touch, and the presence of a real quality of imagination. This is specially true of "A Village Stradivarius." All the stories share more or less in the increased skill and force which come from the growth of the mind and heart behind them. (Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston.)

No American writer of short stories has done better work the past year than has Mr. Owen Wister. In Red Men and White are collected some of his strongest studies of frontier life. They have a Kipling-like effect in the realism with which they photograph soldiers, Indians, cowboys, Mormons, and their surroundings. The glimpse of General Crook, for instance, is a marvelous pen-picture in a few words. Mr. Wister's creations stand out as clearly to the mind as do Mr. Remington's figures to the eye; and it seems as though the author and artist had been designed by nature to work together, as they do here. (Harper & Brothers, New York.)

In Slain by the Doones Mr. Blackmore returns to the scene of his greatest novel; and the figures of great John Ridd and of Carver Doone and Counselor Doone appear again for a minute in conjunction with new characters. The tale is a slight one, but the old charm is there, and few who have read "Lorna Doone" will fail also to read this episode of the time and subject there treated so fascinatingly. In the other short stories of the book there is also much of Mr. Blackmore's leisurely and rich humor. The publishers have found a pleasing cover-design, and have made this a tasteful book in every way. (Dodd, Mead & Co., New York.)

Mr. Stephen Crane's Red Badge of Courage is an extraordinary bit of realism. It follows the fortunes of a young soldier through his belief in the romantic glory of war, his weariness with camp life, his growing doubts of his physical courage, his panic and flight in battle, his resulting hatred of himself, and his feverish thirst for battle and his final "heroism." The story is not pleasant by any means, but the author seems to lay bare the very nerves of his character; practically, the book is a minute study of one man's mind in the environment of war in all its horrible detail. (D. Appleton & Co., New York.)

The revival of interest in Scottish character and customs has undoubtedly induced Messrs. Macmillan & Co. (New York) to reprint the novels of John Galt. We have received The Annals of the Parish and Sir Andrew Wylie. It is said that in his character-sketch of a country parson Galt's model was the "Vicar of Wakefield," but the Scotch minister differs materially from Goldsmith's parson. In spite of the humor and pathos in the "Annals"—his best novel—Galt's name has been only a name to most readers. The reprint may bring at least one worthy character in fiction—the Rev. Micah Balwhidder—into deserved appreciation.

Literary Notes

—We learn that the unfinished tale of Robert Louis Stevenson, called "The Weir of Hermiston," will appear in the new magazine, "Cosmopolis."

—Mr. Augustine Birrell is editing the memoirs of his father-in-law, the late Frederick Locker-Lampson. The book will be called "My Confidences."

—One of the best of forthcoming books will undoubtedly be a biography of Cardinal Manning, based largely on his own written notes, journals, and intimate correspondence. The work is described as of exceptional interest in its revelations of the Cardinal's inner character, especially during the conversion period.

—The "Life of Christ," illustrated by Tissot, and soon to be issued at Tours, France, will be a remarkable book. It will have nearly four hundred reproductions in color from the paintings of the artist, upon the production of which he has been engaged for the past ten years. It is announced that the first twenty copies of the book will sell for $1,000 each, and the remaining copies, 990 in all, for $300 each.

—Among the attractive features promised for the "Atlantic Monthly" is an unprinted "Note-Book" of Nathaniel Hawthorne written in 1839. This is to be followed by "Some Memories of Hawthorne" by his daughter, Rose Hawthorne Lathrop. Another feature will be the publication of an interesting correspondence between Emerson and Sterling. The letters have been edited and annotated by Dr. Edward Waldo Emerson.

[For list of Books Received see page 1107]

The Lion—The Lamb[1]

A Sermon by Lyman Abbott

And one of the elders saith unto me, Weep not: behold, the Lion of the tribe of Juda, the Root of David; hath prevailed to open the book, and to loose the seven seals thereof. And I beheld, and, lo, in the midst of the throne and of the four beasts, and in the midst of the elders, stood a Lamb as it had been slain, having seven horns and seven eyes, which are the seven Spirits of God sent forth into all the earth.—Revelation v., 5, 6.

He looked for a Lion; he saw a Lamb; the Greek says "Little Lamb"—lamb, emblem of meekness; little lamb, emblem of apparent weakness; slain, emblem of sacrifice. And yet this Lamb had seven horns and seven eyes: the horns, emblem of power; seven horns, emblem of perfect power; eyes, emblem of wisdom; seven eyes, emblem of perfect wisdom. This Little Lamb slain was still equipped with perfect power and perfect wisdom. He thought the power and the wisdom were in a Lion, he found them in a Lamb—a Little Lamb—a Lamb as it had been slain.

We continually make this mistake; we think that it is might that rules: we look for a Lion. We think that the power in government is to be found in Congresses, Presidents, Kings, armies, and have not yet learned that the power is in homes and wives and mothers. We think that the power of the Roman Catholic Church is in its cardinals and its archbishops; we do not know that it is in the sisters who are giving their lives in hospitals and schools and battle fields.

The disciples, when Christ came, were looking for a Lion. They believed that the Messiah would appear suddenly, and the hosts of heaven would gather about him and the hosts of paganism would gather against him, and in one terrible last battle he would conquer and ride victorious over a bloody field. They never thought the blood would be his own. But when the angel told the watching shepherds the Messiah was come, the angel also said to them: This is the sign of his Messiahship—that he is but a babe, and a babe cradled in a manger. The evidence of his divinity, the witness of his power, the presage of his victory, was that he was a Little Lamb—presently to be slain. When this truth, that it is the Lamb, not the Lion, that conquers, flashed on the thought and mind of heaven's host, as the apocalyptic seer beheld them, they broke forth into the new song, Because thou hast died, and hast purchased us unto God, thou art worthy to receive power and riches and wisdom and might and glory and honor and blessings.

Power belongs to love. The most potent of all earth's potencies is love. Only love has any right to power. God himself would have no right to be the All-powerful if he were not all-loving. Power is only a scepter, and only love has a right to hold a scepter. The mother has no right to more authority over her children than she has love for her children. The husband has no right to more authority over his wife than he has love for his wife. The husbands need that lesson more than the wives do. It is only love that has right to authority. And love is the final authority, the great power.

When the angels told the shepherds that the Babe was cradled in a manger, the Roman Empire extended from the Euphrates on the east to the Atlantic on the west, and from the northernmost boundaries of what is now France to northern Africa. It had one hundred and twenty millions of population; it had the best-organized armies the world has ever seen, and unnumbered wealth. Then it was that a poor man appeared in one of the provinces of Rome. He wrote no great book, founded no great empire, led no great armies, established no great school. What did he do? He loved. Wherever he saw distress, he comforted it. Wherever he saw need, he supplied it. When he was wronged, he never resented it. When others were wronged, he never passed the wrong unrebuked. His friends were cold and apathetic and unthinking, but, having once loved them, he loved them unto the end. His enemies could not by their bitterness quench the unquenchable spirit of his love. When the soldiers laid him on the cross and were driving the nails into his quivering hands, he prayed for mercy, not for himself, but for them. The brigand that hung by his side he inspired with hope. The mother that stood before him speechless but agonized he committed, with broken accents in his dying voice, to the beloved disciple. When James and John came with their ambitions, he quenched their ambition with love. When Peter denied him, he answered the denial with a look of love. When Judas Iscariot betrayed him, he answered to that betrayal with the epithet of love—"friend." When Thomas disbelieved him, he met skepticism with love. When he died, he left the story of his love for his disciples to tell the world. And that was all they had. And with that simple story of this One that loved they went forth. Eighteen centuries have passed, and now the Roman eagles have perished, and the cross shines in the sun from ten thousand domes and steeples. His empire to-day includes a population of over four hundred millions—four times the population of ancient Rome. They are not all true Christians, you say. Neither were these others all true Romans. But the one are as loyal to their Christ as the others to their Empire. Love is the most potent power in the world. It is not the lion, it is the lamb that conquers. The Eagle is dead, the Lamb lives on forever.

To the Lamb belongs the world's wealth. It is not the greedy, ravening lions that acquire wealth, it is the Lamb. Only the Lamb is worthy to receive riches. They do not belong to shrewd selfishness, but to large-minded love. This rich poor man, who does not know how to use the wealth which God has put into his hands, has no right to it. You and I have no right to take it from him; but he has no right to it. And by and by, when he stands before God Almighty's throne, he will find he has had no right to it. No man has a right to wealth save he who holds it as a trust and administers it in love. It is only love that is worthy to be rich; nay, it is only love that really has riches; for we have not what we hold in our hand, but what ministers to life. This poor dyspeptic is no rich man for the luxuries that lie on his table, if he cannot digest them. This unliterary man is no rich man for the books he has in his library, if he cannot enjoy them. This man who has destroyed the artistic sense in him by his devotion to his counting-room has no real ownership in the pictures that hang on his wall, if they tell no story and stir no emotion in him. We have only what we know how to use. And love is knowing how to use. It is love serving and sacrificing itself for others that alone is worthy to be rich, that alone is truly rich.

It is love only that is wisdom. The cynic and the misanthrope pride themselves on their knowledge of human nature. They know just as much of it as a man might know of the cold earth who did not know there were any seeds beneath the surface. The cynic and the misanthrope are fools. It is love only that is wise: for love sees the possibility in human nature which eyes blinded by cynicism fail to see. It is love which sees a future statesman in a rail-splitter. It is love which sees the great scholar and missionary in the shoemaker. It is love which sees the emancipator of Europe in the monk. It is love which sees the missionary of the first century in the persecutor. Love looks beneath the surface and sees the divine in humanity. Wisdom belongs to love. It was the Lamb that saw in the publican Matthew the great biographer; the Lamb that saw in the ambitious son of Boanerges the beloved disciple; the Lamb that saw in the recreant and unstable Simon the great Apostle Peter. I wonder what he saw in Judas Iscariot which we have not yet seen, but by and by perhaps shall see; for love sees good in evil, and possibility in men and women when loveless hearts see nothing in them.

And to the Lamb belong the glory, and the honor, and the blessing—not to power, not to wisdom, save as power and wisdom are used by love to make itself impart more. I sometimes think that when we climb the shining mount and pass through the pearly gates and hasten up the broad, gold-paved avenue, eager to see the glory of God, we shall see the old inhabitants of the Celestial City standing at the battlements and looking down, and we shall wonder why they are not before the throne of God, and then we shall find they are looking down upon Calvary; for the glory of our God we have left behind us, and we did not even know that it was here. There are ranks and hierarchies of glory. Conscience is a great glory—conscience that sees righteousness and understands it; and faith is a great glory—faith that rejoices in the invisible and the eternal; and hope is a great glory—hope that beckons on the man to a larger and nobler and yet larger and nobler achievement. But best and highest of all is love. For faith sees God—that is wonderful; and hope bids us follow God and become imitators of him as true children—that is still more wonderful; but love is God, and he that loves has already, in some measure, overtaken God and is dwelling with him.

And so to love will come the song of universal blessing. To the Lamb, and the Little Lamb as it had been slain. We worship thee, O God, not for thy power, though that power we might fear; nor for thy wisdom, though that wisdom we must admire: we worship thee for thy love. It is the Lamb, the Little Lamb, that Lamb slain from the foundation of the world—it is thy love, thy love humbling itself, thy love sacrificing itself—it is Calvary which is thy power and thy wisdom and thy riches and thy glory and thine honor; and thus thy love shall receive forever the blessing of all thy children.

◆

Spiritual serenity is spiritual strength. It comes in by no softness of sentiment, but by thorough work. It comes by a faith that emboldens and energizes the whole soul.—Bishop F. D. Huntington.

---

[1] Preached at Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., Sunday morning, November 3, 1895. Reported by Henry Winans and revised by the author.

The Religious World

The Red Cross Society and Turkey

It has been suggested by the American Board, and seconded by the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, that Miss Clara Barton and the Red Cross Society take up the work of ministering to the relief of the sufferers from the Turkish massacre. This is at the request of missionaries on the field, and is indorsed by the officials of our State Department. Miss Barton has accepted the trust and has written the following open letter on the subject:

> Owing to the unanimous and urgent appeals from the friends of humanity, representing nearly all of the people of this country, the American National Red Cross has decided that it must accept the sacred trust of endeavoring to relieve the starving Armenians in Asia Minor. According to conservative estimates there are 350,000 utterly destitute people in that country who will have to be assisted six or eight months—until the next harvest. Fully realizing the difficulties and dangers to be met, the Red Cross will start for Turkey as soon as the necessary funds are placed at its disposal or guaranteed to insure success. Funds may be sent to Miss Clara Barton, President and Treasurer of the American National Red Cross, Washington, D. C. Authorized agents to receive funds and materials will be published in a few days. The Red Cross also suggests that goods, grain, and other material may be sent by chartered steamer.

The Evangelical Alliance

The Evangelical Alliance sends out a letter inclosing and calling especial attention to some of its leaflets containing plans of a new movement. It is for the formation of local alliances, the objects of which are stated briefly as follows: "(1) To bring conscience to bear on the life of the nation; (2) to close the chasm between the churches and workingmen; (3) to gain the strength which comes from organization; (4) to prevent the indefinite multiplication of organizations; (5) to prevent competition and waste in locating missions and churches; (6) to cultivate Christian fellowship between different churches and different denominations; (7) to reach homes with elevating and transforming influences." Another leaflet contains suggestions for work for the local alliances, while a third gives a suggestion for a constitution. The movement is indorsed by many prominent ministers in the various denominations. Of it President E. B. Andrews, of Brown University, says: "The movement might easily prove a new Reformation, more important than the original one." A "Pastor's Programme" for the coming Week of Prayer is also inclosed, which contains notes designed to aid leaders of meetings. They offer to send, gratis and postpaid, as many programmes (without notes) as may be desired for the use of a church, provided a collection be taken at some meeting during the week for the Evangelical Alliance. This has hitherto been supported by a few individuals, but if it is to be continued the churches must give it their aid. A single week-day offering from each church or group of churches observing the Week of Prayer would amply supply the treasury of the Alliance. Correspondence concerning the organization of local alliances is invited. The General Secretary of the Alliance is the Rev. Josiah Strong, D.D., and his address is, The Evangelical Alliance, 511 United Charities Building, Fourth Avenue, corner of Twenty-second Street, New York City.

The Colportage Association: Free Literature for Distribution

In our issue of September 21 we mentioned the Colportage Association in connection with the Bible Institute of Chicago, giving its purpose and opportunities. It is intended to provide good literature at prices within the reach of all, and also to provide good books at a low rate for free distribution. It invited the interest of people of means to buy books for distribution in jails, hospitals, and among the poor. In this way the Association has been enabled to distribute, up to the end of October last, 12,619 volumes. Bibles, Testaments, and other books have been sent into twenty-three different States. But for this distribution the help of local workers is necessary. We have just received a letter from Mr. Moody saying that there are still means to make further free grants of books, and requesting us to ask through our columns the co-operation of ministers of the Gospel, W. C. T. U. and other Christian workers, as well as regular chaplains. Let these write to D. L. Moody, East Northfield, Mass., inclosing some card or reference to show their good faith. After the usual form of application has been filled out, they will send the books, postpaid. Mr. Moody hopes, if he is spared, to put a book into the hands of every prisoner in the United States before a year passes. But to do it he must have the help of local workers.

The Young Men's Christian Union

The Young Men's Christian Union, located at Westchester and Bergen Avenues, New York, is an exceedingly vigorous institution, and deserves special mention because of its broad, non sectarian purposes and work. It has been in existence seven years, and has a total membership of about five hundred young men. Since this Union is not a church, it shows its wisdom in not claiming to be one, or endeavoring to take the place or do the work of a church. That work it leaves for neighboring pastors and churches to do; and yet the institution is in hearty sympathy with the churches, and strives to help, not to hinder, their progress. The Union in all its departments of activity treats each young man as a man, and expects him to deport himself as such. Therefore no rules are displayed about the rooms of the headquarters, and it is certainly a remarkable fact that there have been but two occasions of reproof in seven years. The Union rooms are open every evening (except Sunday) to members and friends. Experience has proven that concerts and socials are strong educational forces, and to this end they are freely used among the young men. A series of socials and concerts is arranged for the whole season, and they have proved very popular with the people in general and the members in particular. The tables of the reading-rooms are well supplied with current literature. Reference-books are accessible, and books for home reading may be obtained. Friday night is set apart as "game night," when all kinds of harmless games are indulged in. They also keep an employment bureau and boarding-house register, for which no fees are charged. The Union sustains classes in gymnastics, athletics, vocal music, and literary and debating societies; bicycle clubs, and an excellent Ladies' Auxiliary, which is an active part of the work. Besides assisting the young men, the auxiliary provides sewing-classes and other helps for girls during the daytime, and for each of the two summers past it has sent over one hundred poor children to summer homes near Sing Sing. The Christian Union holds no regular Sunday services and no exclusively religious services of any kind, except a series of Union Sermons arranged through the kindly co-operation of neighboring churches. By this means the members are afforded the opportunity of hearing near at home the leading clergymen of the various denominations in the cities of New York and Brooklyn. Among the clergymen who have preached to this association of young men Bishop Potter, Dr. Lyman Abbott, Dr. John Hall, Dr. Lyman, Dr. S. H. Virgin, Dr. Henry M. Sanders, Dr. T. DeWitt Bridgeman, and Dr. Arthur Brooks may be mentioned. Dr. B. B. Tyler preached the Union Sermon before a large and deeply interested audience at the One Hundred and Sixty-ninth Street Church of Disciples of Christ, Sunday evening, December 8.

The Open and Institutional Church League

The object of the Open and Institutional Church League as published in its constitution is "to form a bond of union between open and institutional churches, and extend the principles and work for which they stand, as expressed in the platform." Among its officers are the names of many ministers well known as pastors of institutional churches in our large cities. Its platform is broad and comprehensive. We give it in full, as follows:

> The open and institutional church depends upon the development of a certain spirit, rather than upon the aggregation of special appliances and methods.
>
> Inasmuch as the Christ came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, the open and institutional church, filled and moved by his spirit of ministering love, seeks to become the center and source of all beneficent and philanthropic effort, and to take the leading part in every movement which has for its end the alleviation of human suffering, the elevation of man, and the betterment of the world.
>
> Thus the open and institutional church aims to save all men and all of the man by all means, abolishing, so far as possible, the distinction between the religious and the secular, and sanctifying all days and all means to the great end of saving the world for Christ.
>
> While the open and institutional church is known by its spirit of ministration rather than by any specific methods of expressing that spirit, it stands for open church doors for every day and all the day, free seats, a plurality of Christian workers, the personal activity of all church members, a ministry to all the community through educational, reformatory, and philanthropic channels, to the end that men may be won to Christ and his service, that the church may be brought back to the simplicity and comprehensiveness of its primitive life, until it can be said of every community, "The kingdom of heaven is within you," and "Christ is all and in all."

Resignation of Dr. Booth

At the December meeting of the New York Presbytery the resignation of the Rev. Robert Russell Booth, D.D., as pastor of Rutgers Riverside Church was offered and accepted. His reason for resigning is ill health, and he has agreed to maintain the relation of pastor emeritus to the church. The resignation will take effect on February 1. The representative of the church, School Commissioner C. B. Hubbell, spoke feelingly, and said that it was with the greatest reluctance that the church consented to release Dr. Booth from the pastoral relation. Dr. Booth is a man of sixty-five years of age, and has occupied several pastorates, the one with the University Place Church of fourteen years being the longest. He has been with the Rutgers Church ten years, during which time he has built up a large congregation and collected money for the fine edifice erected on the Boulevard. Last May Dr. Booth became a central figure in the Presbyterian Church by being elected to the position of Moderator of the General Assembly.

Another Resignation

The Rev. Joseph J. Lampe, D.D., has also resigned his pastorate of Christ Church, New York, and accepted a call to the Professorship of Old Testament Literature and Exegesis at the Presbyterian Theological Seminary of Omaha. Dr. Lampe began his pastorate at Christ Church twenty-eight years ago, when the church was nothing more than a struggling mission in connection with the Brick Church. The Seminary to which Dr. Lampe is going is just entering upon the fourth year of its existence. It commenced with four students, and has now thirty-two. It is the center of a very important home missionary field. It has no endowments as yet, but is dependent upon the liberality of the Church.

Student Volunteer Convention

The Student Volunteer Union of Great Britain and Ireland is preparing for a great International Convention to meet in Liverpool January 1–5, 1896. Over a thousand leading representatives from the colleges and universities of Europe are expected, and men well known in connection with the students' crusade for missions are invited to take part. The two objective results aimed at are: First, a union of prayer for a speedy effusion of the Spirit of God in all lands; and, secondly, a union of effort in the speedy occupation of all unevangelized territory. In an earnest and stirring editorial on the subject the editor of the "Missionary Review of the World" presses upon all Christians their duty of united prayer and effort for the world's salvation. He believes that on united and prevailing prayer all else depends, and quotes as authority for our praying so as to command a blessing, Isaiah xlv., 11: "Concerning the work of my hands command ye me." Where God's work is concerned we are authorized to claim blessing. The writer fears that the worldliness of the Church has been a flood that has drowned prevailing prayer. He cites some illustrations of worldly tastes and customs creeping into the Church—violin solos and organ voluntaries from popular operas, etc. These things lower the standard of our church life, and, worst of all, crowd out the Holy Spirit. He says: "How any intelligent disciple can look at the present condition of missions and feel satisfied, passes our comprehension. . . . The money spent on self-indulgence is enormously out of proportion to what is turned into God's treasury." And again he says: "Who among us prays, and prays habitually, for the unconverted masses of mankind, for missionaries in their difficult and seemingly fruitless fields, for the victims of superstition and false religion and tyrannical caste and custom? . . . Who of us pleads with God for a world-wide revival, and effusion of the Holy Ghost in all lands?" And again: "We must love the world if we would save the world. . . . When we love men as Christ loved them we shall make sacrifices for them, even unto death, as he did, and it will be easy to give money—not as a hush price, a hire with which to quiet an accusing conscience, or as a compounding with self-indulgence, but because love constrains us." Great hopes are centered around this gathering of young men to consider the "demands of a dying world and the commands of a risen Lord," and to organize for work in neglected fields. It will be the first great gathering of the kind in Europe.

Missionaries in Korea

The correspondent of the New York "Herald" in Korea, Colonel Cockerill, speaks kind and encouraging words of the missionaries in the Hermit Kingdom. He thinks it a very inviting field for service. The opposition to Christian teachers manifested there six years ago has disappeared. Now the missionary comes and goes at will, and "where he is tactful and kindly behaved he is respected." The King has recently said that he desired to see many more "teachers" (missionaries) in Korea. The religion of Korea is a mild form of Confucianism combined with ancestor worship. The writer says that what is most needed now is educational work, as the Korean mind is not able to grasp or understand Christianity at present. In that department the missionaries are doing excellent work. He mentions the Boys' School at Seoul, which is in charge of Dr. D. A. Bunker, assisted by the Rev. H. G. Appenselter, where about one hundred and sixty scholars are enrolled. He also speaks favorably of the Girls' School near by, in charge of Mrs. Scranton, Miss Paine, and Miss Frye. Wherever the Koreans have come in contact with Christian teachers, he says, they lead cleaner lives—physically and spiritually. Whatever may be true of other countries, the missionaries in Korea do not lead lives of comfort. Colonel Cockerill says: "When I think of well-educated, refined women consigning themselves to this doleful, dirty, bad-smelling, absolutely repulsive country, I am amazed." Among the earnest and active workers whom he has met in Korea he names Dr. H. G. Underwood, the Rev. G. H. Jones, the Rev. W. B. Scranton, the Rev. D. L. Gifford, and Dr. C. C. Vinton, and adds: "I am really proud of the work which my countrymen are doing here, and I hope that they will be encouraged and upheld."—The Methodists, Presbyterians, and Baptists are working together in the same field. According to statistics just published, the total number of native communicants in Korea is 528, only one-third of whom are women. Missions are maintained in six of the eight provinces. Some 567 natives are on the rolls as "probationers," only one-fifth of whom are women. Colonel Cockerill credits several of the women connected with our missions with heroic service during the recent cholera epidemic. He mentions the names of Miss Arbuckle, Miss Whitney, Miss Jacobson, and Mrs. Underwood. The latter is the wife of Dr. Underwood, who, in company with Dr. Wells, had charge of "The Shelter" hospital during the prevalence of the epidemic. This tribute to missionary work is the more forcible in that the writer is essentially a man of the world, and quite unconnected with evangelical effort.

Brief Mention

The Parish House of St. Bartholomew's Church, New York, the Rev. David H. Greer, rector, which is said to be already the largest house of its kind in this country, is soon to be enlarged to meet the demands of the church work.

Cardinal Paul Melchers died at Rome on Saturday last. He was best known by his opposition to the German anti-Catholic legislation when he was Archbishop of Cologne, for which he was condemned to fine and imprisonment (which he escaped by flight) and was deposed from office.

The Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute has just met with a serious loss in the burning of its barn, containing many valuable cows, a large quantity of feed, tools, dairy outfit, etc. The property was insured for only two-thirds of its value, and the loss falls heavily on the school in the midst of the winter season. Any special contributions at this time will be gratefully received by its President, Booker T. Washington, Tuskegee, Ala.

The octogenarian Professor of Systematic Theology in Drew Theological Seminary, the Rev. Dr. John Miley, died on December 11 at his home in Madison, N. J. Dr. Miley had filled many important positions in the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was a member of the New York Conference, and had been for about twenty-two years professor in Drew Seminary. As a preacher he possessed peculiar power. He was never sensational, but clear in statement, positive in conviction, and earnest in manner, with great spiritual power. He also occupied a prominent place as an author.

The Home Club

The Children's Hour on Christmas Day

Readings, Mamma:
St. Matt. ii., 1–11; St. Luke ii., 1–20.
Hymn, by C—, Ch—, E—, and M—:
"Little Town of Bethlehem" (Phillips Brooks).
Recitation, Ch—:
"Twelve O'Clock and All's Well."
Reading, Papa:
"Where the Christmas-tree Grew" (Mary E. Wilkins).
Recitation, M—:
"The Baby's Stocking."
Recitation, P— (the Baby, six months old):
"Goo-Goo-Goo Goo."
Reading, C—:
"The Christmas Sleigh-Ride" (Helen Gray Cone).
Reading, E—:
"Snap-Shots by Santa Claus" (St. Nicholas).
Reading, Ch—:
"A Christmas Letter" (Helen T. Hutchinson).
Recitation, C—:
"The Mystic's Christmas" (Whittier).
Hymn, C—, Ch—, and M—:
"Silent Night" (The Carol).
Reading, Mamma:
"This is Sarah Jane Collins" (John J. à Becket).
Recitation, E—:
"The Baby" (George Macdonald).
Recitation, P— (The Baby):
"La-a-a, La-a-a."
Readings, C—:
"A Child's Creed," "Power of the Divine Child" (Frothingham's Child's Book of Religion).
Readings, Ch—:
"The Divine Child at Play," "The Divine Child with his Companions" (Frothingham's Child's Book of Religion).
Recitation, M—:
"Christmas Eve" (St. Nicholas, Dec., 1891).
Reading, C—:
"Hark, a Burst of Heavenly Music" (Mrs. M. N. Meigs).
Reading, Papa:
"The Christmas Truants" (Frank Stockton).
Recitation, Ch—:
"December" (Frank Dempster Sherman).
Song, C—, Ch—, E—, and M—:
"Good News on Christmas Morning" (St. Nicholas Songs).

The Home Standard Decisive

We hear much in these days about the low standards of honesty. Many reasons are given. If it is true that our standards are lowered, is it not due to the carelessness of fathers and mothers in the treatment of their children? They make promises they never expect to keep; they reveal their opinion of people with whom they exchange social courtesies, while too often these people are greeted with affection the very reverse of the opinion expressed in the hearing of the children. The pretenses in many families lower the standards of honesty in the child's mind.

The other day a woman and her son, a boy of fourteen at least, took seats in a railroad train. The boy sat next the window. He slipped down in the seat and seemed to shrink. When the conductor came through, a half-ticket was presented for the boy. The look in the boy's face of shame and of anxiety told the story. The conductor looked at the mother, who was cool, calm, and undisturbed, for a moment. A flush passed over his face as he slipped the half-ticket between his fingers and passed on. He could not shame the mother in the presence of her son. He was a gentleman. A woman guilty of such an act loses that which she can never regain; she has robbed her child of that which would have been his protection in the hour of temptation—the thought of a mother who valued truth above all things.

A Nursery Suggestion

The awakening of the creative instinct that is in every child is the privilege of every mother who uses the best of her intelligence and time for her children. Too often the mother lacks the original ability to devise the methods in either education or amusement that will rouse this divine spark. A pair of scissors without points, of convenient size for a child's hand, with white and colored paper, offer an unlimited field for the play of imagination and inventiveness. Every child old enough to use a pair of scissors knows the story of the House that Jack Built. The whole story can be told in paper. Jack, the house, the bags of malt, the rat, the cat, all present simple lines to the child. After the paper has been cut, there remains the pasting of the pieces on sheets of stiff paper, or, better still, in a scrap-book, in their story relation. Little Bo-peep and her Sheep, in fact every favorite story of a child, offers an opportunity to call in play the child's activities. For Christmas Day there is the story of the Christ Child, which will draw out from the child his conception of the other little child whose life has changed the history of the world. As the child grows older, the paper used should be all white, of a quality that will take water-colors; and this use of colors will reveal the child's conception of the colors in nature and their relations to each other better than any conversation. At first great care must be taken that the outlines of every subject suggested are simple, such as readily yield themselves to the scissors in untrained fingers. Later, the same idea could be carried out in cutting flowers. This is for older children; fine wire, silk thread, and a box of paints are inexhaustible sources of employment. The simple paper doll of former years has evolved into the paper doll with an elaborate wardrobe of tissue-paper. The training of the hands to obedience to the idea as well as to the eye is part, or should be part, of every child's education. It is the obedience of the hand to the idea that makes the artist. The imitative power is valuable, for that means correct vision. The hands of the workman must obey the eye, or the work will not reach a standard. The mother working with her child even to amuse it must train to accuracy by pointing to differences between the model and the work that attempts to follow it. Even the story of the House that Jack Built may follow the pictures taken at random from any book. The child of three should not be held to the same standard of excellence as the child of five. The first attempt should not be measured to the standard of perfection, but of possibility for that child. A hard standard should not be maintained to the point of discouragement. The office of teacher is that of inspirer. Criticism that discourages effort is cruel. The highest gift is that which gives impulse to effort.

True Protection

The State Board of Health of New York proposes to present a bill to the next Legislature to prevent the sale of milk with tuberculosis germs. The bill will compel every man who sells milk to present a certificate from the State that his cows are perfectly healthy. This will compel the examination of every cow by the State Board of Health's Tuberculosis Committee, and by veterinary surgeons in States from which milk is sent into the State of New York. This is the logical step that will protect the people. Examining milk on its way to delivery is but slight protection against disease. The danger must be met at its source. This is fair to the seller, who should not be compelled to bear unnecessary loss.

School Vices

The schoolmasters of Boston have been gathering data in regard to the prevailing vices of the children in the schools of that city. The conclusion is that lying is the vice of the girls, and uncleanliness the vice of the boys. One Boston teacher believes that the desire to please is the root of the girls' freedom from the vice of profanity and coarseness of speech, and the cause of her deceit. The tobacco habit is, the teacher believes, the cause of much of the uncleanliness of the boys. The Anti-Cigarette League is encouraged by the teachers, and it is having an effect on the boys. The question now discussed by the teachers in the Boston schools is how far they must carry this personal work, which lies outside of their professional duties.

Cleveland's Baking Powder,

manufactured originally by the Cleveland Brothers, Albany, N. Y., now by the Cleveland Baking Powder Co., New York, has been used by American housewives for twenty-five years, and those who have used it longest praise it most.

It is perfectly pure and wholesome.

Its composition is stated on every can.

It is always uniform and reliable.

It does the most work and the best work.

It is the strongest of all pure cream of tartar powders, as shown by the U. S. and Canadian Govt. Reports.

All the leading teachers of cookery and writers on domestic science use and recommend it.

He Was a Member

There is much said in these days about women's connection with many organizations. We have two words brought into intimate relation with woman—"over-organization." The following is part of the announcement of a man's death:

> He was twenty-nine years old. He was a Master in the Masonic fraternity, and also a member of Orient Chapter, No. 138, R. A. M.; Aurora Grata Lodge of Perfection; Aurora Grata Council, Princes of Jerusalem; Aurora Grata Chapter of Rose Croix; Aurora Grata Consistory; Kismet Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S.; Brooklyn Lodge, No. 22, B. P. O. of Elks; Fort Greene Council, No. 1,048, R. A., and Columbia Council, L. A. B.
>
> He leaves a wife and two children.

It would be interesting to know how much time he gave his wife and two children.

He Knew

There is a sermon for mothers in the following from "The Hebrew American:" "Neighbor—Bertie, your mother is calling you. Bertie—Yes'um, I know it, but I fancy she don't want me very bad. Neighbor—She has called you seven times already. Bertie—Yes, I know; but she hasn't called 'Albert' yet."

My Back

Arms and limbs are stiff and lame and it is misery for me to move. This is rheumatism, caused by lactic acid in the blood. Neutralize this acid, purify the blood, and cure rheumatism by taking the one true blood purifier, Hood's Sarsaparilla.

"I have been taking Hood's Sarsaparilla for the last six months, and find it a great help to me. I have been suffering with rheumatism in my left arm and shoulder, which was rendered entirely helpless. I am able to use them again since taking Hood's Sarsaparilla." Mrs. C. E. Say, Box 414, Junction City, Kansas.

Hood's
Sarsaparilla
Is the One True Blood Purifier. $1; 6 for $5.

Hood's Pills cure all Liver Ills. 25 cents.

Notes and Queries

1. Can you give me the names of good reference-books for the study of the literary characteristics of the Bible, and (2) for the study of the prophets? I have a class of girls, about seventeen years of age, and wish to make their work interesting and suggestive. 3. Can you tell me of a brief life of St. John the Divine? M. P. C.

1. The series of articles on "The Bible as Literature," published a year ago in The Outlook. Professor A. S. Cook has a little book on "The Bible and English Prose Style." A. D. F. Randolph & Co. have a recently published British work, "Passages Selected from the Bible for their Literary Beauty." 2. Professor W. R. Smith's "Prophets of Israel" is the standard work. Stanley's "History of the Jewish Church" has much of biographical interest. A. D. F. Randolph's series, "Men of the Bible," if you will send for a list, will supply you with some handy volumes. 3. You will find it in Farrar's "Early Days of Christianity." You can examine all the above in a visit to the New York book-stores.

Will you kindly tell us of the Fabian Society of England—how long it has been in existence, what distinguished people belong to it, and about how large a membership it has? Can you give the name and address of any member who would correspond with an American in sympathy with their ideas? Mr. Laurence Gronlund has been organizing Fabian Societies through this part of the country, and aroused considerable interest with regard to what the English Society has accomplished.

M. H.

The Fabian Society was organized in 1883. Its best-known members are George Bernard Shaw, dramatic and musical critic; Sidney Webb, LL.B., of the College of the City of London, and author of the best history of trades-unions; William Clarke, M.A., of the London "Chronicle;" Graham Wallas, M.A.; and Sydney Olivier, B.A. A number of Fabian Societies have been organized in the United States and Canada. The Rev. W. D. P. Bliss ("The American Fabian," 241 Tremont Street, Boston) will give information thereupon.

It is stated upon apparent authority that Congregationalism is on the wane in the New England States, and Baptists are the prevailing denomination. Are the above facts? SUBSCRIBER.

Dr. Coit, of the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society, has kindly furnished us with statistical tables and summaries, from which it appears that, while the Baptists in the New England States have recently had a larger percentage of growth, the Congregationalists have had a larger actual increase. From 1890 to 1895 the figures stand thus: Baptists, gain in churches, 18, or .019 per cent.; gain in members, 11,012, or .087 per cent. Congregationalists, gain in churches, 62, or .04 per cent.; gain in members, 12,376, or .054 per cent. The large gain of the Congregational churches has been among foreign immigrants, Swedes, French-Canadians, etc., in organizations mostly of small membership.

What books or pamphlets can one get with which to meet a freethinker? PASTOR.

In order to a judicious answer, we need to know: (1) What "freethinker" here connotes, a term which different people apply to men so unlike as Professor Briggs and Colonel Ingersoll. (2) Whether, as we suppose, our friend wishes to equip himself for discussion, or to supply the other man with reading. (3) Whether our freethinker is educated or uneducated, an earnest truth-seeker or indifferent and irreligious. (4) If there is any special problem of thought in which his chief interest centers or his difficulties have begun. An adviser must know the case fairly well before advising. Many of the questions which come to us could be better answered if more explicitly asked.

We have lately been revising our church manual, and have stricken out the word "Sunday" wherever it occurs, and have substituted therefor the word "Sabbath." Have we done wisely? Which is the proper word to use in the manual of a Christian church? B. F. M.

"The Lord's Day" is the phrase sanctioned both by New Testament use and by that of the primitive Church. "Sunday" is the civil and legal name of the day. "Sabbath," which always denotes in the Bible the Jewish rest-day, is a very proper term for those who retain the observance of the seventh day, but objectionable for others, as its application to the Lord's Day rests upon a very doubtful theory.

Will you have the kindness to suggest the names of helpful and interesting books on the life and times of David, both as shepherd-boy and king?

M. G. S.

For edifying lessons, see Dr. W. M. Taylor's book on David. For a historical and critical estimate, see Professor W. R. Smith's article on David in the Encyclopædia Britannica. You will find both, we think, in your public library, the latter certainly so.

Are there compilations of historic incidents and anecdotes, arranged topically or in any convenient manner, that you would recommend to me? Please tell me what you consider to be the best collections of poetry and prose quotations? T. B. F.

1. Such a book is Little's "Historical Lights" (Funk & Wagnalls, New York). 2. Wood's "Dictionary of Quotations" (F. Warne & Co., London and New York). The two would probably cost not over $5.

Kindly tell me what book I should procure to find a treatment of the influence Judaism had in coloring the theology of Paul—such as blood, etc.

L. M.

The bottom question at this point is not what influence the Jewish ideas of sacrifice had on the theology of Paul, but what those ideas really were. Read Dr. Everett's "The Gospel of Paul," especially the first part.

Will you kindly inform me as to the character, price, and publisher of Loudon's "Hellenica"?

F. H. H.

Published by Macmillan & Co. and by Dodd, Mead & Co. (both of New York). The work is one of very high merit.

H.—We can supplement our answer of December 7 by mention of the Congregational Ministerial Bureau, the Rev. W. F. Bacon, Manager, Congregational House, Boston. This is said to be the first organization of the kind established in this country. Its distinctive work is to furnish churches, free of charge, with transient or stated supplies, and pastors.

An answer to "W. S. J.'s" question: George I. transmitted a present of books to the University of Cambridge, and at the same time sent a troop of horse to the University of Oxford; whereupon Dr. Trapp composed this epigram:

> "The King, regarding with impartial eyes
> The want of both his Universities,
> To Oxford sent a troop of horse—and why?
> That learned body wanted loyalty.
> To Cambridge books he sent, as well discerning
> How much that loyal body wanted learning."

To this Sir W. Browne replied, on the part of Cambridge:

> "The King to Oxford sent a troop of horse,
> For Tories own no argument but force.
> With equal sense to Cambridge books he sent,
> For Whigs admit no force but argument."

C. E. G.

Can any reader refer me to a book of references, giving simply chapter and verse, for daily Scripture reading—the entire Bible to be always used?

M. G. H.

Have Respect FOR YOUR Stomach.

DO not give it food that will irritate it, or retard it in the performance of its natural functions, or it will retaliate in a way decidedly unpleasant.

Have you a headache, a distress in your stomach, a pain in the side, or an irritation of the skin? These are the symptoms of disordered digestion resulting from unwholesome food.

Alum baking powders are responsible for a large part of this unwholesome food, for it is a fact, recognized by all physicians, that alum renders food with which it is mixed partially indigestible.

The danger to the public is not trifling, for alum baking powders are numerous.

How are they to be avoided?

Baking powders sold, either wholesale or retail, at a lower price than "Royal," are almost invariably made from alum, and therefore of inferior quality and dangerous to health.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER is made of cream of tartar, a pure, wholesome fruit acid derived from grapes. It adds positively anti-dyspeptic qualities to the food. It makes finer, lighter, sweeter food, and is more economical in use, because of its greater strength.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., 106 WALL ST., NEW-YORK.

For the Little People

Kriss Kringle

By F. D. Sherman

Away with melancholy!
  This day is for delight;
When mistletoe and holly
  In wreaths and garlands bright
Are hung above the ingle,
And joyous voices mingle
To welcome in Kriss Kringle,
  Who comes clad all in white!

Green spray and crimson berry
  A crown for him shall be;
Gay catch and carol merry
  Shall fill his heart with glee,
Shall match his sleigh-bells' jingle
And warm his ears a-tingle,—
A greeting to Kriss Kringle,
  The Christmas Fairy he!

Within his sleigh he carries
  The presents high up piled;
Not long with us he tarries,
  By leaf and song beguiled.
God-speed, down dale and dingle,
May there not be a single Forgotten one, Kriss Kringle;
  But gifts for every child!

A Dog's Christmas-Tree

By Estelle M. Hart

Yes, a Christmas-tree just for a dog, and he liked it, too. Liked it, did I say? He thought it was the loveliest thing he had ever seen, and barking couldn't half begin to express his feelings. His eyes, his ears, his feet, his tail, all were animated to the last degree, in his vain attempt to express his rapture.

Shep's mistress didn't have any little boys and girls at her house, and I suspect that Shep got a good deal of the petting that would have belonged to them if they had been there. But it was Tina, the maid, that thought of a Christmas-tree for his favored dogship. She got a tiny green tree, and set it up in a box, and hung it with popcorns and Shep's favorite candies. Then she placed it in the corner of the parlor, and Shep's mistress invited him in, and explained all about Christmas-trees to him, and told him that this was his very own. Don't you think he knew every word she said? Then why did he begin to bark with all his might, and jump around the tree, and around his mistress, and race about the room as if he had lost his wits, and then go over to the tree, and, sitting down beside it, put his little paws together and "beg" for some of the goodies "this very minute"—that's what his eyes said? The tree lasted several days, for Shep's mistress dealt out the candies to him a few at a time; and how they did enjoy the fun!

That was two years ago. Last year Tina got another little tree, and dressed it up in her room, where no one could see it. When she had finished it, she opened the door and came out into the hall with it in her hands, intending to take it down into the parlor when no one was looking. But a pair of sharp eyes in the lower hall spied her the minute she started, and what an excitement there was! Don't you suppose that a dog can remember such a splendid thing as a Christmas-tree a whole year? If you don't, you would have been convinced if you could have seen the rapture that was expressed in every motion of his ecstatic little body, as he scampered up the stairs and round and round Tina, barking with all his might, and almost upsetting her and her precious burden. He superintended the placing of the tree in the parlor, then he rushed off, post-haste, to tell his mistress. She was in her room, but a frantic barking outside the door told her that something important must be attended to at once. As soon as she appeared, Shep jumped upon her in wild delight, then rushed as fast as he could back to the parlor, barking to her all the way to "come quick." She followed him in, and there stood Tina and the Christmas-tree.

"Why, Tina," said her mistress, "I had forgotten all about it!"

But Shep said, "Not I;" and he suddenly sat down before it and began to beg.

Wasn't that a funny thing to please a dog?

This is a true story; and you may be sure that there will be another tiny tree for a merry little dog when Christmas comes again this year.

An Afternoon Walk

The other day a very funny thing happened in New York. A goat was arrested on Broadway. He was walking along lower Broadway, seemingly with calm assurance; but if you looked closely, you could see in his eyes that he did not feel as much at home as he would have you believe. He felt out of place. Perhaps he was a Rip Van Winkle goat. He may have been asleep down near the Battery for a couple of years. That morning he may have wakened up, and, feeling hungry, have started up Broadway for his breakfast of parings, skins, and paper. If he had been a wide-awake goat he would have heard about Colonel Waring and his street-cleaners and the children's street-cleaning leagues. When that goat went to sleep, or to the country, or wherever he has been for the past two years, papers were blowing about the streets of New York, peelings of bananas and oranges, apple-cores, and rubbish lay in the streets for days at a time, and any enterprising goat could live well; but all this is changed; and the goat grew more and more bewildered as he looked at the streets hideously barren, from a goat's point of view. You enjoy the streets very much now, but to a goat a perfectly clean street is most objectionable. A beautiful street to a goat would be liberally sprinkled with cabbage-leaves, with a fair proportion of potato-parings, and an icing, as it were, of apple parings and cores; the paper would be the candy, so to speak, eaten between meals, with tomato-cans to sharpen his teeth on. Such a street would be a most delightful sight to a goat. Poor Rip Van Winkle goat this day walked over an absolutely clean street. At each corner he turned his head, but the same absolute cleanliness—he would call it barrenness—stretched before him. There were the cars, the trucks, and carts; the same messenger-boys, but they could not throw anything at him—there was nothing to throw; there were the men and women hurrying along just as he remembered them; the peddlers were in their places, in the sheltered doorways of the great buildings, but they kept all about their stands perfectly clean. The goat walked on. He got to Union Square, and there was the beautiful grass. He hurried toward it, when the big blue-coated policeman from the street and the gray-coated policeman from the park each grabbed him and pointed toward the sign "Keep off the grass," saying, "Don't you see the sign, you heathen?" Poor Rip Van Winkle goat! He felt his horns grabbed more tightly, and he walked along the street, followed by the small boys who are always on the street to help make a crowd. The goat was taken to the station-house, and committed to the back yard until the authorities could decide what to do with him.

He stretched himself out on the stones, tired and discouraged, and, if you could have understood his language, this is what you would have heard:

"There's a great change come over this city. A great change has come over the small boys. Not one looked sorry for me, but indignant, as if I intruded. The city is horribly clean. It is not a fit place of residence for any of my family, not even my remote connections, the chickens. The only people who can live in this place comfortably are men and their families, and those of my relations who are necessary to them." Here a tear dimmed his eye. "I am not necessary, and so must go. I must emigrate. The country of farms is the place for me in these degenerate days."

Two Weeks Later.—The Rip Van Winkle goat lay on the sunny side of a small barn about one hour's ride from New York. Beside him were a small head of cabbage, two large red apples, and four pieces of white sugar. The goat looked very thoughtful. If you had listened you would have heard him say:

"That walk up Broadway, in spite of the confusion and hunger, was a fortunate walk for me. The arrest, mortifying as it was, was a good thing. It brought me here where a goat belongs. I can draw the children in the cart, and feel that I am useful. There is food such as a goat of refined tendencies enjoys. The city is now given over wholly to my aristocratic relations—man and his family. Colonel Waring, who is biased in his admiration for men, has made it an impossible place for goats. Perhaps it is just as well," he sighed. "I doubt if my branch of the family and man's branch ever were intended to live in such close relations as we formerly did in the city. The majority rules in this country, and there are more men than goats," and he dropped off to sleep, looking at the bunch of holly and the Christmas wreath Flossie had insisted must be hung in his stall, for it was Christmas afternoon.

Jack's Idea

Probably the majority of boys all over this country gather wood for bonfires for election night. Little Jack, we are told, collected a lot of barrels. On the morning of election day he was told that the city authorities had made a law forbidding the burning of barrels in the street on election night. Jack was indignant, and exclaimed, "Huh! Can't build a fire! What's election for, anyway?"

Lost and Found

Two sailing vessels were several miles off shore. The weather was calm, and from each vessel a dory with three men in it shoved off for a little fishing trip. While the dories were gone a heavy fog arose and shut the vessels entirely from sight. Each of the vessels, when the fog cleared, picked up a dory with men in it. Then they sailed home to sell their fish. When they reached the market where the fish are sold, each vessel had the dory and men that belonged to the other vessel, which each vessel thought she had lost.

The Modern Stitch in Time is a Telephone call.

It will save nine times its cost in time and expense nine times out of nine.

13,000 Telephones in New York City

1,200 Public Pay Stations

Permanent Service at your house or office from $75 a year.

THE METROPOLITAN
Telephone and Telegraph Co.
18 CORTLANDT ST.

The Superb CHRISTMAS Number of

THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL

With a wealth of articles, poems and stories, including

Ex-President Harrison's first article on "This Country of Ours";
Rudyard Kipling's new India story, "William the Conqueror";
The story of "How Longfellow Wrote His Best-Known Poems";
Miss Mary E. Wilkins' first of six "Neighborhood Types";
Mary Anderson's first autobiographical article of her career;
A full page of Kate Greenaway's bonnie little women;
The first of Julia Magruder's novel, illustrated by Mr. Gibson;
James Whitcomb Riley's new poem, illustrated by A. B. Frost

And over 40 other stories, articles and poems.

FOR SALE EVERYWHERE FOR TEN CENTS

For One Dollar the Journal will be Sent for a Whole Year by

The Curtis Publishing Company, Philadelphia

COPYRIGHT, 1895, BY THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY

The Spectator

The Spectator had always heard that the happiest people on earth were the fools, and he never took the trouble to discredit this time-honored statement until one memorable night, when he had a long talk on the subject with an undoubted fool, and was by him forced to think seriously concerning the position of fools in relation to themselves and others. In passing, it may be as well to remark that the Spectator does not hereby utterly disclaim times of folly on his own account—far be it from him. His enemies have frequently called him by the fool's obnoxious title—as have also his family and friends, with that affectionate candor which distinguishes those who love us and are ambitious for us. But, for all that, the Spectator himself knows with a glorious certainty that all these critics are fallible, and most of them—with due respect submitted—are as liable as himself now and then to act the fool, or rather, as Charles Reade has so charmingly said, "act the fool without the excuse of being one." Now, the Spectator's fool-friend had no such saving clause; per contra, he, on this one occasion, acted the wise man without at all being one. Never again while he lives will the Spectator talk carelessly of a "fool's paradise," for he now believes that the leper who cries, "Unclean, unclean," has an easier life than the poor fool. The former makes no pretense, keeps up no appearances, while the poor fool must still rattle his bells and dance, and look as if he liked it. It might be argued that a man was not and could not be a hopeless fool if he had sense enough to be conscious of his infirmity; and so, previous to his late experience with one belonging to the true brotherhood, would the Spectator have said. But this man was a fool—a simple fool. Whether conscious or unconscious of his deficiency, it was there to stay as surely and as fixedly as the mound on the back of a hopeless cripple. He was, in fact, possessed of the kind of aggressive foolishness that the word deficiency seems scarcely to describe.

⁂

The Spectator knows fools of the deficient order, and was once present when one of that ilk was paying an evening call on a young girl. With him an evening call meant what it said—a call for an evening. The Spectator, engaged in talk with others at a carefully kept distance, overheard at last a nervous burst of protest from the young and undisciplined hostess: "Why don't you say something?" He knew just what she felt. But this kind of silent bore is not a circumstance to the order in which belongs the Spectator's friend, whose cheap jokes and loquacity are his most maddening quality. As a school-boy—for the Spectator inherited the fool from those indiscreet days when we take no heed of the morrow—it had been the same. Then, little dreaming what he was storing up for himself, the Spectator had been kind in a degree to the boy who was to be father to this man, and from whom even then the other boys ran. But at that time how different it was! Over and over since those blessed days of candor the Spectator has longed to repeat the old simple methods of dismissal. If the child-fool began to tell long, pointless tales, and fire off ghastly puns, it was easy to tell him to "shut up." Indeed, the Spectator regretfully recalls (regretting that the circumstances may not be repeated, not that they ever occurred) certain dismissals which took the more vigorous form of brickbats fired at retreating heels, accompanied by shouts of "Go home, go home!" It is impossible to treat a grown man in this way, however healthy the method.

⁂

On the memorable evening in question the Spectator and his fool friend had met by accident at the house of a common acquaintance, and they left together, walking up the street side by side. Inwardly the Spectator was thinking that he had never before heard his companion more hopelessly silly and inane in conversation, and, while regretting the spoiled call which he had expected to enjoy, he was wondering how any human being could be so dull as to impose such dullness upon others. As if in reply to the thought, the fool suddenly said: "Don't you feel sorry for me sometimes? It's very hard for a man like me to know what to do. I can't cease to live, and I can't live all alone. I don't feel it quite right to hide away always, because I only grow duller if I do, yet nobody wants me. I see how they all edge away from me. I saw how I spoiled things this evening. Sometimes I am tempted to give it all up and go nowhere. But what could I do then? I am not a reading man. I'm too stupid for that. I have no favorite pursuit, and can't find any. I like people, and I like to be with them, and yet I don't feel as if I have the right to go on in this way boring them to death. I am very miserable. What would you do if you were in my place?"

⁂

The Spectator was stunned; and this is just the question which he would like to pass along. He would have rejoiced to pass it on at the time, but he was forced to give an answer of some kind on the spot. In this case it was not worth while to gloss anything and say, "Oh, you rate yourself too low." It was not an hour for pretty speeches. Here was a tedious fool who knew that he was one, and evidently had long accepted the fact as final. If this man acted unconsciousness so well, how many other fools about us are playing their parts with aching hearts? The Spectator was horror-stricken at the suffering revealed. In this single confession the fool seemed pleading for all his kind. The Spectator answered him as truthfully as he could, and as kindly, without ignoring facts. Taking the man at his own figure, they drew up together a plan of life for him, which included shorter and less frequent calls at the houses already on his visiting-list, and an enlargement of his circle of acquaintance. Fancy discussing with a man how best to rid his friends of the nuisance of his presence!

⁂

A more silent tongue was also decided upon, and fewer attempts at wit. Then ended the conversation, which the Spectator can set down as one of the most painfully interesting in which he ever took part, though the most perfected fool of his acquaintance was the second party to the talk. The Spectator knows that it will be difficult to convince any one that this fool was a fool, after narrating such an experience; but a fool he was, and a fool he remains, after that one gleam of reason (so the Spectator thinks, being but human)—for the Spectator's advice was never taken! The plan of living laid down was never adopted in a single respect; and if the plan was not wise and the advice not sound, let him who can, think of a better plan and make it known for the benefit of all other poor fools. Alas! the Spectator's friend is not a rara avis.

⁂

So much from the fool's side of the case. On the other hand, the Spectator would like to ask a question for the benefit of the normal-minded folk of the world, those who, thank God, make up its chief population, Mr. Carlyle to the contrary. By normal-minded the Spectator means that large circle to which he flatters himself he belongs, being neither a fool nor a genius, but an inheritor of a plain common sense which has so far preserved him in tolerable comfort on life's way. The exasperations of genius under boredom may not be here fairly considered, for *any*thing may rasp a genius. The question perplexing the Spectator is, how far are the plain, normal-minded folk required by Christian charity to sacrifice themselves to the fools that cumber the earth? For himself, the fool has a curious effect upon the Spectator, just as cats or the odor of strawberries physically affect others. After a certain time spent in the society of a genuine fool, the Spectator finds himself in a mild perspiration, which, if the torture be too long applied, ends in a slight fever and utter prostration. Now, how can such suffering help the fool, or the Spectator either? It is true that the Spectator's fool friend, once in those long years of intimacy—save the mark!—taught the Spectator a valuable truth; but was the game, from a purely practical point of view, worth the candle of those many hours of suffering?

A Good Almanac is one of the best books to have in the house for reference.

The Sunlight Almanac
for 1896
contains 480 pages, bound in crimson leatherette and stamped in gold (worth 50c.)

Given Free to users of Sunlight Soap

How to obtain them. Commencing Nov., 1895, and until all are given out, purchasers of Sunlight Soap will receive one FREE from their grocer.

Contents. A Complete Almanac, Tables, Directions for Home Management, Language of Flowers, Gardening, Games and Amusements, Dress-making and Fashions, Recipes, Dreams and their significance (page 330).

Sunlight
Soap

Lever Bros., Ltd., Hudson & Harrison Sts., N.Y.

A NEW IDEA IN PAPER PATTERNS

744
YOUNG LADIES' WAIST.
Sizes 30, 32, 3 , 36, 38.

748
LADIES BASQUE.
Sizes 32,34,36,38,40,42,44,46.

Any style or size of garment for Ladies or Children
TEN CENTS
Guaranteed equal in Design and Fit to any Pattern you pay 20 to 40 cents for. FREE Monthly Fashion Sheet for January, or send 5 cents in stamps for Winter Catalogue 500 Designs
THE NEW IDEA PATTERN CO.
192 West Broadway, New York

TUBULAR DRIVING LAMP

IT is the only perfect one.
IT will not blow nor jar out.
IT gives a clear, white light.
IT looks like a locomotive head-light.
IT throws all the light straight ahead from 200 to 300 feet.
IT burns kerosene.
☞ Send for Book.
R. E. DIETZ & CO.
49 Laight St., New York

SPECIAL OFFER No. 11

Write to us and mention THE OUTLOOK and the number of this offer (No. 11), and we will send book describing our lamp, and will agree to send you one single lamp or a pair at our wholesale price (very much less than the retail price). This offer will appear only once in THE OUTLOOK.

The convenience of having book covers of strong manilla paper that will fit any book is appreciated best by those using the

"One Piece" Book Covers

Sample dozen, 25 cents. W. B. HARISON, 59 Fifth Ave., N. Y. City. Send for wholesale priced list of school books of all publishers (7.500 titles), price 10c.

25 CTS. PISO'S CURE FOR 25 CTS.
CURES WHERE ALL ELSE FAILS.
Best Cough Syrup. Tastes Good. Use in time. Sold by druggists.
CONSUMPTION

Suggestions from Santa Claus

BOOKS FOR BOYS and GIRLS

The Jungle Books By Rudyard Kipling

The original "Jungle Book" and "The Second Jungle Book" now ready. Classics. Beautifully illustrated by Mr. Kipling's father. $1.50 each.

Hero Tales from American History

By THEODORE ROOSEVELT and HENRY CABOT LODGE. The book includes graphic descriptions of historic incidents, with sketches of the lives of Daniel Boone, Davy Crockett, and other heroes. 12mo. 335 pages, illustrated, cloth, $1.50.

The Century Book for Young Americans

The "Story of the Government," by ELBRIDGE S. BROOKS. Telling in delightful story form just what every boy and girl ought to know about the government of the United States. Illustrated with 200 engravings. Preface by General Horace Porter. Issued under the auspices of the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution. In handsome buckram binding, $1.50.

Mrs. Dodge's Books include "Donald and Dorothy" ($1.50—new edition), "The Land of Pluck," stories about Holland ($1.50). "When Life is Young," poems for boys and girls ($1.25).

BOOKS FOR BOYS and GIRLS

Jack Ballister's Fortunes

By HOWARD PYLE, author of "Men of Iron," etc., with fifteen full-page illustrations by the author. 8vo, 420 pages, $2.00.

Chris and the Wonderful Lamp

By ALBERT STEARNS. One of the most popular serials ever printed in St. Nicholas. Richly illustrated, 8vo. $1.50.

The Brownies Through the Union

A new Brownie book, by PALMER COX, full of pictures and amusing to young and old. Quarto, boards, 144 pages, $1.50.

A Boy of the First Empire

By ELBRIDGE S. BROOKS, author of "The Century Book for Young Americans," etc. A story-life of Napoleon for young folks. 323 pages, illustrated. $1.50.

Bound Volumes of St. Nicholas

The numbers for the past year—more than 1,000 pages and as many pictures, with stories, long and short poems, illustrated articles, etc. A wealth of literature and art. $4.00.

The Horse Fair

By JAMES BALDWIN. Stories of horses of mythology and history. 8vo, 417 pages. Illustrated. $1.50.

A Year's Subscription to

ST. NICHOLAS

"The Best of All Children's Magazines"

IT is impossible to make a better selection of a Christmas gift than a year's subscription to this the greatest of all periodicals for young folks. "We wish every youth in the land could have the benefit of it," says the Educational Gazette. Can you not help some of them to have it?—your boys and girls, your nephews or nieces, your class in Sunday-school?

It will have a great programme in 1896: Robert Louis Stevenson's "Letters to Young Friends," contributions from Rudyard Kipling, James Whitcomb Riley, Mrs. Burton Harrison, Sarah Orne Jewett, W. O. Stoddard, J. T. Trowbridge, Tudor Jenks, Noah Brooks, John Burroughs, Laurence Hutton, George Parsons Lathrop, and many others. The best serials and short stories are in St. Nicholas, and everything is illustrated.

TO USE ST. NICHOLAS AS A CHRISTMAS GIFT

When desired, we will send a handsome subscription certificate printed in red and black. The subscription price is $3.00 a year, and, if desired, the November and December numbers with this certificate can be sent to the person who wishes to make the gift at Christmas time.

The November number will be given free of charge, and new subscriptions will begin with December

All booksellers take subscriptions, or remittances may be made directly to the publishers, THE CENTURY CO., Union Square, New York.

Fugitive Poems

The Nativity

By James Russell Lowell

“What means this glory round our feet,”
The Magi mused, “more bright than morn?”
And voices chanted clear and sweet,
“To-day the Prince of Peace is born.”

“What means that star,” the shepherds said,
“That brightens through the rocky glen?”
And angels answering overhead
Sang “Peace on earth, good will to men.”

And they who do their souls no wrong,
But keep at eve the faith of morn,
Shall daily hear the angels' song,
“To-day the Prince of Peace is born.”

—Selected.

At the Door

By Eugene Field

I thought myself indeed secure,
So fast the door, so firm the lock;
But, lo! he toddling comes to lure
My parent ear with timorous knock.

My heart were stone could it withstand
The sweetness of my baby's plea—
That timorous, baby knocking and
“Please let me in—it's only me.”

I threw aside the unfinished book,
Regardless of its tempting charms,
And, opening wide the door, I took
My laughing darling in my arms.

Who knows but in eternity
I, like a truant child, shall wait
The glories of a life to be,
Beyond the Heavenly Father's gate?

And will that Heavenly Father heed
The truant's supplicating cry,
As at the outer door I plead,
“'Tis I, O Father! only I”?

Selected.

Victor and Vanquished

By Harry Thurston Peck

I.

Through the crowded streets returning, at the ending of the day,
Hastened one whom all saluted as he sped along his way;
In his eye a gleam of triumph, in his heart a joy sincere,
And the voice of shouting thousands still resounding in his ear.
Passed he 'neath a stately archway toward the goal of his desire,
Till he saw a woman's figure lolling idly by the fire.

“I have won!” he cried, exultant; “I have saved a cause from wreck,
Crushed the rival that I dreaded, set my foot upon his neck!
Now at last the way is open, now at last men call me great;
I am leader of the leaders, I am master in the State!”

Languidly she turned to listen, and decorous was her pretense,
And her cold patrician features mirrored forth indifference:
“Men are always scheming, striving for some petty end,” said she;
Then, a little yawn suppressing—“What is all of this to me?”

II.

Through the shadows of the evening, as they quenched the sunset glow,
Came the other, faring homeward, with dejected step and slow,
Wistful, peering through the darkness, till he saw, as oft before,
Where a woman stood impatient at the threshold of the door.
“I have lost!” he faltered faintly. “All is over,” with a groan;
Then he paused and gazed expectant at the face beside his own.
Two soft eyes were turned upon him with a woman's tenderness,
Two white arms were flung about him with a passionate caress,
And a voice of thrilling music to his mutely uttered plea
Said, “If only you are with me, what is all the rest to me?”

III.

All night long the people's leader sat in silence and alone,
Dull of eye, with brain unthinking, for his heart was turned to stone;
While the hours passed all unheeded till the hush of night had ceased
And the haggard light returning flecked the melancholy east.

But the other, the defeated, laughed a laugh of merriment,
And he thrust his cares behind him with an infinite content;
Recking not of place and power and the smiles of those above,
For his darkness was illumined by the radiance of love.

Each had grasped the gift of fortune, each had counted up the cost,
And the vanquished was the victor, and the winner he that lost.

—The Bookman.

Over the Tubs

By Robert C. Tongue

Up from the laundry, all day long,
Comes the croon of a little song;
Low and plaintive its measures seem
To rise and melt with the wreaths of steam.
Mrs. McGill in the mist below,
Heaping the linen, snow on snow,
Sings at her task as the moments fly;
Still as the busy hours go by,
Mrs. McGill, over the tubs,
Scrubs and washes, washes and scrubs.

Bare are her strong arms, rough and red
Her hands, with striving for daily bread.
While she works in the steam and foam,
Thoughts of the “childer,” left at home,
Come to cheer her, till, after all,
The day seems short and the washing small;
For mother-love, with tender spell,
Is working its ceaseless miracle;
While Mrs. McGill, over the tubs,
Scrubs and washes, washes and scrubs.

Down through the areaway there floats
The cry of the newsboy, strident notes
Telling how on a field of fame
A warrior won him a hero's name;
The sailors clung to a reeling deck,
And served the guns of a shattered wreck;
A hero mounted the ladder tall,
And plucked a life from the flaming wall;
While Mrs. McGill, over the tubs,
Scrubs and washes, washes and scrubs.

Six o'clock! And the music swells
Loud from the throats of a thousand bells;
So, at last, when the shadows fall,
She draws about her a faded shawl,
While sweet content in the rough, worn face
Kindles a brighter than beauty's grace.
Home she hastes, where, the long day through,
The little ones watched and waited, too,
While Mrs. McGill, over the tubs,
Scrubs and washes, washes and scrubs.

Mrs. McGill, your humble name
Has no place in the rolls of fame.
Little it matters to such as you;
Brief the page is, the names are few.
Still I know that your faithful love
Finds a place in the scroll above.
So, when my heart grows weak and faint,
This is the thought that stops complaint:
Mrs. McGill, over the tubs,
Scrubs and washes, washes and scrubs.

—Youth's Companion.

Feed Them Properly

and carefully; reduce the painfully large percentage of infant mortality. Take no chances and make no experiments in this very important matter. The Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk has saved thousands of little lives.

When to say “No.”

When the clerk tries to get rid of some other binding by calling it just as good as the

“S·H·&M·”

Bias Velveteen Skirt Binding.

Simply refuse to take it. No binding wears or looks as well as the “S. H. & M.”

If your dealer will not supply you, we will.

Send for samples, showing labels and materials, to the S. H. & M. Co., P. O. Box 699, New York City.

Arnold Constable & Co.

Lyons Silks

Rich White Brocades,
Rich Chene and Brocaded Silks,
Satin Ground Plaid Silks,
Pim's Irish Plaid Poplins.

Goods just received from Custom-house and representing the coming fashions.

WHITE SATIN,
MOIRE VELOUTÉ,
BLACK BROCADES.

Grenadine, Gaze, and Mousseline

LYONS VELVETS

Broadway & 19th st.

NEW YORK

American Lanternists

(pastors, educators, lecturers, and private persons) are finding out that the very best Stereopticons in the world are manufactured by Riley Brothers, of Bradford, England. “The Monarch” lantern is supreme. In slides, both new, original and “up-to-date,” we are without serious competition in the United States. Seventy-two original views on General Wallace's great book, “Ben Hur,” the masterpiece of the XIX. century. A specialty made of illustrating popular songs of the day.

See our lanterns and slides before purchasing. Compare with others. We know the result in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred. Only one price to all. Discounts all taken off in advance. Best colored slides $1.00 each. Plain slides 40 cents. 100,000 slides in stock on sale or hire. Literature free. Large catalogue and 72 photogravures, postage free, for 20 cents.

RILEY BROTHERS,

American Office and Salesroom: 16 Beekman St., New York.

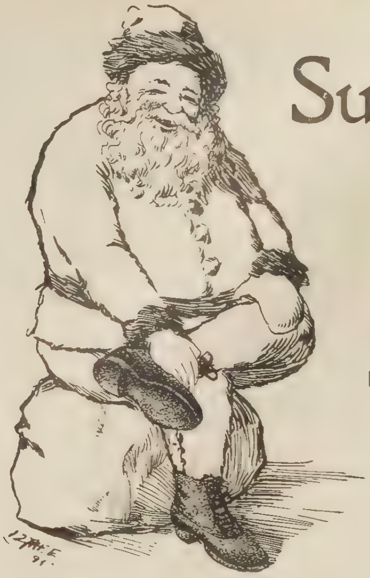
CAR FARE, lunch money, and worry saved in your shopping. Don't come to town yourself, but send your orders by mail to MRS. S. COOPER, 434 Sixth St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

Six Seasonable Shoes Suggested by Santa Claus



(He wears 'em.)

The Alfred Dolge Felt Shoes and Slippers Supply Winter Comfort.

No. 256.

A CHRISTMAS SLIPPER to please any woman. Woman's Romeo, fur trimmed. Dolge felt with leather sole. Price, $2.50.

No. 907.

A STORM PROOF SHOE. Fine leather with Dolge felt insole and hygienic wool lining. Price, $5.00

No. 351.

WOMAN'S FELT LACE SHOE. Leather sole and heel, and hygienic wool lining. Price, $2.25.

They have demonstrated the fact that cold and tender or clammy and perspiring feet are not a necessary consequence to the cold season.

Just how and why they are able to afford this comfort, and why the Alfred Dolge are the only felt shoes to wear, is explained in pamphlet "On a Felt Footing." Sent free.

ORDERS PROMPTLY FILLED
BY MAIL.

Alfred Dolge's
FELT SLIPPERS AND SHOES

THIS TRADE-MARK ON ALL OUR GOODS

No. 909.

MEN'S CUSHION SOLE SHOE. Something luxurious. Leather with cushion sole and hygienic wool lining. Price, $6.00.

No. 101.

MEN'S NULLIFIER. A slipper for men who "can't wear slippers." Made of toilet felt. Price, $3.50.

No. 1065.

WOMAN'S DONGOLA SHOE. With cushion sole and hygienic wool lining. Price, $5.00.

DANIEL GREEN & COMPANY,

(Take Elevator.) 44 East Fourteenth Street, NEW YORK.

The Business World

The General Course of Prices The state of trade last week was marked by great irregularity. Railway stocks and bonds, exclusive of industrial securities, are about the same as the week before. The prices of many staples continue their downward course, the exceptions being in the unchanged rates for flour, oats, print cloths, lumber, rice, and sugar, while cotton, coffee, and petroleum have advanced.

Increase in the Northwestern Dividend One of the most encouraging features in the railway world has been the increase just made by the Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company in its dividend rate on the common stock. A year ago the Company was compelled to reduce the bi-annual payment from 3 to 2½ per cent. Six months later a further reduction to 1½ was made. Now the Company has increased the dividend again to 2½ per cent.

The Sultan's Irade The financial situation abroad has improved since the announcement on Tuesday of last week that the Sultan had at last consented to an irade that additional guard-ships should be admitted to the Bosphorus. There was a further improvement when on Thursday the English gunboat Dryad and the Italian gunboat Archimede passed the Straits of the Dardanelles. Counter elements, however, were at work in the continued selling of South African mining stocks by Paris speculators and on account of the semi-monthly settlement at London.

Resumption of Dividends by the Denver and Rio Grande Last week another encouraging feature marked the progress of the railway work. It was the announcement that the Denver and Rio Grande Railway Company would resume the payment of dividends on its preferred stock. Last week's declaration was that of a dividend of one per cent., payable January 15. As this company was the first to stop the payment of dividends in 1893, when Colorado began to feel a special business depression, so the announcement of last week is interpreted in the most favorable light, as the announcement of such a conservatively managed concern should be.

England's Increased Exports to the United States Mr. I. N. Ford announces in a recent number of the New York "Tribune" that the improved trade with the United States has been the chief blessing of the year for England. November trade returns show a gain of three and a half million dollars in exports of textiles over the same month last year, and this is caused largely by increased business with the United States. The growth of woolen and worsted exports has been tenfold, and cottons and other textiles run up more than one-half. Even the decline of 30 per cent. in tin plate is made up by a large increase in exports under the iron schedule.

Our Production of Iron It will be remembered that we chronicled the fact of an iron production on October 1 of 200,000 tons, and on November 1 of 217,000 tons (the largest on record). We have now to chronicle that on December 1 there had been an increase in the number of furnaces from 239 to 242, but the aggregate capacity was slightly less than that of the smaller number of furnaces on November 1, the figures being 216,800 tons. This would indicate that the furnaces going out of blast during the month had a larger aggregate capacity than those starting work. The significant thing is that the weakening in prices has checked further expansion, but the product still remains prodigiously large.

Senator Frye's Bill Mr. Frye has just introduced a bill into the United States Senate to establish a free port at Fort Pond Bay (five miles west of Montauk Point), or at such other site in the waters of Long Island as the Secretary of the Treasury may approve. This would give us a place where ships might arrive or leave without paying the usual entrance and clearing fees and tonnage dues, and where foreign goods might be unloaded or stored without paying customs duties—in other words, a bonded warehouse. The port would be subject to the warehouse system of the United States. While, in a free port, vessels would escape a certain class of fees, they would by no means escape charges for dockage and for the use of warehouses. It would not be necessary for foreign merchandise to be bonded in order to be transshipped. Furthermore, factories may be erected within this free port for the manufacture of export products. All expense of maintenance—dredging, breakwaters, lights, etc.—would fall upon the owners. These are, as named in Senator Frye's bill, Messrs. Corbin, Pratt, Dickerman, and Edgell. The bill also authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to establish free ports at any other suitable places in the United States.

A Viaduct Across Behring Strait Behring Strait is only forty-eight miles wide, and the Siberian coast is plainly visible from ours. As the water in the Strait is shallow, it has been proposed by some engineers to build a bridge which would connect the Eastern and Western Hemispheres. Mr. Bruce, however, in his recently published book on Alaska, tells us that the spanning of Behring Strait by a bridge would be a physical impossibility, owing to the swift current and vast quantities of ice which in winter are continually flowing through, and which would speedily demolish such a structure. He adds, nevertheless, that though it may be possible to tunnel the Strait, a more practical suggestion would be to fill it in with rock, allowing sufficient openness for the water to flow through and for vessels to pass, thus forming an adamantine roadway between the extreme West and East. The mountains that mark the western point of the continent, at Cape Prince of Wales, are rocky and barren. Great quantities of rock might be taken from these mountains and dropped into the Strait. Of course to carry so gigantic an enterprise to successful completion would require both great capital and labor. As to the latter, if white men could not be found, the Eskimo could be utilized. Should the enterprise be undertaken jointly by the Governments of the United States and Russia, the latter would no doubt make use of her convicts, as she is now doing in the construction of the Trans-Siberian Railway.

Fortnightly and Monthly Settlements at London and Paris So much attention has lately been called to the fortnightly settlemenin in London and the monthly settlements ts Paris that it is well to notice the difference of such adjustments there to those which take place here. Our brokers adjust their mutual balances daily, but in London the period for which credit is allowed to speculators is generally about a fortnight. There is one exception to this rule, namely, British funds, in which the brokers buy either for cash or for settlement at the beginning or end of each month. In Paris the general settlement is always at the beginning or end of each month. The London settlements occupy three or four days, and, owing to the recent unprecedented activity in mines, it has been arranged that there should be a special day, which has been called "Cotango Day," to be devoted to mines alone. It is on this day that jobbers arrange what prices shares shall bring. No matter whether the investor or speculator sells at a lower or a higher fraction, his broker agrees to carry his shares for him at a certain "Cotango." Supply and demand for the shares account for the variation in this "Cotango." The brokers and the public meet their engagements on the same day in London, but in Paris the public pays up on the day before the final day, which is kept for the adjustment of balances between the brokers themselves. On the London Stock Exchange a card is issued for approaching settlements, and is called the "Settling Day Card;" the first day being the "Buying-in Day," the second the "Cotango Day," the third the "Ticket Day," and the fourth the "Account Day."

Senator Thurston's Plan for the Pacific Railways On Thursday of last week Senator Thurston, of Nebraska, brought forward a measure for settling the debts of the Pacific Railways. A Treasury Department circular has also appeared giving notice that nearly $3,680,000 of the so-called "Currency 6s" become due and will be paid January 1, 1896. As will be noted by those interested, this is the third lot of these bonds which the Government has had to take care of within a short time. In January and November, 1895, the sum of about $3,000,000 matured and was redeemed. Next February $4,320,000 will become due. During the next few years other amounts will come due. There then arises the question as to how to provide for these subsidy bonds or "Currency 6s," and how to protect our Government's interest in the road. As to the Union Pacific Railway, the Government is now threatened with the foreclosure of the first mortgage, which, coming before its own mortgage, would stop all of its mortgage equity in the road. Senator Thurston's bill directs the Treasurer of the United States to offer the entire indebtedness owing to the United States on the whole through line, comprising both the Union and Central Pacific, as one claim to be sold to the highest bidder. The bid shall be for not less than half of the entire amount. The Senator believes that the Government would obtain at least as much as its claim is worth at any forced sale of the property, or through any other disposition of it. There is a clearness and a definiteness about this proposition which will commend it to many. Its advantage over the plan proposed by the Government Directors is that there would not be any anxiety on the part of the Government to invest further in the properties. Instead of that, the Government would receive almost at once in cash whatever its second lien against the properties is worth in the market under competitive conditions. Mr. Thurston was asked what he thought the Government would receive under his plan, and he replied between $45,000,000 and $55,000,000. A criticism has been well made, however, that Mr. Thurston's purpose to have the Government interest in both the Central and Union Pacific offered for sale as "one claim" is not entirely a defensible one, since the two are distinct properties, and in all probability will have to be reorganized separately.

FINANCIAL

AMERICAN FIRE
INSURANCE COMPANY
A.D.1810.
Office, Company's Building,
308 & 310
Walnut St.,
Philadelphia

Investment Securities
$
such as real estate loans, municipal bonds, school bonds, etc. We select these for large and small investors with the utmost care. They will yield 4½% to 6½%.
Our pamphlet is free.
The Provident
Trust Co. 45 Milk St., Boston, Mass.
Please mention The Outlook

The Bond Record

Subscription Price
$2.50 per annum
Single Copies
25 Cents

A Monthly Journal
For Investors

108 PAGES

Published by 24 Nassau St. N.Y.
The Bond Record Publishing Company

CONTAINS

Reviews and Analysis of Railroad Reports

AND

The Record of all Transactions in Listed Securities

—both of which features have made THE BOND RECORD an authority in the financial world.

We shall introduce during the coming year articles by prominent men of different professions on subjects of interest and importance to every business man. Among them will be the following:

THE WORLD'S SUPPLY OF GOLD

By Chas. S. Gleed, Esq.

This is a topic of extraordinary interest and of vital importance to the United States at this time, and the facts and opinions appearing in it will be worth the most careful consideration;

AN ELABORATE ARTICLE ON THE ERIE RAILROAD; IRRIGATION AS BEARING ON TRANSPORTATION INTERESTS by an acknowledged authority on the subject; and

AN ARTICLE ON ANTHRACITE COAL

By Mr. William Griffith

the eminent Mining Engineer and Coal Specialist (late Assistant Geologist of the State of Pennsylvania Survey of the Coal Regions, and member of the Pennsylvania Coal Waste Commission), who will prepare exclusively for The Bond Record the most exhaustive statement which has ever been put in print on this question.

Subscriptions sent in now date from February 1st, the beginning of the next volume, and include a binder for the year's numbers.

New York Guaranty & Indemnity Co.

65 CEDAR STREET, N. Y.
Mutual Life Building

CAPITAL, - - - $2,000,000
SURPLUS, - - $1,500,000

IS A TRUST COMPANY UNDER THE BANKING ACT AND TRANSACTS ALL TRUST COMPANY BUSINESS.

Is a legal depository of trust funds.

Acts as Trustee, Transfer Agent, or Registrar for Corporations.

Acts as Executor, Administrator, Guardian, or Trustee of Estates.

ALLOWS INTEREST ON DEPOSITS subject to check.

WALTER G. OAKMAN, President.
ADRIAN ISELIN, Jr., Vice-President.
GEORGE R. TURNBULL, 2d Vice-President.
HENRY A. MURRAY, Treas. and Sec.
J. NELSON BORLAND, Assist. Treas. and Sec.

DIRECTORS

Samuel D. Babcock, Adrian Iselin, Jr.,
George F. Baker, Augustus D. Juilliard,
George S. Bowdoin, James N. Jarvie,
Frederic Cromwell Richard A. McCurdy
Walter R. Gillette Walter G. Oakman,
Robert Goelet, Alexander E. Orr,
G. G. Haven, Henry H. Rogers,
Oliver Harriman, Henry W. Smith,
R. Somers Hayes H. McK. Twombly,
Charles R. Henderson, Frederick W. Vanderbilt,
William C. Whitney.

"Think It Over"

Are Your Savings Earning All They Should?

We offer to investors of any sum from $100 upwards an 8 per cent. investment as good as Government bonds, secured by first Mortgages on Gilt-edged Real Estate. Best references. Investigation solicited.

YOUNG & CO.
Temple Court, 5 Beekman St., New York

R. L. Day & Co.

HIGHEST GRADE
Investment Bonds

Boston Securities a Specialty

7 NASSAU ST., NEW YORK
40 WATER ST., BOSTON

Members New York and Boston Stock Exchanges

SAFE INVESTMENTS

GOOD AS GOVERNMENT BONDS—DOUBLE THE RATE

6% 7% 8% Made in strictly first-class Real Estate Mortgages, State, County, City, and School Warrants and Bonds, with a view to absolute security and prompt interest payments. Best references. Correspondence solicited.

JOHN P. DORR & CO., Investment Brokers
Seattle, Washington

WESTERN MORTGAGES
DEFAULTED AND OTHERWISE,
Bought for Cash.
CHAS. E. GIBSON, 45 Milk St. Boston, Mass.

£ Cheques

Of The Cheque Bank of London, in amounts from £1 up are Cashed All Over the World by agents, hotels, shops, railroads. Just the thing for sending money to The Old Country, and for travelers. Issued for over 21 years. Circular on application. FREDERICK W. PERRY, Gen'l Agent, 2 Wall Street, New York.

YOU SELL WE BUY

DO YOU WANT TO SELL A
Western Mortgage
or Western Land—avoid foreclosure costs—stop sending good money after bad—get a good 5% investment instead? State exact location, condition of title, and your lowest price. Over $2,000,000 in Western securities successfully handled by the present management of this corporation.

THE BOSTON REALTY, INDEMNITY AND TRUST CO.
Send for our Bond List. 33 Equitable Building, Boston

The Children's Aid Society Christmas Appeal

Christmas is the season which should especially be made happy for children, and, above all, for the children of the poor. In New York hundreds of homeless boys and girls, but for the lodging-houses of the Children's Aid Society, would be sleeping in alleys and cellars, or herding in the dens of thieves and vagabonds. Thousands of others, but for our industrial schools, would be roving the streets half-clad and hungry, and growing up to be ignorant, vagrant, and criminal.

We desire at this season to make one happy day for these little victims of poverty and misfortune, with presents, clothing, dinners, food, shoes, and the like gifts. We need money and voluntary help to support these lodging-houses and schools. Above all, we wish to present a home to the homeless.

Twenty dollars will place a homeless waif in a distant comfortable home in the country.

Fifty dollars will put shoes on fifty barefooted little ones.

One hundred dollars will provide nourishing hot dinners for one month to the half-starved children of one of our industrial schools.

Who will aid us to make Christmas happier for the poor? Every dollar helps.

There were during the past year in our six lodging-houses 5,701 different boys and girls; 231,120 meals and 167,733 lodgings were supplied. In the twenty-one day and twelve evening schools were 13,724 children, who were taught and partly fed and partly clothed, 807,939 meals being supplied; 2,059 were sent to homes and employment, and restored to friends both in the East and the West; 4,358 were aided with food, medicine, etc., through the "Sick Children's Mission;" 5,769 children enjoyed the benefits of the "Summer Home" at Bath, L. I. (averaging 577 per week); 6,156 mothers and sick infants were sent to the "Health Home" at Coney Island; 78 girls have been instructed in the use of the sewing-machine in the Girls' Temporary Home and in the industrial schools; 23 were taught typewriting, and 212 boys were trained at the Farm School. $3,404.57 have been deposited in the Penny Savings Banks. Total number under charge of the Society during the year, 37,979.

Gifts of provisions and clothing may be sent to the Central Office, No. 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York City, or will be called for if the address be forwarded. Donations of money may be inclosed to any of the undersigned; if in checks or post-office orders, made payable to George S. Coe, Treasurer.

D. Willis James, President,
11 Cliff Street, New York.
George S. Coe, Treasurer,
American Exchange National Bank,
128 Broadway, New York.
C. Loring Brace, Secretary,
105 East Twenty-second Street,
New York.

A Witty Judge

The late Lord Bowen, besides being a great Judge, was also a great wit, and many interesting bon mots of his are being recalled just now. On the occasion of the Queen's jubilee the Judges were drawing up an address to the Queen.

"Conscious as we are of our shortcomings," ran the address; "conscious as we are of one another's shortcomings," suggested Lord Bowen. Not long ago he was asked to sit in the Admiralty Court. Upon taking his seat he asked indulgence on account of his inexperience in Admiralty business.

"And may there be no moanings of the Bar," he added, "when I put out to sea." Sometimes his wit was very incisive, as, for instance, when he remarked: "Truth will out—even in an affidavit." Not the least happy of his recorded witticisms was the remark he made when congratulated on his appointment to be a Law Lord. He would, he said, find the work easy, his duty being to give his opinion after so many others had given theirs. "In fact, I only have to agree, and might well have been raised to the peerage as 'Lord Concurry.'"—Household Words.

Copco bathsoap is pure white. Think that over. It contains neither green, yellow, brown, pink or any other coloring matter.

COPCO
TRADE MARK.

is pure Soap. Can there be any question about the desirability of such a soap for the skin? Try it. Sold by all dealers.

THE N. K. FAIRBANK COMPANY,
Chicago, New York, St. Louis.

Life : : : : :
Endowment and Accident : : : Insurance

The Ætna Life Insurance Company of Hartford, Conn., grants Policies containing every desirable feature. Reference, its numerous patrons. Address the Company for Insurance or an Agency.

☞ Largest Company in the World writing Life and Accident Insurance.

Broker for the Assured

I save my customers thousands of dollars annually. IF you intend insuring your life, or IF you carry life insurance taken out within the past three years, confer with me.

JAS. A. STEELE, 45 Broadway, New York

Purest Best

A Palatable Stimulant for Invalids

Liebig COMPANY'S Extract of Beef

An indispensable aid to the best cooking

The Original and Genuine

DEAFNESS

and Head Noises relieved by using Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums.

New scientific invention; different from all other devices. The only safe, simple, comfortable and invisible Ear Drum in the world. Helps where medical skill fails. No wire or string attachment. Write for pamphlet.

WILSON EAR DRUM CO.,
Offices: { 155 Trust Bldg., Louisville, Ky.
1122 Broadway, New York.

The Higher Life of New York City

By ALBERT SHAW, with Thirty Illustrations will be a leading feature in the second Illustrated Monthly Magazine Number of The Outlook, which will be published on the 25th of January. This paper, following the introductory chapter by Theodore Roosevelt in this issue, will begin a most interesting and valuable series, to be continued during the year, on "The Higher Life of American Cities," and setting forth, with numerous illustrations, united Christian and philanthropic work, the development of good government ideas, the efforts for securing a more wholesome and attractive home life for the people, and the extension of library, musical, and educational features. Dr. Albert Shaw, who will write the paper on New York City, is the editor of the "Review of Reviews," and the author of "Municipal Government in Great Britain" and "Municipal Government in Continental Europe," and the close attention which he has given to city problems for many years will insure for this article wide attention.

The other cities to be treated are Boston, by the Rev. Dr. Edward Everett Hale, the famous clergyman, author, and philanthropist; Chicago, by Mr. Melville E. Stone, the General Manager of the Associated Press, and one of the best-known citizens of our great central metropolis; Philadelphia, by Mr. Talcott Williams, of the Philadelphia "Press," whose wide experience and journalistic skill specially qualify him for this work; Buffalo, by the Rev. Dr. William Burnet Wright, the pastor of the First Congregational Church of that city, and a delightful writer on any subject; St. Louis, by the Rev. Dr. John Snyder, Pastor of the Church of the Messiah, and a worker in philanthropy and education; New Orleans, by Miss Grace King, a writer of remarkable force, who is herself identified with all that makes for higher living there.

Among the other important features of the next Magazine Number of The Outlook will be: A timely paper on "Clara Barton and the Red Cross Movement," fully illustrated; "From Atlanta to the Sea," the first of three illustrated papers covering the route of General Sherman "from Atlanta to the Sea" in the stormy days at the close of the Civil War, but with special reference to the conditions of the New South, by Mr. Willis J. Abbot, of the Chicago "Chronicle;" "Kate Carnegie," the second installment of Ian Maclaren's new and fascinating novel; "How Shall a Boy be Introduced to Tools?" by Professor Charles A. Bennett, of the Teachers' College, New York; Three Poems by Emily Dickinson, accompanied by a sketch and portrait of the author.

A Weekly Newspaper and a Monthly Magazine

IN ONE—FOR THREE DOLLARS A YEAR

The unique new departure which The Outlook has made in establishing these Magazine Numbers secures for all subscribers a Weekly Newspaper and an Illustrated Monthly Magazine in a single publication, and without any increase of price. Three Dollars pays for the whole fifty-two issues, twelve of which are the Magazine Numbers, marked off by a special cover, made attractive by a wealth of illustrations, and tied together in interest by the monthly installments of Ian Maclaren's novel, "Kate Carnegie," which promises to be equal to "Beside the Bonnie Brier-Bush."

EVERY NEW SUBSCRIBER to The Outlook in 1895 who sends three dollars for a year's subscription and mentions this offer will receive the paper for a full year from February 1, 1896—fifty-two issues—and will also receive all the issues between the date of his order and February 1, including the Illustrated Magazine Numbers of December and January FREE

THE OUTLOOK COMPANY, 13 Astor Place, New York

Books Received

AMERICAN BOOK CO., NEW YORK

Eggleston, Edward. Stories of American Life and Adventure. 50 cts.
Goldsmith, Oliver. The Vicar of Wakefield. 35 cts.
Shakespeare, William. As You Like It. 20 cts.
Eggleston, Edward. Stories of Great Americans for Little Americans. 40 cts.

D. APPLETON & CO., NEW YORK

The Songs and Music of Friedrich Froebel's Mother Play. Arranged by Susan E. Blow.

ARENA PUBLISHING CO., BOSTON

Duff, Grace S. Nicodemus.

THE CENTURY CO., NEW YORK

The Century Magazine. Vol. L.: New Series, Vol. XXVIII. May, 1895, to October, 1895. $3.
St. Nicholas Magazine. Conducted by Mary Mapes Dodge. Vol. XXII., Parts I. and II. November, 1894, to October, 1895. $4.

DODD, MEAD & CO., NEW YORK

Spenser, Edmund. Epithalamion. With Drawings by George Wharton Edwards. $7.50.

GINN & CO., BOSTON

Luquiens, Jules. Places and Peoples.
Cross, Anson K. Mechanical Drawing; Color Study; Free-hand Drawing; Primary Lessons; Grammar Lessons; National Drawing Books, Cards, Models, and Slate.

D. C. HEATH & CO., BOSTON

Grandgent, C. H. Selections for French Composition. 50 cts.

HENRY HOLT & CO., NEW YORK

Von Scheffel, Joseph N. Ekkehard. With Introduction by W. H. Carruth. $1.25.
German and French Poems for Memorizing. 20 cts.

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., BOSTON

Hughes, Thomas. Tom Brown's School Days.
Dana, Richard H., Jr. Two Years Before the Mast.
Eliot, George. Silas Marner. 40 cts.

LAMSON, WOLFFE & CO., BOSTON

Revolutionary Calendar. $1.

LEE & SHEPARD. BOSTON

Fessenden, Laura D. Essie. $1.50.
Ingalls, Herbert. The Boston Charades. $1.

MACMILLAN & CO., NEW YORK

Oliphant, Mrs. The Makers of Modern Rome. $3.
Baldwin, Mrs. Alfred. The Shadow on the Blind, and Other Ghost Stories. $1.50.
Addison and Steele. The Spectator in London. Essays. Illustrated by Ralph Cleaver. $2.
Hughes, Thomas. Vacation Rambles. $1.75.
Ross, C. M. Pinks and Cherries. $1.75.
Walford, L. B. Frederick. $1.25.
Balzac, Honoré de. The Quest of the Absolute. (La Recherché de l'Absolu.) Translated by Ellen Marriage. With Preface by George Saintsbury. $1.50.
The Marvelous Adventures of Sir John Maundevile, Kt. Edited and Illustrated by Arthur Layard. Preface by John Cameron Grant. $2.

A. C. M'CLURG & CO., CHICAGO

Roberts, W. The Book-Hunter in London. $5.
Cheney, John Vance. That Dome in Air. $1.25.
Wheeler, David H. Our Industrial Utopia and its Unhappy Citizens. $1.25.
Latimer, Elizabeth Wormeley. Europe in Africa in the Nineteenth Century. $2.50.

POOR RICHARD, JR. & CO., PHILADELPHIA

Love and I in Heaven: The New Order by a New Reporter. $1.50.

A. D. F. RANDOLPH & CO., NEW YORK

Houghton, Louise S. Antipas, Son of Chuza, and Others Whom Jesus Loved. $1.50.

FLEMING H. REVELL CO., NEW YORK

Comegys, B. B. Last Words for My Young Hearers and Readers.

R. H. RUSSELL & SON, NEW YORK

"Chip's" Old Wood-Cuts.
Bellew, F. P. W. "Chip's" Dogs.
Shelley, Frank. Legends of Gems.

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, NEW YORK

Q. Ia. 75 cts.
Stevenson, Robert Louis. A Child's Garden of Verses. Illustrated by Charles Robinson. $1.50.
"Cavendish." The Laws and Principles of Whist. $1.50.
Brooks, Noah. The Mediterranean Trip. $1.25.

STONE & KIMBALL, CHICAGO

Garland, Hamlin. Rose of Dutcher's Coolly. $1.50.
Channing, Grace Ellery. The Sister of a Saint and Other Stories. $1.
Macleod, Fiona. The Sin-Eater and Other Tales and Episodes. $1.
Stevenson, Robert Louis, and William Ernest Henley. Macaire. $1.

WAY & WILLIAMS, CHICAGO

Yale, Catharine B. Nim and Cum and the Wonder-Head Stories. $1.25.
Wynne, Madelene Y. The Little Room and Other Stories. $1.25.

JOHN WILSON & SON, CAMBRIDGE

Wilson, Lewis G. Glimpses of a Better Life in the Journey of Experience. $1.

THE WOOLFALL CO., NEW YORK

Ellis, Edward S. The Youth's Dictionary of Mythology. 50 cts.

Stimulating and Nutritious

Horsford's Acid Phosphate

It supplies just the right element (the phosphates) to repair waste of body and brain—a food itself, and also helps digest other food.

I WOULD LIKE TO HAVE ONE
WHAT? WILL SEND A PIANO ON TRIAL.
I'LL WRITE FOR ONE ISN'T THAT A BEAUTY?

IVERS & POND PIANOS.

We are large manufacturers of Pianos of the VERY HIGHEST GRADE — this does not mean HIGHEST PRICED. Our magnificent business has been established and maintained by making and selling the BEST Piano at a FAIR PRICE.

Never were our Pianos so desirable as this year. We wish the name of every reader of this paper who intends to buy a Piano. To such we will mail our catalogue, and (if no dealer sells our Piano where you live) quote you prices on all our styles, both for cash and on easy payments.

EASY PAYMENTS: — No city or village in the United States so remote but that we can furnish any well-meaning person with any Piano we make for a small cash payment, balance $10.00 or more monthly till all is paid.

We ship Pianos anywhere in the United States, subject to approval after trial. Pianos to come back at our expense for all freights if not satisfactory. For full information address,

IVERS & POND PIANO COMPANY,
114 BOYLSTON ST., BOSTON.

Water

—nothing but water. That's all you need with Pearline. Don't use any soap with it. If what we claim is true, that Pearline is better than soap, the soap doesn't have a chance to do any work. It's only in the way. Besides, some soaps might cause trouble—and you'd lay it to Pearline. You'll never get Pearline's very best work till you use it just as directed on the package. Then you'll have the easiest, quickest, most economical way of washing and cleaning. 477

Millions NOW USE Pearline

"Where Dirt Gathers, Waste Rules." Use SAPOLIO

About People

—The New York "Mail and Express" informs us that Sir Walter Henry Wilkin, the new Lord Mayor of London, is one of the largest yeast importers in Great Britain—which accounts for his rapid rise.

—We learn that the Rochester "Post and Express," for some years an independent Democratic journal, will, on the first of next year, become a Republican paper under the leadership of Mr. William H. McElroy, who was for some years a member of the editorial staff of the New York "Tribune."

—Herr Jahnke tells us that so great was Prince Bismarck's fear lest his letters should be opened that he would frequently drop into some small stationery shop on his daily walk, ask for a package of cheap envelopes, put in his letters, and then request the clerk to address them, as it would be too much bother to an old man to take off his gloves.

—The father of Mr. Whistler, the well-known American artist, was Major George Washington Whistler, an engineer of wide reputation, and several years of Mr. James Whistler's early youth were spent in Russia, his father having accepted the invitation of Emperor Nicholas to superintend the construction of the St. Petersburg and Moscow Railway.

—Says Dr. Edward Everett Hale: "When Canon Farrar left us some years ago—a most charming and intelligent visitor—he told Phillips Brooks that he was going to give a farewell lecture on his impressions of America. Brooks, who was a thorough American and a person of excellent common sense, said to him, promptly: 'Don't do any such thing. In the first place, you have no impressions; and in the second place, they are all wrong.'"

—It is related in the Washington "Star" that on one occasion Senator Edmunds was standing with a visiting English statesman on the high steps at the west side of the Capitol, looking down Pennsylvania Avenue toward the Treasury Department. The stranger had seen much to interest and amuse him in Washington. "You have a wonderful country and a wonderful people here, Mr. Senator. Nothing can be impossible with such go-ahead inhabitants." "Oh, yes," said the Senator, "some things are impossible here. It is impossible to march a brass band down that avenue and have a crowd of colored people go in the opposite direction at the same time."

—The Springfield "Republican" announces that State Senator George P. Lawrence, of North Adams, is certain to be elected President of the Massachusetts Senate for 1896. Mr. Lawrence is thirty-six years old, a graduate of Amherst College and of the Columbia Law School, and has been prominent in North Adams, socially and professionally, for some years. He is now serving his second term as State Senator, previous to which he held an important judgeship in North Adams. The Outlook is particularly interested in Judge Lawrence's present and future success on account of his connection with the staff of this paper for several months immediately after leaving college.

—The death of Count Taaffe has been felt more deeply by the Emperor of Austria than by any one else, since the Count was his boyhood chum and has been his lifelong companion and confidant. The Emperor has always called the Count by his first name, and has addressed him with the "thee" and "thou," with which he honors very few persons. It is one of the ironies of fate that a statesman who had passed an immense number of useful measures long awaiting parliamentary sanction, who had introduced many sorely needed reforms—poor laws, factory laws, laws for the protection of women, and laws bringing home to employers their duties towards their employees—that a man who had extended the franchise, and who had introduced honesty into a hitherto corrupt administration, should have been at last put down and out. Yet the fact that the Prime Minister conceded so much to the various nationalist aspirations of the many races which make up the Austrian agglomeration was the cause of his ruin. After a vain attempt to increase the electorate by three million votes, the statesman gave up his office.

THE BEAUTY AND BRILLIANCY of GOLD OR SILVER-WARE IS EVERLASTING WHEN SILVER ELECTRO SILICON POLISH IS USED EXCLUSIVELY.
IT NEVER SCRATCHES,
NEVER WEARS,
IT'S UNLIKE OTHERS.
SOLD EVERYWHERE.
THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., NEW YORK.
THIS FIGURE IN RED ON EVERY BOX

Just the thing for a Christmas Present
Any lady will appreciate such a useful and beautiful gift as our "Scovill's Gold"

Puff Box and a box of Pozzoni's Celebrated Complexion Powder

Pozzoni's is the ideal complexion powder—beautifying, refreshing, cleanly, healthful and harmless.

Both at your druggists or fancy goods dealers—50c. or mailed on receipt of price. Address J. A. POZZONI PHARMACAL CO., St. Louis, Mo.

CHRISTMAS GIFT
RESTFUL READING.
Holds book and dictionary just where wanted (sitting or lying down). Place for lamp and racks for more books. Can consult the dictionary without getting up. No strained eyes nor tired arms when reading. Cases for holding Century Dictionary. Catalogue free.
HOLLOWAY CO., Cuyahoga Falls, Ohio.

FOR GIFTS and LIGHT
Buy "MILLER" LAMPS
ELEGANT DESIGNS, BEAUTIFUL FINISHES.
The best lamp made—up-to-date in every respect. Call and see it (a thousand varieties), also our Fine Brass Tables, with Onyx Tops. Buy only "Miller" lamps from dealers. Write for Catalogue.
EDWARD MILLER & CO., { Manufacturers. Established 1844.
28 and 30 West Broadway, and 66 Park Place, New York.
☞ For cool weather buy a "Miller" oil heater.

Bits of Fun

If a praying-machine were invented, many would use it, if it did not take too much time from business to wind it up.—Texas Siftings.

Teacher—How would you describe Henry VIII. of England? Student—I would describe him as a professional widower.—Tit-Bits.

Andy Smart—Say, papa, are the things that Congressmen say appropriate? Old Smart—"Appropriate" is about all they do say.—Syracuse Post.

Teacher—What does the reign of King Charles I. teach us? Tommy—Please, sir, not to lose our heads in moments of excitement, sir.—Truth.

Could anything be neater than the old darky's reply to a beautiful young lady whom he offered to lift over the gutter, and who insisted that she was too heavy? "Lor', missus," said he, "I'se used to lifting barrels of sugar."—Exchange.

Editor (looking it over)—It's a little too late to publish a menu for a Thanksgiving dinner, ma'am, and a little too early for a Christmas dinner; otherwise I should be glad to use this and— Indignant Caller—Sir! That is poetry.—Chicago Tribune.

Tailor—When you delivered Mr. Slowboy's suit did you call attention to the fact that it was there when promised? Boy—Yes, sir. Tailor—What did he say? Boy—He said he felt he never could repay you for what you had done for him.—Sun.

"I suppose you are a socialist, or anarchist, or something?" asked the lady of vague ideas. "Madam," replied Mr. Brokedown Baldwin, "I am a passive altruist." "What in the name of common sense is that?" "I believe in being helped all I can."—Indianapolis Journal.

Ferrari, the celebrated composer, relates the following anecdote in his memoirs: On a cold December night a man in a little village in the Tyrol opened the window and stood in front of it, with hardly any clothing to his back. "Peter!" shouted a neighbor who was passing, "what are you doing there?" "I'm catching a cold." "What for?" "So I can sing bass to-morrow at church."—Household Words.

The young man had seen the play before. He let everybody for four seats around know that, and he kept telling just what was coming, and how funny it would be when it did come. He had a pretty girl with him, and he was trying to amuse her. At length he said: "Did you ever try listening to a play with your eyes shut? You've no idea how queer it seems." A middle-aged man with a red face sat just in front. He twisted himself about in his seat and glared at the young man. "Young man," said he, "did you ever try listening to a play with your mouth shut?" The silence that followed was almost painful.—Washington Post.

A Blunt Physician

A writer in the "Nineteenth Century" tells a characteristic story of Dr. Jephson, who was a famous English practitioner forty or fifty years ago, as well known for his bluntness and freedom of speech as for his professional skill.

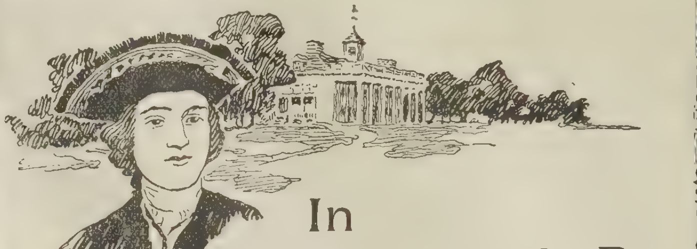
One day a great lady, the Marchioness of ——, called to consult him. He listened to a long account of her symptoms, and then prescribed as follows:

"An egg and a cup of tea for breakfast, then walk for two hours; a slice of cold beef and half a glass of Madeira for luncheon, then walk again for two hours; fish (except salmon) and a cutlet or wing of fowl for dinner, with a single glass of Madeira or claret; to bed at ten and rise at six, etc. No carriage exercise, please."

The patient listened with surprise. "But, doctor," she said, "do you know who I am? Do you know—ahem!—my position?"

"Perfectly, madam, perfectly," answered the doctor. "I am prescribing for an old woman with a deranged stomach."

"Brown's Bronchial Troches" are of great service in subduing Hoarseness and Coughs. Sold only in boxes. Avoid imitations



In Washington's Day
By Woodrow Wilson
Beautifully Illustrated by Howard Pyle and Others

The first of a series of papers in which there is presented a new interpretation of that period which was at once the fruition of the English Colonial culture of America, and the beginning of a New Nation.

Part II. of BRISEIS, William Black's New Novel
Illustrations by Smedley

Second paper of
ON SNOW-SHOES TO THE BARREN GROUNDS
By Caspar W. Whitney
Illustrations by Remington

IN HARPER'S MAGAZINE
For January

Other attractive features:
LONDON'S UNDERGROUND RAILWAYS. Illustrated by Joseph Pennell.—STORIES by Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, Julian Ralph, etc., etc.

35 Cents a Copy. Ready December 21. $4 00 a Year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York.

TWO GREAT CHRISTMAS MAGAZINES.

THE CENTURY,
With Tissot's wonderful pictures of the Life of Christ, a dream story by Kipling, a Christmas story by Stockton, chapters in Mrs. Humphry Ward's novel, «Sir George Tressady,» the opening of Hopkinson Smith's «Tom Grogan,» etc., etc. 35 cents; $4.00 a year. What better Christmas gift than a subscription? November number free to new yearly subscribers who begin with December.

ST. NICHOLAS,
With contributions from Stevenson, Riley, Trowbridge, Mrs. Burton Harrison, and many other well-known writers. Everything beautifully illustrated. A Christmas gift-book for 25 cents. Why not subscribe for your young folks in '96? $3.00.

THE CENTURY CO.,
Union Square, New York.

Interchangeable Card Class Records for Sunday-Schools
An improved system of keeping Sunday-School Records by classes, based on the principle of a card catalogue. Teachers and Superintendents are invited to send for samples and full information.
Mrs. SAMUEL B. BARTOW, Jr., Fitchburg, Mass.

"No library complete without it."—President T. C. Mendenhall, Worcester Polytechnic Institute.

JOHNSON'S UNIVERSAL
Cyclopædia
COMPLETE IN Eight Extra Royal Octavo Volumes

AN ENTIRELY NEW EDITION, the work of a corps of thirty-six eminent scholars as department editors, and of about three thousand contributors, specialists who sign their articles, has just been issued.

CHARLES KENDALL ADAMS, LL.D.,
President of the University of Wisconsin,
EDITOR-IN-CHIEF.

Every department of human knowledge is covered under about Fifty Thousand Titles. The Pronunciation of difficult names is marked. Etymologies are given, and in controverted subjects both sides have a hearing. The whole work is fresh, scholarly, authoritative, up-to-date.

THE ONLY REALLY NEW CYCLOPÆDIA

7264 pages, type new and larger than before.
130 colored maps, including plan of the chief cities of North America and Europe.
3,027 engravings.

Prospectus and specimen pages free on application

D. APPLETON & CO.
72 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK

Our New Holiday Books

Poems of Home and Country. By SAMUEL FRANCIS SMITH, D.D., author of "America." The only authorized complete edition of Dr. Smith's poems, edited under his personal supervision this present year. Royal 8vo, illustrated, cloth, gilt top, $1.50. Edition de luxe, each copy signed by the author, $7.50.

"A cherished memorial of one whom the nation delighted to honor."—The Advance.

The Vacant Chair and Other Poems. By HENRY STEVENSON WASHBURN. 16mo, illustrated, cloth, $1.25.

"A volume of strong, earnest, and tender poetry; one of the daintiest and most attractive of the poetry books of the year."—Boston Transcript.

The Wise Men of Ancient Israel and Their Proverbs. By CHARLES FOSTER KENT, Ph.D., Brown University. 12mo, 208 pp., cloth, $1.25.

A scholarly but brilliant and fascinating study of one of the three great classes of ancient Hebrew leaders and their sayings in the Book of Proverbs. A valuable book for all Biblical students.

Doctrine and Life. By GEORGE B. STEVENS, Ph.D., D.D., Yale University. 12mo, 247 pp., cloth, $1.25.

"A book of rare merit; indeed, one of the very best on its general subject that has appeared in the present generation."—Advance.

American Writers of To-Day. By HENRY C. VEDDER. Masterly critiques of nineteen contemporary authors, including Howells, Stedman, Crawford, Stockton, Cable, Warner, etc. 12mo, 334 pp., cloth, gilt top, $1.50.

"A fine specimen of genial, appreciative, intelligent criticism."—ALVAH HOVEY, LL.D., Pres. Newton Theological Institute.

Foundation Studies in Literature. By MARGARET S. MOONEY, State Normal College, Albany, N. Y. Popular classic myths and their rendering by modern poets, with 16 exquisite reproductions of famous paintings and sculptures. 12mo, 306 pp., cloth, $1.25.

"Intensely interesting, beautifully illustrated, and a treasure to all students of literature."—Am. Jour. of Educ.

Nature in Verse. Compiled by MARY I. LOVEJOY. A charming collection of over 270 choice poems on nature, for young readers. 12mo, 319 pp., illustrated, $1.00.

Twilight Stories. By ELIZABETH E. FOULKE. Original stories and verses for readers of six to ten years, charmingly told and daintily illustrated. Small 4to, with 30 original illustrations, cloth, 50 cents.

For sale by the leading booksellers, or mailed by the publishers on receipt of price.

Send for our Illustrated Catalogues and descriptive circulars of superior Text-books.

SILVER, BURDETT & CO., Publishers

31 East 17th St., New York.
262-264 Wabash Ave., Chicago.
1028 Arch St., Philadelphia.
110-112 Boylston St., BOSTON

JUST READY

Phillips Brooks's

Sermons for the Church Year

Advent, Christmas, Lent, Easter, Etc.

22 Sermons, 360 Pages, Cloth, $1.75

The Farrar Year Book

Selections for Every Day of the Year from the Writings of the Rev. Frederic W. Farrar, D.D. By W. M. L. JAY. 16mo, 372 pages, cloth, gilt top, $1.25.

"They are made with rare good taste and with admirable judgment, and the year book is one of the most notable of recent years."—Boston Advertiser.

The Phillips Brooks Calendar

Twelve leaves (8¼ x 10), with illustrations in colors and selections from the sixth volume of Sermons, $1.00.

BLOCK CALENDARS

WITH LEAF FOR EVERY DAY

The Farrar Calendar

Card (8¾ x 11), with quotations for every day in the year from Dean Farrar's works, 50 cents.

The Phillips Brooks Calendar

Card (8 x 10¾), with quotations for every day in the year from his works, 50 cents.

For sale at the Book-stores, or sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of prices.

E. P. DUTTON & CO.

PUBLISHERS

31 West 23d St., New York

THE HAIR 24th Edition, 25c. (or stamps) Why it Falls Off, Turns Grey, and the Remedy. By Prof. HARLEY PARKER.
W. E LONG & CO., 1013 Arch St., Phila., Pa.
"Every one should read this little book."—Athenæum.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co.'s Holiday Books

Mars

A beautiful book by PERCIVAL LOWELL, describing his very interesting observations. With a colored frontispiece and many full-page and text illustrations. 8vo, $2.50.

A Victorian Anthology

Selected and edited by EDMUND CLARENCE STEDMAN. With brief biographies of the authors quoted, a fine frontispiece portrait of Queen Victoria and a vignette of the Poets' Corner in Westminster Abbey. Large crown 8vo, bound in attractive library style, $2.50; full gilt, $3.00; half calf, $4.50; full levant, $6.00.

Mrs. Jameson's Works on Art

Sacred and Legendary Art. 2 vols.
Legends of the Monastic Orders.
Legends of the Madonna.
Memoirs of the Early Italian Painters

With a memoir and portrait of Mrs. Jameson. In five volumes, crown 8vo, each containing nearly 100 illustrations, selected from the works of great masters. $3.00 a volume, $15.00 the set.

Standish of Standish

A beautiful Holiday Edition of this popular historical novel, by Mrs. JANE G. AUSTIN. With 20 exquisite full-page photogravure illustrations by FRANK T. MERRILL. 2 vols., 12mo, tastefully bound, $5.00.

Last Poems of James Russell Lowell

With a fine portrait. Printed in artistic style, and exquisitely bound in polished buckram. 12mo, $1.25.

Cambridge Poets

Complete Poetical Works of Oliver Wendell Holmes
Henry W. Longfellow
John G. Whittier

Beautiful volumes, each with a portrait, a vignette, biographical sketch, notes, chronological tables, index of titles and first lines. Each, large crown 8vo, $2.00; half calf, gilt top, $3.50; full levant, $5.50.

Mr. Rabbit at Home

A Sequel to "Little Mr. Thimblefinger and his Queer Country." By JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS, author of the "Uncle Remus" books. With 25 capital illustrations by OLIVER HERFORD. Square 8vo, $2.00.

This Goodly Frame the Earth

A delightful book of Impressions of Scenes, Incidents, and Persons in a journey touching Japan, China, Egypt, Palestine, and Greece. By FRANCIS TIFFANY, author of "The Life of Dorothea Lynde Dix," etc. Crown 8vo, handsomely bound, $1.50.

Later Lyrics

Selected from his four latest volumes of poetry by THOMAS BAILEY ALDRICH. 18mo, vellum or cloth, $1.00.

The Whittier Year-Book

Passages for Each Day from the Verse and Prose of JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER. A beautiful book, with a fine new portrait of Whittier, $1.00.

The Courtship of Miles Standish

A beautiful Popular Holiday Edition of LONGFELLOW'S famous Pilgrim poem. With illustrations by BOUGHTON, MERRILL, and others, $1.50.

Angelo

A Poem. By STUART STERNE. A New Edition, from new plates. 1 vol., 18mo, gilt top, $1.00.

This poem, the most popular of Stuart Sterne's books, relates with much force and great delicacy the love of Michael Angelo and Vittoria Colonna.

Sold by Booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., Boston

11 EAST 17TH STREET, NEW YORK

E. B. TREAT

PUBLISHER

5 COOPER UNION, NEW YORK

THE TREASURY MAGAZINE of religious and current thought. Undenominational. 13th Year; devoted to Applied Christianity, elegantly Illustrating the same; Sermons, Questions of the Day, Sunday-school, Mission Work. By best writers on Theology, Christian Life and Work. It fills a niche, meets a want not supplied by any other periodical. Yearly, $2.50. Sample, 10 cents.

OUR NEW BOOK—IDEALS OF LIFE; or, How to Make Life Beautiful. A Symposium. 200 Ideal Men and Women of Europe and America, in original and special articles, tell how to attain the Ideal. Canon Farrar, Max Müller, Sir John Lubbock, G. W. Curtis, C. M. Depew, write, also Bishops Huntington and Seymour, Frances E. Willard, the Poets Lowell, Holmes, Stedman; Presidents Eliot, Dwight, Adams, Low, and others, with Portraits and Autographs. An elegant Home Book of counsel and culture. 640 pages. Cloth, $2.75. Full Morocco, in box, $5.

HOME CULTURE: An Aid to Social Hours at Home. A Catechetical Cyclopedia. 15,000 questions and answers. Sixty-six Educational Volumes in one. Edited by President THOMAS HUNTER, A.M., Ph.D., of the Normal College of the City of New York, and a corps of Professors and Teachers. 672 quarto pages, $3.50. Half Morocco, $4.75.

MOTHER, HOME, AND HEAVEN. Three dearest names to mortals given. A Beautiful Gift Book. Edited by T. L. Cuyler, D.D.

Over 400 contributors prose and poetry. Two Hundred Thousand Copies Sold. New Edition, new authors, new engravings. 460 quarto pages. Cloth, $2.75. Gilt edge, $3.50. Full Morocco, in box, $5.00.

OUR HOME PHYSICIAN: the New Cyclopedia of Family Medicine. By GEO. M. BEARD, A.M., M.D., and ten eminent Associate Editors. Gives causes, symptoms, and reliable remedies for every ill; with Homeopathic Remedies and Treatment, by SAML. LILIENTHAL, M.D. New Edition Revised to date.

"It has an established reputation for accuracy, learning, and sagacity. I keep it on a prominent shelf in my library, and find it a kind of Guardian Angel of the household in matters sanitary and hygienic."—REV. JOSEPH COOK.

1,506 royal 8vo pages. Price reduced from $12 to $6.

PATRIOTIC AND SECULAR OCCASIONS. Historical facts and timely thoughts, helpful in outlining addresses for our 15 patriotic and holiday occasions. 578 pp., $1.75.

ANNIVERSARY AND RELIGIOUS (OCCASIONS). A companion volume to the above. Suggestive thoughts for timely occasions. Edited by F. NOBLE, D.D. 516 pages. $1.75.

THE BOW IN THE CLOUD; or, Words of Comfort. 200 contributions in poetry and prose. Introduction by WM. M. TAYLOR, D.D. 452 pages, $1.75.

CURIOSITIES OF THE BIBLE. Seed thoughts, Bible studies and readings, prayer-meeting outlines, 10,000 prize questions pertaining to persons, places, and things, with key, etc. Introduction by Rev. J. H. VINCENT, D.D. 610 pages, $2.00.

OUR BEST MOODS. Soliloquies and Other Discourses. By David Gregg, D.D., Pastor Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn. 300 pp., $1.25.

A New Help for Superintendents

The Westminster Sabbath-School Blackboard

With a Manual

The Superintendent's Assistant

Price, 75 cents a quarter; $3 a year. Size, 4 by 3 feet, a separate sheet for each Sunday. Send for a sample sheet to

JOHN H. SCRIBNER
Business Superintendent
Presbyterian Board of Publication and Sabbath-School Work.
1334 Chestnut Street
Philadelphia, Pa.

LIBRARIES

Supplying Private and Public Libraries with books our specialty. A list of standard and new issues of all publishers mailed on request. Lists priced gratis. Test our figures.

THE BAKER & TAYLOR CO.

WHOLESALE BOOKS

5 & 7 East Sixteenth St., New York

THE Atlantic Monthly
FOR JANUARY, 1896

WILL CONTAIN

An Unpublished Note-Book of Hawthorne

Written in 1839, while Hawthorne was, for a short time, Weigher and Gauger at the port of Boston.

The Country of the Pointed Firs

A Story of Maine. By SARAH ORNE JEWETT, the author of "Deephaven," and the best known of New England's story-tellers.

The Emancipation of the Post-Office

By JOHN R. PROCTER, Chairman U. S. Civil Service Commission. A forcible statement of the revolution to be brought about in our postal service by the recent consolidation of officers over large areas.

Congress Out-of-Date

A presentation of the abuses due to the present method of convening Congress a year after its election, with some suggested remedies.

Pirate Gold. Part I.

The first installment of a three-part story of romantic Boston life in the fifties by F. J. STIMSON (J. S. OF DALE).

The Christian Socialist Movement of the Century

By J. M. LUDLOW, so identified with the work of Maurice and Kingsley.

The Johnson Club

By GEORGE BIRKBECK HILL. An interesting account of the meetings of a number of distinguished Johnson enthusiasts.

The Children of the Road

By JOSIAH FLYNT. A study of children among vagrants, by an authority widely recognized.

The Fête de Gayant

By AGNES REPPLIER. One of Miss Repplier's most delightful sketches of travel.

As the result of a European trip made for the purpose of study in provincial France, Mrs. MARY HARTWELL CATHERWOOD will contribute a series of readable articles. The first is entitled

A Farm in Marne

Poems, Book Reviews, and the usual Departments.

35 cents a copy. $4.00 a year.

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO.
4 Park St., Boston, Mass.

PELOUBET'S
336 Pages
Select Notes
ON THE INTERNATIONAL LESSONS
Cloth $1.25

W. A. WILDE & CO., - Boston, Mass.
Send postal card for free sample pages.

Begin the New Year with Good Singing!!!

Highest Praise, for the Sabbath School.
$30 per 100 copies.

Christian Endeavor Hymns, for Young People.
$30 per 100 copies.

Gospel Hymns, 1 to 6, for Devotional Meetings.
Excelsior Music Edition, 739 Hymns, $75 per 100 copies.
Words only, limp Cloth covers, - $10 per 100 copies.

The above are unequaled. Do not substitute inferior books because of lower price. The best are cheapest!!

THE BIGLOW & MAIN CO.
76 East 9th St., New York. 215 Wabash Ave., Chicago.

A Great Magazine!

The most famous authors.
The most interesting fiction.
The greatest artists.
Color-work illustrations.
Everything the best that money can buy.
That is

$1. a Year.

The Cosmopolitan Magazine

Giving yearly 1344 pages, with more than 1000 illustrations. The equal of the most expensive magazines. No home is complete without this magazine. Women and men, young and old, will find in it amusement and instruction. In what can a dollar be better expended?

THE DECEMBER EDITION, - 400,000 COPIES.

The Cosmopolitan for that month received the greatest recognition from advertisers ever given to any magazine. It contains from $4000 to $8000 more advertising than was ever published in any magazine, at any place, in any country, at any price. This is why a magazine ranking with the best in literature and art can be sold at 10c. a copy.

Send one dollar to
The Cosmopolitan Magazine,
Irvington-on-the-Hudson,
New York.

THE BIBLE STUDY UNION (or BLAKESLEE) LESSONS
FOR SUNDAY SCHOOLS AND BIBLE CLASSES.

We announce for 1896 the completion of the Series of Lessons on

THE LIFE OF CHRIST

from the four gospels, which are now issued in the following

SEVEN GRADES:

FOR THE PRIMARY DEPARTMENT;
- Primary Lessons and Cards,
- Primary Monthly,
- Child's Quarterly,

FOR THE MAIN SCHOOL;
- Junior Quarterly,
- Intermediate Quarterly,
- Progressive Quarterly,

FOR BIBLE CLASSES—Senior Quarterly,

so that each department of the Sunday School may study a lesson fitted to its special needs, yet all study the same general subject matter. We also offer for

AIDS TO STUDY:

Primary Teachers' Helper; Bible Study Manual; a Harmony; two Lives of Christ; and for the senior grade weekly Notes in The Watchman, Evangelist, Christian Work, Advance, and other papers.

Those who have already used these lessons will find them greatly improved in their present form. Those who begin using them now will be surprised and pleased at the interest they awaken in both young and old.

Why not try them in 1896, and thus allow your school, or a few classes at least, to study a connected and complete life of Christ from the four Gospels, instead of the fragmentary one from Luke alone, which is begun January 1 in the International Series?

Specimen Lessons Free. Address (stating Grades desired)

THE BIBLE STUDY PUBLISHING COMPANY, 21 Bromfield Street, BOSTON, MASS.

MUCH FOR LITTLE is what PIANO PLAYERS, SINGERS and those interested in Musical Matters, will receive in subscribing for the MUSICAL VISITOR, a Monthly Magazine devoted to the interests of MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

32 Page each issue containing practical suggestions from prominent musical writers, discussions of teaching methods, sketches, poems, correspondence and by the best writers and composers. There will be Supplements to the November and December numbers, containing Choir Music for Thanksgiving and Christmas respectively. CHOIR MUSIC as a regular feature of the Magazine has been discontinued and will be replaced by Vocal and Piano Music to meet general demands. Subscription $1.50 per year; single copies 15 cents. The new departure as to class of music began with September 1895 issue.

VOCAL AND PIANO MUSIC

THE JOHN CHURCH CO.,
CINCINNATI, NEW YORK, CHICAGO.

ALL ABOUT HOW
to open, keep and close ANY set of double-entry books, in the most modern, up-to-date manner; change from single to double entry; locate errors in trial balances; prove postings; improve systems; average accounts; make "balance sheets;" teach book-keeping; earn money as an expert; save one-third labor; keep books for or manage a STOCK COMPANY, and more—MUCH MORE—in "Goodwin's Improved Book-keeping and Business Manual." Price, $3. Your money back if you cannot learn ALL in three weeks!
☞ Send for descriptive pamphlet.

J. H. GOODWIN,
B'K'P'R,
R. 130, 1215 Broadway, N.Y.

SOMATOSE BISCUIT STRENGTH
CONTAINING 10 PER CENT SOMATOSE A DRY EXTRACT OF MEAT FOR DYSPEPTICS & CONVALESCENTS

an appetizing, nourishing food for invalids, nursing mothers and delicate children. A valuable food, in compact form, stimulating and strengthening, for long bicycle rides, fishing and hunting trips, or when traveling.

SOMATOSE=BISCUIT,

containing 10% Somatose, are made only by The American Biscuit & Manufacturing Co., New York.

Somatose is a scientific food, consisting of the albumoses, the elements essential for proper nourishment. It is concentrated, palatable, easily digestible, and quickly assimilated, promoting a rapid gain in flesh and strength.

Somatose=Biscuit are obtainable from all druggists.

Send for descriptive pamphlets to the makers, or to Schieffelin & Co., New York, Sole Agents.

Mason & Hamlin

ORGANS

For 40 years the Standard of the World; found in every civilized quarter of the globe; new styles introduced this season, in great variety of casings and at all prices, adapted to church, chapel, lodge and the home.

The organs we make to-day are better than ever before. A little higher in price than other organs, but still absolutely unrivalled in quality.

☞ Where no regular Dealer represents us we now sell direct to the public, at most reasonable prices and on easy terms. Write for catalogue and price list explaining our several Easy Payment Plans.

Mason & Hamlin Co.

145 Boylston St., Boston; 135 Fifth Ave., New York: 253 Wabash Ave., Chicago.

HOUSE FURNISHING

COOKING UTENSILS, CUTLERY,
CROCKERY, FINE CHINA AND GLASS,
EDDY REFRIGERATORS.

LEWIS & CONGER

130 and 132 West 42d St., N. Y.

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE ROLLERS
NOTICE NAME THUS
Stewart Hartshorn
ON LABEL AND GET THE GENUINE
HARTSHORN

A NEW BOOK

METAPHORS, SIMILES AND OTHER CHARACTERISTIC SAYINGS OF HENRY WARD BEECHER

COMPILED BY T. J. ELLINWOOD FROM HIS STENOGRAPHIC REPORTS

12mo, 200 pp., extra cloth, $1.00, p. paid
A. J. GRAHAM & CO., 744 Broadway, N. Y.

Diseases of the Will Diseases of Personality
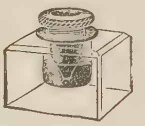
Psychology of Attention

By TH. RIBOT. Authorized translations. Cloth, 75 cents each, the set $1.75; paper, 25 cents each.
"Without attempting to condense further this already condensed and very readable little volume (The Diseases of Personality), written by a distinguished inquirer, I will conclude by saying that it well deserves a place in any general library."—Mr. FRANCIS GALTON, in Nature.

OPEN COURT PUB. CO., Chicago 324 Dearborn St.

THE COLUMBIAN INKSTAND



Inks the Pen Just Right.
Keeps the Ink Clear and Limpid.
Cannot Get Out of Order.

THE DIP FUNNEL can be adjusted so as to properly ink the pen, thus avoiding careful watchfulness in dipping the pen in the ink. Secures freedom from inky fingers or blots on documents.

Price $1.00 each upward. Circular free.
BOYD & ABBOT CO., 256 Broadway, New York

FREE PINS

Send your address on a postal, and we will mail you free, enough Puritan Pins, and a booklet about them, to forever convince you that they are the only pins that don't bend

American Pin Co., Waterbury, Conn.

The Leading Conservatory of America
CARL FAELTEN, Director.
Founded in 1853 by
E. Tourjée.

NEW ENGLAND CONSERVATORY OF MUSIC. BOSTON, MASS.

FRANKLIN SQ.

Send for Prospectus giving full information.
FRANK W. HALE, General Manager.

SUBSCRIBERS' WANTS

Want advertisements of thirty words or less will be published under this heading at one dollar a week. Four cents a week is charged for each word in excess of thirty.

WANTED—By a young lady, a position as amanuensis, or instructor to an invalid or backward child. Address No. 32, care The Outlook.

A YOUNG AMERICAN LADY desires daily position as secretary, companion, or reader to a lady. Best references. F. C., No. 9,998, The Outlook.

146 E. 36th ST., N. Y.—Very desirable, warm, comfortably furnished rooms, separate or en suite; sanitary plumbing; house, table, and neighborhood first-class; terms reasonable; references. No. 31, care Outlook.

WINTER BOARD in cottage at Colegrove, Hawthorne, Florida. Healthy location; on lake; good rooms; Northern cooking; pine woods; terms reasonable; references. Address for information Mrs. WM. S. METCALF.

EDUCATIONAL

New York City

SCHERMERHORN'S TEACHERS' AGENCY
Oldest and best known in U. S.
Established 1855. 3 East 14th Street, N. Y

The Misses Ely's School for Girls
RIVERSIDE DRIVE
85th and 86th Streets, New York

TEACHERS COLLEGE Morningside Heights, New York (120th St., West). -Professional training for general teachers and specialists: Manual training, science, kindergarten, English, form, drawing and color, history of art, domestic science, general pedagogy. Degrees given by Columbia College to both sexes. Circulars of Information. "Teachers College Bulletin." WALTER L. HERVEY, President.

Miss Peebles and Miss Thompson's Boarding and Day School for Girls
30, 32, and 34 East 57th St., New York
Special students admitted.

California

POMONA COLLEGE, Claremont, Cal.—Full College courses leading to degrees of B.A., B.L., B.S. Degrees recognized by University of California and other similar graduate schools. Thirty-five miles from Los Angeles. An Academic course. Preparatory school preparing for all institutions connected with the College. Address C. G. BALDWIN, President.

Connecticut

DARIEN, CONN.—PRIVATE HOME AND School for Feeble-Minded Youth offers every facility for care, education, and training, with the advantages of a pleasant country home.
J. J. KINDRED, M.D., Med. Supt., formerly Clinical Ass't Dareuth School for Feeble-Minded, London, Eng.
M. LILA KINDRED, Principal.

FAIRFIELD ACADEMY.—HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS. Fits for business or college. Genuine home; individual teaching; healthful; 50 miles from New York. FRANCIS H. BREWER, A.M., Prin., Fairfield, Ct.

WOODSIDE SEMINARY
HARTFORD, CONN.
Christmas vacation Dec. 19th to Jan. 6th.
Miss SARA J. SMITH, Principal.

Massachusetts

The Principal of Lasell Seminary
AUBURNDALE, MASS.

Earnestly requests those desiring place in this School for September, 1896, to send soon for catalogue and forms of application. As resident pupils in large number keep their places, and vacancies are few after the first half year, a catalogue considered early, and required social references and present teachers' certificates—forms supplied—returned promptly, will relieve both parties from much "wear and tear" in the summer of 1896.

Thoughtful parents and guardians will find it most satisfactory to see the school at its work; the teachers in their classes; the Studio, the Gymnasium, Swimming Tank, Scientific Cooking Rooms, and Laboratory as they are used in school session; also the dining-room, sleeping and reception rooms, as the girls in residence have them, rather than in vacation, when much is in process of renovation, most teachers absent, etc., etc.

In this way also the applicant becomes prepared to secure promptly any vacancy occurring at Christmas or Easter of the current year, if she is registered on the waiting list, preference being given to those best furnished in requirements.

Address for illustrated catalogue,
C. C. BRAGDON, Principal.

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN TEACHERS' BUREAU
3 Park St., Boston
Native language teachers a specialty.

New York

RIVERVIEW ACADEMY
60th year. Prepares thoroughly for College, the Government Academies, and Business. U. S. Army officer detailed at Riverview by Secretary of War.
JOSEPH B. BISBEE, A.M., Principal, Poughkeepsie, N.Y.

Pennsylvania

BRYN MAWR COLLEGE BRYN MAWR, Pa.
A college for women. Offers undergraduate and graduate instruction. Awards annually two European Fellowships (value $525), seven Graduate Scholarships (value $200 to $300), and nine Resident Graduate Followships (value $500), in Greek, Latin, English, German, and Teutonic Philology, Romance Languages, History or Political Science, Mathematics, Chemistry, and Biology. Competition open till April 15th. Full undergraduate and graduate courses in these departments and in Philosophy and Physics. Courses in Archæology and Geology, and graduate courses in Semitic Languages. For general programme or graduate pamphlet, address as above.

Germantown, Philadelphia, Pa.
WALNUT LANE SCHOOL
Boarding and Day School for girls. 39th year opens Sept. 25th. Academical and college preparatory courses. For circular address Mrs. THEODORA B. RICHARDS, Principal.
Miss SARA LOUISE TRACY, A.M., Associate Principal.

Booth's Pocket Inhaler Outfit, by mail, $1.00

The Australian "Dry Air" Treatment of Asthma, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Coughs, Colds, Laryngitis, Etc.

(Mention this paper.)

45 Harvest St., DORCHESTER, MASS., January 29, 1895.

Your invaluable remedy, Hyomei, has cured me of Catarrh that had defied the power of many so-called cures. I would not be without Hyomei and my Pocket Inhaler on any consideration. I am subject to colds, and I find that Hyomei breaks them up at once. It seems to penetrate the affected part like magic. I believe it to be the greatest preventitive of pneumonia ever discovered. Hyomei has also cured a friend, Miss Annie McMurty, of a most chronic case of Asthma. For three weeks she has sat in her chair day and night. She retired to her bed the evening of the day she began using Hoymei, and slept naturally. She has had no return of Asthma since using Hyomei last spring.

MRS. HATTIE DAVIS.

Hyomei is a purely vegetable antiseptic, and destroys the germs which cause disease in the respiratory organs. The air, charged with Hyomei, is inhaled at the mouth, and, after permeating the minutest air-cells, is exhaled through the nose. It is aromatic, delightful to inhale, and gives immediate relief. Consultation and trial free at my office.

Pocket Inhaler Outfit, Complete, by Mail, $1.00, consisting of pocket inhaler, made of deodorized hard rubber (beautifully polished), a bottle of Hyomei, a dropper, and full directions for using. If you are still skeptical, send your address; my pamphlet shall prove that Hyomei cures. Are you open to conviction?

R. T. BOOTH, 18 East 20th St., New York.

SEND for IT!

An elegant Brochure, illustrating factory views, with description of spoon making.

A BEAUTIFUL HOLIDAY SOUVENIR.

Send for it.

New York Salesroom,
2 Maiden Lane.

Everything in Solid Silver.

Full assortment of silver plate
Hollow Ware,
Cut Glass,
Mounted Pocket Books.

Sterling Silver Inlaid Spoons and Forks
Guaranteed 25 years.

Waldorf. FOR SALE BY ALL JEWELERS.

The Holmes & Edwards Silver Co.,
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

Mention this paper.

THE HEALTH AND REST ALMA
ALMA, MICHIGAN.

Rest for both mind and body is the best tonic for most people who find themselves ailing from overwork, worry or any other reason. To these THE ALMA must present itself as the ideal resort. Its location, climate and waters, as well as its perfect management, certainly entitle it to that distinction. These features are all set forth at length in an illustrated book which we will be pleased to send free to any address.

The Alma Sanitarium Co.,
Alma, Mich.

Special discount to clergymen, teachers, and their families.

DON'T SCRATCH

matches to light gas. For 25 cents, stamps or currency, we will mail you a Matchless Self-Lighting Gas Burner, easily adjusted to any gas fixture. Lights gas without matches and reduces gas bills. Invaluable in Bed-room, Bath-room, Halls, Cellars, and wherever gas is used. Just "Pull the Chain," and instantly you have a light. Each one warranted satisfactory. Splendid night light. Ask hardware dealers and plumbers.

Refers by permission to the Adv. Mgr. of The Outlook, who can testify to its value.

MATCHLESS MFG. CO., 128-30-32 Reade St., N. Y.

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER {Spring No. 2.}

Nature's Great Remedy in Uric-Acid Diathesis.
The Only Known Solvent of Stone in the Bladder—Its Value in Gout.

Case of Gov. THOMAS M. HOLT, of North Carolina.

Stated by Dr. E. C. LAIRD, Haw River, N. C.

Gov. Thomas M. Holt, of North Carolina, a patient with strongly marked Uric-Acid Diathesis, suffered frequent attacks of Nephritic Colic, and at the same time a severe Gouty affection. Except as to the usual treatment for the relief of present paroxysms, I put him exclusively upon BUFFALO LITHIA WATER Spring No. 2, which has been attended with happy and remarkable effect, both as to the Calculus and Gouty affection. Under its action he has at various times discharged large quantities of Calculi and Sand. The deposition of fine sand not infrequently exceeded a teaspoonful. Under microscopic examination it was evident that the Calculi were originally parts of larger formations which had been disintegrated by the action of the Water.

What Governor Holt Himself says:

"I do not at all doubt that my life was preserved by BUFFALO LITHIA WATER which I must regard as one of the most wonderful Waters of the World."

This Water is for sale by druggists generally, or in cases of one dozen half-gallon bottles $5.00 f. o. b. at the Springs. Descriptive pamphlets sent free to any address.

THOMAS F. GOODE, Proprietor, Buffalo Lithia Springs, Va.

"SWEET HOME" SOAP.

YOU CAN HAVE YOUR CHOICE

A "Chautauqua" Desk

OR A "CHAUTAUQUA" ROCKER AND RECLINING CHAIR

WITH A COMBINATION BOX FOR $10.00.

The Combination Box at retail would cost, . $10.00
Either Premium Ditto, . $10.00
Total, ... $20.00

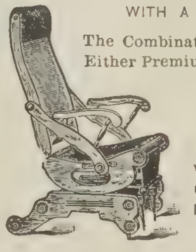
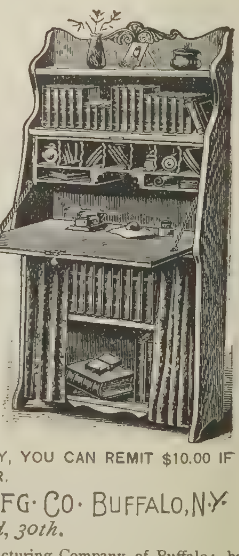
YOU GET BOTH FOR $10.00

WE WILL SEND BOX AND EITHER PREMIUM ON THIRTY DAYS' TRIAL; IF SATISFACTORY, YOU CAN REMIT $10.00 IF NOT, HOLD GOODS SUBJECT TO OUR ORDER.

THE LARKIN SOAP MFG. CO. BUFFALO, N.Y.

Our offer fully explained in The Outlook, Nov. 16th, 23d, 30th.





NOTE.—We are personally acquainted with Mr. Larkin, of the Soap Manufacturing Company of Buffalo; have visited their factory; have purchased and used their goods and received premiums offered, and we know that they are full value. The only wonder is that they are able to give so much for so little money. The Company are perfectly reliable.—The Evangelist.

The Editors have hoped to compile a hymnal that is hitherto unequaled, and it is not to be denied that they have succeeded, and that nobly.—THE INTERIOR.

The Plymouth Hymnal

Edited by Lyman Abbott

With the Co-operation of Herbert Vaughan Abbott and Chas. H. Morse is eminently adapted for use in Churches, Colleges, Schools, Social Meetings, and the Home

Rev. THEODORE P. PRUDDEN, West Newton, Mass.:

Both hymns and music get hold of people. The congregational singing has improved. While there is an abundance of old hymns and tunes, we find the new hymns are a most admirable expression of devout feeling, and the new music is attractive, easily learned, sung with enthusiasm, and united in by many who did not join in the old tunes.

Rev. B. S. RIDEOUT, Norway, Me.:

We have only words of the highest praise for it. It is a splendidly gotten up book in every way. The longer we use it the better we like it.

Rev. JOSEPH J. SPENCER, North Brookfield, Mass.:

Your favor gives me an opportunity to express my great delight in the Plymouth Hymnal. The people take up the new hymns readily and sing with enthusiasm.

Rev. THEODORE CROWL, Sterling, Ill.:

After using the Plymouth Hymnal in our church for the past six months, we are confirmed in our opinion that it is the best book we know of for congregational use.

Professor GEORGE C. GOW, Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.:

The Plymouth Hymnal was our choice out of several admirable books. Every tune is singable. It gives me pleasure to recommend the Plymouth Hymnal for college use.

Professor EDWARD S. PARSONS, Colorado College, Colorado Springs, Colo.:

. . . The use of its noble hymns and tunes will bring a new influence into our College worship, and so into the lives of our students in the present and the future. Such a book cannot be outgrown. We shall rather hope to grow up to it.

Write to us for specimen pages. If you are a pastor, teacher, or choirmaster we shall be glad to send a FREE (returnable) copy to you for examination.

The Plymouth Sunday-School Hymnal

Edited by Thomas G. Shearman and Walton N. Ellis, with an Introduction by Lyman Abbott

This Hymnal is in use in many Sunday-schools, and is an ideal book for children. It is beautifully printed and handsomely bound. Send for specimen pages. A free (returnable) copy will be sent to any pastor or superintendent for examination.

THE OUTLOOK CO., 13 Astor Place, New York

Good Only Until January First

The Special Offer recently mailed to OUTLOOK subscribers, under which a renewal of subscription for two years and a new annual subscription for any friend not now a subscriber may be secured at an exceptional price, is good only until the first of January. If any subscriber has mislaid the offer, a duplicate will be sent on postal card request, with a copy of the attractive illustrated Announcement of THE OUTLOOK for 1896.

Every Subscriber to THE OUTLOOK is cordially invited to fill out and return to this office the following blank.

TO THE PUBLISHER OF THE OUTLOOK, 13 Astor Place, New York:—Please send, in accordance with your offer (without charge), to the addresses below, the first Illustrated Magazine Number of The Outlook, and also the issue of December 28:

Subscriber's Name..

Address..

Name.. Address..

Name.. Address..

Name.. Address..

Name.. Address..

Recreation Department
The Outlook

Suggestions for planning a vacation or a Trip anywhere in the world; printed information, if issued, concerning any Transportation Line, any Tour, any Hotel, or any Pleasure or Health Resort in any part of the world, will be sent on request, without charge, to any Outlook reader.

Recreation Department, The Outlook, 13 Astor Place, N. Y.

Comfort in Travel is realized in the highest degree on the famous fast trains of the Michigan Central, the "Niagara Falls Route," between Buffalo and Chicago, in connection with through trains from the East. Passengers are granted the privilege of stopping off en route at Niagara Falls, or, if time will not permit, can obtain from the car windows, or the platform at Falls View, the grandest and most comprehensive view of the great cataract. All day-trains stop five or ten minutes. For full information inquire of local ticket agents, or address W. H. Underwood, Eastern Passenger Agent, Buffalo, N. Y.

Noon Train Between Boston and New York via Springfield Line

The Boston and Albany Railroad has in service a 12 o'clock, noon, train between New York and Boston. This train leaves either city at 12 o'clock, noon, and arrives at its destination at 5:30 P.M., thus making the trip in five and one-half hours. Station, Kneeland St. Boston. A. S. Hanson, G.P.A.

HICKS' NEWSPAPER ADVERTISING AGENCY,

Vanderbilt Building, 132 Nassau St., New York.

Prompt, careful, and efficient service guaranteed. WM. HICKS, PROPRIETOR.

TRAVELERS' R. R. GUIDE Formerly Appletons'.

R. R. Maps and Time-Tables. Conveniently Indexed. Monthly—25 cents. 24 Park Place, N. Y.

TOURS AND TRAVEL

WINTER TOURS
TO JAMAICA, WEST INDIES

The Most Picturesque and Health-Giving Winter Resort in the World

ATLAS LINE

U. S. mail and passenger steamships sail regularly from N.Y. for West Indies & Spanish Main. Ill. pamphlet free.
PIM, FORWOOD & KELLOCK, 24 State St., New York.
E. A. ADAMS & CO., 115 State St., Boston.

"SEA ROUTE TO SAN FRANCISCO"

A Trip for HEALTH, REST, and PLEASURE

passing within view of Cuba, crossing the historic Isthmus of Panama, and calling at ten Pacific ports of Central America and Mexico, with opportunity to visit these Spanish-American countries. The educational advantages of this trip, in addition to the pleasures of the journey, render it peculiarly attractive, so much so that tourists repeat the voyage year after year. THIRTY-DAY TRIP FOR $120. EXCURSION, $216. All expenses included. Steamers have superior accommodations and leave New York every ten days. For full particulars address

COLUMBIAN LINE STAMFORD PARRY, HERRON & CO., Gen. Agts.,
35 Broadway, Pier 57, foot W. 27th, N. R., New York.

EUROPE AND THE ORIENT THIS WINTER

Tenth select party; best accommodations for Southern Spain, Europe, Egypt, the Nile, Greece, Turkey, Holy Land, etc.; 116 days' tour; sailing from New York, ss. "Normannia," Jan. 8, 1896. Address Mrs. M. A. CROSLEY, 786 Putnam Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Grand Winter Excursion
TO THE MEDITERRANEAN AND ORIENT.
BY THE TWIN SCREW EXPRESS FRENCH MAIL STEAMER LA TOURAINE.

From New York February 4, 1896, to Azores (Fayal), Lisbon, Gibraltar, Algiers, Biserta (Tunis by rail), Malta, the Piræus (Athens), Alexandria (Cairo by rail), Port Said, Jaffa (Jerusalem), Beyrouth (Damascus), Smyrna, Constantinople, through the Straits of Messina, Palermo, Naples (Rome by rail), Villefranche, Marseilles, Palma (Balearic Islands), Malaga (Tangiers).

Duration of round trip, about two months.

Price of passage, round trip, $520, $620, $720, and upward, according to accommodations. For further particulars apply to A. FORGET, Gen. Agent, 3 Bowling Green, N. Y. City.

MALLORY STEAMSHIP LINES.—From New York. A DELIGHTFUL TRIP BY SEA to the Ports of TEXAS—GEORGIA—FLORIDA. Through tickets, single and return, to all points in Texas, Colorado, Utah, Arizona, California, Mexico, &c., Georgia and Florida. Our 64-page "Satchel Handbook" mailed free. C. H. MALLORY & CO., Pier 20, E. R., N. Y.

Tours and Travel

Europe and the Orient

Limited Parties under Personal Escort, Jan. 4—Spain, Southern Europe, Egypt, Holy Land, Greece; Feb. 4.—Japan and China via Honolulu; Feb. 12—Italy, Egypt, Holy Land, Greece, Switzerland. Send for itineraries to Mrs. M. D. FRAZAR & CO., Managers of Foreign Tours, 70 & 71 Globe Building, Boston. Summer itineraries now ready.

GAZE'S TOURS
(Established 1844.)

All necessary expenses included

Holy Land, Egypt, the Nile

Independent Tickets at through rates

Parties under experienced escort leave New York Nov. 27th, Jan. 22d, Feb. 12th, Feb. 19th, and March 7th, for Italy, Egypt, and the Orient. ONLY HIGH-CLASS STEAMERS. Fares range from $460 to $1,125. Detailed, illustrated itineraries post-free.

NILE STEAMERS

The new steamers of the Thewfikieh Nile S.S. Co. leave Dec. 11th and 26th, Jan. 8th and weekly; $171.50 21-day first-class Tourist Steamer; 17-day cheaper Tours, $112.50; dahabeahs and special steamers for private parties.

H. GAZE & SONS, Ltd., 113 Broadway, New York; 201 Washington St., Boston, Mass.; 135 S. Fifth St., Phila., Pa.; 220 S. Clark St., Chicago, Ill.

Official Agents for all Trunk Lines.

FOR THE WINTER GO TO

FROST UNKNOWN BERMUDA MALARIA IMPOSSIBLE

48 hours by elegant Steamships weekly.

FOR WINTER TOURS GO TO

WEST INDIES

30-days trip, 15 days in the Tropics. $5 a day for transportation, meals, and stateroom. A. E. OUTERBRIDGE & CO., Agts. for QUEBEC STEAMSHIP CO., Limited, 39 Broadway, N. Y., or THOS. COOK & SONS, Agents.

New York and Central American SS. Line

Steamers "Regulus" and "Flamborough" will sail semi-monthly for Kingston, Belize, Livingston, Porto Cortez, and Porto Barrios from North Central Pier, Atlantic Docks, Brooklyn. A charming 27-day voyage, through tropical seas, at a cost of less than $5 a day. Superior passenger accommodation. Excellent cuisine.

For passage and particulars apply to

Bowring & Archibald, Agents
9 STONE STREET, NEW YORK

Steam Yachting Cruises to the WEST INDIES JANUARY 11 and FEBRUARY 15

The Cruises will include Bermuda, Jamaica, Nicaragua, Cuba, Windward and Leeward Islands. The American steamer Ohio will be rebuilt to adapt it to all the requirements of a strictly first-class pleasure yacht, carrying no freight, second class or steerage passengers. Send for programme to the Managers THE THOMAS FOREIGN TOURIST CO. 1721½ Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

FOREIGN HOTELS

Bahamas

ROYAL VICTORIA HOTEL
NASSAU, BAHAMA ISLANDS

Opens December 23, 1895.

A LAND OF PERPETUAL SUMMER

S. S. MORTON, Proprietor and Manager

Steamer Northumberland leaves Palm Beach, Florida, 3 times a week. 15 hours' sail.

The Outlook will furnish full information.

Cable address, Morton, Nassau, N. P.

France

FRENCH HOME IN PARIS.—152 Boulevard Pereire. Gare Courcelles, 10 minutes from Arc de Triomphe. M. Lalot, French Protestant pastor, and Mme. Lalot receive into their family a few foreigners desiring to improve their knowledge of the language.

Bermuda

Return to Former Management

Hamilton Hotel
HAMILTON, BERMUDA

OPEN DECEMBER UNTIL MAY

The largest and finest hotel, and only passenger elevator in Hamilton. Highest location, perfect drainage, best views of town, harbor, and islands. For circulars and information apply to MEAD & BROOKS, Managers.

BERMUDA
THE IDEAL WINTER RESORT.

The Princess Hotel

This new and commodious hotel is now open. For terms, circulars, etc., address
N. S. HOWE, Hamilton, Bermuda, or
OUTERBRIDGE & CO., 39 Broadway, N. Y.

HOTELS AND RESORTS

California

HOTEL GREEN PASADENA, CAL. Accommodation for 400 guests. Occupies an entire block. Souvenir mailed.
G. G. GREEN, Owner. J. H. HOLMES, Mgr.

CALIFORNIA
HOTEL VENDOME

SAN JOSE Charming summer and winter resort. Sunny skies; climate unexcelled; modern, comfortable, first-class, and so are its patrons. Headquarters for tourists to the great Lick Observatory. Send for illustrated souvenir. GEO. P. SNELL, Mgr

Colorado

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colo.: The Antlers

Illustrated book, describing Colorado Springs, sent on request by E. BARNETT, Proprietor.

Connecticut

CREST VIEW SANITARIUM GREENWICH, CT.

Especially adapted for mild nervous diseases; home attractions. H. M. HITCHCOCK, M.D.

Florida

THE SPRINGFIELD
Orange Park, Florida

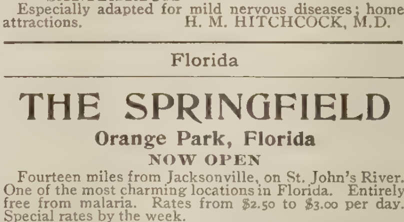
NOW OPEN

Fourteen miles from Jacksonville, on St. John's River. One of the most charming locations in Florida. Entirely free from malaria. Rates from $2.50 to $3.00 per day. Special rates by the week.
CHARLES H. MOWRY, Manager.
Also of the Springfield, Nantucket, Mass.

"Untouched by the Frost"

TROPICAL FLORIDA AT

PUNTA GORDA



THE PUNTA GORDA

On Charlotte Harbor. Accommodates 300. Opens Dec. 20th, 1895. Tarpon fishing, shooting, boating, driving; 400 feet of veranda. Plenty of fruit. Special rates for the season. For pamphlet address F. H. ABBOTT, Room 23, 131 Devonshire St., Boston, Mass.

St. James Hotel

JACKSONVILLE, FLORIDA

TO those who are familiar with the beauties and attractions of Florida, the splendid location, complete equipment, and many advantages of the St. James, Jacksonville, are well known. Those who visit Jacksonville for the first time during the present season will find in the St. James a great hotel, centrally but beautifully located on the highest ground in the city, facing the St. James Park, and accommodating 500 guests. They will find in Mr. J. R. Campbell, the proprietor of the house, an able and experienced hotel man. The St. James is supplied with all the appointments of a modern first-class house. A fine orchestra is one of the attractive features of the house.

For further particulars address, by mail or telegraph,

J. R. CAMPBELL, Prop.

A Special Welcome to January Guests

AT

THE HOTEL ST. ELMO

Green Cove Springs
Florida

Rates the same, but more room. January offers bright, cool days. Several cottages in the immediate vicinity of the hotel at service of guests who prefer them to main building. Write for St. Elmo booklet to JUDSON L. SCOTT, Manager.

A Southern Trip will be more than usually attractive this winter by reason of the

ATLANTA EXPOSITION

and the opening of several new and magnificent hotels. Before deciding, send for the "Pilot."

OLD DOMINION S.S. COMPANY

Pier 26, North River, New York
W. L. GUILLAUDEU, Vice-Pres't & Traffic Mgr.

Florida

NEW ROCKLEDGE HOTEL Rockledge Fla.

Homelike and attractive. Northern help. Orange groves in bearing near by. Send for Illustrated Circular.
H. P. SHARES, Prop'r, New Haven, Conn.
H. E. BEMIS, Mgr., Mohonk Lake, N. Y.

THE BARCELONA

ST. AUGUSTINE, Florida. Good family table and home comforts. R. E. HASSELTINE.

Georgia

HOTEL BON AIR

AUGUSTA, GA.

Enlarged and remodeled, will open Dec. 20, 1895, under former management of Mr. C. A. Linsley, who has given the Hotel widespread popularity. Fifty rooms, mostly with private baths, have been added to the hotel, giving a total capacity of 225. For booklet and particulars address C. A. LINSLEY, Augusta, Ga.

Thomasville, Georgia
Old Oaks

A select boarding-house. Table first-class; location choice; modern conveniences; artesian water.
Miss UHLER, Cor. Warren and Seward Sts.

THOMASVILLE, GA.
PINEY WOODS HOTEL

Season Opens Dec. 28

Hotel Annex Opens Dec. 1

For circulars, etc., apply to F. A. Budlong, Windsor Hotel; The Outlook, 13 Astor Place, N. Y., or WILLIAM E DAVIES, Thomasville, Ga

Illinois

Chicago Beach Hotel 51st St. & Lake Shore

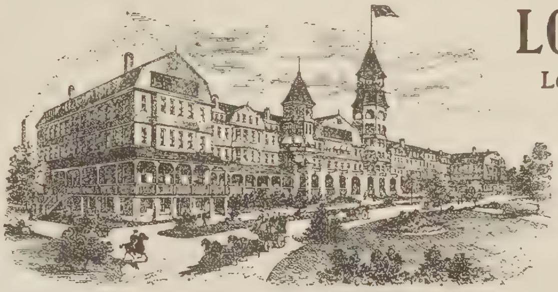
CHICAGO, ILL. HARVEY S. DENISON, Mgr. Demonstrated the most delightful and comfortable abiding-place throughout the year in Chicago.

New Jersey

Galen Hall—A Sanatorium

With all the conveniences of a first-class, quiet hotel. Elevator, steam heat, open-grate fires. Massage, electricity, baths, etc. Table unexcelled. Open all the year. Address Dr. WM. H. H. BULL, Atlantic City, N. J.



LOOKOUT INN

Lookout Mountain, Tenn.

Is now open for 1896

The grandest scenery in America. The most delightful WINTER climate. The finest hotel in the South. Trains and electric cars every 15 minutes from Chattanooga to the door of the INN. Stop-overs allowed on all through tickets. M. S. GIBSON, Manager.

New Jersey

The BRENTFORD

Cor. Madison Ave. and Sixth St., LAKEWOOD, N.J.
Now open. Address Miss A. M. MYERS.

The Buckingham Opposite Laurel House

LAKEWOOD, NEW JERSEY
First-class; rates moderate; circulars. Box 72.

FOREST LODGE

LAKEWOOD, N. J.—Special rates for the fall and early winter. Address THOS. NOBLE.

Finest Winter Hotel in the North

THE LAKEWOOD

NOW OPEN

Rates: Transient, $5 per day; by the week, $25 and upwards. Special rates for season guests.
Address T. F. SILLECK, Lessee,
Late of Oriental Hotel, Manhattan Beach Lakewood, N. J.

The Laurel House of Lakewood

NOW OPEN

DAVID B. PLUMER, Manager,
Lakewood, New Jersey

New Jersey

THE MADISON LAKEWOOD N. J.

Madison Ave. & First St. | Address Mrs. E. H. Merriman.

New York City

Mrs. Gordon 331 WEST 85th ST. Near Riverside Drive.

A quiet and refined home for ladies and young girls visiting New York.

MISS PETZER 160 and 162 East 37th St., N. Y.

One large second floor front room. Room for several transient guests during the holidays.

ST. DENIS

Broadway and 11th St., NEW YORK

Opposite Grace Church EUROPEAN PLAN

Rooms $1.00 per Day and Upward

In a modest and unobtrusive way there are few better conducted hotels in the metropolis than the St. Denis. The great popularity it has acquired can readily be traced to its unique location, its homelike atmosphere, the peculiar excellence of its cuisine and service, and its very moderate prices.

WILLIAM TAYLOR & SON.

(For other advertisements in this department see following page.)

New York City

"A Little Book about a Big City" telling sight-seers, pleasure-seekers, and shoppers how to make the most of a visit to the metropolis—just issued—sent free by Westminster Hotel, 16th St. and Irving Pl., New York.

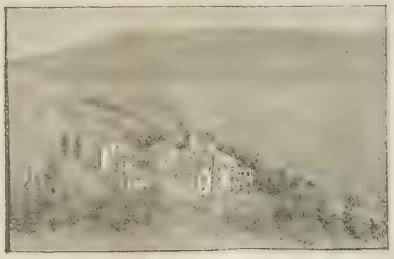
New York

Gleason Sanitarium

ELMIRA, N. Y.

1852 (Formerly Elmira Water Cure) 1895



A comfortable winter home for invalids of both sexes. All modern improvements. All forms of baths, massage, electricity, etc.; under care of regular medical graduates of long experience. Send for illustrated booklet.

Dr. Strong's Sanitarium

Saratoga Springs, N. Y.

For health or pleasure. The appointments of a first-class Hotel. Elevator, electric bells, steam, sun-parlor, and promenade on the roof. Suites of rooms with baths. Massage, Electricity, all baths and health appliances. New Turkish, Russian, and Natural Sulphur-water baths. Lawn-Tennis, Croquet, etc. Open all the year. Send for illustrated circular.

North Carolina

BONNICASTLE. Asheville, N. Car.—A commodious and beautifully situated house, offers sunny rooms and excellent table. Handsome appointments and moderate terms. References if desired. For circulars address Mrs. A. Gulliver, Box 47.

Pennsylvania

WERNERSVILLE, PA.

Grand View Sanitarium

Unequaled as a four-season sanitarium. Dry and bracing mountain air. In winter remarkably exempt from the extremes of cold and severe storms. Send for our new illustrated pamphlet.

Drs. WENRICH & DEPPEN.

WALTER'S SANITARIUM

Walter's Park, Wernersville, Pa.

In Southern Penna., has all the elements of a great WINTER RESORT. Steam heat and open grates, sun parlor, electric light, hydraulic elevator; baths, massage, Swedish movements, electricity. Address for circulars as above, always using the name WALTER'S.

TIME FOR PLANNING WINTER TRIPS

Write the Recreation Department for assistance. We shall be glad to help you find the place you are looking for, and tell you of hotels and routes. It makes no difference where you think of going; we can give you information in regard to any winter resort anywhere.

RECREATION DEPARTMENT, THE OUTLOOK, New York

PINE FOREST INN

SUMMERVILLE, S. C.

NOW OPEN

A FIRST-CLASS WINTER RESORT in every respect. Electric lights, elevators, and all other modern improvements for comfort, convenience, and pleasure. CLIMATE UNSURPASSED. Situated on the South Carolina and Georgia Railway, twenty-two miles from Charleston, S. C. For terms and circulars address

F. W. WAGENER & CO., Proprietors, Charleston, S. C. WM. GAVIN, Asst. Manager, Summerville, S. C.

CALIFORNIA in 3 Days

The Pacific Express

Leaves Chicago at 10.30 p.m. daily. Through Palace Sleeping Cars Chicago to Denver and Portland, with through Sleeping Car accommodations to San Francisco and Los Angeles, and through Tourist Sleeping Car Chicago to California.

Detailed information will be furnished on application to W. B. KNISKERN, General Passenger and Ticket Agent, Chicago. All principal agents sell tickets via . . . . . .

. . . VIA . . .

The Overland Limited

All meals served in Dining Cars.

Palace Drawing-room Sleeping Cars leave Chicago daily at 6.00 p. m., and run through to San Francisco and Los Angeles without change via

THE NORTH-WESTERN LINE

CHICAGO & NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY.

South Carolina

AIKEN, S. C. BUSCH HOUSE.—$2 per day. Special rates by week. Electric lights, etc. Hygienic baths and Kneipp's water cure. HENRY BUSCH. Prop.

South Carolina

PEBBLE LEDGE AIKEN, S. C.—New house; modern conveniences. May be rented furnished for winter season; or select boarders taken. Address P. O. Box 176.

South Carolina

LAND OF THE PINES
AIKEN, S. C.

Dryest climate east of the Rocky Mts. Golf, Fox-Hunting, and Polo. Plenty of sunshine. Average temperature, 52°.

HIGHLAND PARK HOTEL

Renovated and refurnished, now open under new management. For rates and illustrated booklet write PRIEST & EAGER, Managers.

Virginia

HYGEIA HOTEL
Old Point Comfort, Va.

Unrivaled as a health and pleasure resort. Air balmy and full of life-giving ozone. New sanitary plumbing and all the comforts of the modern home. Castalia Spring Water supplied to guests without charge. Circulars may be had at the OUTLOOK, 13 Astor Place, N. Y. F. N. PIKE.

THE SHERWOOD Old Point Comfort, Virginia
A select family hotel of high order. $2 to $3 a day.
GEO. BOOKER, Owner and Propr.

If one were asked to define super-excellence, two words would suffice:

Whitman's
Candies

A taste will better convince you of their delicate deliciousness than all the superlatives in the dictionary. The name, Whitman on every box is warrant of the purity of its contents. At Christmas, or at any time, there's no more acceptable gift than a pound of Whitman's Candies—at your dealer's, or mailed for $1.00.

STEPHEN F. WHITMAN & SON, Philadelphia

For Holiday Gifts!

We have very effective patterns of Shoulder Watches
in gold and silver enamels; a highly artistic line in gold and sterling silver. Also Ecclesiastical Designs in decorated oxidized steel, as well as plain black cases.

The "Addison."

Our unquestioned guarantee with every watch.
THE WATERBURY WATCH CO.,
Send for Catalogue No. 122. Waterbury, Conn.

DEAFNESS & HEAD NOISES CURED by my INVISIBLE Tubular Cushions. Have helped more to good HEARing than all other devices combined. Whispers heard. Help ears as glasses do eyes. F. Hiscox, 858 B'dway, N.Y. Book of proofs FREE

The Outlook
A Family Paper

New Series of The Christian Union

Copyright, 1895, by The Outlook Company.
Entered as second-class matter in the New York Post-Office.

The Outlook is a weekly Family Paper, containing this week sixty-eight pages. The subscription price is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance.

Postage is Prepaid by the publishers for all subscriptions in the United States, Canada, and Mexico. For all other countries in the Postal Union add $1.56 for postage.

Changes of Address.—When a change of address is ordered, both the new and the old address must be given. The notice should be sent one week before the change is to take effect.

Discontinuances.—If a subscriber wishes his copy of the paper discontinued at the expiration of his subscription, notice to that effect should be sent. Otherwise it is assumed that a continuance of the subscription is desired.

How to Remit.—Remittances should be sent by Check, Draft, Express-Order, or Money Order, payable to order of THE OUTLOOK COMPANY. Cash should be sent in Registered Letter.

Letters should be addressed:
THE OUTLOOK,
Clinton Hall, Astor Place,
New York.

Contents for 21 December, 1895

EDITORIAL:

The President's Message on Venezuela........ 1057
Secretary Carlisle's Report.................. 1057
Mr. Bayard's Speech.......................... 1057
The Week in Congress......................... 1057
Massachusetts Municipal Elections............ 1058
Anti-Monopoly in Philadelphia................ 1058
Allen G. Thurman............................. 1059
European Affairs............................. 1060
The Life of the Spirit: The Christmas Vision.. 1061
The Magazine Numbers......................... 1062
Let Us Have Peace............................ 1062
The World's Great Need....................... 1063

CONTRIBUTED ARTICLES

Edward Everett Hale: A Chapter of Autobiography................................ 1064
Kate Carnegie.—Chapters I.-II................ 1069
By Ian Maclaren
"Baddeck and That Sort of Thing"—Twenty Years After.................................. 1075
By William W. Ellsworth
Albrecht Dürer and the Nativity.............. 1079
By Elbert Francis Baldwin
Prophets of the Christian Faith.—II. The Apostle Paul................................ 1080
By the Rev. George Matheson, D.D.
The Higher Life of American Cities.......... 1083
By Theodore Roosevelt
Theodore Roosevelt: A Sketch................. 1085
The Heart of Christmas: A Play for the Children, in One Act.......................... 1086
By Margaret E. Sangster and Caroline A. Creevey

BOOKS AND AUTHORS:

Social Degeneration (Gladden)................ 1089
Novels and Tales............................. 1089
Literary Notes............................... 1090
Books Received............................... 1106

THE RELIGIOUS WORLD:

The Lion—The Lamb: A Sermon by Lyman Abbott.. 1091
The Red Cross Society and Turkey............. 1092
The Evangelical Alliance..................... 1092
Young Men's Christian Union.................. 1092
Open and Institutional Church League......... 1092
Student Volunteer Convention................. 1093
FOR THE LITTLE PEOPLE........................ 1096
THE SPECTATOR................................ 1098
BITS OF FUN.................................. 1108

STEINWAY
GRAND and UPRIGHT PIANOS.

Call and inspect the newly invented patent Grand Pianos in Upright Form. Also for sale for cash or on installments a large assortment of nearly new STEINWAY Grand, Upright and Square Pianos, all warranted like their new Pianos. Also, second-hand Pianos of other make, in perfect order, at low figures.

STEINWAY & SONS, 107-111 E. 14th St.,
NEW YORK.

Not a Patent Medicine.

Nervous Prostration.
Mental Depression.
Nervous Dyspepsia.
Mental Failure.

Freligh's
Tonic (A Phosphorized Cerebro-Spinant)

will cure when everything else has failed. Prescribed and endorsed now, and for ten years past, by over 40,000 Physicians. Sample by mail 25c., ten days' trial. Regular bottle $1 by mail. Small bottle, but 100 doses in each.

Concentrated, Prompt, Powerful.

Formula, descriptive pamphlet, full directions, testimonials, etc., to any address.

I. O. Woodruff & Co.,
Manufacturing Chemists,
106-108 Fulton St., New York City

Formula on Every Bottle.

POINTS
Worth Remembering

In the Season of Coughs and Colds.

Möller's Cod Liver Oil

is prepared only from the fresh livers of the cod-fish, and according to the most approved method.

It is entirely free from products of decomposition and all traces of rancidity.

It is acceptable to the most sensitive stomach, and rapidly promotes nutrition.

MÖLLER'S COD LIVER OIL has enjoyed the confidence of the medical profession and the general public for over forty years.

Flat, oval bottles—all druggists.
Schieffelin & Co., New York, Sole Agents.

"1847"
Rogers Bros.

Silver Plate that Wears

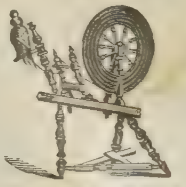
LOTUS PATTERN.

Make sure of the "1847" if you wish the genuine original Rogers Silverware.

Meriden Britannia Company

MERIDEN, CONN.
208 Fifth Ave., NEW YORK.

FLAVOR CUDAHY'S REX BRAND EXTRACT OF BEEF makes delicious flavor for Soups, etc. Send 4c. for Book and Sample. The Cudahy Pharmaceutical Co., South Omaha, Neb.



Registered Trade-Mark

Very Special Values

in

Table Cloths and Napkins
Hemstitched AND Fringed Luncheon Cloths
Table Damask by the yard
Hemstitched Bed Linen
Fine Toilet Towels
Ready-Hemmed Roller Towels
Glass Towels and Dusters

(ALL PURE LINEN)

will be offered by us in our

ANNUAL LINEN SALE

commencing December 30th and continuing throughout January.

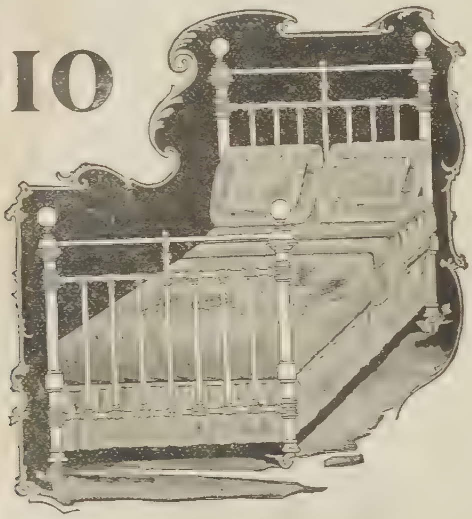
WRITE FOR PRINTED CATALOGUE OF PARTICULARS

James McCutcheon & Co.
THE LINEN STORE
14 WEST 23d STREET, NEW YORK

$10



Look for our name on the foot-rail when you buy a metallic bedstead

There's as much difference in metallic bedsteads as in anything else. Ours are superior in beauty of design, workmanship, and finish. Every bedstead fitted with our PATENT REMOVABLE CASTER—a very important feature. Does your dealer carry our bedsteads? If not, we will send you one of our handsome and popular WELLESLEY bedsteads, represented in cut—white enameled steel, lacquered brass rods, caps, and vases—with good woven wire spring, freight prepaid to N. Y. City or nearer points, for $10.00. What better for Christmas?

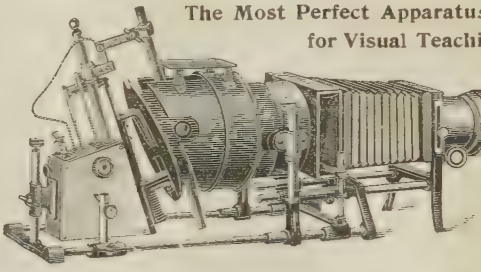
AMERICAN BEDSTEAD COMPANY WESTBOROUGH MASS.

Send for Catalogue. N. Y. Salesroom, 260 Canal St.

State width wanted 3 ft., 3 ft. 6 in., 4 ft., or 4 ft. 6 in.

CRITERION
Electric Light Magic Lantern

The Most Perfect Apparatus for Visual Teaching



Light so strong that it does not matter if room is not completely darkened.

On the same lantern are interchangeable, without the use of tools, the following, viz.: Oil Lamp, Welsbach Gas Burner, Incandescent Electric Lamp, Arc Electric Lamp; also The Microscope, Polariscope, Spectroscope, Vertical and other scientific attachments.

For the projection of the regular lantern slides we make lower-priced lanterns than the Criterion, each being the best of its kind, from $25.00 each for single lantern to $300.00 for stereopticon with Dissolving Key.

Send for catalogue of Magic Lanterns, Slides, Electric Focusing Lamps, etc., etc.

J. B. COLT & CO., Manufacturers
Principal Offices, 115 & 117 Nassau St., New York

AGENCIES:
189 La Salle St., Chicago, Ill.
33-39 South 10th St., Philadelphia, Pa.
131 Post St., San Francisco, Cal.
415 North Broadway, St. Louis, Mo.
50 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.
126 Erie Co. Bank Bldg., Buffalo, N. Y.
39 Marietta Street, Atlanta, Ga.

Constantinople

By EDWIN A. GROSVENOR, with an introduction by General Lew Wallace, and two hundred and fifty illustrations of important places, rulers, and noted people of Ancient Constantinople. 2 vols. Royal 8vo. Cloth. Gilt Top, $10.00; Half Morocco, $14.00.

"An important and valuable work on this famous city. . . . Constantinople is at present a subject of eager European interest and discussion, owing to the unsettled state of affairs between the Porte and the Great Powers, the constant reports of grave insurrections, and the graver fears of a possible and momentous war. A description of the city and its surroundings has therefore a timely interest far beyond the ordinary. . . . Many times assaulted by enemies as powerful and relentless as ever thundered at the gates of Rome, Constantinople vanquished them all, surrendering only at last to Sultan Mohammed II. and the Ottomans. No other capital presents so sublime a spectacle during the Middle Ages. Alone of all the cities of Europe, she towered erect, unsubmerged amid the wild torrents of invasion."—Churchman.

Modern German Literature

By BENJAMIN W. WELLS, Ph.D. 16mo, cloth, $1.50.

It is an excellent popular account of the rise and progress of German literature, comprehensive, and well adapted to its purpose.

From Jerusalem to Nicæa

The Church in the First Three Centuries. Lowell Lectures by PHILIP STAFFORD MOXOM, author of "The Aim of Life." 12mo, cloth, $1.50.

The Condition of Woman in the United States

A Traveler's Notes. By MADAME BLANC (Th. Bentzon). With a Portrait and a short Biographical Sketch by Mario Bertaux. Translated by Abby L. Alger. 16mo, cloth, $1.25.

In addition to a critical sketch of our noted women, Madame Blanc gives us her impressions of women's colleges, university extension, women's clubs and societies, and popular fads.

At all book-stores. Postpaid on receipt of price.

ROBERTS BROTHERS, Publishers, BOSTON

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS

NOW READY

THE CHILD AND CHILDHOOD IN FOLK-THOUGHT

(THE CHILD IN PRIMITIVE CULTURE)

By

ALEXANDER FRANCIS CHAMBERLAIN, M.A., Ph.D.

Lecturer on Anthropology in Clark University; sometime Fellow in Modern Languages in University College, Toronto; Fellow of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, etc., etc. 8vo, cloth, $3.00.

New Book by Mahaffy.

The Empire of the Ptolemies

By J. P. MAHAFFY, Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin; Hon. Fellow of Queen's College, Oxford; author of "Prolegomena of Ancient History," "Social Life in Greece from Homer to Menander," etc. 12mo, cloth, $3.50.

New Book by Professor Sayce.

The Egypt of the Hebrews and Herodotos

By the Rev. A. H. SAYCE, Professor of Assyriology at Oxford. 12mo, cloth, $2.00.

NEW POEMS BY CHRISTINA ROSSETTI

HITHERTO UNPUBLISHED OR UNCOLLECTED

Edited by

WILLIAM MICHAEL ROSSETTI

With a Portrait reproduced from a Pencil Drawing by Dante Gabriel Rossetti. 12mo, cloth, $1.75.
Large-paper Edition of 100 Numbered copies printed on Hand-made paper. $3.50. net.

⁂ "I resolved to put into print any verses of hers which I could find, such as would sustain her poetical reputation, or be of substantial interest as showing the growth of her mind. I looked carefully through the materials which she had left behind her; found many things which I remembered, and others of which I knew little or nothing; and perceived that the amount of her unpublished verse was considerably in excess of what I had surmised. The result is that I now present to the reader a rather large volume, and not, as I expected, a small one."—Preface.

German Songs of To-Day

Edited, with an Introduction and Literary Notes, by ALEXANDER TILLE, Ph.D., Lecturer on the German Language and Literature in the University of Glasgow. 16mo, cloth, $1.00.

The Divine Comedy of Dante. The Inferno

A version in the nine-line metre of Spenser. By GEORGE MUSGRAVE, M.A. Crown 8vo, cloth, $1.50.

LIFE OF CARDINAL MANNING

Archbishop of Westminster.

By EDMUND SHERIDAN PURCELL, Member of the Roman Academy of Letters. With Portraits. Two vols., 8vo, cloth, $6.00.

Life, Letters, and Works of Louis Agassiz

By JULES MARCOU. With Illustrations. Two vols., crown 8vo, cloth, $4.00.

The Life and Letters of Edward A. Freeman, D.C.L., LL.D.

By W. R. W. STEPHENS, B.D., Dean of Winchester, author of "The Life and Letters of Dean Hook," etc. With Portraits, etc. 2 vols., crown 8vo, cloth, $7.00.

HEREDITY AND CHRISTIAN PROBLEMS

By the Rev. AMORY H. BRADFORD, D.D. 12mo, cloth, $1.50.

"Treats of the law and theory of heredity, physical, intellectual, and moral heredity, environment, the problems of the will, the home, education, pauperism, vice and crime, sin and the race, faith and the person of Christ. It is a book of great value, and merits devout, careful study."—Boston Daily Advertiser.

MACMILLAN'S POPULAR EDITION OF THE NOVELS OF CHARLES DICKENS

New Volume.

A Tale of Two Cities and The Mystery of Edwin Drood

By CHARLES DICKENS.
With Illustrations by H. K. Browne and Luke Fildes.

A reprint of the edition corrected by the author in 1869, with an Introduction, biographical and bibliographical, by Charles Dickens the Younger. 12mo, cloth, $1.00.

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF H. DE BALZAC, EDITED BY GEORGE SAINTSBURY

New Volume.

Ursule Mirouët

Translated by CLARA BELL. With a Preface by George Saintsbury.
With three Illustrations drawn and etched by D. Murray-Smith.
12mo, satin binding, uncut, gilt top, $1.50.

THE MODERN READER'S BIBLE

A Series of Books from the Sacred Scriptures presented in Modern Literary Form. The purpose of this Series has regard to the Bible as part of the World's Literature, without reference to questions of religious or historic criticism. Each volume edited with an Introduction and Notes, by RICHARD G. MOULTON, M.A. (Camb.), Ph.D. (Penn.), Professor of Literature in English in the University of Chicago. 32mo, cloth, each 50 cents

NOW READY

WISDOM LITERATURE

THE PROVERBS	ECCLESIASTICUS	JOB (Ready Feb. 15th.)

The Prophets of Israel and Their Place in History to the Close of the Eighth Century, B.C. By the late W. ROBERTSON SMITH, M.A., LL.D. New Edition, with Introduction and additional Notes by the Rev. T. K. CHEYNE, M.A., D.D. 12mo, cloth, pp. 446, price $3.50.

The Songs of the Holy Nativity, considered (1) As Recorded in Scripture; (2) As in Use in the Church. By THOMAS DEHANY BERNARD, M.A., Canon and Chancellor of Wells. 12mo, parchment cover, red edges, pp. 164. $1.75.

Pascal and Other Sermons. By the late R. W. CHURCH, M.A., D.C.L., Dean of St. Paul's. 12mo, cloth, pp. 350, $1.75.

Six Letters on Ante-Nicene Fathers. By FENTON JOHN ANTHONY HORT, D.D., sometime Hulsean Professor and Lady Margaret's Reader in Divinity in the University of Cambridge. 12mo, cloth, pp. 138, $1.50.

Browning as a Philosophical and Religious Teacher. By HENRY JONES, M.A., Professor of Moral Theology in the University of Glasgow. 12mo, cloth, pp. 349, price $2.25.

Thoughts and Aspirations of the Ages. Selections in Prose and Verse from the Religious Writings of the World. Edited by WILLIAM CHATTERTON COUPLAND, D.Sc., M.A. 8vo, cloth, pp. 715, $3.50.

Outlines of Church History. By RUDOLPH SOHM, Professor of Law, Leipzig. Translated by Miss May Sinclair. With a Preface by Professor H. M. GWATKIN, M.A. 12mo, cloth, pp. 254, price $1.10, net.

Some Thoughts on Christian Religion. Being Seven Addresses given during his Visitation in June, 1895. By W. BOYD CARPENTER, Bishop of Ripon and Hon. Fellow of St. Catherine's College, Cambridge. 12mo, cloth, pp. 222, $1.25.

The Constitutional History and Constitution of the Church of England. Translated from the German of FELIX MAKOWER, Barrister in Berlin. 8vo, cloth, pp. x+545, $1.75. net.

MACMILLAN & CO., 66 Fifth Avenue, New York

If You Desire to know all about the

Caligraph Typewriter

Send for our Artistic Illustrated Catalogue for 1896, just published.

If you want the best values in Typewriter Papers and Supplies, you will find them shown in our New Supply Catalogue and Paper Sample Book, which will be sent promptly on request.

AMERICAN WRITING MACHINE CO.
237 Broadway, New York

Cotton Dress Goods.

GINGHAMS, BATISTES, FOULARDS.

Odd lots, broken lines, in some cases only dress pattern lengths; in all over 500 pieces, or at least 25,000 yards of Summer Cotton Fabrics, separated from the regular stock, on counters and tables in the Basement Salesroom and marked per yard:

Printed Batistes . . .	9	cents
Scotch Crepons . .	10	"
Cambrics	10	"
Scotch Ginghams . .	12½	"
English and French Foulards	12½	"

In quality, quantity, and price something we have never before equaled.

Sale continued this week.

James McCreery & Co.

Broadway and 11th St.,
New York.

The Charming Symmetry and the restful support afforded by the Ferris Waist unite to make it the most popular of corset waists. Wear it once and you will renounce the corset and adopt the

FERRIS' GOOD SENSE CORSET WAIST

Both for home and dress wear. Made in styles to suit every figure—long or short waist, high or low bust. Children's 25c. to 50c. Misses' 50c. to $1.00, Ladies' $1.00 to $2.00.

FOR SALE BY ALL RETAILERS.

OUR CONSTANT AIM
TO MAKE THE FERRIS HAMS
THE FINEST!

The Outlook

A·Family Paper

Volume 53 Saturday, 25 January, 1896 Number 4

To the friends and country we love:

Farewell! We know we have your prayers, and you have our efforts for the best that in us lies.

American National Red Cross.
Clara Barton, President.

Washington, D. C.

The telegram printed above was received by The Outlook on Tuesday, as Miss Barton was on the very eve of sailing from New York on her way to Constantinople.
ın people go with

.nd

a prompt and liberal
:ceipts reaches up to Secretary Olney has
:o ascertain from the ıresentatives to enter
Barton accepted the ibution of America's ill warrant the loss ıtinople before leaved to carry out her ıstantinople, if there undertake the task adopted the articles nder which the Red o protection under assured that their ıtly to the purpose

Copyright by B. J. Falk.

JUDGE'S FAVORITES.

EMMA CALVÉ.

Child of the south! return to us, bringing
The song and the passion of Latin land—
Song that the nightingale sighs in its singing
To hearts that listen and understand.
Come to us. Calvé superba! flinging
Gifts of the gods with a lavish hand.

	$250 00
	10 00
	5 00
	2 00
	10 00
	10 30
	25 00
	5 00
	2 00
	5 00
	5 00
	100 00
	20 00
	25 00
	1 00
	3 00
	4 00
	10 00
	2 00
	5 00
	20 00
Miss J. E. D., Morristown, N. J	10 00
Mrs. E. D. B., Morristown, N. J	5 00
M. E., Providence, R. I	10 00
Miss B., New York, N. Y	25 00
Anonymous	2 00
Miss M. B. F., Kansas City, Mo	3 00
A. A. A	1 00
E. H. H	1 00
K. A., New Haven, Conn	1 00
H. MacC., Pawtucket, R. I	2 00
E. E. H., Harvard, Mass	25 00
J. G., Washingtonville, N. Y	2 00
W. L. L., Albany, N. Y	35 00
W. T. M	5 00
W. P. S., St. Johnsbury, Vt	10 00
H. P. R., East Orange, N. J	1 00
C. P. A., Northampton, Mass	10 00
E. D. M., Bryn Mawr, Pa	5 00
Mrs. G. P., Clifton Springs, N. Y	5 00
Baby Frieda	20 00
Total	$697 30

TWO sets of resolutions have been introduced into the United States Senate—one by Senator Sewell, of New Jersey, affirming that the President's message extends the Monroe Doctrine beyond its proper scope, and that this Doctrine does not pledge us to aid and protect Southern Republics; the other by Senator Davis, of Minnesota, reaffirming the Monroe Doctrine, and characterizing

> "any attempt by any European power to take or acquire any new territory on the American continents, or any islands adjacent thereto, any right of sovereignty or dominion in the same, in any case or instance as to which the United States shall deem such attempt to be dangerous to its peace or safety, by or through force, purchase, cession, occupation, pledge, colonization, protectorate, or by control of the easement in canal or any other means of transit across the American isthmus, whether on unfounded pretension of right in cases of alleged boundary disputes, or under other unfounded pretensions, as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States, and as an interposition which it would be impossible in any form for the United States to regard with indifference." (Italics ours.)

The American public will not regard either set of resolutions quite so seriously as they will be regarded abroad. The only way in which our Senators can get an opportunity to make speeches to their constituencies on current topics is by introducing such resolutions. For a Senator can no more speak without a resolution than a minister can preach without a text. The editor has in this respect an advantage over both. The fact is that the meaning of the Monroe Doctrine is not very important. We are quite as competent to define American doctrine for 1896 as Monroe was for 1823. Both Senator Sewell's and Senator Davis's resolutions might be true. There is no good reason why we should assume a protectorate over all South America; there is very good reason why we should view with jealousy any attempt to get, by any means, control of possessions on this hemisphere which might, in the event of war, become a menace to us. But this is not an opportune time to make this declaration. Certainly the disputed territory in Venezuela can by no possibility ever become such a menace.

⁂

One of the most interesting features of the recent tension of feeling between this country and England has been the very frank talk in which the best English newspapers have indulged with regard to English failings. The superiority in tone, dignity, and sense of responsibility of the average English newspaper over the average American newspaper has never been more signally illustrated; for the English press, as a rule, has discussed the recent events which have so overshadowed England with possibilities of peril with sobriety, with an evident desire to state the facts, with clear recognition of English responsibilities, and with a sincere desire to get at the causes of dissatisfaction with English action. Our press, on the other hand, has, as a rule, abounded with denunciation and recrimination. The frank discussion of the question why Englishmen are disliked which has been going on in the English press shows a general consensus of opinion on two points. First, that English commercial ability and prosperity have excited the jealousy of European countries, and have made them eager to take any opportunity of humiliating a successful rival. Secondly, that English conceit, manifested in an irritating assumption of superiority and an irritating habit of disregarding other people's sensibilities, has bred dislike of England in this country. "There is," says the "Speaker," "some justification for the popular American impression of our self-conceit. We ourselves know that it springs mainly from the self-absorption of a busy race. We have our own work in the world to do; and whilst we are doing it we trouble ourselves very little about the affairs, or indeed the feelings, of others. So we tread unconsciously upon the corns of many of our fellow-creatures, and we have naturally to pay the penalty for doing so." Insularity, the "Speaker" adds, is a great thing for England, but there is a penalty attached to it. "It inspires in us that traditional attitude of, we will not say contempt, but condescension towards the foreigner which has been so often satirized by writers and philosophers of our own race." This is admirable talking. It shows the instinct for truth which lies at the bottom of the character of the English-speaking races. We commend this example to our own flamboyant press.

❀

Last week the question was raised in England why the United States should recommend arbitration in the British Venezuelan affair, when it has not yet paid the $425,000 to Great Britain, agreed upon between the late Secretary Gresham and the British Ambassador, Sir Julian Pauncefote, as a lump sum in settlement of Behring Sea claims. The charge that we are not carrying out the terms of that arbitration is wholly unjust. By Article VIII. of the Behring Sea Treaty it was provided that

> "The United States and Great Britain, having found themselves unable to agree upon a reference which shall include the question of the liability of each for the injuries alleged to have been sustained by the other, or by its citizens, in connection with the claims presented and urged by it, and being solicitous that this subordinate question should not interrupt or longer delay the submission and determination of the main questions, do agree that either may submit to the arbitrators any question of fact involved in said claims, and ask for a finding thereon; the question of the liability of either Government upon the facts found to be the subject of further negotiation."

When the questions of fact were submitted to the arbitrators, the finding was against us; but the amount of damages to be paid by us was left to be settled by further negotiation, the Paris Tribunal expressly declining to arbitrate the question of damages. The late Secretary of State and the British Ambassador decided that the best method of settlement would be through a Commission, but as differences had arisen regarding the phraseology to be used in establishing the Commission, and as the expenses of the Commission would be considerable, the Secretary and the Ambassador proposed to settle all claims without adjudication, by a compromise lump sum of $425,000. This agreement was, of course, subject to Congressional ratification; Congress refused to ratify it, and negotiations have been resumed for the organization of a Commission. If our Government shall refuse to pay the damages awarded by this Commission, it will then be time enough to accuse us of bad faith. As many of our Representatives in Washington believe that more than half the British claim was for the expected catches of vessels warned away; that more than half the vessels for which claims were filed were wholly or in part owned by Americans; that a large number of these ships had been put down at double their value; in short, that less than one-fifth of the amount originally claimed was on an equitable basis, it is not surprising that our National Legislature decided to provide for a proper compensation only after thorough investigation.

❀

Last week the Volksraad of the Orange Free State adopted a resolution declaring that the State would assist the Transvaal at all times when such assistance should be required, and protested against the continued existence of the British South Africa Company as being a danger to the peace of Africa, recording its opinion that the charter of the Company should be canceled and that Mashonaland and Matabeleland should be placed either under the British Imperial Government or under the Government of Cape Colony. It is thought in England that it might be a good thing under the circumstances to cancel the charter, since, should the Company be forced into liquidation, the resulting tumult would show that many men high in station, including some members of the reigning house, have realized great amounts of money by the sale of South Africa shares at large premiums to the present unfortunate holders. The forfeiture of the charter would also relieve the Company of much of the blame which has already come to it, and some of the odium might be transferred to the Government. The directors would contend that, but for the repeal of the charter by the Government, they might have fulfilled every engagement. The Company's organizer and chief working power, Mr. Cecil Rhodes, ex-Premier of Cape Colony, has sailed for England. As to his lieutenant, Dr. Jameson, the leader of the recent filibustering raid, we have conflicting dispatches. It is announced that he and his officers are to be conveyed as prisoners to England, where they will be arraigned before proper tribunals. Again, we have news that, as the arrested men have been accused of treason and also of seeking to subvert the Government of the Transvaal, they must be tried by its High Court. As to the Americans arrested, our consular agent at Johannesburg is acting in co-operation with the British authorities in securing protection. The fact that we have accredited an agent to the South African Republic has led some to think that we have recognized the entire independence of that nation and have disregarded the species of suzerainty which Great Britain holds. The statement has been made by officers of our State Department, however, that, in view of the treaty of 1884 between Great Britain and the Transvaal, this has no bearing on the question. In the abovementioned treaty this paragraph defines the former's authority:

> "The South African Republic will conclude no treaty or engagement with any State or nation other than the Orange Free State, nor with any native tribe to the eastward or westward of the Republic, until the same has been approved by her Majesty the Queen. Such approval shall be considered to have been granted if her Majesty's Government shall not, within six months after receiving a copy of such treaty (which shall be delivered to them immediately upon its completion), have notified that the conclusion of such treaty is in conflict with the interests of Great Britain, or of any of her Majesty's possessions in South Africa."

Hence it will be seen that it was not necessary to ask Great Britain's consent to accredit an agent to the South African Republic. Its Volksraad has met at Pretoria, and, after authorizing an addition to the State artillery, and passing resolutions of thanks to the Orange Free State and also to the Cape Colony Government for their influence and support, has adjourned until the regular May session.

❀

The return to office of some of the Ministers who had resigned from the Canadian Cabinet was entirely overshadowed in importance last week by the elections in Manitoba. Premier Greenway has increased his legislative support over that which he enjoyed in the last Manitoban

Parliament. More than thirty constituencies out of the forty have now indorsed Mr. Greenway's colleagues—a sufficient answer to the Remedial Order providing separate schools for Manitoba. It is claimed by the Roman Catholics that the Dominion could not have been formed without the compromise of separate schools, and on this account a provision was inserted in the British North America Act that "nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the province at the union." Under this act the Roman Catholics of Manitoba had the right of support from the public fund for their separate schools; but when the province became mostly Protestant, it was seen that the Protestant schools were making better progress than were those of the Roman Catholics. In 1890, therefore, the Public Schools Act was passed. It declared that no school which did not conform to the provisions of the Act with reference to certificated teachers, authorized text-books, and teaching should be deemed a public school and entitled to any share of the school taxes or legislative grant for educational purposes. No religious exercises were to be allowed except those authorized by the Advisory Board, and no religious exercises were to contain anything opposed to the religious beliefs of any class of the people. This provision was not satisfactory to the Roman Catholics, who contended that they were entitled under the Manitoba Act to separate schools in which they might teach their own doctrines. A test case—"Barrett vs. the City of Winnipeg"—in which the constitutionality of the Public Schools Act was attacked, was carried from court to court until it reached the British Privy Council, which declared that the Public Schools Act was constitutional. Then the Roman Catholics declared that they had the right of redress from the Dominion Parliament, and accordingly they petitioned the Governor-General in Council for relief. The Dominion Cabinet (the Governor-General in Council) expressed doubts as to whether this petition could be heard, and referred the matter to the decision of the Canadian Supreme Court. As the Court was evenly divided, the question was carried to the British Privy Council, which decided that the Roman Catholics had the right to appeal to the Governor-General in Council. A statement was added, however, that the matter of relief was entirely one for the Dominion Cabinet to decide. The Cabinet issued an order directing Manitoba to restore separate schools to the Roman Catholics. Last June the Manitoba Legislature met and declined to carry out the terms of the order; upon which the Dominion Cabinet declared that if Manitoba did not carry out the terms the Dominion Government would at the present Parliamentary session institute legislation to override the Manitoba Public School Act. By the elections last week the people of Manitoba reiterated the answer of the Manitoba Legislature, and it remains to be seen what response the people of the Dominion of Canada will make at the impending Canadian elections. In the United States the laity of the Roman Catholic Church might be safely trusted to confirm the position of Manitoba in favor of non-ecclesiastical public schools.

◆

The recall of General Campos from the command of the Spanish forces in Cuba is regarded by the friends of the insurgent movement as an open confession on the part of Spain of her total failure, so far, to make any headway in putting down the rebellion. General Campos has been universally regarded as Spain's ablest military commander. He has had far larger bodies of troops under his orders than were ever sent to Cuba in previous outbreaks; his army has outnumbered the insurgents ten to one. Yet he has not only failed to defeat or disperse his enemies, but he has been unable to compel them to confine their operations to any one part of the island. At first we were told that the rebels had been driven into the swamps at the eastern end of the island. Then, as they appeared in large bodies in central Cuba, a line was drawn south from Havana to the southern coast, beyond which they were not to pass. As the island is narrow at this part, it seemed an easy military undertaking to hold the line inflexibly. But the insurgents, by threatening Havana, compelled Campos to draw his whole force around the capital, and have passed and repassed his imaginary line at pleasure. Naturally, the extreme party in Havana have accused Campos of lack of vigor and of political leanings towards a compromise with the autonomists. General Garcia, the leader of a former Cuban revolt, speaks of Campos as conciliatory; all accounts agree that he has absolutely refused to adopt the cruel methods of warfare which have been employed by other Spanish generals in Cuba. His successor, General Weyler, is in experience inferior to Campos; he is spoken of as energetic and ready to adopt extreme measures. In this desultory kind of warfare it seems almost impossible to bring on a decisive engagement. The rapidity and alertness of the revolutionary leaders are remarkable. Raids and attacks upon exposed points are followed by swift retreats to inaccessible districts. A whole year has been spent by Spain in futile attempts to crush the rebellion, and it is now stronger than ever.

◆

During the past week the newspapers which urged most strenuously that the new bond issue should have been sold to the Morgan syndicate, instead of being offered in the open market to the highest bidders, have abandoned the prediction that the method employed would fail. From the beginning it was evident that foreign capitalists could bid for the new bonds, and therefore that the syndicate could not dictate its own terms by reason of its control of so large a part of the available gold in this country. The question of greatest interest was whether individual members of the syndicate would enter into the competition for the bonds by offering separate bids. This question had been practically answered in the affirmative by the beginning of last week, certain members of the syndicate having announced that the investors they represented desired the bonds and would offer competing bids. On Wednesday this answer was given in a conclusive way by the publication of a circular-letter from Mr. Pierpont Morgan, dissolving the syndicate. This letter ought to do much to disabuse the public mind of popular prejudice against capitalists, though, unfortunately, it will not be read by nor truly interpreted to the prejudiced class of the public. It is thoroughly patriotic in tone. The syndicate, it says, was organized to offer the Government $200,000,000 of gold coin in exchange for bonds. Within four days the entire amount had been subscribed. The subscribers belonged to four classes of about equal importance:

1. Foreign firms, prepared, if necessary, to ship gold to the amount of this subscription.
2. American banks, savings-banks, trust companies, and private individuals in possession of gold, and wishing the bonds for investment.
3. American banks in possession of gold, and wishing the bonds for future sale in the market.
4. Firms without gold, but willing to obtain it, in order to participate in the loan.

In his circular Mr. Morgan quotes a letter from himself to the President, written just prior to the announcement of the new bond issue, and presumably influential, in connection with a previous interview, in bringing that issue about, recommending, on grounds of public policy, that new bonds should be sold to the syndicate "on about the basis of the contract of February 8, 1895," but pledging his co-operation in making the loan a success in case the President decided to offer the bonds to public subscription. This pledge is carried out by the dissolution of the syndicate, leaving the members entirely free to offer what terms they see fit, and by the co-operation of members of it in making the loan a success. There is now little doubt that the entire issue will be subscribed for at rates approximating those for which the former issue now sells in the open market. During last week Secretary Carlisle sensibly extended the time during which payments for the new bonds could be made. He did this at the suggestion of many New York bankers, who recognized that the purchase of $100,000,000 in gold for the Treasury would contract the amount of money in circulation, and feared that if this contraction took place suddenly, the loan to "restore confidence" would precipitate a panic.

* * *

Among the recent elections of United States Senators the most important was that held in Utah on Monday of this week. Mr. Frank J. Cannon, the son of George Q. Cannon, of the Presidency of the Mormon Church, was selected as the representative of the Mormons, and Mr. Arthur Brown as the representative of the Gentiles. Mr. Cannon was elected delegate to Congress in 1894, partly because of the revulsion of public sentiment against the Democratic party, and partly, it is alleged, because of the church influence in his favor. At one time, in his wilder days, he left the Mormon Church, but returned to it previous to his entrance into politics. He is not regarded as a man of marked ability or strength of character. His colleague, on the contrary, is reported to be a man of exceptional power, closely resembling Senator Tillman. He has been an intense anti-Mormon, and his election was something of a surprise. Both Senators are, of course, Republicans and advocates of the immediate free coinage of silver. In Kentucky the Democratic caucus renominated Senator Blackburn, but fourteen Democrats opposed to free coinage refused to be bound by the caucus action. The election of a Democrat is thus rendered next to impossible, as the two Populists who hold the balance of power will not support a Democrat acceptable to the anti-silver wing. The Republicans may unseat enough Democrats in the lower House to give themselves a majority of both Houses on joint ballot, but the Democrats threaten to meet any such tactics by unseating Republican Senators. In such an unseemly fight as this the Republicans would seem to have the political advantage, as the Republican House has a much longer tale of members than the Democratic Senate. In Ohio the Republicans have elected to the Senate ex-Governor Foraker, who is expected to succeed in all respects to the power and prestige of James G. Blaine. In his speech before the Ohio Legislature accepting the election he characteristically defined himself as a bimetallist, without defining bimetallism.

* * *

Temperance legislation occupies the first place before most of the newly assembled Legislatures. In Ohio the temperance forces seem to be entirely united in support of the local option bill, barely defeated last year, extending to counties the rights now possessed by townships to prohibit bar-rooms within their borders. The Anti-Saloon League, which has carried on so effectively the agitation in favor of this measure, holds its convention in Columbus this week. Among the speakers announced are the Rev. J. M. Cleary, of Minnesota, and Bishop Watterson, of Columbus, representing the Catholic Total Abstinence Union, Colonel Eli Ritter and the Hon. I. E. Nicholson, of Indiana—the leaders of the forces which secured the enactment of the Nicholson Law last year—and the Hon. Walter B. Hill, of Georgia, representing the powerful Anti-Bar-room League in that State, besides President J. W. Bashford, of Ohio Wesleyan University, and others who have given the Ohio League its astonishing vitality and strength. The fact that most of these men are Prohibitionists furnishes illustration of the falsity of the charge that Prohibitionists will not work with moderate temperance people to push forward restrictive measures immediately practicable. It is our observation that much, if not most, of the hard work in behalf of such measures is performed by the members of this party from whose theories we so often dissent. In New York State a large number of excise bills have been introduced into the Legislature besides the Raines tax bill reported last week. A moderate Sunday-opening bill has been presented having the support of Dr. Parkhurst and the Chamber of Commerce, and an immoderate Sunday-opening bill having the support of the Chamber of Commerce and the Excise Reform Association. The former merely authorizes bona-fide restaurants to sell wine and beer with meals, and without meals from 12 to 2 P.M. and from 6 P.M. to 8 P.M. provided they are not to be drunk on the premises. With such an enactment as this it is believed that the temperance forces in this city could defeat at the polls the proposition for wide-open saloons from 1 to 10 P.M., on which the other bill demands a referendum. It is for this last bill, of course, that the liquor-dealers are working with might and main, and we regret to find them supported by many men to whom Sunday bar-rooms, with the attendant treating, tippling, and loafing, are personally repugnant. Fortunately, however, the Legislature—Republican by over two-thirds majority—will not dare to repudiate the anti-saloon platform on which it was elected by offering the local option demanded by liquor-dealers while refusing the local option demanded by temperance people.

* * *

Another temperance matter of interest in New York is a decision of the Court of Appeals which will gradually reduce the number of saloons within two hundred feet of churches or schools. Heretofore it has been the custom, at least in this city, to renew licenses to old saloons within the legal limit, even if the saloons changed hands, unless a protest was filed by the church or school authorities. The Court of Appeals decides that under the law licenses can only be renewed to present licensees and cannot be transferred to new men. The significance of the decision is much less than most of the reports have indicated. In Iowa retiring Governor Jackson, in his message to the Legislature, urges that the license law passed under his administration has lessened the number of saloons. The number of United States licenses issued during the last year of State-wide prohibition, he says, was 6,032; the number issued during the first year of the so-called "mulct" law was 4,264. The revenue of the taxpayers from the license or "mulct" system was $1,156,000. On these accounts the retiring Governor urges that the new law has been helpful to the State as well as to the liquor-dealers. That it has helped the liquor-dealers no one denies; that it has helped the State is vehemently denied by most of the temperance people, who ask nothing more of the new Legislature than that it shall fulfill the pledge to submit to the voters of the State a prohibitory amendment to the Constitution. The fact that the number of United States licenses issued has been lessened signifies nothing, they urge, since one open dram-shop does more business than a dozen stealthy transitory joints. The public revenue from the licenses, they add with force, is not so much wealth added to the State, as a petty salvage from the sums wasted in the bar-rooms. In Canada the prohibitionists have just scored a succession of victories. In the city of Toronto the Prohibitory Union has elected its candidate for Mayor, and seven members of the Board of Aldermen. In Manitoba five-sixths of the Liberal candidates for the Legislature were prohibitionists, and the great Liberal victory was incidentally a prohibition victory.

⁂

The problem of the Greater New York is far more serious and more important than the legislators seem to think. To compel a union of two great cities under one municipal government against the protest of a considerable portion of the citizens of either city would be a great injustice. On the other hand, a mere submission to popular vote of the question whether the two cities should be united in one city, without any attempt to determine beforehand what the nature of that union shall be, is to ask for a vote in the dark. The real problem is this: There is crowded together on Manhattan Island and the immediate vicinity a population already numbering two and a half millions, and certain in a very little time to number four millions. What should be the relation of this great population to the rest of the State? What should be its powers of self-government, and how should they be exercised? These questions cannot be answered offhand by a popular election, nor wisely answered by a committee composed of legislators many of whom are without any expert knowledge of municipal problems. Moreover, it is certain that any legislative committee will be largely influenced by a consideration of the effect which union will be likely to have upon the fortunes of the two great political parties. A hasty decision is not important; a wise decision is. For this what is needed is a committee composed of the most statesmenlike men in the State, men familiar with municipal problems here and abroad, such men as Seth Low and Albert Shaw, to study the problem and propose a plan for legislative or popular acceptance, or both. It may well be that the whole district should be divided into smaller districts, each with its own administrative center and administrative head, analogous to the arrondissements in Paris, but all united in one municipal organization with a central legislative body and a central executive head including and supervising the various departments. It is possible that the proposition to give local option in the matter of liquor-selling to the wards should be extended to other matters either in the wards or in larger districts. Certainly the wisest plan for municipal government for such a heterogeneous population cannot be hit upon by chance, but requires for its formulation a comparison of views by the wisest and most patriotic men.

⁂

This problem is itself part of the larger problem of municipal government throughout the State. What is the relation of the city to the State? What measure of home rule should be accorded to the city? These are questions which not only have never been solved, it may almost be said that they have never been seriously studied by the law-making powers. Dr. Shaw, in his studies of foreign municipalities; Professor Goodenow, in his study of American municipal legislation; The Outlook, in its description three years ago of municipal corruption in this country, and other periodicals and papers in fugitive and fragmentary articles, have considered the subject of municipal government from the historic and scientific points of view; but it may fairly be said that no systematic, patriotic, and scientific endeavor has been made by any Legislature to ascertain the principles which should be applied to municipal government, and to construct a general municipal charter upon those principles. This is what pre-eminently needs to be done. The charter of the great cities should be like the Constitution of the State, adopted after careful deliberation, and not easily to be changed. The Reform Club in the city of New York could render no better service than by entering into correspondence with smaller bodies in other cities for the purpose of devising a plan for municipal government to be urged upon the Legislature. If the cities from New York to Buffalo were once able to agree upon a general plan of municipal government, their united action would unquestionably secure its ratification by the people of the State. It is doubtful whether any legislative committee will or can secure any such results.

⁂

The political machine corrupts, vitiates, and demoralizes everything which it touches. The Hon. Levi P. Morton has made, on the whole, an excellent Governor of New York State. He has been conservative, conciliatory, prudent, and in his moral standards greatly superior to the politicians who have claimed to control the Republican party. When such a man is nominated for the Presidency by his friends, legitimate political ambition should intensify his desire and strengthen his purpose to do great things. But the machine is supposed to control the convention which makes the Presidential nomination, and it is probably true that no man can even have his name submitted to the people as a candidate unless he has secured a nomination from the machine. When, therefore, Mr. Morton's name is seriously mentioned for the Presidency, immediately he is brought under pressure to yield to the machine, whose behests he did not obey in the gubernatorial administration. Apparently as a result of that pressure, he has removed a good man and appointed an extremely doubtful one on the Civil Service Commission, in deference to the demands of the spoilsmen, and in spite of the protest of the Civil Service Reformers; in other words, he has put the law into the hands of men whose character and antecedents give the public reason to believe that they will disregard its spirit, and, so far as they dare, will violate its principles. If this is what the machine can do with a man so deservedly esteemed as Governor Morton, what wonder that it corrupts and demoralizes men of feebler fiber and less eminence! Such political appointments as these make the independent citizen question whether he can hope for political purity in either party, or for a political issue, not between spoilsmen struggling for office, but between statesmen honestly differing in their political judgments. Our present political system is as if in the Civil War General Lee on one side and General Grant on the other had been controlled in their campaigns by the peddlers, sutlers, camp-followers, and hangers-on who were following the army for what they could make out of it.

⁂

The New York Kindergarten Association has made an appeal for funds. It needs about $9,000 for the work of the winter, in addition to the money which it receives from regular sources. No officer of the Association receives any salary, and very considerable work is done and very heavy responsibilities are shouldered by busy men and women out of pure love of the cause. Subscriptions of any amount may be sent to the Treasurer, Mr. Alfred Bishop Mason, 10 Wall Street.

Hopeful Signs

That waves of emotion sometimes sweep through whole races is well known. There are times when great populations are seized with a kind of hysteria; when it seems as if the nerves were in control instead of intelligence and will. The world appears to be passing through such a period at present. The evidences of nervous excitement have long been numerous in all the arts, and the recent outbreaks of race and national feeling in their suddenness and intensity have seemed to betray the general diffusion of a hysterical element. Only a few weeks ago, with the exception of the uncertainty at Constantinople, the whole world was at peace; now it would seem as if the whole world were by the ears. The clamor of tongues has been deafening. First came the roar which rolled over this continent like a surge. Then followed a similar tumult in England and Germany, and mutterings all over Europe. The sober business of governing the world and keeping order, with due sense of the tremendous responsibilities involved, has apparently yielded for the moment to the sort of irritability which sometimes takes possession of a school of boys at the end of the winter term, when, at the least provocation, self-restraint goes and passion comes. President Woolsey used to say that about the middle of March the devil went through the New England colleges like a roaring lion. It seems to-day as if the whole world were feeling a kind of nervous tension, and as if its nerves were giving way under it.

There is, however, one fact in the present situation which is profoundly significant, and, from our point of view, profoundly hopeful, and that is the evident reluctance of any Great Power to commit itself beyond hope to the settlement of questions by war. All Europe is armed to the teeth. Not since the days of Napoleon the Great have so many men been under arms, or so many vessels equipped for battle, ready to sail at an hour's notice; and not even in Napoleon's time was there anything like the systematic, scientific, and complete equipment of armies and navies alike for the highest service and the most deadly destructiveness. And yet, with these superb instruments in hand, no country is willing to evoke the awful possibilities of war. Science has armed men with such instruments of destruction that the very perfection of the instrument makes the man unwilling to employ it. It would seem as if the development of the machinery of devastation and wreck had developed also a keener sense of responsibility, a keener consciousness of pain. The Emperor of Germany may send gratuitous congratulations to the President of the South African Republic, and all England may be set aflame with indignation, but Germany has probably no intention of provoking an armed struggle. With every possible facility for warfare, war is the one thing which she wishes to avoid. The same thing may be said of England, which, as usual, has shown the nerve of the English-speaking races under great danger, and has manifested a characteristic readiness and resourcefulness. France is supposed to be full of the belligerent spirit, but France is now calling herself the arbiter of peace in Europe. Italy and Austria have great armies, but neither desires to use them. Even Russia, which still stands largely outside of European opinion, shows a new reluctance in employing force.

The unwillingness of the world to fight is due to several causes: First, to the clear recognition, on the part of all who know anything about the matter, of the enormous destructiveness which must be involved in any modern war. Second, to the immense and crushing expense which any war must involve. The Franco-German War cost eight and a half millions of dollars a day. A United States Senator is reported as having said that war would be a good thing for this country—not war for the vindication of National honor or the protection of National rights, but war in itself. Never, surely, did any man in high position evince a greater ignorance of the laws of economics or of the teachings of history. War is sheer brutal destruction of values, and in the present condition of things, when almost every country in Europe is loaded to the water's edge with indebtedness of every kind, no country has the courage to face an enormous addition to its financial burdens. France, with all its prosperity and sagacity, has been steadily increasing its national debt; Italy has been almost crushed by the burden of taxation; the same burdens in Germany are already as heavy as the people can comfortably bear; and, while the English are rejoicing in a large surplus of revenue, the general financial condition of the Empire is not one to encourage any increase of obligations. Third, to the growing sense of the solidarity of the race and of the reality of the ties which bind country to country. We have long passed the point where even a German bomb could be dropped by the most ardent German marksman into the Louvre with any degree of satisfaction, and the American who could destroy Westminster Abbey would be a monster. In spite of armaments and arms, there is more real brotherhood in the world than there has ever been before, and the swift reaction against the passion which in this country, in England, and in Germany has been so notable in recent weeks, is an assertion of a common sentiment which public men and the ruling classes cannot disregard. The peoples of the world are for peace because they hate destruction. They have a growing sense of the responsibility of race for race, and they are coming into that broader economic knowledge which makes them understand that the highest results, both materially and spiritually, are reached by co-operation between the races, and not by the kind of competition that involves destructiveness. In other words, war, which is the old method of barbarism, has already become an anachronism in these civilized days, which are not, as some of our warlike public men declare, "piping times of peace," but times of higher discernment of the uses of energy, of profounder sense of the solidarity of the race, and of truer ideals of honor.

A Historical Precedent

The Outlook cited last week the action of President Monroe and the speech of Mr. Webster in support of the Greeks in their struggle for freedom against Turkey, as furnishing a historical example of the spirit and method in which and by which the United States may properly endeavor to put a stop to outrages in Armenia. England may find a still more striking historical precedent in one of the finest episodes in her later history. Two hundred and forty years ago, in 1655, Charles Emanuel II., Duke of Savoy and Prince of Piedmont, by an edict, commanded his Protestant subjects in the valleys of the Cottian Alps, known sometimes as the Vaudois and sometimes as the Waldenses, to abjure Protestantism and accept the Roman Catholic faith within twenty days, or to part with their property and leave the country. These brave and sturdy people resisted. Military force was sent against them. They were overcome by preponderance of numbers, they were slaughtered, flung over precipices, carried away into captivity, outraged in every conceivable fashion, and hundreds of families were driven to seek access among the snows of the high Alps, where many of them perished from exposure and cold. The news of this persecution, so brutal in its method, aroused deep feeling throughout Europe, and stirred the heart of England profoundly. As the leader of Protestant Europe, the English felt a deep and sacred sense of responsibility. One of the greatest of Englishmen was then at the head of the State, and the appeal of the suffering Vaudois found no uncertain response in the heart of Oliver Cromwell. An Ambassador was sent to the country to ascertain the facts, a fast-day was appointed to be observed throughout England, a subscription of more than forty thousand pounds, equal to at least a million of dollars in our day, was raised for the sufferers, and letters of protest were sent to Charles Emanuel and to the chief princes and powers of Europe. Behind the evident indignation and determination of these letters of protest, signed by a man who not only ruled but governed, was the best army in Europe. The edict of persecution was withdrawn, and the Vaudois were not only freed from the outrages to which they had been subjected, but were allowed to worship according to their own conscience. The spirit of England found expression not only in this energetic and effective action, but also in one of the noblest of Milton's sonnets—a sonnet which has to-day a new meaning:

"Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints, whose bones
 Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold:
 Even them who kept thy truth so pure of old,
 When all our fathers worshiped stocks and stones,
Forget not: in thy book record their groans
 Who were thy sheep, and in their ancient fold
 Slain by the bloody Piemontese, that rolled
 Mother with infant down the rocks. Their moans
The vales redoubled to the hills, and they
 To heaven. Their martyred blood and ashes sow
 O'er all the Italian fields, where still doth sway
The triple Tyrant; that from these may grow
 A hundredfold, who, having learnt thy way,
 Early may fly the Babylonian woe."

A statesman at the head of the English Government, a statesman even in our own Senate, might learn a lesson concerning the power of public opinion from this chapter of English history, and a hint as to one method of relieving the martyred Armenians.

The Peace of God

In troublous times we find refuge in the truth that God dwells in perpetual peace. Peace is the eternal fact. Wars and rumors of wars are temporary facts breaking in upon that eternal peace. When the black clouds gather in the west, and the thunder seems to fill the heavens with reverberation, and the lightning illumines the whole angry horizon as with fire gleams of wrath, and the winds, broken loose, swoop down upon the plain and cut a broad swath through the forest, cutting the trees as the scythe cuts the grass-blades in its path, it seems as though all nature were in wild chaos. But, in fact, the path of the storm is but a few miles in width, and on either side the sun is shining and the birds are singing. All the storms of earth are of earth's own making, and rise but a few thousand feet above its scarred surface. The world itself, with all its storms, moves in its appointed orbit through unbroken and eternal peace. So our world-storms travel in narrow paths through environing peace. So humanity moves forward in the orbit God has appointed, through a peace which is never broken. He in whom we live and move is never tempest-tossed, never bewildered, never hurried, never perplexed, never bowed beneath burdens too heavy for his carrying. As children playing, worrying, sometimes quarreling in the nursery, on whose troubled life the strong mother looks without dread, knowing that out of even the apparent evil there will issue, if the children be but rightly guided, a better, braver, clearer-thoughted, stronger-willed manhood, so we in this little nursery of ours play our child games, and fight our child battles, and suffer our child sorrows, while the strong God looks down on us with infinite tenderness, but with infinite peace. It is well sometimes for us to flee from the nursery strife, stand for a moment at the divine Mother's side, look up into Her calm face, and receive the quiet benediction of Her presence. This it is to "acquaint thyself with God, and be at peace."

Calvinism has its beatific side. The sovereignty of force is terrible; the sovereignty of law may be dreadful; but who can be in terror of the sovereignty of love? "I am the Lord, and there is none else; I form the light and create the darkness; I make peace and create calamity; I the Lord do all these things." Substitute love for I, and re-read this declaration, and life becomes luminous. Love-sent calamity becomes a blessing. As when the green sod sees the plow coming straight toward it, and knows that in a few moments it will be torn up by the roots, and all its glorious verdure will be bruised, and yet can rejoice if it can foresee that this burial of spring prepares for the resurrection of a harvest, so the soul that knows the good God and what glory he brings out of desolations and devastations, fears not the destruction that wastes at noonday. Love holds the plow-handles and makes the furrows;

"And all is right that seems most wrong,
 If it be His dear will."

When in the apocalyptic vision the book of human destiny was brought out, John wept much because no one was found able to open it. Then the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, the strong Son of God, the lover of mankind, strong in his love and strong in his hope, because he could see the end from the beginning, and could in his strong love share the sufferings which were to redeem the race, came forward and took the book and broke its seals. And when He did so, forth from the book came war and famine and pestilence and persecution. It is self-sacrificing love alone which dares open the book of human destiny and let free the awful woes that are hidden in it. For tears are seeds of joy, and sorrow is the travail-pain of a new life. And all the tumults and strifes are but the dust and confusion of the factory whose finished product is man, made in God's image, and satisfied only when after life's troubled dreams he awakes in God's likeness.

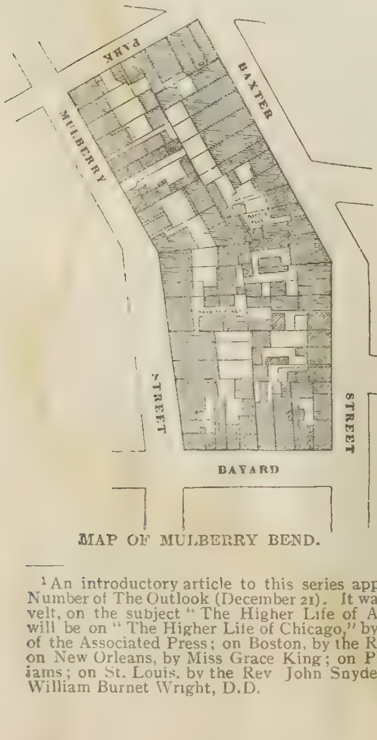
What a tumultuous rapid is that which flows from the foot of Niagara Falls to its peaceful resting-place in Lake Ontario! Two drops take this tempestuous and seemingly perilous journey together, both tossed hither and yon in the foaming current, both flung now into the air by interposing rocks, now forced backwards by recalcitrant eddies, but both making their way steadily to the lake below. One, perplexed, distraught, terrified, despairing, cries out to itself, What is all this for? Why was I taken from my quiet repose in Lake Erie? The other knows that God has cleft this passage for the river through the rocks, and not in vain, and that all thwarting obstacles and jutting stones cannot hinder his purpose nor block the pathway of the tiny drop whose roadway has been hewn out for it, whose peaceful harbor is waiting for it. So in the midst of the swirls and eddies and currents of this tumultuous life, the soul that knows God moves on serenely to the issue his Maker has prepared and predetermined; kept in perfect peace because his mind is stayed on God.

KINDERGARTEN, HEBREW INSTITUTE

The Higher Life of New York City[1]

By Albert Shaw

FOR some years I have been of the opinion that no other great town, anywhere within the bounds of highly civilized countries, could fairly be charged with so great a neglect of the common wants of its population, and with so feeble a sense of common citizenship and of burgher pride and responsibility, as New York. It happened some years ago that I landed at New York after a visit to Constantinople, and I felt strongly impelled to write an article comparing the two cities in some of their outward aspects. In paving, cleanliness, and various other respects, New York seemed scarcely superior to the Sultan's capital. There had been, doubtless, a well-developed local feeling in New York in the earlier history of the town; but the tremendous growth of the period following the Civil War had swallowed up the old New York, while the new metropolis had not arrived at any civic self-consciousness.



MAP OF MULBERRY BEND.

Time is an element for which there can be no substitute. It is not wholly inexplicable that in the twenty-five years from 1865 to 1890 New York should have dealt so impotently with many of those common concerns that make for the happiness and welfare of its people. But the situation has marvelously changed for the better. Citizens who were indifferent, and who seemed lacking in local public spirit, have been converted to a new sense, not only of the stern necessities for local reform, but also of the attractive possibilities that are within reach.

Perhaps nothing illustrates this fact more pertinently than some of the circumstances under which the street-cleaning of New York has of late so marvelously improved. The proper cleansing of the streets, with the satisfactory removal of garbage and waste materials, forms one of the primary factors in the wholesome life of every great town. And inasmuch as the tenement quarters of New York are the most densely populated in the whole world, it is plain that clean streets, courtyards, and passageways are of vital consequence to the health and well-being of New York's inhabitants. Under the new municipal order of things, a number of wealthy and fastidious ladies are acting regularly as volunteer inspectors to assist the Street-Cleaning Department in obtaining the best service and the highest efficiency from its army of sweepers; while in the crowded districts of the East Side hundreds and thousands of little children of foreign parent-age are, by precept and example, doing valiant duty against the vicious local practice of throwing paper and other kinds of waste materials into the streets. The new civic spirit has invaded the school-rooms. Pupils carry home to their parents the new gospel of clean and well-kept streets. The Department of Public Works, recognizing the just claims and needs of the districts most densely crowded with working people, has now entered upon the policy of a rapid extension of asphalt paving where formerly one found only the ill-laid, sunken, and rut-worn stone-block roadways, from which the entire removal of dust and filth was impossible. All this means real and practical progress. New York is very peculiar, not only in its elongated contour, but also in the distribution of its population elements. The more wealthy classes live as a wedge, the sharp point of which may be regarded as reaching down to the Washington Arch at the foot of Fifth Avenue in Washington Square, while the lines of the wedge gradually diverge as they proceed northward. On the lower end of the island, south of Fourteenth Street (except for the entering tip of the wedge), and on the east and west river fronts for a long way to the north, is a vast working-class population, housed altogether in tenement buildings. The sharpness of the contrast of conditions inside and outside of this wedge is destined to grow less by virtue of processes which the new policies in street cleaning and paving serve well to illustrate.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOUSE

---

[1] An introductory article to this series appeared in the preceding Magazine Number of The Outlook (December 21). It was written by Mr. Theodore Roosevelt, on the subject "The Higher Life of American Cities." Other articles will be on "The Higher Life of Chicago," by Mr. Melville E. Stone, Manager of the Associated Press; on Boston, by the Rev. Edward Everett Hale, D.D.; on New Orleans, by Miss Grace King; on Philadelphia, by Mr. Talcott Williams; on St. Louis, by the Rev. John Snyder; and on Buffalo, by the Rev. William Burnet Wright, D.D.

There are advantages as well as disadvantages in that peculiar shape of Manhattan Island which has resulted in such unexampled density of population. The rivers are too deep to become contaminated, and are broad enough to serve as fresh-air ducts. No portion of the tenement-house population is far from the water front. To a limited extent this water front has been utilized for free summer baths. The Battery Park, at the foot of the island, has a glorious sea wall and harbor promenade, and it ministers to the health and happiness of scores of thousands of tenement dwellers. It may well be believed that a much larger use will ultimately be made of the river fronts for purposes of recreation.

Only a few years ago, portions of the lower East Side tenement districts were avowedly slum neighborhoods of such character that it was not deemed safe for well-dressed men and women to pass through the streets even by day. All this is rapidly changing. Comparatively speaking, good order prevails through the tenement districts. One of the inestimable reforms of the past year has been the removal of trucks and other heavy vehicles from the streets at night and on Sundays. The movement for clear streets, smooth streets, and clean streets in New York has now acquired a momentum that nothing can check.

NEW YORK TRADE-SCHOOL, BRICKLAYERS' CLASS

COOPER UNION, BIBLE HOUSE IN BACKGROUND

The European cities, having in large part performed this essential task of street renovation, have begun to lay serious hold of another great problem—that of the reform of the housing conditions of the masses. The difference between decent and healthful house accommodations and the opposite state of things amounts to all the difference between a hopeful social growth and a hideous social decay. The problem is a difficult one in New York, but its solution is not impossible. An essential part of the task lies in a full and deliberate diagnosis of the malady. A valuable study of the facts has been made for us by an official Tenement-House Committee, of which Mr. Richard Watson Gilder was Chairman, and which, after remarkably painstaking inquiries, made report to the Legislature a year ago. Certain changes in the building laws, and other legislative remedies, promptly followed, and the process of condemning the worst of the tenement rookeries has been rendered much easier for the health authorities.

The worst houses in New York are the buildings which were a generation or two ago occupied as the homes of New York's merchant princes, but which have now been made over into tenement-houses, the well-to-do inhabitants having moved a long way up-town. A good illustration is to be found in the building now used as headquarters by the Industrial Christian Alliance in Bleecker Street. This building, perhaps as recently as the outbreak of the Civil War, was still occupied as the home of a prosperous merchant. It was built for the use of a single family. Its mahogany doors and marble mantels still remain. Two years ago it was occupied by not fewer than seventy Italian families, comprising perhaps three hundred persons. It is now the headquarters of one of the best and noblest works of practical philanthropy to be found in the city. The lower part of New York contains thousands of houses thus built for the private occupancy of one family, which have been made over into tenement hives with a family for every room.

The laws now carefully regulate the appointments of new tenement buildings; and while most of them fall far below the ideals advocated by the English and American promoters of so-called model dwellings, they are in the line of progress. The coming decade promises to bring great improvements in the construction of workingmen's dwellings. There are not a few wealthy men and women in New York who are giving earnest thought to the question, and are ready, when their plans have had a little more time to mature, to make large investments in blocks of model tenements. I am willing to be called a confirmed optimist if such a characterization is to be based upon the expressed belief that slum dwellings in New York are not inevitable, but that their abolition is perfectly feasible, that the worst is now already behind us, and that the agencies, public and private, already at work along the lines of improvement will ultimately stamp out all the worst plague-spots.

Towards this great end of the cleansing of the slums, one of the most imperative needs is the creation of a considerable series of small parks and playgrounds scattered through the very heart of the congested tenement districts. A beginning is the difficult step in measures of this kind; and, fortunately, the first victories for small parks in New York have been won. The Legislature and the municipal authorities are definitely committed to the policy. Moderate appropriations have been made. A block of the worst tenement-houses in New York, known as Mulberry Bend, was demolished last year to make way for one of these much-needed little parks. The policy moves with a somewhat discouraging tardiness, but public opinion will in the end sustain the small-parks movement and make it effective. Its great champion is Mr. Jacob A. Riis, a journalist whose daily work has given him an unequaled knowledge of social conditions in the tenement districts of New York, and whose books, articles, and personal efforts have availed, more than the work of any other one man, to acquaint the prosperous half of New York with the rights, needs, and possibilities of the working masses.

THE CHARITIES BUILDING

One of the great needs of New York has been public baths and wash-houses, lavatories, and similar conveniences. Here again the great difficulty was in getting a tangible start. That start has been made. To one of the sub-committees of the Chamber of Commerce's famous "Committee of Seventy" on municipal reform was assigned the subject of public baths. Mr. W. H. Tolman, Ph.D., formerly Secretary of Dr. Parkhurst's City Vigilance League, and now Superintendent of the work of the Society for Improving the Condition of the Poor, acted as secretary of this sub-committee; and Mayor Strong, when his administration began, retained the committee as a Mayor's advisory group for the initiation of the policy. A practical result is the appropriation of $150,000 for the construction, in a crowded tenement district, of a well-appointed model public bath on the best European lines. The establishment will be erected in the present year, and its success is a foregone conclusion. It will be followed by others in a series which will gradually supply the entire population. This is no slight mark of municipal progress, but rather a most hopeful and far-reaching line of new public policy.

One of the most difficult problems in a great town is the proper shelter of the floating population. The old-fashioned common lodging-house is an exceedingly hard thing to regulate. In the English cities the only effectual means of lodging-house reform thus far discovered has been municipal construction and operation. The municipal model lodging-houses have not wholly superseded those conducted by private enterprise, but have set a high standard, and, by virtue of example and by force of competition, have driven the meaner and smaller establishments out of business, compelling private lodging-house keepers to provide large, well-appointed establishments which can readily be inspected by the health authorities and the police. For several reasons needless to discuss (the "floating vote" being one of them), municipal lodging-houses in New York could not secure public indorsement. The feasibility, however, of the provision of model lodging-houses through private enterprise—under motives of public spirit and philanthropy, yet with the assurance of a moderate return upon capital invested—has become clearly evident to those best informed. No fact has more strongly impressed itself upon the minds of Mr. Milbury and his associates in the work of the Industrial Christian Alliance (this work dealing with the most unfortunate element of the floating population) than the great need of a series of model lodging-houses in New York. One of the social experiments of Calvary Church is a lodging-house in East Twenty-third Street (next to its admirable workingmen's club, known as the Teetotum, on Mr. Buchanan's London pattern); and this hostelry is highly successful. It is now well understood that a prominent capitalist and man of public spirit is preparing, out of his own means, to provide for New York a notable series of model lodging-houses. Mr. D. O. Mills, who is engaged in this project, has thoroughly acquainted himself with the British models, and has enlisted the co-operation of Mr. Ernest Flagg, a very brilliant New York architect. The undertaking is destined to form one of the most notable forward steps which New York will have taken in this decade in the direction of a betterment of social conditions and facilities.

The field for educational improvement is everywhere an unlimited one; but New York's educational deficiencies are by comparison painfully conspicuous. Nevertheless, the very fact that this necessity for educational reform is now so appallingly evident is perhaps the most hopeful element in the situation. A few years ago the condition of things had not been laid bare. Few people appreciated the inadequacy of New York's educational methods and opportunities. To-day the work of reform is based upon a better knowledge than ever existed before.

The public schools of New York are sadly inferior. The school system is badly organized, and has hitherto been fatally involved in Tammany politics. Some of the teachers are faithful and enlightened, while many of them are of poor qualifications, and others are lacking both in character and in zeal. The school accommodations are so insufficient that many thousands of children are unable to find places. A majority of the buildings are of ill design, and playgrounds and modern appliances are totally lacking. The movement for public-school reform is, however,

THE HEBREW INSTITUTE

Mrs. Ballington Booth

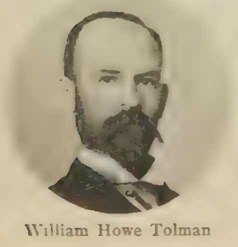
Rev. Edward Judson

J. A. Riis

Rev. C. H. Parkhurst, D.D.

Rev. W. S. Rainsford, D.D.

D. O. Mills



William Howe Tolman

fairly begun. The disagreeable facts have been unsparingly exposed. The necessity for manual training in the schools has been recognized, and some progress has been made in introducing practical lines of instruction. That famous and noble charity, the Children's Aid Society, has for a great many years maintained a series of so-called industrial schools, and given instruction to thousands of poor children, receiving some support out of public funds for its educational work. The same thing is true of one or two other benevolent organizations. It is now proposed that these schools should be amalgamated with the public-school system. The result will be a greater watchfulness on the part of the workers in such organizations as the Children's Aid Society, to the end that the public schools may more completely fill the requirements of the present day.

One of the most hopeful innovations—even though its statistical exhibit thus far is very modest—is the free kindergarten. In order to show what free kindergartens might accomplish, and what place they were destined to fill in the life of the tenement-house population, it was necessary that a private society should make the beginning. A devoted band of men and women have exerted themselves to make this demonstration a success. Prominently identified with the work have been Mr. Gilder, Mr. Hamilton W. Mabie, and Mrs. Kate Douglas Wiggin, now Mrs. Riggs. It was never expected by them that New York could be fully supplied with the free kindergartens of a charitable society. What they aimed at was the ultimate acceptance of the kindergarten as an essential part of the work of the public schools of the city. The school board has at length been converted, and a considerable number of free kindergartens are now maintained as a part of the school system. The number will doubtless steadily increase. New York supports seven or eight thousand drinking-saloons, and not less than ten thousand places where intoxicants are sold. There ought to be ten thousand free kindergarten classes in New York. There will at least be some hundreds of them within a few years.

Another imperative educational need of the city is a series of popular manual-training and practical trade schools and of technical high schools. Thus far the development of facilities for technical instruction and for training in practical trades has been very limited. But some right beginnings have been made, and the city will eventually become aroused to the possibilities of popular instruction in applied art, designing, and all kinds of practical callings. The old Cooper Union, given to the people of New York by Peter Cooper, has served a magnificent end as a people's university and social center. Its art, science, and general classes and its various educational opportunities have made it the central influence in the lives of thousands of young apprentices, clerks, and working people. The Hebrew Institute, far over in the lower East Side of New York, is another social and educational center which is accomplishing a vast work for the young members of that great Jewish population element which is becoming so important a factor in the industrial life of New York. The Hebrew Institute is a powerful agency for the making of good citizens. A long article could be written upon its varied activities and its patriotic and wholesome influences. The Hebrew Technical Institute, the Baron de Hirsch trade-schools, and the manual-training schools which are under the auspices of Dr. Felix Adler and his associates, are helping to supply the need for practical education, and, above all, are serving as object-lessons. The New York Trade-Schools founded by Colonel Auchmuty on the upper East Side also deserve honorable mention; but their fees place their desirable facilities beyond the reach of the poorest lads. Few persons are aware that the best technical school available for New York's young men, and the one most largely patronized, is supported by the State and is a free boarding-school, with a beautiful country location. The terms of admission, however, are a serious drawback. Let us hope that the day will come when it will not be necessary for a sixteen-year-old youth in this great city to be guilty of a crime in order to avail himself of such magnificent facilities for trade instruction and for general education and discipline as are freely supplied by the State to the inmates of the Reformatory Prison at Elmira.

Among the best and most promising agencies in the general educational field are to be included the so-called "Settlements" and the parish work of the "institutional" churches. The University Settlement, maintained by a large number of gentlemen and conducted by Mr. James B. Reynolds as head worker, forms a most excellent center for the practical investigation of social conditions, and at the same time affords opportunity for the carrying on of a series of clubs and classes which enlist the interest of many hundreds of East Side boys and girls, and which, chiefly through the young people, appeal also

Seth Low

Bishop Potter

Mrs. Rylance (Ellen Coe)

Theodore Roosevelt

Rev. A. R. Doyle

J. B. Reynolds

Rev. W. T. Elsing

MADISON SQUARE GARDEN AND TOWER

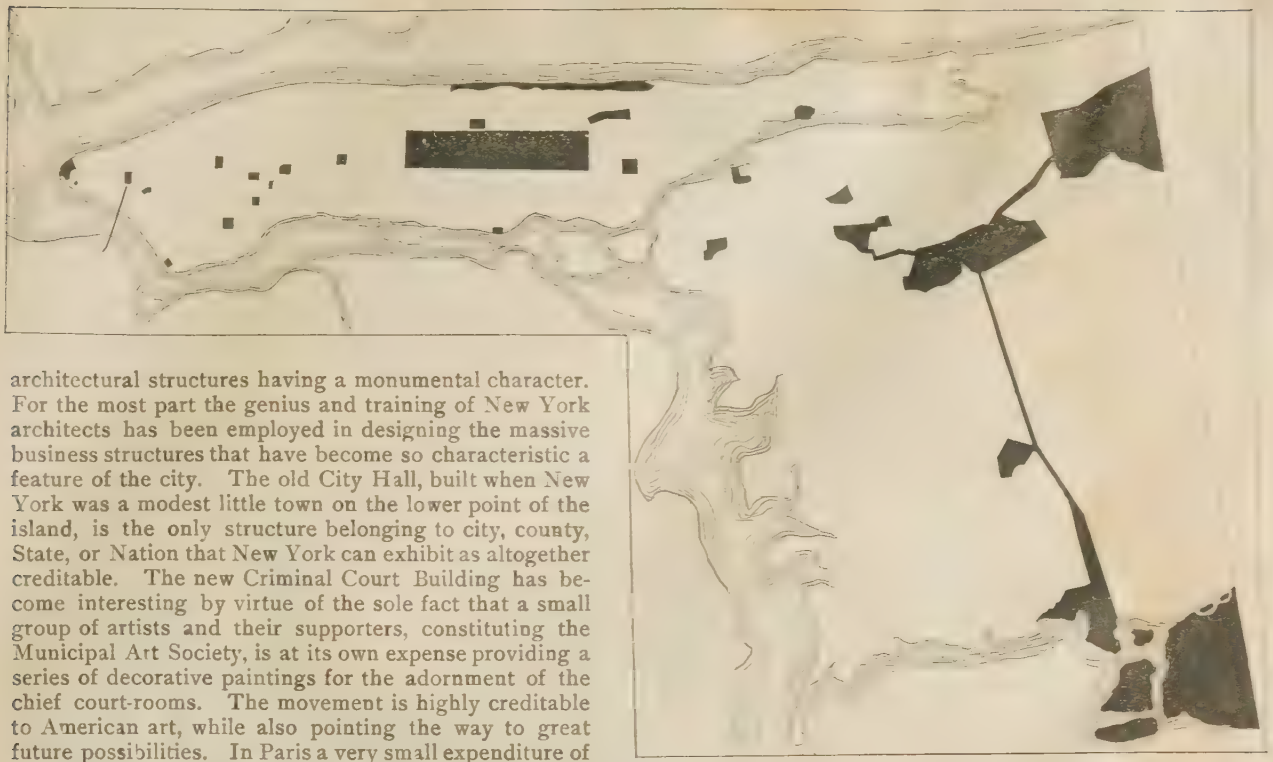
NATHAN HALE STATUE IN CITY HALL PARK

to the parents. It is a similar work that the College Settlement in Rivington Street, maintained and conducted by educated women, performs in its vicinity. The usefulness of these social centers is constantly increasing. They promote the progress of the community in all kinds of ways. They are in touch with relief work, with the reforms of the street-cleaning and public works departments, with the police and health authorities, with public-school work, and with all sorts of movements for the betterment of the city. In a somewhat similar way a number of churches have so organized their practical work as to come into touch with the whole life of the people about them. Thus, on the East Side, the Settlements and various churches, Catholic, Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Methodist, and others, under such leaders as the Rev. Dr. Rainsford and the Rev. John B Devins, have formed a "Federation of East Side Workers," with the result of various useful forms of co-operation. St. George's Church, under Dr. Rainsford's vigorous administration, is famous for its many-sided social activity. In like manner the Rev. Dr. Judson, south of Washington Square, through the agencies which have been called into existence around the Judson Memorial Baptist Church as a center, is carrying on an admirable work. St. Bartholomew's parish, under Dr. Greer's administration and with the benefit of the liberal gifts of such public-spirited men as Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt, furnishes another conspicuous illustration of what the modern church may accomplish when it conceives of its mission as a broad one and enters upon a large practical policy. The great Catholic parish of the Paulist Fathers, located in the densely crowded upper West Side, has been eminently successful in its educational work and as a center of good social influence; and various other instances might readily be given of individual New York churches which have become centers of social activity. Out of all these sound and earnest beginnings of educational and social work in the crowded parts of New York there is going to be evolved at length some well-distributed and complete system that will meet the entire situation. Many years will be required, but the outcome is not doubtful.

Meanwhile, the opportunities of New York in the sphere of the higher education are constantly improving, and they afford a brilliant outlook. The high ridge between the Hudson and Harlem Rivers north of Central Park has been selected as the new site for Columbia College, for its protégé Barnard College, for its other protégé the Teachers' College, for the Protestant Episcopal Cathedral, for the great St. Luke's Hospital, and for some other institutions which will aid in the general result of creating a splendid center for the higher ethical, educational, and scientific interests of New York, besides affording an opportunity for noteworthy architectural achievements. The old "University of New York" has also gone northward and domiciled itself upon an attractive eminence overlooking the Hudson, now fittingly designated as "University Heights." A strong tendency has been shown during recent years towards the affiliation in New York of agencies making for the advancement of learning and the promotion of the intellectual and æsthetic life. The wealthy citizens also show an encouraging disposition to contribute toward the promotion of public institutions of learning and culture. A notable instance is the Metropolitan Museum of Art, which, through the liberality of the citizens of New York, is rapidly assuming rank as one of the world's important galleries. Another instance is the American Museum of Natural History, which is much visited by the young people of New York, and which has a rapidly developing scientific value. Popular lecture courses are maintained in connection with both of these. For several seasons Columbia College has co-operated with these institutions and with Cooper Union in providing the people of New York with lecture courses in various fields of science and art. New York has never followed the example of Boston and Chicago in providing a great public library, and the lack of such an institution has been sorely felt. The want is likely to be supplied, however, through the amalgamation of the Astor and Lenox Libraries with the Tilden Trust. Besides the resulting great reference library, it is expected that there will also be developed in connection with the institution a circulating library, with branches, somewhat after the Boston plan.

It is to be regretted that the ground plan of New York does not lend itself to any very advantageous placing of public buildings, or of architectural structures having a monumental character. For the most part the genius and training of New York architects has been employed in designing the massive business structures that have become so characteristic a feature of the city. The old City Hall, built when New York was a modest little town on the lower point of the island, is the only structure belonging to city, county, State, or Nation that New York can exhibit as altogether creditable. The new Criminal Court Building has become interesting by virtue of the sole fact that a small group of artists and their supporters, constituting the Municipal Art Society, is at its own expense providing a series of decorative paintings for the adornment of the chief court-rooms. The movement is highly creditable to American art, while also pointing the way to great future possibilities. In Paris a very small expenditure of municipal money annually devoted to the promotion of art is securing for the public buildings, including the school-houses, a wonderful array of wall designs illustrating historical and local subjects, and adding very much to the æsthetic and educational wealth of the community. If New York's beginnings in this direction are small, they are nevertheless of commendable quality.

THE CITY HALL



THE PARK SYSTEM OF NEW YORK CITY
(The black spots represent the Parks)

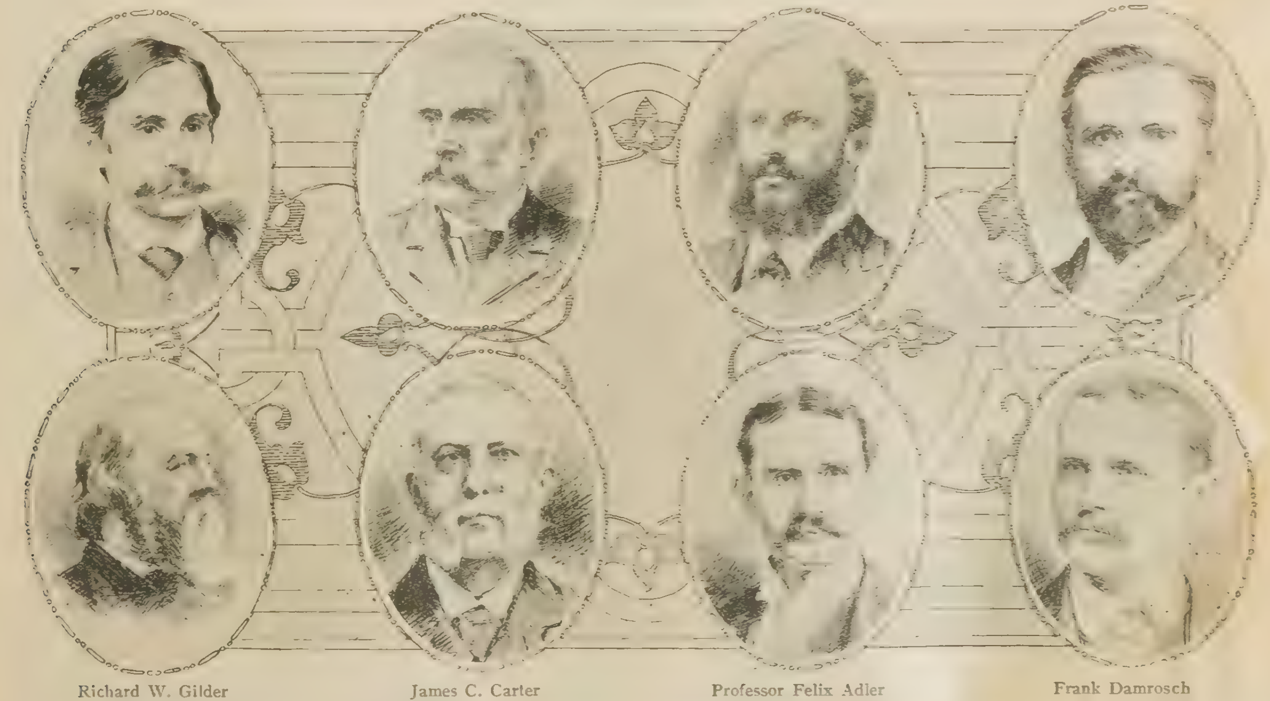
The story of public statuary and sculpture in New York is not a pleasant one. Since most of the attempts at public statues are so bad, it is fortunate that the aggregate number occupying conspicuous places is small as yet. Happily, the best American sculptors of our own day are men of sound taste and thorough attainments. The municipal authorities are learning to trust the judgment of the sculptors, and there is comparatively little danger, henceforth, that inartistic work will find acceptance. The Washington Arch, at the foot of Fifth Avenue, is an admirable possession, while sculptors like St. Gaudens and MacMonnies have begun to give us statues that are worth a journey to inspect. Clearly, New York has begun to give evidence of its growing importance as an art center. The tendency is toward the union of æsthetic forces, and towards a larger and more generous mutual understanding between the art leaders and the community at large. What is true as to the improving outlook for architecture, sculpture, and painting is also discernible in the field of music. It would appear that New York can support the opera without any governmental subvention. The Carnegie Music Hall, and all that its existence and uses represent, is also a good sign of progress.

I have not intended that this brief and sketchy attempt at an appreciation of some of the varied elements and factors



Richard W. Gilder
Frederick Law Olmsted

James C. Carter
Elbridge T. Gerry

Professor Felix Adler
Rev. David H. Greer

Frank Damrosch
John P. Peters

THE METROPOLITAN MUSEUM OF ART

which are helping to swell the rising tide of New York's progress should give much attention in a specific way to the machinery of municipal government, the machinery of church organizations, or the machinery of the standard charitable and philanthropic societies. The readers of The Outlook are not in need of such information. It is enough, then, for me to remark that under the new administration, with such officials as Mr. Roosevelt, the municipal life has received a great uplift. The recent history of some of the municipal departments is teaching New York what a wealth of unanticipated blessing lies in the mere fact of an honest and disinterested city government. The influence upon public and private morals of the new order of things at police headquarters is exhibiting itself in unexpected ways. It is penetrating to the very foundations of the community's life. As for the churches, it may suffice to remark that they are concerning themselves with the study of the actual conditions of New York life as never before, and that their social usefulness and their influence for good citizenship are plainly increasing rather than diminishing. Dr. Parkhurst's stirring work has counted for much toward this end.

The great charitable societies, moreover, show themselves capable of a considerable degree of adaptation. I have already alluded to several of these. The Society for Improving the Condition of the Poor, with Mr. Cutting at its head and Dr. Tolman as its executive officer, is engaged in a varied social work of uncommon interest and value, which includes public baths, summer outings, vacation schools on a large scale, an admirable free labor bureau, and a dozen other things out of the ordinary lines and of timely significance. Its central offices are in the attractive new United Charities Building—which, by the way, constitutes another of New York's social centers of first importance. Here one finds the offices of the Charity Organization Society, which, besides the well-understood primary functions of such an association, is also carrying on other interesting branches of work. One of its most important lines is its Penny Provident Fund. Several hundred receiving places are maintained for its savings system, and it thus supplies an important incentive to thrift.

THE WASHINGTON ARCH AND THE JUDSON MEMORIAL CHURCH

In distinctive relief work along established lines of charitable aid the Organization Society holds the guiding place, and the Society for Improving the Condition of the Poor works in immediate harmony with it. The really significant fact about the charity work of New York is the practical manner in which it has adopted the broad modern view that charity must not pauperize; that the individual family may be greatly benefited by an improvement in the general social conditions and facilities of the town.

THE OLD CITY COLLEGE

It is the policy of the charitable societies to favor such movements for self-culture as Miss Grace Dodge's Working-Girls' Clubs, to promote forethought and co-operation in such forms as mutual benefit funds for insurance against accident or illness, and in a hundred ways to help people to help themselves.

I have long been strongly of the opinion that the savings-bank system, on some plan or other, needs a tremendous amplification in New York. We have in the Bowery Savings Bank, the Bank for Savings, the Emigrant Industrial, and several other well-known institutions, a group of savings-banks doing an enormous business in the aggregate. There would be no advantage in endeavoring to establish a municipal savings bank system in competition with these existing institutions. But it has seemed to me that, through some sort of federation among the existing banks, with the countenance of State and municipality, the help of leading financiers, and the support of the principal charitable organizations, it might be possible to invade all the tenement-house districts and all the suburban neighborhoods with a great number of branch savings-banks. And together with these there should be provided the branches of a great pawnbroking shop, or mont-de-piété, which ought also to be under the management of a society of financiers and philanthropists, with the Mayor and certain other municipal representatives as ex-officio members of the board. Happily, the Provident Loan Association, with its office in the new Church Missions Building, was formed last year under Dr. Greer's direction, and it has entered with caution, but determination, into this very field of reformed pawnbroking. Its experience as a pioneer will be invaluable, but its scope ought to be vastly enlarged. New York urgently needs not less than fifty branch offices of a central pawnbroking institution managed on as broad and beneficent lines as the mont-de-piété of Paris.

There was a time when it seemed to me that municipal reform in New York promised to make headway only slowly, because the reformers appeared to have in mind nothing but the negative task of defeating Tammany. They seemed lacking in constructive programmes and in progressive municipal ideals. Their point of view, however, has been shifting almost as rapidly as any reasonable optimist could desire. After all, good government will inevitably seek to accomplish the ends for which good government is adapted. The reasonable hope that New York is henceforth to have both honest government and also progressive policies is beginning to act powerfully on the minds of many citizens. Not to mention with any detail such organizations as the City Club, the Good Government Clubs, the branches of the City Vigilance League, and other non-partisan organizations for the betterment of civic affairs, it is evident that among rich men and poor men alike there is springing up a practical faith in the possibilities of that Greater New York which is to be great not merely in area, population, and commercial resources, but also greater by far than heretofore in its means and methods for promoting the welfare of all its people. It is also perceived that no man's contribution toward the general end is to be despised, but that the great millionaire, the literary man, the guilds of artists, the labor unions, the societies of women, the down-town business organizations, and the poorest school-children, as well as political bodies and churches, may all contribute very appreciably. I have now, therefore, high expectations for the advancement of the one great community which for a long time seemed to me the worst governed, the most unenlightened, and in many ways the least hopeful of all the great population-centers of the civilized world.

ALBERT SHAW

Albert Shaw

Dr. Albert Shaw, who has become widely known as the editor of the "Review of Reviews," as a student of topics connected with municipal government, and as a writer upon such subjects, is a young man of Western birth, tall and slender in figure, with a keen eye, a quick and rather nervous manner, and features expressing in an unusual degree intelligence, energy, and character. Born in Ohio, the central West, Dr. Shaw represents a catholicity of feeling and knowledge which very few Americans possess. He knows the whole country. He is not distinctly an Eastern man, a Western man, or a man of the Pacific slope: he is a man of America. He knows the characteristics of each section, its strength and its weakness. With New England blood in his veins, but with the energizing influences of the West about his boyhood, Dr. Shaw graduated at Iowa College, the oldest institution of its class west of the Mississippi. During his college life the future journalist and writer devoted a great deal of time to the study of literature and of literary style, disclosing very early two qualities which are pre-eminently characteristic of him to-day, lucidity and directness. After graduation Dr. Shaw began his professional life as editor of the Grinnell "Herald," a position which enabled him to master all the mechanical and routine work of journalism.

His aims were not the aims of the ordinary journalist. He saw with unusual clearness the possibilities of his profession, and he saw also that he needed a wider educational basis. His interest in social and political topics was the interest of a man of philosophic mind, eager to learn the principles and not simply to record the varying aspects from day to day. In order the better to secure the equipment of which he felt the need, he entered the Johns Hopkins University and took a graduate course. It was during his residence in Baltimore that he met Professor Bryce, who recognized his rare ability and intelligence, and who used his unusually large knowledge of social and political conditions in the country. While carrying on his special studies at the Johns Hopkins University, Dr. Shaw joined the editorial staff of the Minneapolis daily "Tribune." After receiving the degree of Ph.D. in 1884, he removed permanently to Minneapolis, and took his place at the head of the staff of the "Tribune." His work almost at once attracted attention. Its breadth, its thoroughness, its candor, and its ability were of a kind which made themselves recognized on the instant. Four years later Dr. Shaw spent a year and a half studying social and political conditions in Europe, traveling extensively and devoting much time to the examination of the condition of municipalities. It was this study which has borne fruit in the two volumes on Municipal Government which have come from the press of the Century Company, and which have given Dr. Shaw the first rank as an authority on these matters. When the "Review of Reviews" was established in this country in 1891, Dr. Shaw became its editor, and his success in the management of this very important periodical has justified the earlier expectations entertained by his friends, for he has given the "Review of Reviews" a commanding position. He is one of the very few journalists in this country who treat their work from the professional standpoint, who are thoroughly equipped for it, and who regard themselves as standing in a responsible relation to a great and intelligent public. Dr. Shaw's presentation of news is pre-eminently full, candid, and unpartisan; his discussion of principles is broad-minded, rational, and persuasive. He is entirely free from the short-sighted partisanship of the great majority of newspaper editors, and he appreciates to the full the power of intelligent, judicial statement. His opinions, for this reason, carry great weight, and it is not too much to say that he has not his superior in the field of American journalism.

THREE POEMS
BY EMILY DICKINSON

READERS of Miss Emily Dickinson's verse and of her letters do not need to be told that she belongs among the writers who cannot be classified. The note of individuality, which is so distinct throughout the entire history of New England, has been nowhere more definitely struck than in her verse and prose. During the latter years of her life she was a recluse, and her thought shows singular insulation. She was solitary, but her solitude was populous with thought, imagination, sympathy, kindness, and aspiration. She seemed to owe very little to any literary parentage, although she once said that Keats and the Brownings, Ruskin, Sir Thomas Browne, and Revelation were her books. "I went to school," she writes, "but in the manner of the phrase had no education. When a little girl I had a friend who taught me immortality, but venturing too near, himself, he never returned. . . . You ask of my companions. Hills, sir, and the sundown, and a dog large as myself that my father brought me. They are better than beings, because they know but do not tell; and the noise of the pool at noon excels my piano." Spontaneity, flashes of insight, epigrammatic phrase, are characteristic of Miss Dickinson's prose and verse. She saw things in detached flashes of light. She never took the trouble to co-ordinate the objects of her vision, and they come before us isolated and detached as they came to her. She is often abrupt, sometimes inconsequential, but she has thoughts; and at times these thoughts take on a wonderful felicity of speech. These qualities are admirably illustrated in the three poems by Miss Dickinson here published for the first time. The portrait of Miss Dickinson as a child is reproduced, by permission, from the book "Letters of Emily Dickinson" (Roberts Brothers, Boston).

Immortality

This world is not conclusion;
A sequel stands beyond,
Invisible as music,
But positive as sound.

It beckons and it baffles,—
Philosophies don't know,
And through a riddle at the last
Sagacity must go.

To prove it puzzles scholars;
To gain it, men have worn
Contempt of generations,
And crucifixion borne.

Sufficiency

'Tis little I could care for pearls,
Who own the ample sea,
Or brooches, when the Emperor
With rubies pelteth me,

Or gold, who am the Prince of Mines,
Or diamonds, when I see
A diadem to fit a throne
Continual crowning me.

Departing

We learn in the retreating
How vast a one
Was recently among us;
A perished sun

Endears in the departure
How doubly more,
Than all the golden presence
It was before!

MISS CLARA BARTON
The Latest Photograph

Clara Barton and the Red Cross

By Myrtis Willmot Barton

MISS BARTON AT THE TIME OF OUR CIVIL WAR

The story goes that toward the end of the sixteenth century there lived in Lancashire five brothers, who decided that not only was Lancashire too small, but England not quite large enough, to hold them all; so one went to Ireland, and from him come the Bartons of Grove; another wended his way to the land of the canny Scots, where in time the name became changed to Bartan; a third crossed over to France, where his descendants bear the name of Bartin; a fourth settled in southern England, under the name of Burton; and, after fifty years, the younger son of that Barton who remained in the old home, one Marmaduke by name, was seized with the wandering spirit of his race, and, coming to America within a dozen years after the landing at Plymouth, founded the family of which Clara Barton is the brightest light. Thus she comes from a race of sturdy pioneers and volunteer soldiers; the very name Barton in the Anglo-Saxon means "defender of the town."

Her father, Captain Stephen (one of the youngest sons of Dr. Stephen Barton and beautiful Dorothy Moore), was a man prominent in the business and political life of his town and State; until incapacitated by age, he was always chosen "Moderator" to preside at town meetings; he was also a captain of the militia—being a soldier by training and nature, having served for three years in the Indian wars by the time he was of age; and, in short, was a man universally respected and esteemed for his bravery and goodness of heart. The family into which my Aunt Clara was born was already a grown-up one, she being the youngest, by a dozen years, of five children. With her two sisters and eldest brother all teachers themselves, it is not surprising that she began her school life at the age of three, riding to and from the rude little building on the shoulder of her big brother Stephen, who was a teacher there, and studying quietly in classes by the side of boys and girls many years her senior. She has told me she never remembers possessing a doll, her loving care having been lavished on the pets of the household—a sick cat or dog appealing more strongly to her sympathies than anything else. The only inanimate playthings she had were wooden soldiers fashioned by her brothers, and with these her father would amuse and interest her, as together they fought over the battles of his younger days, until she felt all the fire and enthusiasm of a soldier following the lead of Mad Anthony Wayne, and learned lessons in military tactics and war as though in preparation for the life before her.

Lest I give the idea that her time was devoted entirely to books, I must speak of her outdoor life, for she was one of those fleet-footed, agile girls, strong of limb, clear-headed, and perfectly at home in a saddle. Her younger brother, David, instead of being studiously inclined, as were the others, was passionately fond of horses; so that when she was but a wee child he would put her on the back of a young horse, while he, on another, would hold her hand, and together they would canter around the fields, in and out among the other horses, broken and unbroken. Those who know her now will understand what a sensitive, shrinking girl she must have been, never thrusting herself forward, and avoiding, rather than seeking, strangers; although in her own home she was gay and light-hearted, full of fun and jokes, with the keen sense of humor which she has never outgrown, and the power of making the drollest speeches in a quiet, irresistible way; the knack of remembering, and telling well, a good story has always been one of her greatest charms. Remembering her shyness and modesty, one can imagine how soon it must have been tried, when, as a little nine-year-old girl, she went away from home to board in the family of the teacher under whom she was to study. The love and respect she bore this man are things of which she cannot speak now with dry eyes, and his sayings and advice she remembers and often repeats to this day.

THE NEW YORK RED CROSS HOSPITAL

Thus the years passed, first in study, then at home caring for a sick brother—nursing him through a dangerous illness though a mere child herself; and, when scarce entering girlhood, away with a school of her own to teach, and later at a college for young women, until she came back to assist her brothers in the counting-rooms of the mills they had built. She was always wise, always helpful—going home when needed, and, when the work in hand was done, going away to earn a little more by her teaching or bookkeeping, and with those earnings to further educate herself—taking a few lessons in one thing here, a few more in another branch there—until she went to Washington as one of the first women in a department of the Government.

Her labors in the Civil War have been recounted so often and so minutely that I shall not undertake to describe them again in so brief a sketch as this. The story of her courage and self-sacrifice the world can never know in its fullness—except as she consents to give it us in the autobiography upon which she is now at work.

In Miss Barton's home in Washington is a collection of Andersonville relics—rude cups and plates, and still ruder tools, all made by those poor prisoners; and these, while each speaking of heartache and misery, bear also, to those who know how to read between the lines, a story of that melancholy comfort that makes a woman rejoice, even though her loved ones be dead, in knowing that they were given Christian burial, and that a woman's hand, with pity and tenderness, marked their last resting-place. To see Miss Barton before a group of Grand Army men shows how she must have worked and ministered through those long, hard years of war to have so won the esteem and admiration of these strong men.

Clara Barton's connection with the Red Cross began when, at the end of the sixties, worn out and broken down in health, she went to Switzerland to rest and grow strong again, only to find there more work to do, and, finding it, to so enter into it, heart and soul, as never to lay it down. At the breaking out of the Franco-Prussian War there came to her, in her Swiss cottage, several members of the International Committee of the Red Cross, en route for the scene of action. They explained their errand, begged her to join them, and finally so filled her with enthusiasm that, ill as she was, she promised to follow them within a fortnight.

She was at once presented to the sweet, unassuming daughter of Kaiser William I., the Grand Duchess of Baden, who, with her ladies of the court around her, was working as hard and unceasingly as any simple woman of our own land worked during our great conflict; and as they worked together, these two women found themselves mutually helpful—my aunt bringing forward her practical experience, and the Grand Duchess being able to teach her the methods and objects of the Red Cross, its workings and its ways; so that, all

A RED CROSS NURSE

Miss Bettina Hofker, Sister Superintendent of the New York Red Cross Hospital through her months there, in the field, at court, or in the hospitals, while she was doing good in her own way, she was acquiring the knowledge necessary for the fulfillment of her ultimate promise—to work unceasingly until she should have brought her own country into the Treaty; for the international character of the Red Cross is a feature of the greatest importance, though often forgotten.

It would be impossible to enter here into a detailed account of her life during the Franco-Prussian strife; it would be too long a story, however interesting, to follow her about from hospital to battle-field, and from Strassburg to Paris, which latter place she entered the day after the siege was raised; but, as an illustration of her work there, and as showing the sorrows of the weaker sex during war, there stands out in my mind one picture. Among the recollections of a dozen years ago I remember seeing in a little Frenchwoman's studio a large, unfinished painting of a scene in a Strassburg hospital. It was a picture to appeal to my childish eyes, for there stood my aunt with her head turned away toward a baby in a woman's arms, while women leaned toward her to catch a word, and children clung to her skirts, and one little boy, half afraid, had lifted a corner of her gown to his lips. I hope that picture may be finished some day. The gown in this picture, by the way, is green, my aunt's favorite color. The story is told that one of her sisters once said: "When Clara goes to town to buy a brown dress, a brown dress I know she will get, for Clara always does as she says. But, one way or another, that dress always manages to turn green before she can get home."

I have said that as regards the international character of the Red Cross so little seems to be known; the name, as a general rule, brings to people's minds a hazy idea of "trained nurses," and "something to do with hospitals," when in reality it stands for a great Treaty entered into by the nations of the earth for the purpose of alleviating the sufferings of war. It shows that, although that glorious day when war shall be over and all difficulties settled by arbitration has not yet come, still the time has arrived when a wounded man is no longer left to die on the field, nor shut up in a prison to expire little by little—that the time has even now come when the sick and wounded of the enemy are cared for with the same tenderness shown one's own.

Under the flag of the Red Cross all ground is neutral; all persons lawfully wearing its brassard can go unmolested; in its hospitals are found friend and foe, side by side, with every thought of personal strife left outside its walls, and only the motto of humanity and neutrality in mind. One by one, nearly every civilized nation of the world has accepted the invitation to enter, becoming a party to the great treaty; and the reasons that the United States did not join sooner are, first, that the idea was never presented to the people themselves, the knowledge of the treaty never having gone beyond the State Department; and, second, that the possibility of war for us was so remote that our Government seemed to think it a useless step until the new feature known as the American Amendment was suggested, whereby relief was to be given to the victims of the terrible national calamities so frequent here; this addition to the original scope of the treaty, in its purely war character, made it appeal more fully to our people and our officials. Since the adhesion of the United States, in 1882, several succeeding nations, in joining, have added the American Amendment to the provisions of the treaty.

It is a long story, that of those ten years between the close of the Continental war and the final accession of the United States—a long story, full of discouragements, false hopes, and disappointments, full of weary months, I may say years, of nervous prostration, when my aunt was so ill that it seemed as if she were a weak little child, and had to grow up again. But, as soon as she was able, she was up from her sick-bed and in Washington, ready to begin the work to which she had pledged herself; and, at last, through the interest and co-operation of those great statesmen, Garfield, Windom, and Blaine, steps were taken necessary for making the United States one of the Red Cross nations—the untimely death of the martyred President leaving the honor of signing the treaty to his successor, President Arthur, who affixed his signature and made proclamation of the fact in 1882.

We have had no wars in the past fifteen years to call the Red Cross into its original field of action, but in the time of suffering from the elements it has come nobly to the front, doing the work of humanity in the quiet, unostentatious way characteristic of its American President; asking nothing, distributing what was given with a wise and generous, though frugal, hand, bringing order out of chaos, feeding the hungry, and clothing the destitute, at first; teaching the people to help themselves rather than making them objects of charity; so that, in every case where the Red Cross has quitted a field, it has left the mass of the people better off than before the disaster—better off because of the practical lessons inculcated as well as from the gifts distributed.

RATION DAY, ST. HELENA ISLAND

It has worked at such times as those of the forest fires of Michigan, the Texas drought, the Mount Vernon cyclone, the Johnstown flood, twice on the Ohio at the time of the floods, for ten months at the Sea Islands after the cyclone and flood there; and, after being at home but one year, preparations are even now being made whereby, if so decided, Miss Barton will start with a few of her staff for the East, to carry food, money, and clothes to the suffering Armenians. This, if undertaken, will be a new and terrible kind of work—an undertaking full of peril and danger, and one requiring the head of a diplomat and a heart of courage, as well as the hand and soul of a philanthropist.

Altogether, the work of the Red Cross here has been of a different nature from that in other countries; that it is not conducted on quite the same plans and principles as in Germany or Italy, for instance, is due to the difference between the governments of those countries and ours, the difference in the character of the people, and to the entirely different kind of work needed. That there are so few authorized sub-societies is owing mainly to lack of knowledge and even to indifference on the part of many. In New York City there is, however, an association under its direct patronage, which, since its founding, has done good and faithful work in its nursing among the poor, as well as in its hospital and training-school, which is to supply all the nurses used by the National Red Cross.

GEORGE KENNAN
First Vice-President of the Red Cross Society

The New York branch, of which Mrs. Charles H. Raymond is President, is at present located on One Hundredth Street, between the Boulevard and West End Avenue, and is under the supervision of Miss Bettina Hofker, who, although but a young girl, has won laurels for her self-sacrifice and devotion while working in the slums of this city, before she undertook the larger and more responsible position of training "Sisters" for true Red Cross work. It will be a gratification to the people of New York to know that their institution is the especial pride of Miss Barton; it being begun and carried out on the genuine Red Cross ideas, brought straight from Germany.

The American National Red Cross has its headquarters at Miss Barton's home in Washington—in a house well fitted, because of its location and history, to be the center of such a work as that of the Red Cross. On the corner of Seventeenth and F Streets, across the street from the War, State, and Navy Departments, and on the opposite corner from the famous old Winder Building, stands a large, old-fashioned house, a place of great, high-studded rooms—plain, comfortable, staid, and substantial, but with a total absence of any suggestion of luxury. Here live Clara Barton and the Red Cross. The house was built in Jefferson's time, and for years was the private residence of General Jessup, of the old army; then, during the Civil War, it was the headquarters of the army of Generals Halleck and Grant; and my aunt has pointed out to me the room in which, for months, lived the famous Indian, General Eli Parker, and has told me a story of his singular life and ways. In another room General Horace Porter had his office, and out of General Grant's great room was that of Colonel Dent, while many other well-known names are associated with the various rooms.

It is a house in which to remember half-forgotten stories and bits of history, each and all suggested by the rooms themselves or their contents. Thus, in a vase in the reception-room one sees a large bunch of wild rice, gathered and dried by my aunt at the siege of Fort Wagner—gathered from a spot over which had rained shot and shell for a whole long day; close beside it stands a modern photograph of her Highness the Grand Duchess of Baden; while upstairs, in my aunt's own room, there hangs, in its quaint frame of twenty-five years ago, a larger portrait of her, showing the sweet, womanly face as my aunt first knew it in its youthful beauty. Again, one finds some curious and beautiful pillows of Russia leather in all colors, sent home at the time of the relief work of our Red Cross during the Russian famine; and in an out-of-the-way corner, as far from being on exhibition as possible, lies a bit of wood from the fence of the dead-line within Andersonville Prison.

The walls of the corridors are hung with banners and immense flags of all nations. Norway and Sweden greet one upon opening the door; on either side hang the crown of Italy and the cross of St. George and St. Andrew; in the drawing-room are two beautiful flags of silk—the dainty blue and white of Greece surmounted by the silver ball and crescent; and the flag of brave little Switzerland, of which our Red Cross is the reverse. The most magnificent of these is the enormous black eagle of Prussia; in the upper corridor hangs the flag of United Germany, the large eagle with its circle of smaller ones; then come the tri-color of France, the Russian ensign, and many others, all sent as personal gifts in appreciation and acknowledgment of her service under the one little flag to which they all bow.

As is the case with all the rest of the house, Miss Barton's office is devoid of useless luxuries; it is plain, simple, and devoted entirely to business. Here she works from early in the morning until late at night, answering personally and by dictation the enormous daily correspondence from all parts of the world, transacting business of all kinds, working quietly and steadily for hours, forgetting to eat, and, one is tempted to say, to sleep as well, for she is always the first one up in the morning, and frequently works until away into the small hours of the night.

The question naturally arises, How has she preserved her strength and youth so marvelously? The only answer to my mind seems to lie in the fact that she is so quiet and calm and that she never wastes her strength, coupled with a thoroughly acquired knowledge of how to live and keep well; and as for sleep, she has the happy faculty of being able, at any time and in any place, to curl up, sometimes in the most cramped positions, and sleep for fifteen minutes, then, waking, to take up the conversation or work just where it was dropped and go on.

The letters she receives are most curious, interesting, and touching; all of them showing love—and all receive the same kind attention. Indeed, I have seen her, on several occasions, toss aside, until she had more time, some delicate letter in the unintelligible fashionable hand of the day—from some stranger who thinks she has more time to study over the writer's words than the latter has to write them distinctly in the first place—only to take up reverently and lovingly a poor, misspelled, badly written, much-blotted letter of love and thanks written by a Southern negro whom the Red Cross had helped at some time.

Questions are frequently asked concerning Miss Barton's religious belief; on that score I can say that she comes of a family of most liberal-minded people, and this, combined with her life, has led her to adopt the true Red Cross spirit, making no distinction in race, nationality, nor creed—the word "humanity" embracing everything—so that it may well be said of her, as Thomas Paine said of himself:

The world is my country,
To do good is my religion.

STEPHEN E. BARTON
Second Vice-President of the Red Cross Society

That she is a fluent writer every one knows; but not every one knows of the dainty bits of verse she has been in the habit of writing since her girlhood. She also adds to her other accomplishments that of reading aloud most charmingly, and sometimes gives her family and a few friends delightful treats in that way.

At home, as in the field, she is never idle; and when traveling is never distressed by inconveniences by the way. I have journeyed with her throughout the Western country, in parts unsettled and wild; I have ridden miles with her over rough Western trails while she told of roads during war-times—roads rough and unbroken, with mud to the hubs of the wheels, over which she rode on a springless wagon, the only woman, with a band of mutinous men, when to show one sign of fear or fatigue would have meant failure to her; and when the wagon stuck and the men refused to help, delicate little woman that she was, she was out in the mud with her own shoulder to the wheel, until, for very shame, the men fell to work with a will.

I have seen her in camp, where she has taught us how really comfortable and delightful an out-of-door life can be made without any of the conveniences of modern appliances.

Again, on the Atlantic coast in her native State, I have seen her in a State's prison, in a group of the most hardened, obstreperous of women offenders, still quiet and gentle, but controlling them so that not one would disobey her, and even the most ugly had a word of praise. This was at Sherborn, Mass., to which place General Butler asked her to come as Superintendent of the Woman's Reformatory Prison for the year 1883. She, remembering his kindness and goodness to her and her family in the years gone by, gladly went to help straighten out one of the tangles of his Governorship. Her home in Dansville was another place where for a few years she was able to live in quiet, peace, and retirement among the trees and vines of that beautiful spot on the hillside, resting in preparation for the greater work of after years.

In conclusion, I can say that if Clara Barton ever had a motto or watchword, she has kept it so modestly in the background that even I never heard of it; but her idea of life, I often think, lies in what she once said to me when, with the feverish haste and impatience of youth, I was longing for great things to do. "Be always calm, my child," she said; "keep yourself quiet and in restraint, reserve your energies, doing those little things that lie in your way, each one as well as you can, saving your strength, so that when God does call you to do something good and great you will not have wasted your force and strength with useless strivings, but will be ready to do the work quickly and well. Go slowly, my child—and keep ready."

Clara Barton: An Impression

Recently a member of the editorial staff of The Outlook visited Miss Barton at her Washington office. The personal impression received will supplement the preceding article.

The first impression Miss Barton makes on a stranger is that of a woman of perfect repose. The expression of her face, the quiet of her manner, and the exquisitely modulated voice are so harmonious, so restful, that the thought that this woman was born to command, to lead, to endure hardship, to witness suffering, seems past belief. Miss Barton is a little below medium height; her figure is almost girlish. As I saw her, she wore a dress of some dark material, with a feather boa about her neck. Her hair was parted in the middle, and combed down over her ears, and brought in a soft puff just above and back of the ear; two side-combs were in the hair, a little below the part on either side. The woman reveals the spirit of motherhood in her face. It is the true mother who sees in all the world, everywhere, the objects for her ministrations. Her sentences constantly reveal this spirit. Miss Barton is a charming talker when roused. The listener sits back, in the dim light of the stately room that makes a fitting frame for the woman, and listens, if wise. The simple directness of Miss Barton is one of her greatest charms. She cannot believe that the great, busy world is interested enough in her to want to know the story of her life. She is not important; her work is all that interests the world, she says, with positiveness. Doubtless it has often occurred to thousands, as it did to this special visitor, that they would like to know why Miss Barton had consecrated her life to the Red Cross movement. When the question was asked, Miss Barton looked surprised.

"The work was put into my hands. I was asked by the Geneva Commission to take it up. They thought I could do it. They wanted me to interest the United States Government. I said I would think about it. I decided to do it. I was not led; I was not standing around looking for something to do; these people wanted some work done, they asked me, I did it. That is the whole story.

"About this Armenian Mission. The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions asked us to take the work. We made two conditions. First, that all the Boards should agree that we were the ones to go into Armenia with relief; we did not want to take the work up to find that other bodies had chosen other agents. If all the great bodies were agreed that we were the ones to do the work, then one of our conditions would be met.

"The second condition was that there should be funds. We would not agree to go into a field to give relief to suffering people unless there were funds to provide that relief. We were asked how much we would require. My financial secretary responded by asking a question. 'You are in touch with the people of Armenia; you know better than any one else the number of people who need relief; it is said that 350,000 people are in danger of starvation before their crops will be ready. How much would you think necessary?' The response was, 'About $500,000 to relieve and keep relieved until danger is over.' You see the situation. Now, if only part of that sum is put at our disposal, we dare to go forward.

"If we cannot reach them, then we suffer alike, we suffer with them. Interesting? When you stand day and night in the presence of hardship and physical suffering, you do not stop to think about the interest. There is no time for that. Ease pain, soothe sorrow, lessen suffering—this is your only thought night and day. Everything, everything else is lost sight of—yourself and the world.

"I shall go if we take up the work. I have the finest executive officers in the world; trained men, every one. They go into the field with absolute power. It must be so. I am a poor sailor, but I shall go. There is nothing else to do."

"Good-by."

The impression of womanly strength, determination, gentleness, and dignity strengthens after one has gone from Miss Barton's presence.

The American National Red Cross.

INCORPORATED UNDER THE LAWS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, OCTOBER 1, 1881
REINCORPORATED, APRIL 17, 1893.

For the Relief of Suffering by War, Pestilence, Famine, Flood, Fires, and other Calamities of Sufficient Magnitude to be deemed National in Extent. The Organization acts under the Geneva Treaty, the provisions for which were made in International Convention at Geneva, Switzerland, August 22, 1864, and since signed by nearly all civilized nations. The United States gave its adhesion by Act of Congress, March 1, 1882. Ratified by the Congress of Berne, June 9, 1882. Proclaimed by President Arthur, July 26, 1882.

HEADQUARTERS: WASHINGTON, D. C.

BOARD OF CONSULTATION:
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES AND MEMBERS OF THE CABINET.

EXECUTIVE OFFICERS:
CLARA BARTON, PRESIDENT AND TREASURER.
GEORGE KENNAN, FIRST VICE-PRESIDENT.
STEPHEN E. BARTON, SECOND VICE-PRESIDENT.
WALTER P. PHILLIPS, GENERAL SECRETARY.
GEORGE H. PULLMAN, FINANCIAL SECRETARY.
DR. JULIAN B. HUBBELL, GENERAL FIELD AGENT.

DIRECTORS:
CLARA BARTON,
GEORGE H. PULLMAN,
STEPHEN E. BARTON,
DR. JULIAN B. HUBBELL,
GEORGE KENNAN
WALTER P. PHILLIPS,
PETER V. DE GRAW,
DR. JOSEPH GARDNER.

Washington, D. C., December 2, 1895.

Rembrandt Harmensz van Rijn

By Elbert Francis Baldwin

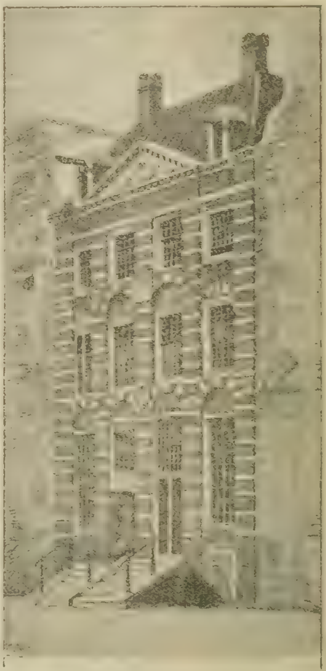
The illustrations in this article are used by special permission of Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York, publishers of Michel's "Rembrandt."

PORTRAIT OF REMBRANDT

In all Holland there is no more typically Dutch town than Leyden. When we hear its name, we think instinctively of its celebrated university, of its Elzevirs, of its situation on the lower reaches of the Rhine, of its picturesque town-hall and churches and asylums, of its markets and fairs, of Spinoza and Lucas van Leyden. The town could not have looked very differently nearly three centuries ago, when to a miller and his wife was born a son. That son became the greatest of Northern painters, and his name is one of the supreme names in all painting. The name was Rembrandt Harmenszoon (shortened later; zoon meant the son of Harmen) van Rijn (because he lived on the banks of the Rhine). He was not destined by his parents to follow his father's trade. Instead they enrolled him among the students of Latin literature at the University, and intended him for the law. Nature intended otherwise. Unlike the traditional parents of artists, these parents saw their mistake, removed him from the University, and placed him under the instruction of one Swanenburch, where he remained three years. Rembrandt then went to Amsterdam, where he placed himself under a more famous teacher, Pieter Lastman. In six months the young painter returned to Leyden to work independently, so sure of himself had he become. Here he made such progress that, when only twenty-five, he decided to locate definitely in the larger city, and returned to Amsterdam for good.

Rembrandt: fic
1633:

Most artists live lives in which are striking, not to say dramatic, effects; but a quieter artist's life than Rembrandt's is rare. He was a genuine Dutchman in this; but in another equally important respect he did not at all correspond to the Dutch character, which is above everything economical, unprodigal, thrifty. Rembrandt realized the phrase we hear nowadays, "You would not expect an artist to be a practical man, would you?" Now, Rembrandt did not mean to be extravagant in his own living, and in personal and household expenses was actually frugal, but he had one habit which brought him to bankruptcy. It was not drinking, nor gambling, nor dissipation in any fiercer form than extravagant expenditure for works of art. His studio must have been something worth seeing, for anything to decorate it or his beloved models, his Saskia and his Hendrickje, was hard to refuse. If he had no money to buy hangings and furniture, jewels and robes, he would borrow it. That studio must now be appropriately housed, and what house was there quite so expressive of good Dutch architecture, and so adapted to Rembrandt's use, as the one in the Breestraat, which cost 13,000 florins, and was never but half paid for? The accumulated interest on the remaining half was one reason for the artist's financial ruin. The house was built in 1606, from the date inscribed on the modillion in the second story. Rembrandt loved this home more than anything in the world: it was his world. It sheltered his wife and his children, and the children of his art. What a picture must have been seen there every evening: Rembrandt quietly drawing or engraving, and his beautiful wife engaged at her needlework; for it was to that house that he brought his Saskia, the Frisian girl whose face in maturer beauty looks out of the frame on the opposite page. We may gain a wrong idea of their married life, and think it a rollicking one, from the familiar picture in the Dresden Gallery showing Rembrandt laughing and holding his wife on his knee, while with one hand he raises a wine-glass. The couple are arrayed in richest attire, and seemed only too well disposed to make holiday. Their real life was singularly sedate and serene. It is pitiful that it should have been only eight years long, cut short by Saskia's premature death. During those years Rembrandt seemed for the most part to forget other subjects than his beloved Saskia. We have portrait after portrait of her in pencil, etching, and paint. It was always a labor of love to produce those portraits. He never tired of painting his wife's long, golden, silky hair, her peachlike complexion, her beautiful dark eyes, and her lovely mouth. After the manner of his time, he loved to deck her in gold-broidered garments and in rare jewels. He sought for characters whom he could thus adorn, as, for instance, Delilah in "Samson's Marriage," or "The Wife of the Burgomaster of Pancras." No works of Rembrandt are more painstaking than these portraits in their various disguises. There is an impulsiveness and yet a perfect finish about them which fascinates every art-lover.



REMBRANDT'S HOUSE

From the time of Saskia's death, however, obscurity began to fall on Rembrandt's life, if not upon his work. That life had never been a particularly convivial one; he had never cared for the tavern-existence of many of his companions; he had always longed for a home of his own; his appreciation of his parents and kinsfolk had been as proverbial as his kindness to them. Yet Rembrandt's retirement was becoming almost morose. Fully to develop his art he had sought it where he could find greatest spontaneity of expression—among the lower classes rather than in the ranks of the aristocracy. Like Luther, like Shakespeare, he spoke out of the people, to the people. Though he had now become a painter without peer in Holland, he had never sought to raise himself into greater social distinction, and his personality was hidden from those in high station, who should have been the very ones to help him out of difficulty. There is no more startling proof of his estrangement from society than, when there were national rejoicings on account of the Peace of Westphalia some years later, Rembrandt's name was not mentioned among those commissioned to celebrate the occasion by works of art.

THE BEGGARS

About this time, too, the whims of picture-buyers began to change. Instead of virile Rembrandtesque work, the minute and enamel-like prettinesses and insipidities of some fashionable painters were preferred.

We now come to that disputed point, the relations of Rembrandt and Hendrickje, the latter the model for the exquisite "Portrait of a Woman" in the Louvre. Whatever might have been true at first, Rembrandt recognized Hendrickje ere long as his wife, as, at birth, he acknowledged the child, Cornelia, as his own. Nor could there be more striking proof of complete respect and accord than in the tender treatment always given to Hendrickje by Saskia's son, Titus. In truth, Hendrickje and Titus were drawn together by an increasingly common embarrassment and hardship—namely, Rembrandt's hopeless bankruptcy.

Yet, in adversity as in prosperity, Rembrandt's mighty art-passion and genius never left him. His continued production at a lofty level was due far more to his self-revelation than to his technique, unequaled as that was. It was no egotism which made him paint fifty portraits of himself; it was because he was himself his own best model, and from his ever-varying emotion he carefully studied his own expression, equally varying. Never was vigorous youth more perfectly portrayed than in his early pictures of himself; but the later ones are more pathetically interesting—the face often unshaven, the eyes sunken, the hair scant, the frame grown unwieldy, the garments almost slovenly, the expression no longer vivacious, but full of melancholy experience. What a change from the portrait on the opposite page! Yet, in evil days as in good, Rembrandt always painted himself just as he was. He did himself this honor, and he gave it to every one. No painter was ever more exactingly truthful. A "poet's license" was not for him.

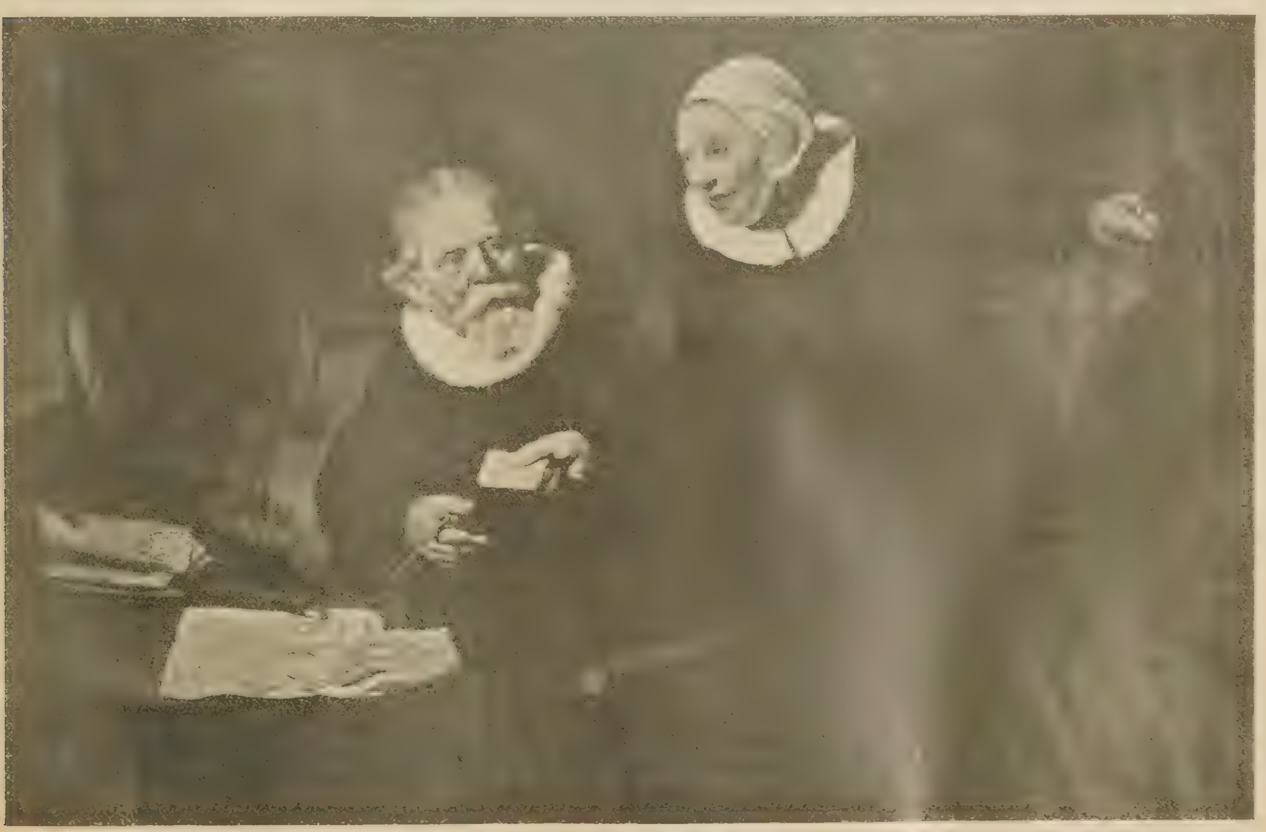
PORTRAIT OF SASKIA

THE DRAUGHTSMAN

Another reason for his steadiness of work was the inspiration from his married and family life. In his domestic devotion was also seen his independence of the world. How well the mutual interests of wedded life are suggested by his "Shipbuilder and his Wife" (a picture now hanging in Buckingham Palace)! How entirely Rembrandt transfers his own imagination to the observer! In the works of other Dutch artists we read Dutch life, its homely, healthy joys, orderly household cares, rigid but dignified customs; sturdy, vigorous, character-making existence; in Rembrandt we read something more. The family life is not objective alone, it is also subjective; it is not only Dutch, it is the world's.

The love of humanity often carries us over personal disasters, and it was so with Rembrandt, more than any other artist a painter of the common people. He knew that the significance of life was greatest where it was least complex. This may be noted in "The Beggars," the etching printed upon the opposite page. Few strokes are there, but a master-effect. It is fortunate that the cheapness of reproduction has made it possible for any one to own a print of Rembrandt, and it is fortunate for us in America that the Metropolitan Museum in New York City possesses some examples of the master's drawing and painting.

Rembrandt's work is spiritual, not spectacular. All his pictures, but specially his illustrations of the Bible story, speak of the inner life. Ecclesiastical conventions no longer prescribed forms for sacred art in the North, but even they could not have restrained Rembrandt, who better than any other painter realized that the Bible describes man's whole nature, not a part of it. Therefore no artist has ever given to the world such a complete history of the Old and New Testaments. Rembrandt is the truest art-interpreter of Scripture, for to him it was not alone the divinest, it was the most human of books.



THE SHIPBUILDER AND HIS WIFE

Alfred Austin: The New Poet Laureate

By Hamilton W. Mabie

It is forty-five years since Tennyson was made Poet Laureate, a stretch of time so long that, to the great majority of readers of English poetry, it seems as if the great poet and the great place were indivisible. Nothing shows more clearly the national and representative character of Tennyson's poetry than the splendid tradition which he has created about the Laureateship. He has so exalted the place that men have forgotten that it is merely an official position; they have come to regard it as formal recognition of primacy among contemporary singers. As the crowning of Petrarch was simply a public recognition of a genius which had already thrown its spell over Italy, so we have come to think of the Laureate as a child of the Muses rather than an appointee of the English Prime Minister. The vacant place confirmed the general impression; the golden crown was above the grasp of any living singer. Lord Salisbury has rudely dispelled the illusion by a selection which compels us to remember that of the fourteen men who have been Laureates only four have been singers of high rank; four others have been men of respectable gifts and achievements; six have been minor poets of such slender talent that they have been forgotten. Ben Jonson, Dryden, Wordsworth, and Tennyson seem, in the long historical perspective, to have happened among the Laureates rather than to have been of them; the lines of Olympian descent and of official recognition have four times run parallel, but for the greater part they have had widely different directions.

ALFRED AUSTIN

Mr. Alfred Austin carries us back, not to Davenant and Colley Cibber and the singers of the second grade of Laureates, but to Eusden and Pye, poets of the lower rank—the rank from which the official singers have usually been taken. And yet Mr. Austin is an English gentleman of culture, dignity, and ability; a man of scholarly tastes and attainment, of high character, and of unquestioned ability. He does not lack talent, but he lacks the kind of talent which the world has come to associate with the position to which he has been called. He is essentially a prose writer, and it has been his ill fortune to be thrust into a place which two great poets have held in succession. His clear-cut face expresses virility, decision, energy; but there is no imagination in it. It is the face of a strenuous rather than of a spontaneous man; of a poet who has formed himself by deliberate and laborious effort rather than one who has had the help of heaven in following the lines of his own inclination. All that high aims, hard work, a wholesome life, and an honorable ambition can accomplish in a man to whom the higher gifts have been denied has been wrought in Mr. Austin; but the ease, the spontaneity, the freshness, and the magical charm of the poet he has never compassed. They are beyond him; in spite of all his striving and his painstaking effort he remains an artisan, unable to cross the invisible line which separates the man at work from the man at play, the craftsman from the artist.

Carefully educated, not in the historic English schools, but in Catholic institutions, taking his degree at the London University, called to the Bar at the Inner Temple, forsaking the law at an early age for the more congenial work of the pen, a writer of verse since his eighteenth year, a journalist of skill and intelligence, Mr. Austin has come to the full maturity of his sixtieth year with a very honorable record of work, which is widely respected but which has never set the pulse beating or the imagination aflame. A stout Conservative of the Tory type, he has felt the charm of English scenery, history, and life in their imposing and impressive attitudes. He is well equipped to write an ode on the death of a Prime Minister or the birth of an heir to the throne, but he has never touched the heart of the English people. He has, it is true, written a number of short lyrics which have some singing quality in them, touches of ease and abandon such as a poet by the grace of God always has at command. It ought to be added that he has also feeling; indeed, feeling is his truest gift. But it is significant that even his smoothest and sweetest verse has never found lodgment in the memory of his readers, and the men are probably few who can recall a line of his writing. His love of nature is sincere and intelligent, but the magic of English skies and woods never steeps his lines in the enchantment which lies on Wordsworth's "Daffodils." In the expression of this love he is always self-contained and conventional. He has never felt the throb of passion which Wordsworth knew. He is always rational and sophisticated; his contact with nature is always through the medium of thought, as the first line of the verses entitled "A Birthday" shows:

I love to think, when first I woke
  Into this wondrous world,
The leaves were fresh on elm and oak,
  And hawthorn laced and pearled.

The earliest sound that greeted me
  Was the ousel's ringing tone;
The earliest sight, lambs frisking free
  Round barked oaks newly thrown.

The gray-green elder whitened slow
  As in my crib I slept;
And merles to wonder stilled my woe
  When I awoke and wept.

When held up to the window-pane,
  What fixed my baby stare?
The glory of the glittering rain,
  And newness everywhere.

It is Mr. Austin's misfortune that, while he can write about the glory and the newness of the world, he cannot make us see and feel them. Mr. Watson has said of him that he "may, in a special sense, be styled the Laureate of the English seasons," and it certainly is true that, in picturing the changes of the year and expressing the spirit of the seasons, Mr. Austin is at his best. The following lines have been widely quoted, and come very near the felicity and freshness of poetry:

SWINFORD HOUSE, ALFRED AUSTIN'S HOME IN KENT

I.

The Spring-time, O the Spring-time!
Who does not know it well?
When the little birds begin to build,
And the buds begin to swell.
When the sun with the clouds plays hide-and-seek,
And the lambs are bucking and bleating,
And the color mounts to the maiden's cheek,
And the cuckoo scatters greeting;
In the Spring-time, joyous Spring-time!

II.

The Summer, O the Summer!
Who does not know it well?
When the ringdoves coo the long day through,
And the bee refills his cell.
When the swish of the mower is heard at morn,
And we all in the woods go roaming,
And waiting is over and love is born,
And shy lips meet in the gloaming;
In the Summer, ripening Summer!

III.

The Autumn, O the Autumn!
Who does not know it well?
When the leaf turns brown, and the mast drops down,
And the chestnut splits its shell.
When we muse o'er the days that have gone before,
And the days that will follow after,
When the grain lies deep on the winnowing-floor,
And the plump gourd hangs from the rafter;
In the Autumn, thoughtful Autumn!

IV.

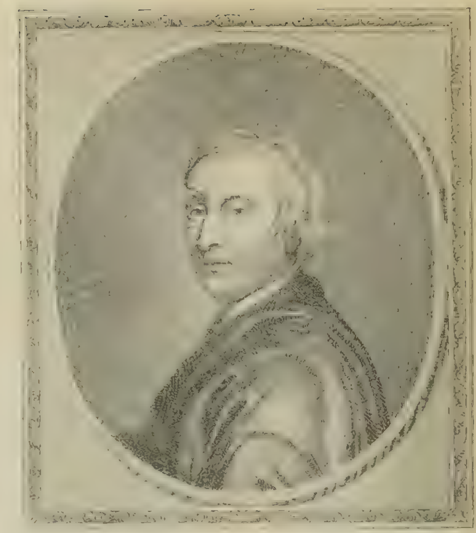
The Winter, O the Winter!
Who does not know it well?
When, day after day, the fields stretch gray.
And the peewit wails on the fell.
When we close up the crannies and shut out the cold,
And the wind sounds hoarse and hollow,
And our dead loves sleep in the churchyard mould,
And we feel that we soon shall follow;
In the Winter, mournful Winter!

The range of Mr. Austin's ambition is indicated by the long list of his published works. In verse alone many volumes have come

IN "THE GARDEN THAT I LOVE"

VILLAGE CHURCH NEAR ALFRED AUSTIN'S HOME

BEN JONSON
Poet Laureate 1619-1637
By permission of D. G. Francis

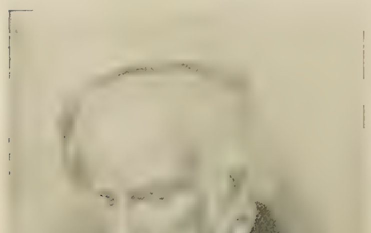


JOHN DRYDEN
Poet Laureate 1670-1700

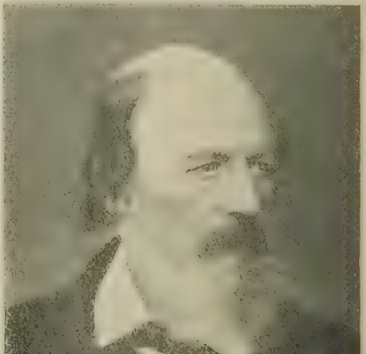
from his tireless hand, and of these four are devoted to long and elaborate poems. Such titles as "The Human Tragedy," "Savonarola: A Tragedy," "The Tower of Babel: A Celestial Love Drama," "Fortunatus, the Pessimist," "Prince Lucifer," suggest the gravity of the themes with which Mr. Austin has dealt and the seriousness with which he has taken himself and his work.[1] Seriousness is the note of great poetry, but it is also the note of a great deal of mechanical verse. Both Wordsworth and Tennyson took themselves, as we say, very seriously; but so also did Mr. Tupper and Mr. Bailey. Mr. Austin is a careful, conscientious, and often skillful workman; he understands the technical side of his craft; but he has neither the intellectual force which gives long poems their architectural strength and beauty, nor the freshness and variety of touch which lends continuous charm to massive structure. Like Keats's friend, the ambitious painter Hayden, Mr. Austin has epic hopes and desires with only a lyric gift of very slender substance. He is best in his shorter and less pretentious pieces. Love of nature and love of country are familiar notes in these lyrics. He shares with his greater brethren that national feeling which is rarely lacking in poets of force and originality. The England of which Shakespeare sang with such majesty of epithet and adjective—"this sceptered isle," "this teeming womb of royal kings," "this seat of Mars;" which evoked from Tennyson so many noble lines illustrative of civic progress and of the continuity of national growth and power, appeals also to Mr. Austin. But it is not the heroic England of Shakespeare nor the progressive England of Tennyson of which he sings; it is imperial England of world-wide trade and sea-wide supremacy:

I see the deep-plowed furrows of the main
  Bristling with harvest; funnel, and keel, and shroud,
  Heaving and hurrying hither through gale and cloud,
Winged by their burdens; argosies of grain,
Flocks of strange breed, and herds of Southern strain,
  Fantastic stuffs and fruits of tropic bloom,
Antarctic fleece and equatorial spice,
Cargoes of cotton, and flax, and silk, and rice,
  Food for the hearth, and staples for the loom;
Huge vats of sugar, casks of wine and oil,
  Summoned from every sea to one sole shore
  By Empire's scepter; the converging store
Of Trade's pacific universal spoil.
And, heaving and hurrying hitherward to bring
  Tribute from every zone, they lift their voices,
  And, as a strong man revels and rejoices,
They loudly and lustily chant, and this the song they sing.

Mr. Austin's work as a journalist has been varied and ardent. He reported the Franco-German War and the last great Vatican Council for the "Standard," and he has long contributed editorially to this Conservative organ. He has written three novels, which, in this country at least, have attracted no attention. It was as a critic of trenchant style that he first became known in England. The essays on "The Poetry of the Period" had an audacity and dash which stimulated curiosity. They were keen and epigrammatic, and they dealt frankly with great reputations. Tennyson, Browning, Swinburne, and Morris were sharply called to account by a writer who sounded a clarion note in behalf of virility, passion, stir, and power. It is singular that when this voice crying in the wilderness of conventionality began to chaunt the burden of its own prophecy it was devoid of every tone which it had demanded from other voices; of all the voices of the time which have tried to sing, it has been most tame, unimpassioned, and mechanical. In two books of prose, "The Garden That I Love" and "In Monica's Garden," Mr. Austin makes his nearest approach to literature; for in these books he writes of things he knows and loves; of flowers, hedges, secluded walks, leafy retreats, the stillness of afternoons in old gardens, the beauty of summer on ancient sward. His tastes are the tastes of a cultivated English gentleman, born to intelligence, integrity, and the opulence of an old and ripe civilization. He loves the beautiful English scenery, and he glories in the splendid force and achievements of the English race. He has had long practice with the pen, and he is an excellent craftsman. All this must be said of the new Laureate. He is well furnished with all the external qualities which ought to go with his office. He lacks, however, the one quality which would have given official recognition confirmation by the inexorable Muses—the gift of genius.



WILLIAM WORDSWORTH
Poet Laureate 1843-1850



ALFRED TENNYSON
Poet Laureate 1850-1892

---

[1] Mr. Austin's books are published in this country by Macmillan & Co., of New York. For the photograph from which our portrait of Mr. Austin is made we are indebted to the "Literary Digest."

From Atlanta to the Sea

I.—Atlanta and Macon[1]

By Willis John Abbot

THE traveler who approaches Atlanta from the north and finds himself suddenly whirled into the center of a great and populous city, with electric cars clanging in every direction, a great hotel such as might stand on Fifth Avenue, New York, towering beside the smoky, squalid railway station, with a din of traffic over the granite pavement of the streets that fairly drowns the rumble of the trains and the clangor of the engines—a traveler in such case is almost certain to ask, as I have heard during the past six months a score or more inquire, how it came about that a great city and a modern city had been set down at such a point. If he came from any northern point to the westward of Atlanta, he passed through Chattanooga, and from that town to Atlanta saw much to remind him of the fratricidal strife which is not forgotten though the bitterness of its memory has died away. The droning voice of the conductor calling the stations seemed that of one reading a page of history. Where the train plunged through the range of mountains dividing the Atlantic from the Mississippi watershed, the passenger, if observant, might see one mute reminder of the days of war, one evidence that a railroad company can, on occasion, be sentimental, for there in the narrow cut is a lonely grave, kept green by railroad hands, and marked with a simple tablet inscribed "To an unknown hero." One of Sherman's men lies buried there, and you will note as clear a tone of pathos in the voice of the Southerner who may point out the little mound as in that of any Northern man who speaks of it. Then from the car windows the passenger can see Rocky Face, Kenesaw, and Stone Mountains, and hears men speak of Resaca, Allatoona, and Marietta, but the suggestions of war-time are only in the names and in the mountains and rivers—nature's imperishable monuments. Scan the face of the country as he will, the most keen-sighted traveler on this railway, which traverses every inch of the pathway of Sherman toward Atlanta, will find no trace of the war. Nature has healed the scarred fields and forests. Frost and rain have leveled the earthworks, or kindly foliage and vines have covered them. And a new spirit bred of new conditions has repaired whatever damages the little hamlets and villages along the railway suffered. Nor has the kindly hand of time been less successful in removing from the minds of men the memorials of war-time hatreds. Last summer I traversed that railroad in a car full of Sherman's veterans, fresh from the G. A. R. encampment at Louisville, and eagerly pointing out to each other old landmarks. At every station was the usual throng of idlers. Nowhere was there a sign of disrespect for or aversion to the blue coats and brass buttons, and at more than one stopping-place the invaders were greeted with cheers. The nearest approach to a hostile voice was that of a coal-black "mammy" who alternately berated the "Yankees" and besought them to buy her fried chicken.

A REMINISCENCE OF THE OLD SOUTH

But I digress. Though there is much in the country about Atlanta to interest the traveler, there is nothing to suggest the reason why a town left prostrate and in ruins little over thirty years ago should have since grown from barely 12,000 to more than 110,000, and, what is more, should have discarded every characteristic of an easy-going Southern village and taken on the appearance and manners of a bustling Northern city. For, even at the risk of offending local pride, it must be insisted that Atlanta is essentially Northern or perhaps Northwestern. It is more like Chicago or Minneapolis than it is like its neighbor Savannah. It is Northern in its rush and hurry, in its "strictly business" air, in the opportunities it offers to newcomers and the eagerness with which it invites newcomers, in its smokiness, in its architecture, in its unpicturesqueness, and in its push. Unlike a good many Northern, or rather Northwestern, cities, Atlanta has proved its capacity to enjoy that most dangerous of municipal dissipations, a "boom," and recover almost without sign of disaster.

I put to a lifelong resident of Atlanta the almost universal questions: "What has made your city? Why does it stand here in the midst of a country not overpopulous, gifted undoubtedly with natural resources of unusual richness, but not needing a market-place of 110,000 people? Why are you growing at double the pace of Georgia's seaport, Savannah?"

His response sounded queerly, coming from that source. "Sherman made Atlanta," said he; "Sherman taught all LEYDEN HOUSE, THE HEADQUARTERS OF GENERAL SHERMAN IN ATLANTA the world that Atlanta was the gate city of the South. He fought for months to get it so as to secure an entrance to the Confederacy. When he left, he burned it lest some one else should get the prize, and he tore up all its railways, so as to close the gate. When the war closed, railway promoters saw, as Sherman had, that Atlanta was the key to the South, and raced with each other to get their rails there first. The advertising Sherman gave us, supplemented by the public spirit of our people, built this city."

---

[1] In the series of three illustrated articles of which this is the first, Mr. Abbot will trace the present conditions in that part of the New South falling within the route of Sherman's famous march "from Atlanta to the Sea."

There may be something in this explanation of Atlanta's growth. I am sure there is much in that part of it which ascribes prosperity to the enterprise of the citizens. They have in them the temper and the pluck of city-builders. They are the sort of people who could build a $2,000,000 Exposition and, when it seemed that the people of the surrounding country were not likely to support it, go cheerfully down into their pockets for additional tens of thousands to pay running expenses and clear off the floating debt. They have adaptability, too. A case in point: When the first Cotton Exposition in Atlanta, in 1881, closed, there was left a great and durable building. What to do with it? Should it be sold for a song to wreckers, like the palaces of Chicago's White City? An Atlanta man looked it over and said he would buy it for a cotton-mill—then an institution not common in the South. So a cotton-mill it became, and has steadily increased its business until it has now 20,000 spindles and 680 looms. The Atlanta man who tells you this story is fond of adding that when this mill started, Mr. Edward Atkinson, the eminent Bostonian, had just demonstrated that cotton-manufacturing could not succeed in the South.

State Capitol Atlanta

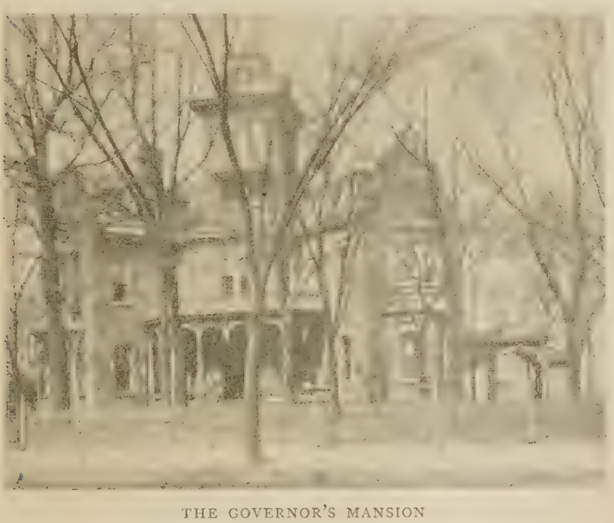
An Atlanta Club House

The Atlantan, like all denizens of new and rapidly growing towns, is glib of statistics; but it seems to me that municipal statistics convey little to the mind of the man who hasn't seen the city, and fail to impress him who has. That more than seventy-four miles of streets are traversed by street railways—all electric—is less suggestive than the note that Atlanta's focal point, Broad Street, where the cars from every section of the city cross and recross, is almost as busy and bewildering as the corner of Fifth Avenue and Twenty-third Street in New York, or that of State and Madison Streets in Chicago at dusk. Nor could the statement that there are in Atlanta 101 churches give half so vivid an idea of the general dissemination of religious throught and culture among the people as the recollection of a certain church, Episcopal and not the most prominent or most fashionable sanctuary in the city, into which Sunday after Sunday I saw carried camp-chairs to fill every aisle from the chancel to the lobby, and even then there were not seats enough for all who came to its doors.

This subject of the work of the churches leads naturally to thought of the condition of social order in Atlanta. The North is prone to think the South the home of gaming and drinking, oblivious to the fact that local option has given even to Texas a wider measure of prohibition than has Massachusetts. In Georgia the prohibition element is strong—so strong that one of its opponents remarked to me, rather ruefully, that as soon as the Exposition closed the whole State would be under a prohibition law. But for the present Atlanta enjoys one of the most stringent laws for the regulation of the liquor traffic, and the one most perfectly enforced of which I have ever heard. All dramshops are closed at 10 P.M., and not one is opened on Sunday. It is not a merely nominal closing—a front-door and side-door shuffle—but an actual discontinuance of the trade of liquor-selling during the prohibited hours. So far as I could see, there was no difficulty about the enforcement of the ordinance, nor any persistent effort made to evade it. The saloon-keeper, on getting his license, puts up a heavy bond, which is forfeited if he is detected in violation of the law. This, and the widespread public sentiment favoring strict regulation of the business, have proved sufficient. Just about the time the Exposition opened, the Council, on the plea that Atlanta was about to become a "cosmopolitan city," extended the time for keeping saloons open at night to twelve o'clock. The Mayor promptly vetoed this ordinance, and the Atlantans applauded the act, which may have discouraged cosmopolitanism, but kept Atlanta a purely American city. The other evils incident to a great city are kept under rigid control, and I am credibly informed that there is not a gambling-house, open or covert, in the whole city.

Returning to the material side of Atlanta's life, it is to be noted that it is rather as a commercial than as a manufacturing city that it is great. By the southward movement of the cotton-manufacturing industry, which is one of the most noteworthy industrial phenomena of the day, Atlanta has profited, but not in proportion to her size. It is, perhaps, the lack of water-power which has diverted so much of this business from her doors to smaller Georgia cities, like Augusta, Macon, and Columbus. I should judge the course of Atlanta's development to be much like that of Denver, Omaha, Kansas City, or even Chicago. To-day it is great because it has the geographical position which makes it a distributing center. To-morrow there develop such manufactories as are necessary to the immediate needs of a great and growing city with populous surroundings. The ball, turning, grows with each revolution, and in time the city, which, like Chicago, had no natural advantages as a manufacturing center, is made one through artificial conditions which it itself creates.

In the architecture of Atlanta is little that is notable. The "sky-scraper" has invaded the business district, it is true, but neither in numbers nor proportions is it remarkable. One of the several good hotels, the Kimball, is an excellent example of commercial architecture, while the Grand Opera-House interior affords as creditable an example of theater designing and decoration as is to be found on the continent. Of the public buildings the State Capitol is a really dignified, if rather conventional, edifice, possessing the unusual distinction of having been built within the appropriation. Domestic architecture is heterogeneous, Peach-tree Street, Atlanta's pride, being lined with all sorts and conditions of houses. It is curious to note in the new residences now building a tendency to revert to the old-fashioned Southern type, with Grecian pillars encircling three sides of the main structure, as in the Leyden House, here illustrated, which once served as General Sherman's headquarters. For a time the Atlantans fell a prey to the Queen Anne mania, and then to servile imitation of anything Northern, but latterly are returning to the rather classic type of house so long distinctive of the South. But, indeed, there is little of ostentation in the domestic life of Atlanta. It is a city of homes, and though there be stately ones among them, they are but few. It is not certain that the economic situation which leads to the multiplication of what the reporters call the "palatial residences" is the best, after all.



THE GOVERNOR'S MANSION

What effect on the commercial development and the social life of Atlanta the Exposition just ended will have is hard to estimate. The Exposition was nobly planned and executed. Its landscape effects were impressive, though the architecture was, in the main, commonplace. It suffered, perhaps, in coming so swiftly after the great Chicago Fair. But it cannot fail to exert a very considerable influence, not only on Atlanta, but on the surrounding country. The discovery in the financial centers of the North that Atlanta, with 110,000 people, of whom at least 50,000 are negroes, had in it the qualities necessary to the creation and maintenance of such an institution, must result in profit. And, indeed, the manifestation of those qualities day by day as the Exposition progressed was a source of constant admiration to beholders. Every exposition sees its dark days during the opening weeks. The Atlanta affair was no exception to this rule, and so there came to us, strangers in Atlanta, almost weekly news of a guarantee fund raised by citizens, of the directors contributing $10,000 each to avert some threatened disaster, or of one citizen subscribing $50,000 to put the finances of the Exposition in sound condition. And as for the social burdens entailed and bravely met, surely never were clubs more constantly and hospitably open, never did a handful of society people dine, dance, and receive with such unremitting attention the stranger within their gates; never did orators of any city—and the South is the home of oratory—more assiduously discourse in welcome to New York and Illinois, the Commercial Men's Association, the League of Press Clubs, or the thousand and one visiting organizations which haunt expositions of every kind.

I am not one of those who believe that the greatest benefit, or even a great benefit, to spring from the Atlanta Exposition will be the extinguishment of rancor between the sections lately at war. My judgment is that that hatred was dead long ago. So far as their reiteration of peace and good will goes, the speeches at Atlanta were a mere repetition of those I heard at the New Orleans Exposition in 1884. And if there were dramatic scenes of renewal of friendship at Atlanta, was it not at New Orleans that two Union veterans escorted Jefferson Davis from his house to view and pay his respects to Philadelphia's Liberty Bell? But, after all, there was something fine in the spectacle, one September afternoon, of Chicago's famous First Regiment, 900 strong, clad all in gray, marching down Peachtree Street, headed by the Fifth Georgia, uniformed in the regulation garb of the United States Army. "'Pears like they had the colors mixed," remarked a contemplative spectator of this queer reunion of the blue and the gray.

The greatest good that can come to Atlanta and the South from the Cotton States and International Exposition came when the directors of that enterprise gave the colored race an equal right to participate in it, gave them a building, and invited one of their foremost men, Professor Booker T. Washington, to join in the exercises of the opening day. The address he then made, no less than the warm plaudits of his auditory, mostly Southern, and the generous comments of the Atlanta press, taught the whole country that the negro problem, as we call it, had taken on a new phase. Atlanta has six institutions for the education of the colored people. The new Constitution of the State of South Carolina provides for a State technological school for blacks, in every respect the equal of that for whites. In short, without enumerating the institutions, it may fairly be said that, except in very unusual cases, any Southern negro can secure a technological or academic education if he will make to such end such sacrifices as many a New England boy two generations ago made to go to Dartmouth or to Bowdoin.

Sherman left Atlanta ruined; it is now stately. He left it small; it is now great. He left it a mud-hole; its streets now are paved with granite quarried from historic Stone Mountain. The handful of shops he left behind him has grown to more than two hundred wholesale houses, doing a business of nearly $100,000,000. The two railways he tore up are succeeded by nine. The blacksmith-shop and the cotton-press, which made up most of the manufacturing industry of the village of 1863, have developed into more than six hundred factories in 1896. This is the record of a scant third of a century, much of it made against the worse than war-time discouragements of the Reconstruction period.

Georgia, save for its two considerable cities, Atlanta and

IN MACON—A CITY OF HOMES

Savannah, is practically a farming community. Its urban population is estimated at 225,000, the two cities named having not less than 170,000 out of this number. But a number of thriving small towns are found in the State, some of them having in their water-power and railroad facilities the nucleus of very considerable growth in this era of the southward tide of emigration and of manufacturing. Notable among these are Augusta, Macon, and Columbus—all towns that escaped the full shock of Sherman's onset, but were scorched by the hot breath of his rushing legions. Milledgeville, which he entered, has abandoned the race for commercial prestige. It is the home of several State institutions, which, in part, occupy the buildings erected when this venerable town was the capital of the State. The old State House, built in 1803, in which the Ordinance of Secession was passed, now houses the Middle Georgia Military and Agricultural College—an odd combination, by the way, but typical of Southern life, where the sword and the plowshare are still interchangeable. The old executive mansion, a dignified structure, is now used as the dormitory of the Georgia Normal and Industrial School for Girls, a college the classes of which are attended by more than four hundred pupils. The State asylum for the insane is also located at Milledgeville. But, like most towns given over to educational and State institutions, this one strives little for commercial advancement.

Macon is a fair type of the Georgia manufacturing city of the smaller kind. It strove long and valiantly to rival Atlanta, even making an effort to secure the State capital when it was moved to the larger city in 1867. Public-spirited citizens raised a considerable fund to press this issue, but at the last moment wisely concluded that a bird in the hand was worth two in the bush, and spent their campaign fund at home in municipal waterworks. It is perhaps characteristic of the journalist to judge the enterprise of a community by the use it makes of printers' ink. So judged, Macon ranks high as an enterprising city. In a somewhat extended experience with "booming" towns I have never seen printed matter eulogistic of a city more artistic or more effective than that issued by the Macon Advertising and Information Bureau. Work of this nature, when joined in by all the citizens, is bound to tell; and in the case of Macon it has told, for between 1880 and 1890 its population increased from 12,794 to 22,746—an increase of 79 per cent., greater by far than that of any other Georgia city. To-day the commercial population of Macon—that is, the people within its limits and in its suburbs—is over 37,000. Nearly every city of moderate size has some great man's words of praise to cite to strangers, and in Macon they will tell you that Henry Ward Beecher said that in respect to natural advantages Macon is the most beautiful city in the South.

Natural advantages, however, do not build cities; the biggest grow where the obstacles to be overcome are greatest. (Query: Does the individual man thrive on opposition as does man collectively?) Macon owes her growth in the past decade to the push of her citizens. They promoted the two great cotton-mills which run 35,000 spindles and employ nearly 1,000 hands. They built up the iron and other manufacturing industries in which over 3,000 men are engaged. They built up the jobbing houses which do a business of $50,000,000 annually. They showed the enterprise and pluck which brought twelve railroads thither seeking their trade. And if once they brought themselves and their town to the verge of ruin by the too great enthusiasm with which they backed a railroad construction company, it must at least be said that their recovery was swift and complete.

The natural advantages of soil and climate which he enjoys, the Maconian has utilized to the highest degree. He has made his town a city of homes, with broad, well-shaded streets, verdant lawns, and flowery gardens. The park system of the city is on a scale befitting a town which expects and deserves to grow rapidly and uninterruptedly. To soil and climate, too, is due the fertility of the surrounding peach orchards and watermelon fields which make of Macon one of the great fruit markets of the country. It is perhaps not necessary to accept the figures of the optimistic President of the Macon Advertising and Information Bureau when he assures prospective settlers that it costs $40,000 to bring a 1,000-acre peach orchard to maturity, while a single full crop will net the farmer $300,000. But none can traverse the fruitful territory about this little city without being impressed with the fact that its advantages are not half utilized, that the bounty of nature is going to waste, and that there, as in other parts of the South, it needs but industry, intelligence, and thrift applied to farming to bring in a rich reward.

I can give but a passing word to the educational and religious establishments of this thriving Southern town. Of the former the most interesting feature is the Wesleyan Female College, established in 1836, and certainly the oldest college for women in the United States, if not in the world. Think of that, O Smith and Vassar! Georgia, and not New England or New York, the pioneer in the higher education of women! It will be interesting, by the way, to New Yorkers to know that the building which at present houses this venerable institution owes its existence largely to the munificence of the late George I. Seney. Of churches Macon has forty-six, of which twenty-four are for the whites and twenty-two for the negroes.

Since Macon lost heart in the endeavor to outstrip Atlanta in the race for population, one great ambition burns in the minds of its citizens. The stranger is taken to the water part of the city and shown the Ocmulgee River—a turbid and not impressive stream. Once great river steamers came up that channel, he is told, and Macon then sat at the head of navigation in central Georgia. Brunswick was the port of entry then, and cotton shipped by boat from Macon was transferred direct to the holds of ocean steamers. All this, it is expected, shall come again, for not only have private funds been expended for dredging the river, but Uncle Sam has lent a friendly ear.

How Shall a Boy be Introduced to Tools?

By Charles Alpheus Bennett

Professor of Manual Training in the New York Teachers' College

When a parent introduces his son to books, he is careful to select the best ones and then to see that they are properly used. He should take no less pains in introducing his son to tools. Both books and tools are a valuable means in education, but their value depends upon the kinds selected and the use that is made of them.

It has sometimes been said that the country boy has a great advantage over the city boy in this matter of learning the use of tools. There is much truth in this statement, yet the extent to which it is true and the reasons why it is true are often lost sight of. After several years of Robinson Crusoe life in the sand-pit behind the barn, the country boy drops his play tools and takes up the real tools of the garden, the field, and the wood-pile. He is shown how deep to cover turnip-seeds and potatoes. With his new hoe he tries to keep up with the men in the corn-field. In haying-time he spreads the swaths in the morning, and loads or rakes after the cart in the afternoon. When harvest is over and the hills are covered with snow, he shoulders his ax and goes to the woods with his father or the hired man to help cut the year's stock of firewood. In a few days more he is serving an apprenticeship at the sawhorse and the chopping-block, or is trying his hand at the beetle and wedge. In all this work he is guided by his father or some one who is interested in having the tools used properly and the work done well. Herein lies one of the secrets of the value of the country boy's training in the use of these tools. He is not left to his own destruction, but is systematically drilled to do his work quickly and well.

But the country boy's opportunity to use tools does not always stop with the spade and the beetle; he often has access to a limited number of edged tools. Every thrifty farmer has, at least, two or three chisels, as many augers, a gimlet, a hand-saw, a draw-knife, and a spoke-shave. In the use of these his son is not always so successful as in the use of the heavier ones, and the training resulting from their use is not always so valuable. The value of edged tools to the farmer's boy is in direct ratio to the farmer's ability to use the tools himself and to his wisdom in dealing with his son. The wise father (and in this case poverty lends wisdom) does not give his boy the free use of all these tools at once. He first gives his son the gimlet and the spoke-shave or one of the chisels, at such times as he can supervise their use. Later the boy is allowed to use these tools at any time he pleases, and others are given him on special occasions. The father is careful to see that the boy knows how to use each tool properly and how to keep it in repair; but never is the boy allowed to use a tool until he has given assurance that he will neither damage the tool nor injure himself in using it. Unfortunately, many farmers do not take pains to teach their sons the use of edged tools. They only take pains to chastise them when a tool is lost or broken, and to say, "You ought to have known better" when a finger is cut or badly bruised. When the son of such a farmer comes to the manual-training school, the teacher becomes skeptical regarding the superiority of the country boy's training. Not only is this boy's way of handling tools unworkmanlike, but his careless and slovenly habits seem to retard his mental and moral growth. It is with great difficulty that the teacher puts him through a course of unlearning to get him back to the starting-point and ready to begin over again. This unfortunate state of affairs in many cases is clearly due to a lack of supervision and instruction.

Three suggestions, then, may be given to the parent who wishes to make tools as well as books an effective means in the education of his child.

1. Do not give him a Christmas present of a large box filled with a great variety of tools, of the use of which he knows nothing. Instead, buy him a few tools; add to this stock as fast as additions are needed; be sure they are excellent in quality, and that each tool is the right size. At first do not give him too many tools that imply a high degree of accuracy in working. Accuracy is the result of growth.

2. See that he is taught how to use a tool before you allow him the unrestricted use of it. It is desirable also that he should be taught how to sharpen it and to keep it in repair.

3. Manifest interest in his work, and supervise it enough to satisfy yourself that he is forming good habits instead of bad ones—habits of neatness and orderliness, of perseverance and accuracy, instead of the reverse.

The answer to the question, "How shall a boy be introduced to tools?" is now easily given. At first he should be taught to use the ordinary hand tools of the farm and garden. If this is impossible, teach him to use such other tools as the hammer, the hatchet, the saw, and the auger; these do not imply too high a degree of accuracy in working. Later he should gradually be taught the use of such finer tools as the chisel, the gouge, the plane, and the knife.

The father who cannot find time to teach his son the use of tools at home will do well to send him to a good manual-training school. In such a school instruction in the use of tools is given as a means of general education, not to teach a trade. The manual-training teacher takes the standpoint of the parent, and looks upon the boy, not as a future mechanic, but as a future man. Instruction from such a teacher under the favorable conditions existing in a well-equipped manual-training school is likely to be far better than can be given at home by the father. But the fact that a boy is sent to a manual-training school does not relieve the parent of all responsibility regarding the boy's training in the use of tools. His school work should be supplemented by work in the home shop. In this work the parent should always manifest deep interest and take pains to see that the habits formed are of such a nature as to elevate and strengthen the character of the child.

KATE CARNEGIE[1]

By Ian Maclaren

Author of "Beside the Bonnie Brier-Bush," "The Days of Auld Lang Syne," etc., etc.

CHAPTER III.—A HOME OF MANY GENERATIONS

For Chapters I. and II. see the last Magazine Number of The Outlook (December 21)

It was the custom of the former time to construct roads on a straight line, with a preference for uphill and down, and engineers refused to make a circuit of twenty yards to secure level ground. There were two advantages in this uncompromising principle of construction, and it may be doubtful which commended itself most to the mind of our fathers. Roads were drained after the simplest fashion, because a standing pool in the hollow had more than a compensation in the dryness of the ascent and descent, while the necessity of sliddering down one side and scrambling up the other reduced driving to the safe average of four miles an hour—horse-doctors forming a class by themselves, and being preserved in their headlong career by the particular Providence which has a genial regard for persons who have too little sense or have taken too much liquor. Degenerate descendants, anxious to obtain the maximum of speed with the mimimum of exertion, have shown a quite wonderful ingenuity in circumventing hills, so the road between Drumtochty Manse and Tochty Lodge gate was duplicated, and the track that plunged into the hollow was now forsaken of wheeled traffic and overgrown with grass.

"This way, Kate; it's the old road, and the way I came to kirk with my mother. Yes, it's narrow, but we 'ill get through and down below—it is worth the seeing."

So they forced a passage where the overgrown hedges resisted the wheels, and the trees, wet with a morning shower, dashed Kate's jacket with a pleasant spray, and the rail of the dog-cart was festooned with tendrils of honeysuckle and wild geranium.

"There is the parish kirk of Drumtochty," as they came out and halted on the crest of the hill, "and though it be not much to look at after the Norman churches of the south, it's a brave old kirk in our fashion, and well set in the Glen."

For it stood on a knoll, whence the ground sloped down to the Tochty, and it lay with God's acre round it in the shining of the sun. Half a dozen old beeches made a shadow in the summer-time, and beat off the winter's storms. One standing at the west corner of the kirkyard had a fuller and sweeter view of the Glen than could be got anywhere save from the beeches at the Lodge; but then nothing like unto that can be seen far or near, and I have marveled why painting men have never had it on their canvas.

"Our vault is at the east end, where the altar was in the old days, and there our dead of many generations lie. A Carnegie always prayed to be buried with his people in Drumtochty, but, as it happened, two out of three of our house have fallen on the field, and so most of us have not had our wish.

"Black John, my grandfather, was out in '45, and escaped to France. He married a Highland lassie orphaned there, and entered the French service, as many a Scot did before him since the days of the Scots Guards. But when he felt himself a-dying, he asked leave of the English government to come home, and he would not die till he laid himself down in his room in the tower. Then he gave directions for his funeral, how none were to be asked of the county folk but Drummonds and Hays and Stewarts from Blair Athole and such like that had been out with the Prince. And he made his wife promise that she would have him dressed for his coffin as he fought on Culloden field, for he had kept the clothes.

"Then he asked that the window should be opened that he might hear the lilting of the burn below; and he called for my father, who was only a young lad, and commanded him to enter one of the Scottish regiments and be a loyal kingsman, since all was over with the Stewarts.

"He said a prayer and kissed his wife's hand, being a courtly gentleman, and died listening to the sound of the water running over the stones in the den below."

"It was as good as dying on the field," said Kate, her face flushing with pride; "that is an ancestor worth remembering. And did he get a worthy funeral?"

"More than he asked for; his old comrades gathered from far and near, and some of the chiefs that were out of hiding came down, and they brought him up this very road, with the pipers playing before the coffin. Fifty gentlemen buried John Carnegie, and every man of them had been out with the Prince.

"When they gathered in the stone hall you 'ill see soon, his friend-in-arms, Patrick Murray, gave three toasts. The first was 'the king,' and every man bared his head; the second was 'to him that is gone;' the third was 'to the friends that are far awa';' and then one of the chiefs proposed another, 'to the men of Culloden;' and after that every gentleman dashed his glass on the floor. Though he was only a little lad at the time, my father never forgot the sight.

"He also told me that my grandmother never shed a tear, but looked prouder than he ever saw her, and before they left the hall she bade each gentleman good-by, and to the chief she spoke in Gaelic, being of Cluny's blood and a gallant lady.

"Another thing she did also which the lad could not forget, for she brought down her husband's sword from the room in the turret, and Patrick Murray, of the House of Athole, fastened it above the big fireplace, where it hangs unto this day, crossed now with my father's, as you will see, Kate, unless we stand here all day going over old stories."

"They're glorious stories, dad; why didn't you tell them to me before? I want to get into the spirit of the past and feel the Carnegie blood swinging in my veins before we come to the Lodge. What did they do afterwards, or was that all?"

"They mounted their horses in the courtyard, and as each man passed out of the gate he took off his hat and bowed low to the widow, who stood in a window I will show you, and watched till the last disappeared into the avenue; but my father ran out and saw them ride down the road in order of threes, a goodly company of gentlemen. But this sight is better than horsemen and swords."

They were now in the hollow between the kirk and the Lodge, a cup of greenery surrounded by wood. Behind, they still saw the belfry through the beeches; before, away to the right, the gray stone of a turret showed among the trees. The burn that sang to Black John ran beneath them with a pleasant sound, and fifty yards of turf climbed up to the cottage where the old road joined the new, and the avenue of the Lodge began. Over this ascent the branches met, through which the sunshine glimmered and flickered, and down the center came a white and brown cow in charge of an old woman.

"It's Bell Robb, that lives in the cottage there among the bushes. I was at the parish school with her, Kate—she's just my age—for we were all John Thamson's bairns in those days, and got our learning and our licks together, laird's son and cottar's daughter.

"People would count it a queer mixture nowadays, but there were some advantages in the former parish school idea; there were lots of cleverer subalterns in the old regiment, but none knew his men so well as I did. I had played and fought with their kind. Would you mind saying a word to Bell . . . just her name or something?" for this was a new life to the pride of the regiment, as they called Kate, and Carnegie was not sure how she might take it. Kate was a lovable lass, but, like every complete woman, she had a temper and a stock of prejudices. She was bon camerade with all true men, although her heart was whole, and with a few women that did not mince their words or carry two faces; but Kate had claws inside the velvet, and once she so handled with her tongue a young fellow who offended her that he sent in his papers. What she said was not much, but it was memorable, and every word drew blood. Her father was never quite certain what she would do, although he was always sure of her love.

---

[1] Copyright, 1896, by John Watson.

"Do you suppose, dad, that I'm to take up with all your friends of the jackdaw days? You seem to have kept fine company." Kate was already out of the dog-cart, and now took Bell by the hand.

"I am the General's daughter, and he was telling me that you and he were playmates long ago. You 'ill let me come to see you, and you 'ill tell me all his exploits when he was John Carnegie?"

"To think he minded me, an' him sae lang awa' at the weary wars." Bell was between the laughing and the crying. "We're lifted to know oor laird's a General, and that he's gotten sic honor. There's nae bluid like the auld bluid, an' the Carnegies cud aye afford tae be hamely.

"Ye're like him," and Bell examined Kate carefully; "but a' can tell yir mither's dochter, a weel-faured mettlesome lady as wes ever seen; wae's me, wae's me for the wars," at the sight of Carnegie's face; "but ye 'ill come in to see Marjorie. A'll mak her ready," and Bell hurried into the cottage.

"Marjorie has been blind from her birth. She was the pet of the school, and now Bell takes care of her. Davidson was telling me that she wanted to support Marjorie off the wages she earns as a field-hand on the farms, and the parish had to force half a crown a week on them; but hear this."

"Never mind hoo ye look," Bell was speaking. "A' canna' keep them waitin' till ye be snoddit."

"Gie me ma kep, at ony rate, that the minister brocht frae Perth, and Drumsheugh's shawl; it wudna be respecfu' to oor Laird, an' it his first veesit;" and there was a note of refinement in the voice, as of one living apart.

"Yes, I'm here, Marjorie," and the General stooped over the low bed where the old woman was lying, "and this is my daughter, the only child left me; you would hear that all my boys were killed."

"We did that, and we were a' wae for ye; a' thocht o' ye and a' saw ye in yir sorrow, for them 'at canna see ootside see the better inside. But it 'ill be some comfort to be in the hame o' yir people aince mair, and to ken ye've dune yir wark weel. It's pleasant for us to think the licht 'ill be burnin' in the windows o' the Lodge again, and that ye're come back aifter the wars.

"Miss Kate, wull ye lat me pass ma hand ower yir face, an' then a'll ken what like ye are better nor some 'at hes the joy o' seein' ye wi' their een. . . . The Glen 'ill be the happier for the sicht o' ye; a' thank ye for yir kindness to a puir woman."

"If you begin to pay compliments, Marjorie, I'll tell you what I think of that cap; for the pink is just the very shade for your complexion, and it's a perfect shape."

"Ma young minister, Maister Carmichael, seleckit it in Muirtown, an' a' heard that he went ower sax shops to find one to his fancy; he never forgets me, an' he wrote me a letter on his holiday. A'body likes him for his bonnie face an' honest ways."

"Oh, I know him already, Marjorie, for he drove up with us, and I thought him very nice; but we must go, for you know I've not yet seen our home, and I'm just tingling with curiosity."

"You 'ill not leave without breakin' bread; it's little we hae, but we can offer ye oat-cake an' milk in token o' oor loyalty;" and then Bell brought the elements of Scottish food; and when Marjorie's lips moved in prayer as they ate, it seemed to Carnegie and his daughter like a sacrament. So the two went from the fellowship of the poor to their ancient house.

They drove along the avenue between the stately beeches that stood on either side and reached out their branches, almost but not quite unto meeting, so that the sun, now in the south, made a train of light down which the General and Kate came home. At the end of the beeches the road wheeled to the right, and Kate saw for the first time the dwelling-place of her people. Tochty Lodge was of the fourth period of Scottish castellated architecture, and till it fell into disrepair was a very perfect example of the sixteenth-century mansion-house, where strength of defense could not yet be dispensed with, for the Carnegies were too near the Highland border to do without thick walls or to risk habitation on the ground floor. The buildings had first been erected on the L plan, and then had been made into a quadrangle, so that on the left was the main part, with a tower at the southwest corner over the den, and a wing at the southeast coming out to meet the gate. On the northeast and north were a tower and rooms now in ruins, and along the west ran a wall some six feet high with a stone walk three feet from the top, whence you could look down on the burn. A big gateway, whose doors were of oak studded with nails, with a grated lattice for observation, gave entrance to the courtyard. In the center of the yard there was an ancient oak and a draw well whose water never failed. The eastern face was bare of ivy, except at the north corner, where stood the jackdaws' tower; but the rough gray stone was relieved by the tendrils and red blossoms of the hardy tropiolum, which despises the rich soil of the south and the softer air, and grows luxuriantly on our homely northern houses. As they came to the gateway, the General bade Kate pull up and read the scroll above, which ran in clear-cut stone letters—

TRY AND THEN
TRVST BETTER GVDE
ASSVRANCE
BOT TRVST NOT OR YE TRY FOR FEAR OF REPENTANCE

"We've been a slow dour race, Kit, who never gave our heart lightly, but having given it never played the traitor. Fortune has not favored us, for acre after acre has gone from our hands, but, thank God, we've never had dishonor."

"And never will, dad, for we are the last of the race."

Janet Macpherson was waiting in the deep doorway of the tower, and gave Kate welcome as one whose ancestors had for three generations served the Carnegies, since the day Black John had married a Macpherson.

"Calf of my heart," she cried, and took Kate in her arms. "It iss your foster mother that will be glad to see you in the home of your people, and will be praying that God will give you peace and good days."

Then they went up the winding stone stair, with deep, narrow windows, and came into the dining-hall where the fifty Jacobites toasted the king and many a gathering had taken place in the olden time. It was thirty-five feet long by fifteen broad, and twenty-two feet high. The floor was of flags over arches below, and the bare stone walls showed at the windows and above the black oak paneling which reached ten feet from the ground. The fireplace was six feet high, and so wide that two could sit on either side within. Upon the mantelpiece the Carnegie arms stood out in bold relief under the two crossed swords. One or two portraits of dead Carnegies and some curious weapons broke the monotony of the walls, and from the roof hung a finely wrought iron candelabra. The western portion of the hall was separated by a screen of open woodwork, and made a pleasant dining-room. A door in the corner led into the tower, which had a library, with Carnegie's bedroom above, and higher still Kate's room, each with a tiny dressing-closet. For the Carnegies always lived together in this tower, and their guests at the other end of the hall. The library had two windows. From one you could look down and see nothing but the foliage of the den, with a gleam of water where the burn made a pool, and from the other you looked over a meadow with big trees to the Tochty sweeping round a bend, and across to the high opposite banks covered with brushwood. First they visited Carnegie's room.

"Here have we been born, and died if we did not fall in battle, and it's not a bad billet, after all, for an old soldier. Yes, that is your mother when we were married, but I like this one better," and the General touched his breast, for he carried his love next his heart in a silver locket of curious design.

Three fine deerskins lay on the floor, and one side of the room was hung with tapestry; but the most striking piece of furnishing in the room was an oak cupboard, sunk a foot into the wall.

"I'll show you something in that cabinet after luncheon, Kate; but now let's see your room."

"How beautiful! and how cunning you have been," and then she took an inventory of the furniture, all new, but all in keeping with the age of the room. "You have spent far too much on a very self-willed and bad-tempered girl, and all I can do is to make you promise that you will come up here sometimes and let me give you tea in this window-seat, where we can see the woods and the Tochty."

"Well, Donald," said the General at table to his faithful servant, "how do you think Drumtochty will suit you?"

"Any place where you and Miss Kate will be living is a good place for me, and there are six, or maybe four, men I hef been meeting that hef the language, but not good Gaelic—just poor Perthshire talk," for Donald was a West Highlander, and prided himself on his better speech.

"And what about a kirk, Donald? Aren't you Free like Janet?"

"Oh, yes, I am Free; but it iss not to that kirk I will be going to here, and I am telling Janet that she will be caring more about a man that has a pleasant way with him that about the truth."

"What's wrong with things, Donald, since we lay in Edinburgh twenty years ago, and you used to give me bits of the Free Kirk sermons?"

"It iss all wrong that they hef been going these last years, for they stand to sing and they sit to pray, and they will be using human hymns. And it iss great pieces of the Bible they hef cut out, and I am told that they are not done yet, but are going from bad to worse," and Donald invited questioning.

"What more are they after, man?"

"It will be myself that has found it out, and it iss only what might be expected, but I am not saying that you will be believing me."

"Out with it, Donald; let's hear what kind of people we've come amongst."

"They've been just fairly left to themselves, and the godless bodies hef taken to watering the whisky."

CHAPTER IV.—A SECRET CHAMBER

"The cabinet now, dad, and at once," when they went up the stairs and were standing in the room. "Just give me three guesses about the mystery; but first let me examine."

It was pretty to see Kate opening the doors, curiously carved with hunting scenes, and searching the interior, tapping with her knuckles and listening for a hollow sound.

"Is it a treasure we are to find? Then that's one point. Not in the cabinet? I have it; there is a door into some other place; am n't I right?"

"Where could it be? We're in a tower cut off from the body of the Lodge, with a room above and a room below;" and the General sat down to allow full investigation.

After many journeys up and down the stair, and many questions that brought no light, Kate played a woman's trick up in her room.

"The General wishes to show me the concealed room in this tower, Janet, or whatever you call it. Would you kindly tell us how to get entrance? You needn't come down; just explain to me;" and Kate was very pleasant indeed.

"Yes, I am hearing there is a room in the tower, Miss Kate, that strangers will not be able to find; and it would be very curious if the Carnegies did not have a safe place for an honest gentleman when he was in a little trouble. All the good houses will have their secret places, and it will not be easy to find some of them. Oh, no; now I will remember one at Glamis Castle . . ."

"Never mind Glamis, nurse, for the General is waiting. Where is the spring? Is it in the oak cabinet?"

"It will be good for the General to be resting himself after his luncheon, and he will be thinking many things in his room. Oh, yes," continued Janet, settling herself down to narrative, and giving no heed to Kate's beguiling ways, "old Mary that died near a hundred would be often telling me stories of the old days when I wass a little girl, and the one I liked best wass about the hiding of the Duke of Perth."

"You will tell me that to-morrow, when I come down to see your house, Janet, and to-day you 'ill tell me how to open the spring."

"But it would be a pity not to finish the story about the Duke of Perth, for it goes well, and it will be good for a Carnegie to hear it." And Kate flung herself into the window-seat, but was hugely interested all the same.

"Mary was sitting at her door in the evening, and that would be three days after Culloden, for the news had been sent by a sure hand from the Laird, when a man came riding along the road, and as soon as Mary saw him she knew he was somebody. But perhaps it will be too long a story," and Janet began to arrange dresses in a wardrobe.

"No, no; as you have begun it, I want to hear the end; but quick, for there's the room to see and the rest of the Lodge before it grows dark. What like was he?"

"He wass a man that looked as if he would be commanding, but his clothes were common gray, and stained with the road. He wass very tired, and could hardly hold himself up in the saddle, and his horse wass covered with foam.

"'Is this Tochty Lodge?' he asked, softening his voice as one trying to speak humbly. 'I am passing this way, and have a message for Mistress Carnegie; think you that I can have speech of her quietly?'

"So Mary will go up and tell the lady that one wass waiting to see her, and that he seemed a noble gentleman. When they came down to the courtyard he had drawn water for his horse from the well, and wass giving him to drink, thinking more of the beast that had borne him than of his own need, as became a man of birth.

"At the sight of the lady he took off his bonnet and bowed low, and asked if he might have a private audience, to which Mistress Carnegie replied, 'We are private here,' and asked, 'Have you been with my son?'

"'We fought together for the Prince three days since—my name is Perth. I am escaping for my life, and desire a brief rest, if it please you, and bring no danger to your house.'

"'Ye had been welcome, my Lord Duke,' and Mary used to show how her mistress straightened herself, 'though you were the poorest soldier that had drawn his sword for the good cause, and ye will stay here till it be safe for you to escape to France.'

"He was four weeks hidden in the room, and although the soldiers searched all the house, they could never find the place, and Mrs. Carnegie put scorn upon them, asking why they did her so much honor and whom they sought. Oh, yes, it wass a cunning place for the bad times, and you will be pleased to see it."

"And the secret, Janet," cried Kate, her hand upon the door; "you know it quite well."

"So does the General, Catherine of my heart," said Janet, "and he will be liking to show it himself."

So Kate departed in a rage, and gave orders that there be no more delay, for she would not spend an afternoon seeking for rat-holes.

"No rat-hole, Kit, but a very fair chamber for a hunted man; it is twenty years and more since this door opened last, for none knows the trick of it save Janet and myself. There it goes."

A panel in the back of the cabinet slid aside behind its neighbor, and left a passage through which one could squeeze himself with an effort.

"We go up a stair now, and must have light; a candle will do; the air is perfectly pure, for there's plenty of ventilation;" and then they crept up by steps in the thickness of the walls, till they stood in a chamber under six feet high, but otherwise as large as the bedroom below. The walls were lined with wood, and there were two tiny slits that gave air, but hardly any light. The only furniture in the room was an oaken chest, clasped with iron and curiously locked.

"Our plate-chest, Kit; but there's not much silver and gold in it, worse luck for you, lassie; in fact, we're a pack of fools to set store by it. There's nothing in the kist but some old clothes, and perhaps some buckles and such like. I dare say there is a lock of hair also. Some day we will have a look inside."

"To-day, instantly," and Kate shook her father. "You are a dreadful hypocrite, for I can see that you would rather Tochty were burned down than this box be lost. Are there any relics of Prince Charlie in it? Quick!"

"Be patient; it's a difficult key to turn; there now;" but there was not much to see—only pieces of woolen cloth tightly folded down.

"Call Janet, Kate, for she ought to see this opening; and we 'ill carry everything down to my room, for no one could tell what like things are in this gloom.

"Yes, Perth lived here for weeks, and used to go up to the gallery where Black John's mother sat with her maid; but the son was hiding in the North, and never reached his house till he came to die."

First of all they came upon a ball dress of the former time, of white silk, with a sash of Macpherson tartan, besides much fine lace.

"That is the dress your grandmother wore as a bride at the Court of Versailles in the seventies. She was only a lassie, and seemed like her husband's daughter. The Prince danced with her, and they counted the dress something to be kept, and that night Lochiel and Cluny also had a reel with Sheena Carnegie, while Black John looked like a young man, for he had been too sorely wounded to be able to dance with her himself." And then the General carried down with his own hands a Highland gentleman's evening dress, trews of the Royal tartan, and a velvet coat with silver buttons, and a light plaid of fine cloth.

"And this was her husband's dress that night; but why the Stewart tartan?"

"No, lassie, that is the suit the Prince wore at Holyrood, where he gave a great ball after Prestonpans, and danced with the Edinburgh ladies. It was smuggled across to France at last with other things of the Prince's, and he gave it to Carnegie.

"It will remind you of our great days," he said, "when the Stewarts saw their friends in Mary's Palace."

Last of all, the General lifted out a casket and laid it on his table. Within it was a brooch, such as might once have been worn either by a man or a woman; diamonds set in gold, and in the midst a lock of fair hair.

"Is it really, father? . . ." And Kate took the jewel in her hand.

"Yes, the Prince's hair—his wedding present to Sheena Macpherson."

Kate kissed it fervently, and passed it to Janet, who placed it carefully in the box, while the General made believe to laugh.

"Your mother wore the brooch on great occasions, and you will do the same, Kit, for auld lang syne. There are two or three families left in Perthshire that will like to see it on your breast."

"Yes, and there will maybe be more than two or three that will like to see the lady that wears it." This from Janet.

"Your compliments are a little late, and you may keep them to yourself, Janet; it would have been kinder to tell me . . ."

"Tell you what?" And the General looked very provoking.

"I hate to be beaten." Kate first looked angry, and then laughed. "What else is there to see?"

"There is the gallery, which is the one feature in our poor house, and we will try to reach it from the Duke's hiding-place, for it was a cleverly designed hole, and had its stair up as well as down." And then they all came out into one of the strangest rooms you could find in Scotland, and one that left a pleasant picture in their minds who had seen it lit of a winter night, and the wood burning on the hearth, and Kate dancing a reel with Lord Hay or some other brisk young man, while the General looked on from one of the deep window recesses.

The gallery extended over the hall and Kate's drawing-room, and measured fifty feet long from end to end. The upper part of the walls was divided into compartments by an arcading, made of painted pilasters and flat arches. Each compartment had a motto, and this was on one side of the fireplace:

A · nice · wyfe · and
A · back doore
Oft · maketh · a rich
Man . poore.

And on the other:

Give liberalye
To neidſvl · folke ·
Denye · nane · of ·
Them · al · for · litle
Thow · knawest · heir
In · this lyfe · of what Chaunce · may · the Befall.

The glory of the gallery, however, was its ceiling, which was of the seventeenth-century work, and so wonderful that many learned persons used to come and study it. After the great disaster when the Lodge was sold and allowed to fall to pieces, this fine work went first, and now no one examining its remains could have imagined how wonderful it was, and in its own way how beautiful. This ceiling was of wood, painted, and semi-elliptical in form, and one wet day, when we knew not what else to do, Kate and I counted more than three hundred panels. It was an arduous labor for the neck, and the General refused to help us; but I am sure that we did not make too many, for we worked time about, while the General took note of the figures, and our plan was that each finished his tale of work at some amazing beast, so that we could make no mistake. Some of the panels were circles, and they were filled in with coats-of-arms; some were squares, and they contained a bestiary of that day. It was hard indeed to decide whether the circles or the squares were more interesting. The former had the arms of every family in Scotland that had the remotest connection with the Carnegies, and besides swept in a wider field, comprising David King of Israel, who was placed near Hector of Troy, and Arthur of Brittany not far from Moses—all of whom had appropriate crests and mottoes. In the center were the arms of our Lord Christ as Emperor of Judea, and the chief part of them was the Cross. But it came upon one with a curious shock to see this coat among the shields of Scottish nobles. There were beasts that could be recognized at once, and these were sparingly named; but others were astounding, and above them were inscribed titles such as these: Shoe-lyon, Musket, Ostray; and one fearsome animal in the center was designated the Ram of Arabia. This display of heraldry and natural history was reinforced by the cardinal virtues in seventeenth-century dress: Charitas as an elderly female of extremely forbidding aspect, receiving two very imperfectly clad children; and Temperantia as a furious-looking person—male on the whole rather than female—pouring some liquor—surely water—from a jug into a cup, with averted face, and leaving little to be desired. The afternoon sun shining in through a western window and lingering among the black and white tracery, so that the marking of a shield came into relief or a beast suddenly glared down on one, had a weird, old-world effect.

"It's half an armory and half a menagerie," said Kate, "and I think we 'ill have tea in the library with the windows open to the Glen." And so they sat together in quietness, with books of heraldry and sport and ancient Scottish classics and such like round them, while Janet went out and in.

"So Donald has been obliged to leave his kirk;" for Kate had not yet forgiven Janet. "He says it's very bad here; I hope you won't go to such a place."

"What would Donald Macdonald be saying against it?" inquired Janet, severely.

"Oh, I don't remember—lots of things. He thought you were making too much of the minister."

"The minister iss a good man, and hass some Highland blood in him, though he hass lost his Gaelic, and he will be very pleasant in the house.

"If I wass seeing a sheep, and it will be putting on this side and that, and quarreling with everybody, do you know what I will be thinking?"

"That's Donald, I suppose; well?"

"I will say to myself, that sheep iss a goat." And Janet left the room with the laurels of victory.

[To be continued in the February Magazine Number of The Outlook]

Books and Authors

Walter Pater's Last Essays[1]

Walter Pater

This last volume, now posthumously published, of Mr. Pater's essays is made up almost entirely of the work of the last few years of his life. It contains also a curious study, printed as "the only specimen known to be preserved of those early essays . . . by which his literary gifts were first made known to the small circle of his Oxford friends," and the exquisite "Child in the House," which, though published seventeen years ago, has only of late come to general notice. But the other essays come within the last five years, and as a whole the book gives a good idea of the later developments of Mr. Pater's work and thought.

Like Matthew Arnold and Ruskin, Mr. Pater was always interested in art, not for itself alone, but in its relation to life. He wanted always to know, not merely what it was, in what forms it was manifest, but what kind of element it made in the great complex of circumstance that envelops each one of us. Indeed, in his real interest in actual life he went far beyond the two other great critics of our time, having in fact such a feeling for concrete humanity that he was himself not merely a critic, but a creative artist as well, and hence came "Marius the Epicurean" and the "Imaginary Portraits," of which, by the way, three are contained in this volume, as fine as any of the others. Matthew Arnold regarded literature as a sort of guide to conduct, but always in a largely intellectual way. Ruskin looked at all art as didactic, and at almost all works of art as symbolizing universal ideas. But Pater always sought for the actual people who had produced any artistic thing; he always strove to see the artist behind and in his work.

The particular direction which this effort took was toward an emphasizing of the representative character of style. Where Ruskin presents at length the allegoric significance of the quatrefoils in the façade of Amiens, Mr. Pater is interested in the cathedral as being one of "the grand and beautiful people's churches of the thirteenth century," so that he chooses as a companion study (both essays are here republished) the monastic church of Vézelay. The way in which the style represented the artist, the personal note in style, that was Mr. Pater's great interest, even as in the lecture on Mérimée here, where "Mérimée's superb self-effacement, his impersonality" is the personal trait. In his earlier work other principles seemed more important to Mr. Pater, but as he grew older this one seems to have become more dominant.

This idea, however, even when urgently insisted upon, is not in itself strikingly original; in Mr. Pater's mind it seems to have been connected with another: not the representative quality of style only, but the moral quality of it, the formative power of good style, the transmutation, in a way, not here of conduct into expression, but of expression back again into conduct. The formative power of style—he never stated exactly his conception of it. In his earlier days he pressed his conviction that the function of art was to give the highest quality to the passing moment; pressed it in a manner so focused and surcharged that it is not easily forgotten. But the later conception, that style may be a force in life, an influence on character, this idea never came to perfectly definite expression in Mr. Pater's work. It is by stray hints here and there that one becomes conscious of it—by stray hints and by its reflection on his own writing. In the last chapter of "Plato and Platonism" is there something approaching a clear statement, but in this volume only dim allusions. Still, this vaguer, less definite conception of the influence of art in life seems largely to have taken the place of the earlier theory which has offended so many who only half understood it.

If, however, this last volume gives us no new light upon the problem opened in the last lecture on Plato, it does show us clearly enough another development of the representative power of style, and that in the style of Mr. Pater himself. His earlier way of writing—the Conclusion to "The Renaissance" is the best example, although the passage on La Gioconda seems to be most quoted—his earlier style has here given place to a mode of expression very different. We have an example of the early work in the Oxford essay in this volume, which forms a quaint contrast with the writing of later years—a sort of journeyman's masterpiece, it seems. Interesting also is this lecture on Mérimée, which in the beginning is as diamond-like as if he had written it twenty years ago, perhaps consciously so with a view to its subject. But in a few pages we have the later style, the suggestion, the colloquial tone, which marks all his later writings. Instead of the clear, direct statements, we have all the armory of suggestion, the conjecture, the approximation, the remark to the reader, the exclamation. And, instead of the brilliancy and grace of literary tradition, we have countless indications of an effort to come nearer to real speech. So his style becomes less and less of a formal court costume, and more and more the every-day working-dress of an intense and cultivated intellect. To some degree also is it the mirror—and here let us recall that idea that style has a formative power, a molding quality—the mirror, not so much of Mr. Pater's actual temper, probably, as of the temper which we may think one of his ideals. Sensitive it is, subtle enough, and yet masculine and persistently truthful, putting persuasion in the place of crying and striving, attaining its end by reasonable influence instead of by authority, looking on all sides of the matter, dissatisfied with cut-and-dried conventionalities, scholarly but not pedantic, and therefore clear-sighted and keen, judging possibilities and probabilities rather than setting the thing down ex cathedra, and very human all the time, speaking to the reader as a friend to a friend. And all these characteristics, which might be of a man rather than of a way of writing, may have been to some extent qualities of the temper which Mr. Pater conceived of as best for one who would see clearly all the shows of this world, what they were, and through them all—whatever such a one might see.

◆

The theory of evolution and the theology of the divine immanence fit together, as is obvious to any one. W. F. English, of the First Congregational Church of East Windsor, Conn., has ventured to put this famous thought of Hegel's into a popular form in the way of an essay on natural theology, entitled Evolution and the Immanent God. (The Arena Publishing Company, Boston.) The special value of Mr. English's essay lies, not in any originality of thought, but in his application of the principle to many details of theology, such as the question of providence, miracles, prayer, immortality, and the like. As a contribution to a higher and less materialistic idea of God this book may be welcomed.

---

[1] Miscellaneous Studies by Walter Pater. Prepared for the Press by Charles L. Shadwell. Macmillan & Co., New York. $1.75.

Novels and Tales

The artist is often revealed as strongly in small things as in great. Mr. S. J. Weyman's The Little Wizard is short and slight, but, within its chosen limits, is a thoroughly artistic bit of fiction. Its hero is a little Royalist lad of the times of Charles I., who falls among rustic fanatics and, by an odd train of events, becomes suspected of being endowed with witch powers and of bringing a storm to hinder the march of Cromwell's army. The brief glimpse of Cromwell himself is admirably given. The close is dramatically managed and effective. (R. F. Fenno & Co., New York.)

Mr. J. A. Mitchell, the editor of "Life," has tried his hand at a tale of the marvelous. The hero of his story (the heir of an East Indian kingdom, but transported as a boy to a Connecticut farm) has the gift of seeing exact pictures of future events, and the peculiar difficulty of his position when he thus sees the manner of his own death just before his marriage is ingeniously dwelt upon. There is plenty of invention in the story and some humor, though not as much as might be hoped for in the editor of our best humorous paper. But it cannot be said that it has the merit of being a reflection of nature or life. (Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.)

Mr. John Fox, Jr., is a worthy follower of Miss Murfree in treating the Southern mountain life with imaginative force. Like Miss Murfree, he faithfully reproduces dialect to an extent that sometimes becomes wearisome; but there are back of the dialect life, passion, and incident. In A Cumberland Vendetta, and Other Stories the tale which gives name to the book is much the best in the volume. (Harper & Brothers, New York.)

One suspects the decadent when one reads the title of the new novel by Mr. Percy White, the author of "Mr. Bailey-Martin." Yet Corruption is not a morbid book. It deals with a wretched failure of a man's life through an entanglement of passion. The fall of the clever politician and possible great statesman is as pitiable as it is complete, and the positive moral lesson is absolutely obvious. The realism of the book is distinct but not disagreeable. If it be allowable to treat the topic at all, it must be admitted that the method here is manly and free from objectionable purpose. From the literary standpoint the author's style is hard and unsympathetic, but he has force and clearness. (D. Appleton & Co., New York.)

Galloping Dick, as portrayed by H. B. Marriott Watson, is a sturdy rogue and highwayman of the Claude Duval type. His impudence leads him into extraordinary adventures with a bishop, a rebel, an elegant lady of the court, and even with "Old Rowley," or King Charles II. in person. It cannot be said that there is profit to be found in these tales, but that the author has the power of creating a character and making his narrative and his diction fit the times of which he writes cannot be denied. There is even a trace of the Stevensonian delicacy of touch here and there, and notably in the adventure with the bishop. The coarseness of manners of the day is by no means disguised. The story cannot be commended for universal reading. (Stone & Kimball, Chicago.)

Mrs. Katharine Tynan Hinkson is one of the strongest poets and sketch-writers in the interesting group of the younger Irish authors. In The Way of a Maid she gives us a novel of Irish life which is charming in so far as it is a transcript of actual nature, but fails when it plunges into the depths of imaginative passion. The author's forte is with the simple, the natural, and the actual. Her characters are better than her plot. There is a great deal of promise in the novel, but we cannot think it equal to some of her slighter stories and sketches. (Dodd, Mead & Co., New York.)

Mr. Julian Ralph, in People We Pass, comes very close to the line that separates strong, original fiction from the clever newspaper man's presentation of what he sees about him. In these stories the "people" are avowedly types of New York East Side dwellers. Mr. Ralph has done much more than catch the slang, dialect, and swagger of the East Side streets. He has found the point of view that explains motive and character. The incidents as well as the people are typical. The book is admirably illustrated. (Harper & Brothers, New York.)

We had thought that we never wanted to see another novel of the French Revolution, but The Veil of Liberty: A Tale of the Girondins, by Peronne, has caused us to recant. It is a graceful story, gracefully narrated, and about a section of that great movement not commonly taken by the novel-writers as a subject. The plot is well managed and the characters are developed in a rational fashion. It is not a "blood and thunder" story, but a highly moral tale. The outcome is somewhat depressing, as would be expected from the title. The author professes to follow history closely in delineation of plot and of characters. (Macmillan & Co., New York.)

John Darker, a novel by Aubrey Lee, is a story upon which a considerable amount of talent has been wasted. The idea of the story is novel, the plot is ingenious, the people and places are vividly described. The author has a power of description almost photographic. The characters are fairly well developed, and the result of the action of the story is poetically just. On the other hand, one lays down the book with the question, To what purpose is such a story written, and what does it signify? It is a long-drawn-out chronicle of commonplaces; nowhere does the story rise to a high moral or intellectual plane. From beginning to end we traverse a dull, low level of mediocrity. There are many words and many pages, and they signify nothing. It is form without substance. (Macmillan & Co., New York.)

In our opinion, Lilith: A Romance, by George Macdonald, is a menace to the reason of the reader. It is an allegory wherein dream passes into reality and reality shades into dream by such indefinable degrees that it is not possible to tell where the dividing line lies. The motive-idea of the story is a magic mirror, through which one steps into a world of the higher dimensions, and in this world encounters Adam's first wife, Lilith, with other extraordinary allegorical personages, and thus passes through a romance of moral life which is figured under a series of exciting adventures. The story is not grotesque; it is uncanny, yet undoubtedly possesses literary power and moral excellence, if only we could guess the interpretation of the author's difficult parable. It resembles the shifting phantasmagoria of an opium dream. (Dodd, Mead & Co., New York.)

Dean Farrar, of Canterbury, has put forth a new story, Gathering Clouds: A Tale of the Days of St. Chrysostom, which is in some sort a companion to the story called "Darkness and Dawn." The period of history treated in "Gathering Clouds" is, as all students know, singularly picturesque. The social and political life of Constantinople were then in a state of ferment. Chrysostom was a man who united in himself, to an extent unusual, strength and sweetness of character. His faults were the errors of his time, his virtues belonged to his holy religion. The complications with which he was involved arose from many conflicting interests. All this Dean Farrar has treated with a certain fairness, though we cannot help feeling that at times he is unable to sympathize with the sincere conviction of the orthodox party. His story is a historical study, rather than a piece of fiction, a novel, or romance. He has allowed himself no liberties with facts, and his fancy plays only in the domain of the unknown. (Longmans, Green & Co., New York.)

The reasons may be physiological, or they may be industrial and economic, but, be they what they may, the dominant tendency of the intellectual world at the present day is towards a general pessimism and even cynicism. This tendency of human feeling has been made a study by Joseph Hocking in his novel All Men are Liars. The character that he has chosen to dissect is that of an intense, high-strung, noble-souled man, who is, by disappointment in his fellow-beings, driven to discouragement and to moral suicide. The book itself is saved from being unhealthy by the introduction of some true and worthy characters, who convince the hero, Stephen Edgcumbe, that there are some men, even if they be but few, who are true. While it may be true of thousands, as the bitter poet has said,

> They eat and drink and scheme and plod,
> They go to church on Sunday;
> And many are afraid of God,
> And more of Mrs. Grundy, it is not true of all. There are undoubtedly left at least ten thousand in Israel who have not bowed the knee to Balaam or kissed the calves. The literary form of this novel is good. It is the work of a practiced hand, and this, united with its excellent moral effect, renders it a story to be commended. (Roberts Brothers, Boston.)

Teachers of German will welcome the publication of a new book containing three stories, with capital notes and a grammatical appendix of peculiar excellence. The stories are Goethe's "Die neue Melusine," Zschokke's "Der tote Gast," and Kleist's "Die Verlobung in St. Domingo." The editing is done by Professor A. B. Nichols, of Harvard. (Henry Holt & Co., New York.)

The author of A Hard Woman: A Story in Scenes, by Violet Hunt, believes that she (or he) has depicted a type of a large class. The class in reality is not large, though it does really exist. The hard woman, whose only idea is social success, is not as numerous as the novel-writers would have us believe; nevertheless, the character of Mrs. Munday, "the hard woman," is admirably shown in all its phases. The portrait is true to facts. The only thing about this story that is not typical is that the hard woman breaks down. In real life this is the exception, not the rule. As for the rest, the dialogue is sparkling, the narrative moves on rapidly, and the diction is sufficient for the purpose. In short, it is a novel not wholly unworthy of reading. (D. Appleton & Co., New York.)

The Religious Outlook in Japan[1]

By the Rev. D. C. Greene, D.D.

A WELL-KNOWN Japanese writer, now in America, has recently declared his conviction that the civilization of the West has reached its height, and that its power of self-development is exhausted. However, he is confident that a new life from Japan is to be infused into this apparently decadent civilization, and that under the leadership of his countrymen the world will advance to a future more glorious than its brightest dreams. In varying terms, the same optimistic prophecy of the part Japan is to play on the world's stage finds daily expression in the public press of its larger cities.

While we may hesitate to accept these views, there can be no question that the growing consciousness of strength on the part of the people of Japan must lead to an unusual intellectual activity, and to an honorable share in the varied work of the world. At this crisis in her history, when the minds of all classes are filled with such bright hopes, the religious condition and prospects of her people are worthy of special study.

As is well known, two religions, Shintoism and Buddhism, have struggled for the mastery on Japanese soil. There has been no complete victory for either, but gradually a modus vivendi has been secured. No distinct line of demarcation has separated the followers of the two systems, neither has there been an amalgamation of the two, yet nearly every man, unless a priest (and sometimes even then), has worshiped impartially at both Shinto and Buddhist shrines. Shintoism, whether indigenous or not, dates from the very dawn of history, and is associated with all the legends from prehistoric times, but especially with the early glories of the imperial house. Hence its worship is by many identified with patriotism and loyalty. Buddhism, on the other hand, was introduced from China and Corea in the sixth century. Its missionaries brought with them the arts and literature of the Chinese civilization. Though persecuted for a time, they soon made themselves essential to the life of the nation, and early gained so much influence with the governing classes that Buddhism seemed to be supreme. The wealth and magnificence of its temples and monasteries were in striking contrast with the simplicity, though sometimes the stately simplicity, of the Shinto miya, "the honorable houses."

When, however, the old feudal system gave way, and a centralized government was "restored," as the Japanese insist upon saying, Buddhism, which had owed much to the old shogunates, lost its wealth and prestige. Shintoism, on the other hand, began to reassert itself, to claim to be the only true expression of loyalty, and to teach a special system of ethics founded on this one doctrine of loyalty. The stirring events of the past few years have called out many apostles of this doctrine, which, however noble may have been the purpose of its advocates, has unquestionably tended to dull the sense of social obligation. With the Chinese literature came the Confucian system of ethics, which soon rose to a commanding position in Japanese society. Shintoism was especially weak on its ethical side, but even Buddhist priests were glad to avail themselves of the teachings of Confucius. In their purer form these teachings found little currency outside the military class, but gradually they were in a measure popularized, and as thus modified came to be the main reliance for the moral instruction of the people.

When Christianity was brought to Japan by Xavier and his associates, the religious condition of the country seemed to augur a peaceful propagation of the new doctrines, but the imputation of political motives led to the well-known attempt to crush out the last remnants of the Christian faith. The work of the missionaries was more extensive than is generally supposed, and congregations were gathered in many places, even as far as Sendai, nearly 1,000 miles northeast of Nagasaki. The attempt to destroy this work was not entirely successful, and many thousands of Christians, the fruit of the old seed, were found near Nagasaki when the era of modern missions began in 1859. There is reason to believe that this widespread and persistent faith made a permanent impression upon the religious life of Japan. One meets here and there, especially in some of the irregular sects of Shintoism, forms of religious truth which certainly suggest a Christian origin. Some of these the Japanese associate with modern Christianity; but it is more probable that they indicate the working of the old leaven of Xavier's hiding.

With the opening of the country in 1859, Christianity came with new prestige, and associated with a more brilliant civilization. The efforts to take the civilization without the religion were earnest but futile. The first-fruits were early won among the Samurai, the intellectual leaders of the people. Even to-day a large share of the Protestant churches are in the old castle towns, and the number of Christian Samurai in the country at large is probably five or six times the normal proportion. These Christian Samurai are active, forth-putting men, whose influence is felt far outside of Christian circles. They have already furnished a Cabinet Minister, several Vice-Ministers, a Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, one Speaker and two Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole in the House of Commons of the National Diet, four or five professors in the Imperial University, besides many other high officials. In a recent number of the "Sun," the best known of Japan's periodicals, four of the leading articles were by Christian writers. The high degree of intellectual activity thus indicated must be borne in mind in any attempt to estimate the religious forces at work in Japan. The Christians themselves see in the influence they have gained a reminder of the great responsibility which rests upon them to maintain their intellectual independence, to mold the religious life of Japan, and to make it something more than a mere duplicate of that of Christian lands.

This desire for something new and distinctively their own, while natural and in a manner praiseworthy, tends to an undue emphasis upon the national element in the life of Western lands, and to an underestimate of the strong current which makes for unity. Many of these Christian scholars are well read in the literature of the West. Some of them have traveled widely and have observed carefully the institutions of many lands. But this ever-present stress upon the national element in history too often leads to a misinterpretation of the condition and tendency of Christian thought, and suggests the serious danger of a provincial form for Japanese Christianity.

Happily, however, the influence of Christianity is not seen alone in the writings of its leading men. There are in all over 100,000 enrolled Christians in Japan. Outside the churches there is also a wide penumbra composed of men who, while not always nor even generally attendants on Christian worship, are yet largely under the influence of the Christians, and are ready to accept their leadership in matters of social and political reform. Such men serve not only to increase the growing volume of Christian public sentiment, but also to secure to it a greater steadiness and breadth of purpose. Then, too, though it may be thought that Christian truth comes into Japan chiefly through the force of six hundred and more missionaries, there are many other avenues not less important. I do not wish to disparage the efficiency of this large body of Christian workers, nor that of the churches and other institutions which they have built up; I do not forget the more than 2,000,000 of portions of the Scriptures in the hands of the people, nor the 100,000 native Christians, nor the 7,000 scholars in Christian schools; but I do mean to emphasize the auxiliary forces, which, because they operate at more points, are yielding results not less important, and which embody a prophecy perhaps more sure.

---

[1] This article is the first in a series in which will be presented a view of the current conditions of religious thought in many of the countries of the world. Other articles will be by the Rev. A. M. Fairbairn, D.D., Principal of Mansfield College, Oxford, on "The Religious Outlook in England;" by M. Paul Sabatier, on "The Outlook in France;" by Dr. Adolph Harnack, on "The Religious Outlook in Germany;" by Mr. P. C. Mozoomdar, on "The Religious Outlook in India;" and by Miss Isabel F. Hapgood, on "The Religious Outlook in Russia."

The life of Western lands is making itself felt in Japan in numberless ways. If not already so, English literature will soon be better known in Japan than that of China. This literature is read partly in its English dress and partly in translations. There is also a rapidly growing native literature which embodies essentially Western thought. Under the influence of this literature, changes are taking place in the language which betoken a new attitude of mind. In the meantime the common-school system, culminating in the Imperial University, and the public press are propagating these new thoughts and this new attitude of mind in the most retired parts of the country. All these influences are intensified by the increasing intimacy of relation between Japan and the Great Powers, of which she even now claims to be one. The world has never before seen the attempt to transfer a nation from one civilization to another under conditions so favorable. Brought at first unwillingly into close relations with the greatest nations of the earth, Japan has become interested in the new life and ambitious for a conspicuous share in its activities. Her scholars have already gained recognition in some important departments as worthy contributors to the world's stock of knowledge. This sense of community of interest is heightened by the close contact created by more than weekly mails, by fast steamers, and daily telegrams from the centers of the world's life. Under such circumstances assimilation must be rapid, and it is no exaggeration to say that soon the line between the Occident and the Orient will pass through the Japan Sea.

THE AMERICAN BOARD DEPUTATION TO JAPAN

Rev. J. G. Johnston, D.D. Rev. A. H. Bradford, D.D.
Hon. William P. Ellison Rev. J. L. Barton, D.D.

The work of the missionaries and the Japanese Christians is supported at every point by this process of assimilation. On the other hand, the old religions, while preserving the form of life, cannot maintain themselves against the current of modern thought. Various attempts have been made to ally the Buddhism of Japan with the pantheism of Schopenhauer and Hartmann, but such an alliance does not and cannot interest the great mass of Buddhist believers. Complaints are made on every hand of the ignorance and immorality of the priesthood. Efforts at reform accomplish something, it is true, but the great reforming influence is that which goes forth from the Christian community, which, small though it be, has the ear of the public. The hold of the priesthood is relaxing, in spite of a few new and gorgeous temples, which might seem to indicate vigor and strength, and of their best efforts to adjust themselves to the new life about them. An attempt has been made to avail themselves of the late nationalistic reaction to join forces with Shintoism against Christianity, but it is plainly artificial and cannot long be maintained. The two sets of men who are thus brought together have little in common but their dread of the advancing Christianity.

The Shinto scholars, however, have gained a more legitimate advantage from the increasing influence of the Imperial House; but they, certainly the most thoughtful of them, feel that a new interpretation must be given to the doctrines of their faith, and they are beginning to proclaim them in terms of monotheism. Perhaps in part as a reaction from this rationalizing movement, many irregular Shinto sects are springing up, with which are associated phenomena akin to those which lie at the root of the so-called Christian Science. In one of the most important of these, the Tenrikyo, that is, the Teaching of the Heavenly Principles, which claims nearly two million adherents, there seems to be a marked tendency toward monotheism. It is chiefly noticeable because it illustrates how, under the influence of the common schools and the public press, even the ebullitions of superstition are restrained and made amenable to the general drift of public sentiment. At first anti-rationalistic, these new sects are compelled to rationalize, and will ere long lose their distinctive character and make way for a new and better movement. They mean, it would seem, the disintegration of the old religions; and I think the Buddhist priests, who are seriously alarmed, so understand them.

Perhaps no better illustration of the present ethico-religious revolution can be given than two remarkable addresses by prominent public men. The first which I will mention is that of Professor Iyenaga, of the Keio Gijiku, Mr. Fukuzawa's famous university. He took as his text the attempted assassination of Li Hung Chang, and set forth in a masterly manner the need of a new basis for the ethical instruction of the young men of Japan. He maintained that such acts could not be considered as mere sporadic cases of crime, but that they were the natural result of the Confucian system, and proved its incompatibility with the facts of modern life. It is essentially a feudalistic system, and does not contemplate the needs of the more complicated conditions of modern society. The other address was by the Minister of Education, Marquis Saionji. In almost identical terms the Marquis expressed his conviction, and indicated that the policy of his department would be in favor of a broader and more cosmopolitan view of social obligations. These two men do not speak for themselves alone; their speeches mark an epoch in the ethical history of Japan. They assert, in effect, that Japan's ethical needs are the same as those of the nations of the West. They illustrate how the future of Japan is bound up with that of Christian nations. She feels, and quickly feels, every movement which stirs Western society. Even the late so-called reaction is nothing less than a manifestation in Japan of the same world-movement which has produced anti-Semitism in Germany and the A. P. A. in the United States. The liberal movement in the churches which causes us anxiety is one and the same with that which is felt in America. To hold the German missionaries or the American Unitarians responsible for it is to miss its true meaning.

Upon this close and growing intimacy between the life of Japan and that of the West I base my forecast of the future. I believe in a Divine Providence who is to bring out of the present unrest all over the world a stronger and a more intelligent faith. This very series of articles testifies to a spirit of expectancy. As the very youthfulness of the Church of Japan has made her feel more keenly the doubts which have disturbed us all, so will that same freshness of youth render her more responsive to the new faith. The channels of influence are open. Would that there might course through them none but streams which shall make glad the City of God!

The Deputation to Japan and the Kumi-ai Churches

The letter of the Deputation of the American Board to the Kumi-ai churches in Japan has appeared in other papers, and by them has been made the basis of editorial comment. It has not before appeared in The Outlook, simply because it was definitely understood that all report was first to be made to the Prudential Committee, and after that given to the public. Misleading comments on this letter have appeared in certain quarters which are clearly made by those who do not understand the facts. The report of the Deputation will appear in substance in these columns next week. It is to be presented to the Board on Wednesday, January 23, after which it will become public property. Since the letter of the Deputation to the Japanese churches has appeared elsewhere, we give it here in full:

Dear Brethren: The Deputation appointed by the Prudential Committee of the American Board to visit and confer with its missionaries and with Japanese Christians in Japan has completed its work and is about to sail for home. During our presence in your beautiful country we have been the recipients of so many courtesies at the hands of the Kumi-ai Christians and churches that we should feel that we had been deprived of a great privilege if we were not permitted to express our hearty thanks to you for your kindness to us. With the growth of your churches, almost unexampled in the history of any country, we have had great satisfaction, and at the prospect of still larger growth, both in numbers and spirituality, in the not distant future, we gratefully rejoice. We feel that your history is our history, and your prosperity is a blessing which will carry gladness to all Christians the world around.

You are a body of independent churches, subject to no master but Jesus Christ. This we fully recognize, and this our missionaries have always recognized, and we have rejoiced to find in you much of the spirit of the Pilgrim Fathers, to whom the religious life of our country is so largely indebted. As we look over the world with its teeming millions, so many of whom have no clear idea of the Gospel of our Saviour, we feel that an immense and solemn responsibility rests upon the Church of Christ in all lands, and not the least in your own land, to which Providence seems to have committed the intellectual and spiritual leadership of the East.

In our study of the problems facing the missionaries we have had to consider whether the time had come for their withdrawal from Japan. In getting information on this point we have consulted with many of your ministers, laymen, and evangelists, and every one has advised us not immediately to withdraw from the field. Some have suggested that the number of missionaries should not be increased, but the voice in favor of retaining most of those now present has been unanimous. We have decided to advise the missionaries to remain in your country for the present, hoping that the time will not be far distant in which you will be able not only to do without them, but also to join with us in carrying the kingdom to other lands. Our missionaries will not attempt to establish independent churches, but will, so far as they are able, seek to co-operate with you in the work of the Kumi-ai body along the same general lines as in the past; and we ask for them in their difficult duties your generous co-operation.

They will, of course, have to do the work in the way in which they can work best, as you will work in the way best adapted to you; but there ought to be, and we are persuaded that there will be, no serious difficulty in such co-operation. We must ask you to remember that our missionaries have to render an account to the Board concerning their work and all moneys expended by them, and that often, when you may differ from them, they may be only carrying out the imperative and necessary instructions of the Board.

We have been advised, both by you and by our missionaries, to devote more attention in the future to sending out for occasional service eminent and able pastors and theologians, and also to provide for the translation and publication of works of religious thought of standard value. Both of these suggestions seem to us eminently wise, and we shall take great pleasure in advising our Board to do as you suggest. You have also suggested that so far as there may be changes in the location of missionaries, less attention should be given to cities where there are already well-established Kumi-ai churches. That suggestion also approves itself to us, and we have so advised our missionaries.

We regret that we have not been able to come to agreement with those with whom we have had misunderstanding concerning houses and lands, purchased and paid for by the treasury of the American Board. In Kioto and Kumamoto such misunderstandings exist. With reference to this we have addressed to the Trustees of the Doshisha a letter from which we quote as follows:

> We cannot believe that you will think of asking rent from the Board for the missionary houses in Kioto, when the land was purchased and the houses were paid for entirely out of the treasury of the Board. For you to do that, we believe that both you and all your countrymen would hold to be a stain upon the good name of the Doshisha.

Concerning our difficulty at Kumamoto we desire to say that we are profoundly grateful to our brethren of the Kumi-ai churches for what they have done to help us in that matter; and we trust that they will not cease to use their efforts until there has been an honorable settlement.

As we study the religious condition of the world we find much cause for rejoicing at the swift advancement of the kingdom of God; but we also see that that kingdom has many and insidious foes, and that the demand was never greater that all the Christian host should present a united and aggressive front against unbelief and sin. This is no time for emphasis upon what we do not believe. Positive, Scriptural, able, consecrated preaching, and pure, saintly, Christian lives are everywhere imperatively demanded. Will you not unite with us, and with all Christians, in exalting the personality and fatherhood of God, the saving work of Jesus Christ, the need of regeneration by the Holy Spirit, and his constant ministry; the duty of all men of every land and condition to love and serve one another, and the power of the endless life? In short, may we not, together with all evangelical Christians, unite in so presenting the Gospel of our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ that your land and our land and all lands shall, in due time, acknowledge him as Master and Lord?

We have read with much interest the platform adopted by you in you recent meeting at Nara, and see in it your recognition that the world can be made truly Christian only by men of lofty faith, holy lives, and pure hearts. We pray God's blessing on the movement there so auspiciously started.

Dear brethren, we greet you as our fellow-workers for the kingdom of God; we pray for you; will you not pray for us and for our country, that together Japan and America may advance toward the stature of truly Christian nations?

Once more and from our hearts we thank you for your courtesy to us. It will never be forgotten. God bless the Kumi-ai churches, and God bless the Japanese nation!

In the bonds of Christian fellowship we subscribe ourselves, dear brethren, very kindly,

JAMES L. BARTON.
WILLIAM P. ELLISON.
JAMES GIBSON JOHNSON.
AMORY H. BRADFORD.

Yokohama, December 6, 1895.

In regard to the above letter one or two points need to be guarded. The letter distinctly says that there is a "misunderstanding" in regard to the property at Kioto, and it quotes from a letter addressed to the Trustees of the Doshisha; but the letter to the Trustees was not regarded by them as any imputation upon their motives, and by it the Deputation simply stated that it would have to leave the whole matter to the honor of the Japanese Christians. There has been a tendency to misinterpret this part of the letter. Those who are most conversant with the facts in the case are not at all surprised that there is a misunderstanding. They feel that the Japanese Christians are intending to do the honorable thing in the midst of difficult circumstances, and they are still hoping for an agreement that will be satisfactory to both parties. The Deputation has said nothing reflecting upon the Christian character of the Trustees of the Doshisha, who interpret certain facts in a different way from that of the Board. In the absence of written documents such misunderstandings are not surprising. The Trustees of the Doshisha assured the Deputation that the missionaries would receive from them generous and honorable treatment, and thus far there is no reason to doubt the sincerity of their statement. If that pledge is not kept, there will be occasion for strong speech—but not till then. In all the intercourse of the Deputation with the Trustees we are assured that their conduct was that of Christian gentlemen. If, as the result of further correspondence, the misunderstanding continues, we hope it may be settled by arbitration.

A Lecture Course

"The God-Idea in some of the Principal Religions of the World" will form the subject of a course of lectures to be given before the Brooklyn Ethical Association, in the Pouch Mansion, 345 Clinton Avenue, on Sunday evenings in February and March. "The Hindu Conception of God" will be presented by the Swami Vivekananda, of India; "The Idea of God as Expressed in the Art of the Ages" by Professor J. Leonard Corning, of Munich; "The Ancient Religion of China: Its Teachings Concerning God, Immortality, etc.," by the Rev. F. Huberty

James, of England. Further particulars may be obtained by addressing Dr. L. G. Janes, Fulton Building, New York.

The Religious World

The Recall of Commander Booth

What has been known for a little time to a few persons has at last reached the public, namely, that Commander and Mrs. Ballington Booth have been recalled to England by the head of the Salvation Army. Just where they are to be placed in the future we have no intimation at the time of this writing, and it is not essential that we should have in order to say that, at least from the American point of view, a very great mistake has been made. In a peculiar way Commander and Mrs. Booth have identified themselves with the American people. The Army was in a weak condition when they assumed its direction here. They have done more than revive its spirit; they have given Americans confidence in its management, and many have contributed liberally to its support who would not have thought of doing so had they imagined that Commander and Mrs. Booth were likely soon to be displaced. It is not probable that the change indicates lack of confidence on the part of the home office. It may be supposed that it is intended to promote the American leaders; but the Army cannot promote them. It has no field to offer them in which they can do a larger work, and it has no one in its whole service who here will be regarded with the same confidence. The ablest and most efficient officers in the whole Army may be sent to the United States, but they will come untried and comparatively unknown. They will have to make their own place and secure for themselves by years of difficult service the confidence which is now reposed in the Commander and Mrs. Booth. It is possible that the welfare of the Army at large may require a serious sacrifice on the part of the Army in the United States, but nothing else could possibly justify this change. We hope it is not too late for the mistake to be seen, and for Commander and Mrs. Booth to be left in charge of the Army in this country, which they can lead better than any one else, and which affords them quite as great a field for their pre-eminent abilities as any other country in the world could offer them.

The Brick Church in New York

As our readers are aware, a year or two ago the Church of the Covenant and the Brick Church in New York, both Presbyterian, united, the congregation of the former going to the Brick Church, and the Rev. Drs. H. J. van Dyke and J. H. McIlvaine jointly retaining the pastorate. Experience has proved that both men are not needed in the position, and, in order that the church might be free to choose a pastor who should represent the united body, both pastors resigned. It was understood that Dr. McIlvaine desired to withdraw, and that he earnestly and generously urged the people to unite in retaining Dr. van Dyke. At a meeting held on January 15 the following resolution concerning Dr. van Dyke was offered by Mr. J. Cleveland Cady, who represented the old Church of the Covenant:

> Resolved, That the congregation of the Brick Presbyterian Church urgently request Dr. van Dyke to withdraw his resignation and to continue in charge of the church as its pastor. We do this out of sincere affection for him and appreciation for his ministrations. We recall his faithful and successful services during thirteen years, and recognize that the present prosperity of the church is due chiefly to his labors and eminent standing in the community. He has labored for our souls' welfare and brought us the consolation of Jesus Christ. We have found blessing and edification in his pulpit services, and have precious memories of his kindness and sympathy. We will not consent to bring to an end such a history of affectionate service on his part, and we sincerely trust he will continue to be our pastor.
>
> Resolved, That we pledge him not only our united regard and affection, but also such aid in his work as he may find necessary. We recognize the greatness of the burden we ask him to resume, and promise to come to his aid in such way and measure as he may desire.

After the above was adopted the following resolution was proposed by Mr. John E. Parsons, representing the Brick Church, concerning Dr. McIlvaine:

> Resolved, That we cannot allow Dr. McIlvaine to leave us without putting upon record our high appreciation of his ability as a preacher and his endearing qualities as a man. To friends who came with him to this united church he has added the larger number of those to whom he has ministered in his new field. We appreciate the unselfish and self-sacrificing motive which has led him to insist that he shall be allowed to resign and that Dr. Van Dyke shall be asked to stay. We wish him Godspeed, and shall pray that he may be safely kept in his journeyings, and prospered in any new field of labor he may select.

We do not know what Dr. McIlvaine's future will be, but a man of such eminent ability and consecration cannot long be allowed to remain idle. It is intimated that one cause of his resignation was the desire for a year's rest and travel. His ministry, both in Presbyterian and Congregational pulpits, has proved him an able thinker and an eloquent preacher.

Myron Adams

We have already briefly noted the death of the Rev. Myron Adams, but desire here to pay a tribute of respect to the memory of one of the most chivalric spirits in the pulpit of the State of New York. The Rev. Myron Adams, who was pastor of Plymouth Church in Rochester, died at his home on Sunday, December 29. He was a graduate of Auburn Theological Seminary, and a son-in-law of Professor Samuel M. Hopkins, one of the most independent and vigorous thinkers of the Presbyterian Church. Mr. Adams saw service in the war, and afterward entered the ministry. He was an independent and earnest thinker, a man who hated shams and loved righteousness with peculiar intensity. He was the author of several books, the best known of which is "The Continuous Creation." Those who had the privilege of knowing Mr. Adams always found him a genial friend and an earnest and manly man. He was honest—if such an expression may be used—even to a fault; sometimes perhaps even misrepresenting himself in his effort to be absolutely sincere. He had become a great power in the city of Rochester, where his noble personality was greatly honored and loved. The service in his remembrance which was held in the church of which he had been pastor was conducted by an Episcopalian, a Presbyterian, a Unitarian, and a Jewish Rabbi, while other ministers very generally, in their own pulpits, bore testimony to the fidelity and earnestness of the man who had so strongly impressed himself upon the religious and municipal life of the city. It was the privilege of the writer of this paragraph to know Mr. Adams intimately before he entered the ministry, and from that day to his death he was always found to be a gracious, brave, honest, and manly advocate of everything which he believed to be true and good.

A New Missionary Paper Proposed

It has been long thought that an inexpensive missionary newspaper which should give important facts about the work of all the Congregational societies would have a wide usefulness. The officers of the six Congregational societies—namely, the Congregational Sunday-School and Publishing Society, Congregational Home Missionary Society, American Missionary Association, Congregational Church Building Society, Congregational Education Society, and the American Board—have now prepared a circular-letter to the churches asking pledges for the support of such a paper. It would be a sixteen-page monthly, sold at the nominal annual subscription price of ten cents, and the plan would be for the churches to agree to take each a certain number of copies for its own families. The hope is to reach all families in the denomination. The officers of the societies rightly say that "such a paper as is suggested would awaken interest, stimulate inquiry after further information, unify our operations and bind us together as a denomination, facilitate the work of pastors among their people, and lead to increased prayer and giving and effort in our own denominational work." The proposed paper would in no way take the place of present missionary publications, but would supplement their work and occupy a field of its own.

A Memorial Meeting

The universal love which went out to Arthur Brooks, the breadth of his interests, and the large place he filled in this community, were evidenced both by the spirit which characterized the occasion and by the large congregation which assembled at the memorial service in the Church of the Incarnation, in this city, on Sunday evening last. Among the speakers were the Rev. Drs. Greer and Rainsford, Dr. Seth Low, and Mr. Hamilton W. Mabie. Archdeacon Tiffany, who presided, also made some interesting comments on Dr. Brooks. The addresses breathed a profound spirit of reverence for the courage, the honesty, the ability, the helpfulness, and the varied talents of a man whose life had many sides, but whose energies were all consecrated to one end.

Union Seminary Lectures

A course of lectures in Union Theological Seminary on the now popular subject of the Unity of the Christian Church has already been announced in these columns, but all the special subjects have not been given. The subjects of the lectures still to be given are as follows:

January 27, President E. B. Andrews, of Brown University, "The Sin Schism."
February 10, Bishop H. C. Potter, "The Lambeth Articles."
March 2, Bishop J. F. Hurst, "Irenic Movements Since the Reformation."
March 9, the Rev. A. H. Bradford, D.D., "The Unity of the Spirit World-wide Necessity."

Leonard Bradley and the Wolves

A Story for Young Folks

By Virginia Woodward Cloud

I have learned more about dead generations from the attic than from the many-branched Family Tree hanging in the wide hall, under the original grant of land signed by Cecil Calvert, Lord Baltimore. The last time I undertook the attic I was armed with a bunch of keys (wardens to the more valuable heirlooms) and accompanied by Grandmamma. For Grandmamma delights in talking "old times" to one who loves to listen. Therefore, when Grandmamma was seated upon a little, low chair with a very high back, belonging, no doubt, to a spinning-wheel and a chimney-corner, I proceeded to look at the contents of a brown hair trunk.

"What an extraordinary garment!" I said, holding up to view a coat with the tails torn or chewed directly off. "It looks as if it went with a powdered queue and knee-breeches and buckles, and all that sort of thing. But why are there no coat-tails?"

"That coat belonged to your great-great-uncle, Leonard Bradley, on your mother's side. The Bradley things are in the trunks, and the Herberts' in the chests—"

"But the coat-tails?" I said, closing the trunk and spreading the garment upon it. I settled myself beside it, and Grandmamma smiled at me.

"It'll not take long to tell, for it didn't take long to happen. I am very proud of those lost coat-tails. It happened this way—and I've heard my father tell about it so often that I can close my eyes and see it. Your great-great-uncle, Leonard Bradley, was a famous huntsman in his day, and used to make excursions into the heart of the mountains near which he lived, and bring back game, and plenty of pelts besides. That part of the country was so wild and lonely then, and the little settlement so near the foot of the mountain, that for years the sheep-pens were not safe at night from a prowling bear or wolf. I heard many a story, as a child, of the creatures which inhabited those mountains and never showed themselves by light of day.

"One evening, Leonard Bradley, who was quite a young man, returned, at dusk, with two of his friends from a hunting expedition in the mountains. A 'town meeting' had been called for that evening, and was to be held in the school-house. The school-house stood some distance from the group of houses which formed the settlement, it having been built near the foot of the mountain, because the village seemed to be growing in that direction. It was a bitterly cold evening, and the ground was covered with snow. The huntsmen, who had not brought back much game, determined to stop at the school-house and await the several townsmen, who, with themselves, would form the meeting of the principal men of the village. One of Leonard Bradley's friends had shot a bear's cub shortly before dusk, and, returning, had grown tired, and dragged it after him over the snow to the door of the school-house. The third man of the party was the schoolmaster, who, having a duplicate key of the door, let them in, and they proceeded to build a fire preparatory to the meeting to be held later.

"They sat around it, getting warm and chatting, and by and by one said:

"'The wind is rising. Hear it coming down the mountain!'

"'Yes,' said another, ''tis like a human voice. It will be bitterly cold to go home in.'

"'Harken!' said Leonard Bradley, suddenly. Then they sat silent for a moment, and in that moment the wind's voice took a strange and terrible note. Nearer and more loud it came. Nearer and more terrible.

"The men sprang to their feet with blanched faces. Then a prolonged and fearful sound swept down the mountain through the night, and wrapped them round with a terrible nearness.

"'Wolves!' said Leonard Bradley. 'They are starved out and have followed our track. There must have been blood dropped from the game!'

"An instant of listening showed that he was right. The wind-like sound that, at a distance, seemed to come from one throat, broke suddenly from a multitude, and in a moment later a frenzied pack of wolves hurled itself, dashing and leaping, upon the door of the little school-house.

"'The mark of the cub's blood,' said Leonard Bradley, briefly. 'How many charges have you?'

"'Two,' said one man, examining his gun. 'One,' said the other, looking at his. 'None,' said Leonard Bradley, snapping his flintlock, 'and the door is not over strong.'

"Between the chinks of a shutter they could see the howling forms, black against the snow, making vain dashes upon the door-sill, over which the body of the cub had been drawn. The door shook ominously as they hurled themselves against it.

"'We cannot shoot from here,' said one of the men. Then Leonard Bradley leaped up a low flight of steps to a little landing, where hung the bell-rope, the long end of which lay coiled upon the floor. On this landing was also a window, and to this window the three men pressed.

"Far off they could see a gleam of light here and there from the houses in the settlement. The moon had risen, and all around them was a world of snow, with the darkness of the mountain in the background, and beneath was a panting, ravenous pack of wolves—how many they did not dare conjecture. The tracks of blood in the snow had fairly frenzied the beasts. They were howling like mad, and leaping upon the door of the school-house.

"One of the men fired from the window, and a huge wolf sprang upward and dropped back dead. A second shot entered the pack and infuriated the animals all the more. The third missed fire.

"'That is all, and the door will not hold much longer,' said Leonard Bradley, at a sound from below. He seized the bell-rope and commenced to ring with all his might.

"'This may stir them in the village, and show that something is wrong!'

"''Twill soon be too late,' said one of the men, leaning from the window; 'they must smell the blood yet!'

"'Throw out the game and keep them off the door!' cried Leonard Bradley. So, while he pulled the bell-rope, his friends carried upward the game, which they had piled within the door, and cast it out the window, piece by piece, into the pack below. There were but four pieces in all, and these were fallen upon and ravenously devoured. But the portion of the hungry wolves which had gotten none tore upon the school-house door in a fury, evidently scenting the blood which had crossed its threshold.

"Then there came a sudden sound of cracking timbers. The two men fell upon their knees, and Leonard Bradley dropped the bell-rope.

"'The door is giving way!' he said. 'If there was but a little more time, help might come.'

"'If there were but more game to throw out!' cried one of the men.

"And again there was the sound of cracking timber. Then, suddenly, Leonard Bradley seized the coil of bell-rope and sprang upon the window-ledge. In a twinkling, before his friends dreamed of his intention, he was outside, hanging over the heads of the howling wolves. 'The door is giving!' he called back. 'You both have families. Maybe I can keep them off—'

"Then there was a howl. Two black forms leaped into the air, and there was a sharp cry from Leonard Bradley and a pistol-shot. The foremost wolf fell back dead, and a volley of shot poured into the pack, scattering them right and left. They dashed backward in a panic towards the mountain, followed by a rain of bullets and shot.

"The bell had rung the alarmed neighbors thither, and the first shot had caught the wolf which leaped upward after Leonard Bradley.

"They picked Leonard Bradley up, unconscious but really unhurt. It was found, however, that his coat-tails had been seized and torn off by the fangs of the wolf.

"And this is the coat," said Grandmamma, stroking the garment, which lay on the trunk. "Leonard Bradley's mother kept it, and afterwards his wife, for it means that, after all, soldiers do not always fight with a sword, and all the heroes are not written down in history."

Answers to Puzzles

In The Outlook for January 18

Names of Capes.—East, Farewell, Good Hope, Horn, Clear, May, Verd, Prince of Wales, North, Charles, Town, Hatteras, Cod, Henry, Blanco, Ann.

Birds with Rhymes.—1. Crow, so. 2. Jay, gay. 3. Parrot, carrot. 4. Wren, again. 5. Lark, hark. 6. Owl, scowl. 7. Eagle, legal. 8. Hen, men. 9. Goose, loose. 10. Gull, dull. 11. Dove, love. 12. Linnet, minute. 13. Duck, luck. 14. Swallow, wallow. 15. Hawk, talk. 16. Sparrow, arrow. 17. Raven, craven. 18. Thrush, hush. 19. Crane, cane. 20. Rook, nook.

Riddle.—The name John.

Flowers with Rhymes.—1. Rose, grows. 2. Lily, chilly. 3. Pink, think. 4. Myrtle, turtle. 5. Crocus, focus. 6. Phlox, box. 7. Marjoram, decorum. 8. Pansy, tansy. 9. Lotus, wrote us. 10. Aster, master. 11. Stock, rock. 12. Primrose, prim rows. 13. Clover, over. 14. Daisy, hazy.

Additions.—1. Mit, mitten. 2. Of, often. 3. Bit, bitten. 4. Has, hasten. 5. Fry, frighten. 6. Oh, oaten. 7. Lie, lighten. 8. Bat, batten. 9. Kit, kitten. 10. Pat, patten.

For the Little People

Barmecide Ball

By Isaac Ogden Rankin

My laddie and I together,
  Before he had grown so tall,
Played one odd game with an odder name—
  He called it "Barmecide ball."

"Grandmamma! I have discovered
  A nice new game," he said;
And his eyes with fun were gleaming,
  And his cheeks were cherry red.

"I can't play ball in the nursery,
  I mustn't play in the hall,
Outdoors it is raining, raining—
  Let's play at Barmecide ball!"

You remember the Barmecide's dinner
  Which the Barber tells about—
The table spread, and talk of bread,
  But food and drink left out?

Such was my laddie's fancy;
  The game was soon begun;
We had no ball to use at all,
  But simply "lots of fun."

For his heart was in the frolic,
  He laughed and tossed—and all
In pure imagination:
  And this is Barmecide ball.

It isn't the globe of leather
  That makes the game, you see,
But a laughing heart which does its part
  Whatever the fun may be.

"Compliments of Brer Rabbit"

By James Buckham

It was a nice, new box trap that stood under the oak-tree on the knoll; one of those traps that boys use when they wish to catch small animals, like squirrels and rabbits, alive.

It had a lid, caught up with a string. The string was attached to a bit of stick, on which the bait was fixed; and when the animal entered the trap and nibbled the bait, the lid would fall and shut him in.

Standing as it did upon a knoll, the trap could be seen quite a distance away. It belonged to Harry Drake; and Harry had set it under the oak-tree to catch a rabbit which he had seen nibbling there.

It happened that two young men, who were taking an afternoon walk, passed near the knoll in the pasture, and saw the trap under the oak-tree. "Ah!" said one of them, "there's a box trap—just the kind I used to set for squirrels and rabbits when I was a boy. Let's go up and have a look at it." So the two young men climbed the knoll where the oak-tree stood, and knelt down to examine the trap. It had been newly set, and there was a nice fresh piece of apple, for bait, on the wooden trigger. The young men were in a merry mood, and the one who had first suggested visiting the trap exclaimed, "Suppose we give the boy who set this trap a surprise!" He took a blank card out of his pocket, laughingly penciled a line upon it, showed it to his companion, and then put it in the trap and sprung the trigger, so that the lid fell down, as it would if a rabbit had nibbled at the bait. The two young men walked away laughing, and soon disappeared.

When school was out for the afternoon, Harry Drake made all haste to visit his trap. Imagine his delight and excitement when, as he climbed the pasture fence, he saw that the lid of his trap was down. "Oh! oh!" he cried, "I've caught my rabbit, sure!" He ran up the knoll as fast as his short and plump little legs would carry him. Then, with flushed face and trembling hands, he bent over the trap and lifted the lid ever so little, that he might get a peep within. But no little furry nose was pushed up into the crack, nor was there any sound of rustling or scratching within. Surprised and anxious, Harry lifted the lid a trifle higher. A beam of light fell across the dark interior of the trap, and Harry saw a glimmer of something white. He watched it closely for a minute, but it did not move. Finally he lifted the lid of the trap until he could thrust in his chubby hand. A bit of cardboard met his fingers. He drew it out, and, with eyes wide with wonder, read these astonishing words, written across the card in a bold hand:

> Compliments of Brer Rabbit

It was the card which one of the young men had placed in the trap to surprise Harry.

It was some time before the bewildered young trapper realized that it was a joke which had been played upon him, and no the real autograph card of "Brer Rabbit" himself. But when the significance of the droll message did appear to him, he had a jolly laugh, that did him as much good as if he had actually caught poor little Bunny.

Peter's Mistake and Apology

She was such a dear little girl that you loved her at once. She had a most interesting family of dolls. They were all sizes and all kinds—Chinese, Japanese, French dolls, English dolls, and American dolls. When they were together they almost made a congress of nations. The favorite doll was the American doll, not because the little mother was so patriotic, but because this doll was her first doll.

I would not be surprised if you would shudder at the description of this favorite doll. One leg was gone, and one arm had been pulled off—perhaps it would be truer to say it had been worn off by the constant carrying of this small mother, who at times forgot and dragged her doll as if she were a wagon. From dragging over the floor and lawn one heel had been worn through, and all the sawdust ran out and the limp leg hung down, or blew out in the wind with her petticoat. One eye was gone, and the other had become fixed with an upward stare that made you uncomfortable. But the little mother loved this doll for her misfortunes; she slept with her; she sat behind her when she was at the table, and in her lap when she listened to stories. The other dolls looked in speechless wonder at this devotion. They were spick and span and whole, but when they went driving it was the maimed and one-eyed doll that sat in the little mother's lap, and they were on the cushion under the robe.

This doll's name was often changed, but it was sure to keep one part of its name always—"My dear." Whatever change took place, it never lost that. At last, one day, the end came. "My dear" Etta was left for a moment on the piazza alone. She was on her back looking steadily at the roof of the piazza. Peter, the dog, an old friend, one would suppose, for they had been in the same family for three years, came bounding around the corner of the house. He stopped so short when he saw Etta that he threw himself backward. Then he bounded back some distance, and round the corner of the house again as if playing at hide-and-seek. "My dear" Etta made no advances and Peter wagged his tail fiercely, and barked uproariously, and capered around the helpless doll. Was it the wind, or did she shiver? Peter, with a jolly, joyous bark, as if saying, "Come now, let us have some fun," took dear Etta's best dress in his mouth, and scampered over the lawn. Such a frolic and game you never saw!

Such a howl and tumult as there was when the little mother saw what had happened! Peter went up the hill with his tail hanging between his legs and his head down. Why, he meant it in fun! it was a game! and now there was only a bundle of rags. You know how you felt when harm has come where you meant fun. That afternoon Peter barked up on the hill. His bark seemed to say, "I wish you would come. Somebody needs you." At last the little mamma and her big sister went up there, and what do you think? Somebody had dropped three pretty gray kittens near the fence, and they were huddled together crying piteously. The little mother gave a scream of joy, and gathered them into her apron, and trotted down the hill, with Peter jumping and barking at her side as if to say, "There! see, I do love you! I did not mean to hurt you, or dear Etta. Will you forgive me now that I have found these dear kittens for you?"

The kittens were the happiest things, and kept the little mother so busy that she forgot Etta. The other dolls took turns in riding in her lap, and shared the privilege of hearing the stories. And the little mother was very much happier with so many dependent upon her for their pleasure; and no one doll was being made selfish.

Tobe

A True Story

By E. L. Thurston

Tobe is the most deceitful animal that ever drew a street-car—at least so the drivers and stablemen of his line are accustomed to remark.

The driver groans when Tobe is led up and harnessed to the car. His groans are louder and deeper, frequently, before the trip is ended, and then, when summoned before the superintendent to give his reason for being so long on the way, he simply answers:

"I had Tobe, sir!" and the excuse is accepted. Yet Tobe would be missed were he to leave the line, and it is doubtful, after all, if the men would wish him turned off.

He is the fattest horse on the line—and the laziest. His sleek brown coat glistens in the light, and he looks the image of health and strength—and yet!

He was half-way between the two terminals the other evening, when the car was suddenly stopped to take on a passenger, and when the bell rang to go ahead, Tobe evidently decided otherwise, and calmly slid down flat on the track with every appearance of a very sick or a very dead horse.

The driver and conductor hurriedly dismounted and ran forward. The former being, with reason, somewhat suspicious, struck the horse with the whip, to make him rise. Tobe gave a groan, lay out flatter than ever, and closed his eyes. The men tried to raise him, but he hung limp on their hands, and they had to desist from their efforts.

Other cars came up and were blocked, while their drivers joined in the attempt to get the poor sick horse on his feet.

People in the crowd talked about the cruelty of the company in using worn-out horses on the line, and gazed compassionately at the form spread out before them. They did not see, as one or two others did, the poor sick horse stick out his tongue and lick in a dry leaf that fluttered against his nose.

More cars came up and stopped, and the crowd grew larger.

"Draw him off to one side, so the cars can go on," suggested a conductor, and willing hands quickly undid the harness and pulled the horse off to one side, one bystander remarking:

"He'll never pull a car again."

As the men turned back to their cars, however, there was a slight noise behind them They looked around, and there was Tobe calmly rising to his feet. He got up easily and steadily, shook himself once or twice, snatched a mouthful of dry leaves from the gutter, and then calmly walked back to his place in front of his car, and waited to be harnessed up.

Twice has Tobe been so afflicted, and many other times has he gone lame so suddenly and severely that the other horse has had to practically draw the car home, while Tobe appeared barely able to drag one foot after the other; and yet, the minute the stable-yard was reached, his lameness has suddenly disappeared.

Miss Juliet Corson,
Founder of the New York Cooking School,
Mrs. D. A. Lincoln,
Author of "Boston Cook Book,"
Mrs. Sarah T. Rorer,
Principal Philadelphia Cooking School,
Mrs. Emma P. Ewing,
Principal Chautauqua School of Cookery,
Miss Fannie M. Farmer,
Principal Boston Cooking School,
Miss C. C. Bedford,
Superintendent New York Cooking School,
Miss Kate E. Whitaker,
Normal Cookery School, San Francisco,
Marion Harland,
Author "Common Sense in the Household,"
All Authorities
On cookery, writers and teachers,

Use Cleveland's Baking Powder

It does the best work.

Aid for Armenia

Whatever may be the outcome of the assertion by the Turkish Legation at Washington of the refusal of the Porte to admit the Red Cross Society into Turkey, it is quite certain that it is possible for Americans to aid the starving Armenians. The letter below, from the National Armenian Relief Committee, makes that perfectly clear. In point of fact, the assertion has not been confirmed from Constantinople, and Miss Clara Barton and her assistants will probably have sailed for Turkey before this is read. We renew our urgent appeal of last week to our readers to help in this pitiful and pressing cause. The report from Van, published herewith, gives a vivid idea of what is actually being done. The Outlook subscribes $250 to the relief fund. It asks its readers to send it contributions, made payable to the order of The Outlook Company.

Relief Still Possible

The following official statement has been issued from the headquarters of the National Armenian Relief Committee:

The reported intention of the Turkish Government to refuse the American Red Cross permission to enter Turkey will not cause the National Armenian Relief Committee and its branches throughout the country to relax their efforts for an instant in raising funds to save the 350,000 Armenians who are perishing from starvation and exposure.

The National Committee is the authorized agency throughout the country for raising funds and supplies to be distributed by the Red Cross, providing it enters the field. But in case the Red Cross is excluded, the National Committee has authority to utilize existing agencies on the ground or organize new ones, so that all contributors may be assured that their gifts will, as speedily as possible, reach the sufferers for whom they are intended.

Many are not aware of the fact that relief work to the extent of not less than $100,000 has already been successfully carried out in Turkey during the past few months, under the direction of a strong and representative committee of foreign residents and diplomats in Constantinople, through European Consuls, and the Americans who are to be found in all the principal cities of the interior.

A letter just received from Constantinople, dated December 27, states that sixty bales of clothing had been forwarded that week to Cesarea, and that it is now possible to forward large amounts of money safely to those engaged in this relief work in the devastated regions.

45 William Street, New York, January 14, 1896.

What is Being Done

The following extracts from the Report of the Armenian Industrial Relief Bureau at Van show what is being done, and how:

The fact that this relief work was demanded and begun in midsummer, a time when, if ever, a people whose fortunes are bound up in the soil should be able to keep the wolf from the door, is an eloquent proof of the sad state of affairs among the Christian inhabitants of Armenia. In midsummer of a year of exceptional agricultural prosperity, so great was the number of those destitute of daily bread that we were forced to begin relief work. The plan of this work is to aid without pauperizing, and to utilize a part of the great number of workers who are idle and starving because there is no work to be had, and whose discouragements and demoralization are almost more regrettable than their physical misery.

Under the primitive conditions which Moslem rule has preserved, a large portion of the people of both cities and villages are conversant with the various processes of the manufacture of coarse cotton and woolen fabrics. Armenia is a great wool-producing country, while abundant cotton is brought from Persia. This suggests a simple solution of the work problem. Bags of wool were bought, weighed out into pound portions, and whenever a woman came begging for help or work, her case was investigated, her name registered, and she was given wool to card and spin; on the return of the thread, it was weighed and examined as to quality, the woman was paid at a rate estimated to supply her with bread, and she was given another lot of wool. The giving of two or three lots in this way was enough to bring down on us a crowd, and speedily we found a large business flooding in upon us, one demanding good organization and a corps of distributers. Cotton was added to our supplies, and all the process and tricks of the two trades were investigated, and every attempt was made to put the enterprise on a sound business basis. Infinite watchings were necessary in guarding against impostors, and in preventing petty thieving and unfaithfulness on the part of those who took work. The medical work had given us acquaintance with the people, and from our ex-patients we were able to select at once those for whom our hearts had ached to help gain a living. A good corps of helpers was soon organized: men to keep the door—and it often took three men to do this—against the clamoring crowd; men to receive and weigh the wool, cotton, and thread; men for the various demands of the Central Bureau. For the first two months the work was accommodated in our house (this is written by a medical missionary), in the rooms used as a dispensary, and we were in a state of siege from morning to night. The long lower hall was devoted to cotton-carders, the twang of whose primitive cards and the dust of whose work filled the house from early morning till dark, while a crowd of wretched men and women was never absent. The thread was given by weight to weavers who were out of work and in dire poverty; the woven goods were received by weight, and the weavers were paid with due regard to the needs of their families. To the children, and to some who were too weak and sick to do the heavier work, yarn was given to be knitted into socks.

Shortly we found ourselves in possession of a good stock of cotton clothing and woolen goods for the loose trousers worn here, and huge piles of coarse socks. The question what to do with them came to the front. The suggestion was made that this work might help and be helped by the Sassoun Relief Work, by our supplying materials for distribution there. This arrangement has been the means whereby our Bureau doubles its efficiency, thus having an assured market for all its produce.

Our goods are done up in bales here, loaded on donkeys or ox-carts, and carried down to the Lake harbor. There they are received by the miserable little sailboats that ply on the Lake, and are taken, with prayers for insurance, to the opposite sides of Lake Van, a distance of some sixty miles. Thence they are transported by horses or carts, a journey of ten days to two or three weeks, according to the weather and other exigencies of travel in this land. The entire distance is only about 120 miles.

In this way we have already sent some 2,000 pairs of socks and 1,400 webs of cloth, to the value of $950. A good market can be had here in Van for all our product, and indeed we have sold enough to bring our total sales up to $1,136.

During the past week we paid over an average of 100 persons daily. The average of wages per capita for the week was seven piastres, or about thirty cents. This is far too small a sum to meet in most cases even the cost of bread. But, considering our small balance, and the fact that we need for wages alone some $176 a week, we dare not increase wages, or give anything gratuitously. The intense poverty of the people is shown by the fact that these wages, small as they are, exceed from one-third to one-half the regular rates for the same work.

On the other hand, the demands grow more and more urgent—desperate, I might well say; so importunate are the crowds that I often have to call a man to pass me out of the office after my work is done. The people weep, and catch my clothes, and will not let me go. It is maddening to see such misery and yet be obliged to turn a deaf ear to so much of it. We help, through our 476 workers, some 2,000 souls, and this is not, in itself, a small thing. But when it is compared with the vast number of helpless poor about us it accentuates our appeal to our more fortunate fellow-Christians for larger help. . . . The cry goes up for more help. Winter cold and rains are upon us. Thousands have but the thinnest and most ragged clothing, no shoes or stockings, many no beds and most no fuel or other winter provision. Thousands never taste anything but coarse, dry bread for weeks and months at a time—and little enough of that—while, especially in the villages, hundreds have not even that and are on the verge of starvation. I doubt not that many will have actually starved before these words are read in England and America.

A private letter just received, dated Van, December 18, says that the Industrial Department is caring for over 900 families and is feeding 2,400 poor persons a day.

—President Kruger, of the South African Republic, bears upon his body many scars of bullets and spear-heads, and his left hand is minus a thumb which he lost years ago. His gun burst and terribly mangled the thumb. "Oom Paul" was so afraid that lockjaw would set in that he entreated his comrades to amputate the member. One of them tried to do so, but his heart failed him and he gave it up. Thereupon President Kruger seized a knife with his other hand and himself cut off the mangled thumb. A very small scar now remaining shows what a good job he made.

Exposure

To a contagious disease does not mean contracting that disease, if you have strength and vigor to repel it. Strength and vigor are given and safety to the health is insured by

Hood's Sarsaparilla

The One True Blood Purifier. $1; six for $5.
Prepared only by C. I. Hood & Co., Lowell, Mass.

Hood's Pills are gentle, mild, effective. All druggists. 25 cents.

Notes and Queries

MARCH OF THE MEN OF HARLECH

(Gorhoffedd Gwry Harlech)

Hennffych well i wlad fy nghalon,
Llwyddiant i ti Gymru dirion.

March, ye men of Harlech bold,
Unfurl your banners in the field!
Be brave as were your sires of old
And like them never yield.
What tho' every hill and dale
Echo now with war's alarms;
Celtic hearts can never quail
When Cambria calls to arms!
By each lofty mountain,
By each crystal fountain,
By your homes, where those you love
Await your glad returning,
Let each thought and action prove
True glory can the Cymry move;
And as each blade gleams in the light,
Pray, "God defend the right!"
Clans from Mona wending,
Now with Arvon blending,
Haste with rapid strides along
The path that leads to glory.
From Snowdon's hills with harp and song,
And Nantlle's vales, proceeds a throng
Whose ranks with yours shall proudly vie,
And nobly win or die.

In response to the request of "E. C." I give above a copy of the first verse only of the English words now generally used in Wales to the air of the "March of the Men of Harlech." I give also the first two lines in Welsh, of the same song, believing that sufficient for one dose. There have been many versions of this song; all of them, however, are modern. The melody alone comes to us from the shadowy past, its author unknown, its history vague. It is known that the present ruins at Harlech are those of a castle built by Edward I.; though but a shell, they are wonderfully impressive. In 1404 Owain Glyndwr (the Owen Glendower of Shakespeare's Henry IV.) obtained possession of the fortress and held a Parliament within its walls. In the time of Edward IV. the Earl of Pembroke laid siege to the castle, which surrendered after a long, brave, and bloody resistance. It was during this siege that the "March of the Men of Harlech" was composed, presumably not as a song, but arranged for the harp, then the favorite Welsh musical instrument; as a march, rendered by a full military band, it can scarcely be equaled.

Wonderfully fine as this composition is, it cannot fairly be called the "national melody of Wales." If popularity is the test of a national air, then the song of "Hen Wlad fy Nhadau," Anglicized into "Land of my Fathers," is the melody of Wales. No musical gathering of Cymry, in this country or at home, separates without singing this noble and inspiring hymn. On the other hand, I have attended scores of such gatherings without hearing "Harlech." If "E.C." desires one of the finest specimens of modern Welsh music, let him obtain a copy of "Aberystwyth," by Dr. Joseph Parry, of Cardiff, South Wales. This tune, like most Welsh hymn tunes, is written in the minor key, but it has a triumphant ring worthy of the martyrs. It requires volume; a quartette choir could no more develop it than they could "Ein Feste Burg." A choir of ninety male voices recently sang this by command before Queen Victoria, who was greatly moved and commanded its repetition. These ninety men were mostly miners, who rarely saw the sun except on the Sabbath, but as singers they are as perfect artists as the "Royal Welsh Ladies' Choir," who so lately charmed American audiences. The composer, Dr. Parry, twenty-five years ago was a poor boy working in a rolling-mill at Danville, Pa. His spare moments and chalk were employed in composing tunes on every scrap of board, iron, or paper that lay next his hand. One or two of these compositions were sent to Wales, and excited so much interest that the composer was sought, a fund raised to send him abroad; he graduated from the Royal College of Music, London, received his honorary title from his Alma Mater, and to-day ranks among the greatest of British composers. I heard his "Aberystwyth" sung by twelve thousand or more trained voices in Llanelly, Wales, last summer, and never again expect to hear such singing on earth; Sir Joseph Barnby, speaking of it, said that he never before had heard congregational singing. In Wales male voices are rarely heard singing the soprano parts; the four parts are always carried firmly, in exact time, and precisely as written. German chorals are generally sung by all the voices carrying the melody, while the organs or orchestra fill in the harmony. American congregational singing is—well, I can't do it justice. If "E. C." wants to hear Welsh music thoroughly well sung, let him attend one of the Eisteddfods held annually in Wilkesbarre or Scranton, Pa., and it will be a revelation to him.

OLIVER WILLIAMS.

Catasanqua, Pa.

Please inform me of the best book or books on the great creeds and the great councils of Christian history.
F. W. B.

As to creeds, Dr. Schaff's work, "The Creeds of Christendom," is the very best. As to councils, there is Hefele's "History of Councils," translated from the German, and published at Edinburgh. But the most satisfactory recourse is to the special articles on each council in the Encyclopædia Britannica. See also the references to the several councils in Dr. Schaff's "History of the Christian Church" and Dean Stanley's "History of the Eastern Church."

Grocer, in his book on "Illustrative Teaching," speaks of Todd's "Lectures to Children," "Truth Made Simple," Abbott's "Young Christian," "Corner-Stone," etc., as embodying examples of apt illustration. Will you kindly name a few more modern books of the same sort, and some more recent book than Grocer's on teaching by illustration?
B. A. A.

You may Snap your Fingers at Dyspepsia.

LOOK to the kitchen for the remedy. Eat freely three times a day bread, hot biscuit, hot cakes, made light and sweet with ROYAL BAKING POWDER, stop yeast bread, use meat sparingly, take plenty of air and exercise, and you may snap your fingers at Indigestion.

There is a quality in ROYAL BAKING POWDER, coming from the purity and wholesomeness of its ingredients, which promotes digestion. Food raised by it will not distress. This peculiarity of ROYAL has been noted by hygienists and physicians, and they are accordingly earnest in its praise, especially recommending it in the preparation of food for those of delicate digestion.

Alum baking powders cause indigestion.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., 106 WALL ST., NEW-YORK.

"The Right Road," by the Rev. J. W. Kramer (T. Whittaker, New York), is an excellent book of the same kind. Others, for perhaps older pupils than you have in mind, are Samuel Smiles's books on "Character" and "Self-Help" (Harpers, New York); also O. S. Marsden's "Pushing to the Front" and "Architects of Fate" (Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston), E. W. Bok's "Successward" (Revell Company, New York), W. J. Dawson's "Making of Man" (Crowell, New York), and W. M. Thayer's "Aim High" (Whittaker, New York).

Can any one tell me where the term the "unspeakable Turk" comes from; who first used it?
I. M. M.

Books Received

AMERICAN BOOK CO., NEW YORK

Lindsay, Thomas B. The Lives of Cornelius Nepos. $1.10.
Stories from Aulus Gellius. Edited by Charles Knapp. 30 cts.

AMERICAN NEW-CHURCH TRACT & PUBLICATION SOCIETY, PHILADELPHIA

Giles, Rev. Chauncey. Progress in Spiritual Knowledge. $1.50.

D. APPLETON & CO., NEW YORK

Hamilton, M. A Self-Denying Ordinance. $1.
Young, C. A. The Sun. $2.
Marey, E. J. Movement. Translated by Eric Pritchard. $1.75.
Walford, L. B. Successors to the Title. $1.
Stuart, Eleanor. Stonepastures. 75 cts.
Johnson's Universal Cyclopædia. (New Edition.) Vol. VIII.

THE BAKER & TAYLOR CO., NEW YORK

Webb-Peploe, Rev. H. W. The Victorious Life. Edited by D. L. Pierson. $1.25.

THE BOSTON BOOK CO., BOSTON

Foster, Roger. Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States. Vol. I.

THE CATHOLIC BOOK EXCHANGE, NEW YORK

Hewit, Augustine F., D.D. The Teaching of St. John the Apostle to the Churches of Asia and the World. $1.

GINN & CO., BOSTON

Burroughs, John. Little Nature Studies for Little People. Edited by Mary E. Burt. Vol. I.

S. C. GRIGGS & CO., CHICAGO

Fisher, Mary. Twenty-five Letters on English Authors. $1.50.

HENRY HOLT & CO., NEW YORK

Zschokke, Heinrich. Das Abenteuer der Neujahrsnacht und Der zerbrochene Krug. Edited by A. B. Faust. 25 cts.
Wichert, Ernst. An der Majorsecke. Edited by Charles Harris. 20 cts.

CHARLES H. KERR & CO., CHICAGO

Williams, John Milton, D.D. Rational Theology.
Meakin, Frederick. Nature and Deity.

MACMILLAN & CO., NEW YORK

Benedetti, Count. Studies in Diplomacy. $3.
Sayce, Rev. A. H. The Egypt of the Hebrews and Herodotos. $2.
Kompert, Leopold. Christian and Leah, and Other Ghetto Stories. Translated by Alfred S. Arnold. 75 cts.
Garnett, R. The Age of Dryden. $1.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, NEW YORK

Chambers, Robert W. The Red Republic. $1.25.

FLEMING H. REVELL CO., NEW YORK

Meyer, F. B. David, Shepherd, Psalmist, King. $1.
Comegys, B. B. Last Words for My Young Hearers and Readers. $1.
Moody, D. L. Notes from My Bible. $1.
Wells, Amos R. When Thou Hast Shut Thy Door. 60 cts.
Hill, Thomas G. F., and Grace L. Hill. The Christian Endeavor Hour. 15 cts.

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, NEW YORK

Hogg, James. De Quincey and His Friends. (Imported.) $3.
Cox, Marian R. An Introduction to Folk-Lore. (Imported.) $1.50.
Vladimir. The China-Japan War. (Imported.) $4.50.
Daniell, A. E. London City Churches. $2.25.
Donne, John. Poems. Edited by E. K. Chambers. Introduction by George Saintsbury. 2 Vols. (Imported.) $3.50.
Haddon, Alfred C. Evolution in Art: As Illustrated by the Life Histories of Designs. (Imported.) $1.25.
Salmond, Stewart D. F., D.D. The Christian Doctrine of Immortality. (Imported.) $5.

STONE & KIMBALL, CHICAGO

Sharp, William. The Gypsy Christ and Other Tales.
Cram, Ralph Adams. Black Spirits and White.
Abbott, Angus E. The Gods Give My Donkey Wings.
Watson, William. The Father of the Forest and Other Poems.
Poe, Edgar Allan. Complete Works. Vols. VI., VII., and VIII. (Criticism). Vol. IX. (Eureka, etc.). Edited by Edmund Clarence Stedman and George E. Woodberry. $1.50 each.

The Home Club

The Care of the Hands

By Katherine Armstrong

When our Maker planned and created the "human form divine," he did not overlook the minor parts, the accessories, if we may so call them. He made the hands and the feet shapely and beautiful, and all variations from the original model are caused, more or less, by use, abuse, and carelessness. Every one's duty to himself, in good plain English, is to look as well as possible. When one can truthfully say, "I don't care how my hands look," the condition of mind is certainly one to be pitied. There may be deviations from the "lines of beauty," but a well-cared-for hand soon blinds one to ordinary defects of form. It indicates refinement, too, for coarser natures care little for the details of the personnel.

A homely hand, that shows its owner's care and attention in all the delicate minutiæ, is far more attractive than one beautiful in form and complexion that betrays neglect.

We so often see misshapen hands. What causes them? Baby hands are usually perfect, and children's hands seldom out of shape, for they are almost constantly in motion. With suitable care, good honest labor need not get the lines of the hands "out of plumb." Lack of exercise will do it oftener. The joints grow stiff and bent and crooked as people grow older, because they are kept so motionless. A good vigorous rubbing, massage if you will, night and morning, for ten minutes, will keep the joints of the hands and fingers lithe and supple till long past the allotted threescore years and ten.

If, from age or any other cause, one feels a touch of rheumatism in the finger-joints, such as will enlarge them later on, a simple emollient will soon relieve. An old gentleman who became an invalid at mid-life had then perfect hands. He sat and bemoaned his fate that he could labor, even with his pen, no more. Gradually his finger-joints became turned and distorted, with no evidence of any disease to cause it—only lack of use. Had he but stirred up the circulation, and exercised his hands and his fingers, *some*how, *any*how, every day, he might have retained his beautiful and pliant hands as long as he lived.

The skin of the hands should be kept soft and smooth. This cannot be done with cheap soaps, for only poor, coarse material enters into their composition. Money is well spent for good toilet articles, and the most economical soap for the hands is the finest. A dainty odor is desirable as well.

Those who must count their money, and cannot afford the costlier appurtenances of the toilet, can find good substitutes in less expensive every-day articles. Ten cents' worth of borax will last a long time; it will whiten the hands and remove most discolorations, but it is astringent and drying in its nature, and if used too freely gives the skin a dry and parched appearance. Lemon-juice will remove from the hands such stains as borax will not.

The homely old remedy for chapped, rough, red hands—yellow corn-meal and vinegar—is very effectual; used, of course, in connection with a fine soap.

A little tincture of benzoin in the water for washing the hands is very softening; good for the face as well. Glycerine is healing, but does not take kindly to all skins.

Thick sweet cream is very healing for chapped hands; and a weak mustard-water will remove disagreeable odors. Profuse perspiration of the hands is a stubborn and annoying ailment and the ruin of gloves. Rice-powder, French chalk, or alum-water baths are the best remedies.

The belles of olden time used the following cleansing and agreeable preparation for the hands: one pound Castile soap dissolved over a fire with a little water till a smooth paste; then stir in a cup or more of oat, corn, or almond meal, and, when partly cold, pour into jars for use.

The manicure's art is one easily learned; the really necessary implements are not many. A high polish on the nails is not considered en règle to-day, and the fashion of trimming them to a point has also gone by. A pair of gloves of liberal size, if my lady wishes to do some dusting herself, will protect the hands. The "ounce of prevention" comes in most forcibly in this matter.

Nothing New

A short time ago there was in this column a suggestion for the use of the scissors for the entertaining and education of little children. It was suggested that the children should cut in white paper any of the stories with which they were familiar, such as "The House that Jack Built;" the house, the bag of malt, the rat, etc., all present outlines that are simple and those familiar to a child. After the parts had been cut, the next step is the pasting on sheets of paper, or into a scrap-book, of the figures in the story form. There have just been exhibited at the Teachers' College, Morningside Park, New York, some specimens of free-hand drawing from the Chicago public schools. In this exhibit the idea of giving the young children the opportunity for expression is used. The story of "Jack and Jill" is told by cutting out the figures, the pail, the well, and the house at the foot of the hill, from a thin blue paper laid over a cream. The colors make a picture, and the result is the first step in art work. The scissors work is for the children who are too young to use a sharp knife, but the knife work, too, offers opportunity for the expression of that which is a picture in the child's mind; it reveals to the observant mother and teacher what conception the child has of the words it uses, of the stories it hears or reads.

Preservation of Clippings

I have been interested in the suggestions concerning the preservation of clippings. Several of the methods I have used. The trouble often is that two good articles are found on the two sides of the same leaf. A great majority of the articles I preserve come to me in The Outlook. I had ten years' files of the paper. The accumulation was so great that its use was impracticable. I went through the whole of it, separating the leaves containing articles for preservation (except those containing small items for clipping, which I put by themselves), discarding the advertisements, etc. The selected leaves I divided—with no attempt at classification—into ten lots, marking them A, B, C, etc., and numbering the leaves of each consecutively. Around each lot is buckled a cloth strap. I bought white paper by weight and had it cut the size of calling-cards, and had made a slip index to all marked articles. These slips I arrange as I like, keeping some of them in a subdivided envelope. Thus I avoid the bulkiness of scrap-books, the muss of paste, the waste of time in pasting, embarrassment from articles that cannot be separated, and I have 2,500 indexed leaves of uniform size convenient for use. I shall treat my accumulating Outlooks in the same way. The system is invaluable to me in Bible-class teaching and for other purposes. W. P. W.

There is no better method of filing than that of using the manufactured files such as are in use in business offices. These files are sometimes fitted in small cabinets that will hold three files—one for letters, one for catalogues, and one for clippings—or all three may be used for clippings, classifying them in the files and filing alphabetically in each file. This is simple, inexpensive, and most convenient.

The Artist View

The artist's opinion on woman's dress is always valuable. Mr. Beckwith is quoted as saying:

> The real beauty of a dress lies in its perfect adaptation to the wearer. The Greek gown is best suited to certain types—women of full form and regular features: the Venetian or Renaissance to the warmth and richness of Italian beauty. The modern style, properly adjusted, is equally well adapted to the beautiful nineteenth-century women who grace it.

A New Business

The papers of Buffalo describe a new calling or employment for women—that of house-hunter. The business grew out of personal experience. The woman who has developed it spent a long time in finding the house she wanted. The number of useless journeys she made at the suggestion of real-estate men convinced her that a woman could make a good living who would make a study of houses, locations, and rents. She visited real-estate agents, and some agreed to pay her a percentage for the tenants she received for their houses. She charged the renters a small fee when they were suited. She has been very successful, and has added flats and rooms as well as whole houses to her list.

A Citizen's Letter

A school superintendent in Maine has received the following note from a citizen in a small town:

> Dear Sir I wish to say to you that Our School is no good and I wont you to stup the scool and it must be done for the town is paying away our monay for northing if you cannot take that teacher Out of the School and put in a new teachr you must stup the school I have seen a lawyer and he says it can be stup I shall Notify the town so that she can not get her pay I suppose that is all you want her to have thair is not a Scholar goin to scool now she come and stay her Ours now it must be stup I shal take proper meens to do so you can come and see me if you wish to

A Standard

> Ruskin once wrote to Dante Gabriel Rossetti: "If you wanted to oblige me, you would keep your room in order and go to bed at night. All your fine speeches go for nothing with me till you do that."

That was all. Ruskin stood for health as well as beauty; and order was to him—is it not in fact?—one of the first elements of beauty.

How much faster the world would grow if we only would practice as much as we preach

A Breakfast Fruit

Grape-fruit is recommended by doctors as a tonic. One physician said recently that people whose livers were always in remembrance would find them driven from their minds if they used grape-fruit freely in the morning.

A Dangerous Practice

The householders in cities should not use hot water to wash the sidewalks when the temperature is at the freezing-point. This practice is most dangerous. In some cities a fine is imposed for using water on the walk in freezing weather.

A Practical School

Near Philadelphia a Practical Housekeeping School has been opened. The school year is from October to May; pupils may enter for one month. All departments of housekeeping will be taught.

A Good Almanac is one of the best books to have in the house for reference.

The Sunlight Almanac for 1896 contains 480 pages, bound in crimson leatherette and stamped in gold (worth 50c.)

Given Free to users of Sunlight Soap

How to obtain them. Commencing Nov., 1895, and until all are given out, purchasers of Sunlight Soap will receive one FREE from their grocer.

Contents. A Complete Almanac, Tables, Directions for Home Management, Language of Flowers, Gardening, Games and Amusements, Dress-making and Fashions, Recipes, Dreams and their significance (page 330).

Sunlight Soap

Lever Bros., Ltd., Hudson & Harrison Sts., N.Y.

The Personal Side of George Washington

BY GENERAL A. W. GREELY, U. S. A.

Not the President, Statesman nor General will General Greely describe, but the young man, the lover, the son, the husband, the neighbor and man. General Greely has read over 2000 of Washington's own letters in preparing these articles.

His first paper will treat of

The Loves and Marriage of Washington

Sketching his true attitude toward women: his courtships with Sally Cary and Betsey Fauntelroy, and his marriage with Martha Custis. The articles will shortly begin in

THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL

One Dollar for One Year

The Curtis Publishing Company, Philadelphia

COPYRIGHT, 1896, BY THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY

THE

Journal of Hygiene

$1.00 a year; 10 cents a number

The back Numbers from July to Dec.
Free to New Subscribers for '96

THE JANUARY NO. CONTAINS:

Hygiene of the Heart. BY THE EDITOR.

Cold Feet: Their Cause and Cure.

Large Eaters. BY DR. DIO LEWIS.

Psyche Healing: Schlatter a Case. BY HESTER M. POOLE.

Notes Concerning Health. BY THE EDITOR.

Hygiene for Women. BY JENNIE CHANDLER.

Topics of the Month. BY THE EDITOR.

The New Year; A Wise Gift; Mr. Frothingham and His Sunday-School; Studying Brains; Studies Concerning Alcohol and its Effects.

DECEMBER NO., PARTIAL CONTENTS:

Grief a Spiritual Malady: Consolations. BY FELIX ADLER.

Health and Working Habits of Elizabeth Cady Stanton. BY HERSELF.

Physiological Effects of Anger. BY HELEN L. MANNING.

Notes Concerning Health. BY THE EDITOR.

The Perfect Man, No. 48, by Dr. T. D. Crother: Anorexia; Longevity and Labor; Dreams of the Blind; Diseases Not Transmitted by Heredity; Light and its Effects on the Mind.

Hygiene for Women, No. 32. BY JENNIE CHANDLER.

A Dangerous Experiment for Parents.

THE NOVEMBER NO. CONTAINS:

The Hygiene of Our Consciousness. BY HENRY WOOD.

Hygiene of Our Eyes, etc.

THE OCTOBER NO.:

Vivisection in Schools. BY DR. LEFFINGWELL.

A Bad Breath—Its Cure. DIO LEWIS.

THE SEPTEMBER NO. CONTAINS
DR. BUCKE'S ESSAY:

Was Walt Whitman Mad? etc.

THE AUGUST NO.:

Voice Training and Health.

THE JULY NO.:

The Dietetic Treatment of Epilepsy.
Hygienic Treatment of Obesity.
Exercise for Consumptives, Etc.

Each No. contains Notes on Health,
A Series of Short Papers, The Perfect Man,
A Department entitled Hygiene for Women,
" " Topics of the Month.

The "Scientific American" says: "'The Journal of Hygiene and Herald of Health' contains more sensible articles than any journal of its kind."

A Premium Worth Having

Every new subscriber may, by sending 10 cents extra, have Dr. Holbrook's work entitled a volume of over 300 pages, and a work in every way valuable. The retail price of the work in cloth is $1.50, but the copy sent will be paper bound.

HYGIENE OF THE BRAIN

The following books are also published by the same house:

Eating for Strength	$1 00
Liver Complaint	1 00
How to Strengthen the Memory	1 00
Advantages of Chastity, paper	50
Deep Breathing, or Lung Gymnastics	50

All the above to one order, $4.00.

Address Dr. M. L. HOLBROOK
46 E. 21st St., New York

Literary Notes

—Dr. Conan Doyle has now completed his last novel. It is a tale of the Regency, and will be entitled "Rodney Stone."

—The title of Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett's new novel is announced to be "A Lady of Quality." It is a story of the days of Queen Anne.

—Mr. Lecky, the historian, who has just been elected to Parliament for Dublin University, has two volumes on "Democracy and Liberty" in the press.

—With his new novel, "Über allen Gipfeln," Herr Paul Heyse has changed his course somewhat and for the better. In it the Nietszche school of philosophy is shown to be futile.

—The Clarendon Press is now publishing Mr. Gladstone's edition of Bishop Butler's works. The venerable statesman closes his account of the causes inducing him to undertake the work with a—for him—wonderfully short sentence: "Better thus than not at all."

—"Romance," in its present dress and matter, is an attractive journal for five cents. In the January number we note readable articles on Turkey, Amateur Photography, Hindus and their Tricks, Actors and their Make-up, and Gold-Mining in South Africa. There are also appreciative notices of the lives and works of M. Jules Viaud ("Pierre Loti"), Mrs. Alma-Tadema, Messrs. Hopkinson Smith and Wells Champney.

—The late Jean Baptiste Montegut was the first European to expound the philosophy of Ralph Waldo Emerson. In 1857 M. Montegut became editor of the "Revue des Deux Mondes," a position he held five years, when he took charge of the literary criticism of the "Moniteur Universel." Besides his numerous essays on philosophy and literature, he translated the works of Shakespeare, Macaulay, and Emerson into French.

—The fashionable novelist in Italy just now is Signor Gabriele d'Annunzio. Strangely enough, the supreme test for Italy seems to be French criticism. It was rumored that Signor d'Annunzio's new series of novels, "I Gigli," would be published exclusively in French, because the romancer avers that only French readers have ever really understood him. However, this rumor does not tally with the fact that the first of the series is announced to appear in "Il Convito" and is called "La Vergine alle Roccie."

—A dispatch from London to the New York "Sun" says that "it is impossible to overlook, even in this hour of crisis, the crowning disgrace inflicted on this long-suffering country to-day by its official versifier. The Poet Laureate's effort in the 'Times,' entitled 'Jameson's Ride,' has broken the spirit of all Englishmen who have seen it, and if Parliament were in session might easily have caused a vote of no confidence in the Government which appointed this successor of Tennyson. Here is a stanza:

> "Wrong! Is it wrong? Well, may be;
> But I'm going, boys, all the same.
> Do they think me a burgher's baby
> To be scared by a scolding name?
> They may argue, and prate, and order;
> Go tell them to save their breath.
> Then over the Transvaal border,
> And gallop for life or death."

—It may not be known that as a young man Mr. Thomas Hardy, the novelist, proposed to follow architecture as a profession, and was for a while in the office of the well-known architect Sir Arthur Blomfield. He used his spare moments, however, in writing a novel called "Desperate Remedies." Though this met with failure, he was not discouraged, and produced "Under the Greenwood Tree." At that time Mr. Frederick Greenwood was editing the "Cornhill Magazine." One day, at a cheap book-stall, he chanced to light upon "Under the Greenwood Tree," and for the sake of its name he picked it up and saw that there was genius in the neglected work. He then hunted up Mr. Hardy and commissioned him to write a novel for the "Cornhill." Thus was born "Far From the Madding Crowd."

[For list of Books Received see page 169]

A COUGH SHOULD NOT BE NEGLECTED. "Brown's Bronchial Troches" are a simple remedy and give immediate and sure relief.

The best lamp-chimney word in the world is "Macbeth," whether English or French or Flemish or Dutch.

But get the shape that is made for your lamp, "pearl top" or "pearl glass." Let us send you the Index.

Geo A Macbeth Co
Pittsburgh Pa

Church Finances
Greatly Augmented.

To fill your church with interested people is the way to have a healthy treasury. This is easily done by using the masterpieces of the world to proclaim the gospel to the eye as well as speak it to the ear. Everybody sings the gospel from the lantern screen.

Write for pamphlet, "Solved; or, The Sunday Evening Problem." Read its hints, and the actual experience of pastors who have tried the new plan. It is mailed for the asking. Illustrated catalogue 20 cents.

RILEY BROTHERS,
Branches: 16 Beekman St., New York.
BOSTON: 244 Washington St. CHICAGO · 196 La Salle St. KANSAS CITY (Mo.): 515 East 14th St, MINNEAPOLIS: 1564 Hennepin Ave. CHATTANOOGA · 708 Market St. SAN FRANCISCO · 430 Kearny St. PORTLAND · 411 Couch St.

THE STAMP OF QUALITY

The Liberty

When you see it on your wheel, you know you have the best

THE LIBERTY CYCLE CO
4 Warren Street, New York City

The admirers of the works of Robert Louis Stevenson will be glad to know that the famous Thistle Edition is now complete and will be delivered upon terms which make it possible for every book-lover to own these beautiful volumes.

The Outlook says:

"This edition is an event in the literary world. It is not too much to say of the Thistle Edition that it comes as near the ideal of perfect book-making, at a moderate price, as we have yet approached in this country."

For full particulars send a postal to Charles Scribner's Sons, 153–157 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

Reliable representatives wanted.

FLAVOR CUDAHY'S REX BRAND EXTRACT OF BEEF makes delicious flavor for Soups, etc. Send 4c. for Book and Sample. The Cudahy Pharmaceutical Co., South Omaha, Neb.

Don't buy cheap; trashy bindings that are dear at any price. You pay but a trifle more for

TRADE - S·H·&M· - MARK

BIAS VELVETEEN
SKIRT BINDINGS

and save your time, your money and your dress.

Look for "S. H. & M." on the label and take no other.

If your dealer will not supply you we will.

Send for samples, showing labels and materials, to the S. H. & M. Co., P. O. Box 699, New York City.

Liebig Company's THE BEST is the most Economical. Don't buy inferior and imitation sorts; nor liquid extracts, which are mostly water and salt, ask for Liebig Company's

WORLD-KNOWN Extract of Beef

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.
EPPS'S GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.
COCOA
BOILING WATER OR MILK.

1896 LITTLE 1896

"FOR EVERY BOOK READER."

LITTLE JOURNEYS to the Homes of American Authors: (1.) Emerson, by Geo. Wm. Curtis. (2.) Bryant. (3.) Prescott. (4.) Lowell. (5.) Simms, by Wm. Cullen Bryant. (6.) Walt Whitman. (7.) Hawthorne, by Curtis. (8.) Audubon, by Parke Godwin. (9.) Irving. (10.) Longfellow. (11.) Everett. (12.) Bancroft.

Twelve monthly parts (beginning in January) '96, beautifully printed. Subscription for one year (12 numbers), including postage, 50c. Sample Copy, 5c.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, Publishers,
27 West 23d Street, New York City.

JOURNEYS

The Juvenile Class and Concert No. 2

By H. H. McGranahan and W. A. Lafferty

This book, like its very successful predecessor, Class and Concert No. 1, is designed for day schools, singing classes, concerts, and entertainments. It contains a complete and carefully graded course of instruction, a choice collection of new songs, duets, trios, etc., and a short cantata, entitled "America's Birthday." This book is much in advance of Class and Concert No. 1 in having a more complete and systematic course of exercises and a higher grade of music for practice and songs for entertainments. Price, 30 Cents.

PUBLISHED BY
THE JOHN CHURCH COMPANY
Cincinnati New York Chicago

Daily Bible Readings

These notes have been arranged for the daily use of busy people, and are intended to furnish suggestive thoughts which may be followed out at pleasure. It is not claimed that they are exhaustive, and critical exposition has not been attempted. The notes are so printed that they may be conveniently cut out and placed in a Bible for daily use.

SOME WOMEN OF THE BIBLE—VI.

Sunday, January 26. Esther ix. Mordecai's day of joy comes through Esther, ver. 4. The expression, "day of feasting and gladness," in vers. 17, 18, 19. A Christmas custom, ver. 19, l. c. The month that was "turned," ver. 22, might well be celebrated forever, ver. 28. Is gratitude a national virtue in our country?

Monday, January 27. Esther x. Of the three statements concerning Mordecai's goodness in ver. 3, the last by far the most important. Ps. cxxii., 7, 8.; Col. iii., 15; Rev. i., 4; Phil. iv., 7.

Tuesday, January 28. Luke i., 28–56. Four prominent women named Mary: (1) the mother of Jesus; (2) Mary of Magdala; (3) Mary the mother of James and Joses, and (4) the sister of Lazarus. Also Rom. xvi., 6. Christ's mother mentioned only four times after his infancy. Her character best studied in Luke first. She is "highly favored," but not an object of worship; blessed for her faith, ver. 45; her humility, ver. 48; her reverent spirit, vers. 49, 50; her patriotism, ver. 54. Present at the ascension, but apparently not at the resurrection. Object of her son's last care, John xix., 26, 27. In Acts i., 14; ix., 11, see the blessing following the bitter hour; in John xix., 25, f. c. See Rom. viii., 18; 2 Cor. v., 1–9.

Wednesday, January 29. Mary, the mother of James and Joses, was probably the sister of Christ's mother, and her faithful friend, as well as the friend of Christ. Called also, John xix., 25. By the cross and at the sepulcher, Mark xv., 47, and xvi., 1; carrying good but incredible news to the sorrowing, Luke xxiv., 10; Prov. xvii., 17; John xi., 11; Prov. xxvii., 9.

Thursday, January 30. Luke viii., 1–3. A woman of unblemished character and in good circumstances, ver. 3, l. c. Healed by Christ of a terrible disease, she gratefully followed and ministered to him, ver. 2, 3. At the crucifixion, John xix., 25. She followed to the burial, Mark xv., 47; brought spices, Mark xvi., 1, and John xx., 1. To her Christ first appeared as she wept at his grave in the early dawn, John xx., 15, 16. No doubt she was in the glorious company, Acts i., 9. A true, loving, self-sacrificing, grateful follower of Christ. Are you such?

Friday, January 31. Luke x., 39-42. Three pictures of this lovely Mary. The first, in Luke x., reveals her character. The place that she coveted, "at Jesus' feet," hearing his word, Ps. xxvii., 4, 5; Luke viii., 35. Her position indicates humility and deep affection. "That good part" held its true place in her heart. "In having all things and not Thee, what have I?" Phil. i., 21; 1 Tim. vi., 6.

Saturday, February 1. John xi., 1–45. The sisters in deep distress, ver. 3. John vi., 68; Isa. xxvi., 16; Ps. xlvi., 1. A beautiful record, ver. 5. Mary in ver. 20, l. c., may have been overcome with grief or not aware of Christ's approach, but she came quickly, vers. 29–31. An affectionate sister, ver. 31, l. c. Had many friends, vers. 19, 31, 33. But her crowning virtue was her faith, ver. 32, l. c. Matt. xv., 28; 1 Pet. i., 7; Rom. v., 1; Heb. xi., 6.

A Popular Author

Mr. Owen Wister, the author of many interesting studies of the West, is a Harvard man, and toward the end of his course at college his tastes seemed to become musical rather than literary. After graduation, so the "Bookman" informs us, he resolved to adopt a musical career, and with this purpose in view went abroad, and, upon the recommendation of Liszt, began the study of composition in Paris. Unexpected circumstances, however, occasioned a sudden change of plan, and Mr. Wister returned to America. Shortly afterwards failing health sent him elk-hunting in Wyoming, and seeking health he found not only new strength but a new world. He then settled down to the practice of law in Philadelphia, but the spell of the West was upon him and could not be broken. The literary instinct which it had stirred could not be stilled.

When Tired Out

Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate

Dr. M. H. Henry, New York, says: "When completely tired out by prolonged wakefulness and overwork, it is of the greatest value to me. As a beverage it possesses charms beyond anything I know of in the form of medicine."

Not a Patent Medicine.

Nervous Headache

few escape. It is one of the penalties of the age. Our grandparents never had it. They had nerve but not nerves. In their day more than half the physicians were not prescribing

Freligh's Tonic

A Phosphorized Cerebro-Spinant

as a nerve sedative, as they are today. Contains no opiate of any kind. Perfectly safe. Prompt relief. Builds up and strengthens the whole system.

Regular bottle, $1.00, 100 doses. All druggists. Concentrated, prompt, powerful. Sample by mail 25 cents. Descriptive pamphlet, formula, testimonials, etc., mailed to any address.

I. O. Woodruff & Co.,
Manufacturing Chemists,
106-108 Fulton Street, New York City,

Formula on Every Bottle.

Van Dyke's Fascinating Out-Door Books

Theodore S. Van Dyke, the author of the best-known books about the "American Italy," has what Charles Dudley Warner calls "Uncommon powers of description and a genuine literary gift. . . . Carries the poetic charm of the land." His latest book is:

GAME BIRDS AT HOME

The sportsman, the dog, the birds and their haunts and habits, are all treated with expert information and graphic skill. $1.50.

"Delightful book! Such completeness of knowledge; such apt and vivid word-painting; such variety and yet such unity,; and withal such literary taste blending with the sportsman's instincts, make this one of the most charming books ever written."—The American Field.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA:

Its Valleys, Hills, and Streams; its Animals, Birds, and Fishes; its Gardens, Farms, and Climate. $1.50.

MILLIONAIRES OF A DAY:

An Inside History [as true as it is witty] of the Great Southern California Land Boom. $1.00; paper, 50c.

RIFLE, ROD, and GUN IN CALIFORNIA

A Sporting Romance. Shooting, Fishing, and Flirting in one adventurous expedition. $1.50; paper, 50c.

THE STILL HUNTER:

A practical treatise on Deer Stalking. Called by the Spirit of the Times "the best, the very best, work on the subject." $2.00.

⁂ Of all Booksellers, or mailed by the Publishers,

FORDS, HOWARD, & HULBERT, New York

Have you seen the new Monthly Magazine

"Progress of the World"?

It contains in simple, easily understood terms an explanation and account of the great current events of the whole world in political and historical matters; the notable achievements in scientific discovery; the most interesting mechanical accomplishments; the greatest financial events; the literary and artistic works of special merit. Keeps the busy reader informed of everything worth knowing in current human progress.

Profusely Illustrated. One Dollar a Year.
Send five 2-cent stamps for Sample Copy.

PROGRESS OF THE WORLD CO.
156 Fifth Ave., New York

Christianity as Christ Preached It

Wishing to extend the faith in a simple, rational Christianity, literature will be sent free to all upon application to SEC. POST-OFFICE MISSION, 1102 Walnut St., Philadelphia.

D. Appleton & Co.'s New Books

Movement

By E. J. Marey, Member of the Institute and of the Academy of Medicine; Professor at the College of France; author of "Animal Mechanism." Translated by Eric Pritchard, M.A. With 200 Illustrations. Vol. 73, International Scientific Series. 12mo. Cloth, $1.75.

The present work describes the methods employed in the extended development of photography of moving objects attained in the last few years, and shows the importance of such researches in mechanics and other departments of physics, the fine arts, physiology and zoölogy, and in regulating the walking or marching of men and the gait of horses.

Successors to the Title

By Mrs. L. B. Walford, author of "Baby's Grandmother," etc. No. 184, Town and Country Library. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

Readers of the best contemporary fiction know how to appreciate this popular author's lightness of touch and unfailing humor.

Stonepastures

By Eleanor Stuart. 16mo. Cloth, 75 cents.

This graphic picture of quaint characters belongs to the class of specialized American fiction which has been headed by the work of Miss Wilkins, Mr. Cable, Colonel Johnston, Mr. Garland, and others. The author has studied the peculiar and almost unknown life of the laborers in a Pennsylvania mining and manufacturing town with a keenness of observation and an abundant sense of humor which will give her book a permanent place among the genre studies of American life.

For sale by all booksellers; or will be sent by mail on receipt of price by the publishers,

D. APPLETON & CO.
72 Fifth Ave., New York

Begin the New Year with Good Singing!!!

Highest Praise, for the Sabbath School.
$30 per 100 copies.
Christian Endeavor Hymns, for Young People.
$30 per 100 copies.
Gospel Hymns, 1 to 6, for Devotional Meetings.
Excelsior Music Edition, 739 Hymns, $75 per 100 copies.
Words only, limp Cloth covers, - $10 per 100 copies.

The above are unequaled. Do not substitute inferior books because of lower price. The best are cheapest!!

THE BIGLOW & MAIN CO.
76 East 9th St., New York. 215 Wabash Ave., Chicago.

The Beginner in Phrasing

By W. S. B. MATHEWS

This book is founded upon a new idea in Piano teaching which is destined to have great influence in all future first-class teaching. It is an elementary course of lessons in figures, motives, periods, thematic development, and transposition, for the development of musical intelligence and taste, and the foundation of musical phrasing, from the works of Handel, Schubert, Reinhold, Wolf, Heller, Reinecke, and Gayrhos. The grade of difficulty is that of the third and fourth grades, and is a companion to Mathews' Graded Materials, Volume 2. Price, $1.00.

PUBLISHED BY THE JOHN CHURCH COMPANY
Cincinnati New York Chicago

STAMPED STEEL CEILINGS

DECORATIVE, DURABLE, AND BEST

for Dwellings, Churches, or Business Houses. Ceilings of any shape, old or new. Send for Catalogue.

H. S. NORTHROP, 29 Cherry St., N. Y.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT

Tells the thrilling story of

ST. CLAIR'S DEFEAT

The author has made a careful study of this disastrous campaign, availing himself of material not hitherto used. The paper is handsomely illustrated by R. F. Zogbaum.

HENRY LOOMIS NELSON has an exceedingly timely and important paper on THE PASSING OF THE FUR-SEAL

CASPAR W. WHITNEY'S third paper of his series, On Snow-Shoes to the Barren Grounds, describes a characteristic bison hunt, with illustrations from photographs and from drawings by Frederic Remington.

The New Baltimore. The German Struggle for Liberty. Briseis by William Black. Joan of Arc, by Louis de Conte. A Mother in Israel, the last story from the pen of the late Prof. H. H. Boyesen. A humorous story by M. E. M. Davis, illustrated by A. B. Frost. Etc., etc.

IN

HARPER'S MAGAZINE

FEBRUARY NUMBER

FOR SALE EVERYWHERE. $4.00 A YEAR.

SICUT PATRIBUS SIT DEUS NOBIS

Old South Leaflets on Puritanism

Seven new leaflets have just been added to the Old South series, all relating to English Puritanism and the Commonwealth. They are numbered 58 to 64, and are as follows: No. 58, Hooper's Letters to Bullinger; 59, Sir John Eliot's "Apology for Socrates;" 60, Ship-money Papers; 61, Pym's Speech against Strafford; 62, Cromwell's Second Speech; 63, Milton's "Free Commonwealth;" 64, Sir Henry Vane's Defence.

All leaflets contain full historical and bibliographical notes. Price, 5 cents a copy; $4.00 a hundred. Send for complete list.

Directors of Old South Work, Old South Meeting House, Boston

WORLD-WIDE POPULARITY

THE DELICIOUS PERFUME
CRAB-APPLE BLOSSOMS

AND THE FAMOUS
CROWN LAVENDER SALTS

"A delicate perfume of the highest quality; one of the choicest ever produced."—Court Journal

SOLD EVERYWHERE

In crown-stoppered bottles only. Beware of fraudulent imitations put up by unprincipled dealers for extra gain.

THE CROWN PERFUMERY CO. 177 New Bond Street, London

Can ASTHMA Be Cured? IS A QUESTION AFFECTING THOUSANDS.

"It gives me pleasure to say that you have cured me of Asthma. I suffered several days at a time every year for over ten years, before I commenced Dr. Hayes' treatment. After a thorough trial I was cured, and haven't suffered a minute since. This was over five years ago. If you wish you may publish this."

G. L. CONNOR, M.D., Cokesbury, S. C.

"Schuyler is very well, and entirely free from Asthma and the other complaints that formerly troubled him so much. For the past two years he has had no return of his Asthma, and is strong and well, and can do his ten or twenty miles on his bicycle. As for myself, I have had no return of Asthma for several years, and in fact have never had since the first year of using your medicine (1888)."

W. C. PATE, 46 Cedar St., New York, N. Y.

☞ 2000 other references, with full information, free on application to Dr. HAYES, Buffalo, N. Y.

To Look on the Bright Side of Things, Use SAPOLIO

The Outlook

A Family Paper

New Series of The Christian Union

Copyright, 1896, by The Outlook Company.

Entered as second-class matter in the New York Post-Office.

The Outlook is a weekly Family Paper, containing this week sixty-eight pages. The subscription price is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance.

Postage is Prepaid by the publishers for all subscriptions in the United States, Canada, and Mexico. For all other countries in the Postal Union add $1.56 for postage.

Changes of Address.—When a change of address is ordered, both the new and the old address must be given. The notice should be sent one week before the change is to take effect.

Discontinuances.—If a subscriber wishes his copy of the paper discontinued at the expiration of his subscription, notice to that effect should be sent Otherwise it is assumed that a continuance of the subscription is desired.

How to Remit.—Remittances should be sent by Check, Draft, Express-Order, or Money Order, payable to order of THE OUTLOOK COMPANY. Cash should be sent in Registered Letter.

Letters should be addressed:

THE OUTLOOK,
Clinton Hall, Astor Place,
New York.

Contents for 25 January, 1896

EDITORIAL:

The Monroe Doctrine in the Senate........... 125
The English and American Press............. 125
The Behring Sea Question...................... 126
The Transvaal and Great Britain............. 126
The Manitoba Elections........................ 126
Spain and Cuba................................. 127
The New Bond Issue........................... 127
New United States Senators.................. 128
Temperance Legislation....................... 128
The Greater New York......................... 129
A Bad Example.................................. 129
Hopeful Signs.................................... 130
A Historical Precedent......................... 130
The Peace of God............................... 131

CONTRIBUTED ARTICLES:

The Higher Life of New York City........... 132
By Albert Shaw
Albert Shaw: A Sketch......................... 139
Three Poems..................................... 140
By Emily Dickinson
Clara Barton and the Red Cross.............. 141
By Myrtis Willmot Barton
Clara Barton: An Impression................. 145
Rembrandt Harmensz van Rijn................ 146
By Elbert F. Baldwin
Alfred Austin: The New Poet Laureate...... 148
By Hamilton W. Mabie
From Atlanta to the Sea. I.—Atlanta and Macon.. 151
By W. J. Abbot
How Shall a Boy be Introduced to Tools?.... 155
By Charles A. Bennett
Kate Carnegie. Chapters III. and IV......... 156
By Ian Maclaren
The Religious Outlook in Japan............... 162
By the Rev. D. C. Greene, D.D.
Leonard Bradley and the Wolves: A Story for Young Folks.......................... 166
By Virginia W. Cloud

BOOKS AND AUTHORS:

Walter Pater's Last Essays.................... 160
Novels and Tales................................ 161

THE RELIGIOUS WORLD:

The Deputation to Japan........................ 164
The Recall of Commander Booth.............. 165
The Brick Church in New York............... 165
Myron Adams.................................... 165
FOR THE LITTLE PEOPLE........................ 167
NOTES AND QUERIES............................ 169
THE HOME CLUB.................................. 170

Shorthand without Complications

by ALFRED JANES has been written for ten years by its author in the Reporting Gallery of the British Parliament, and is recognized by the English Education Department. It is the most easy of all the efficient systems. The Manual of the System, with an Exercise Book and a Shorthand Key to same, will be sent, post free, on receipt of thirty cents in postage stamps. Address A. JANES, 5 Crofton Road, Camberwell, London, S. E., Eng.

Delicate Lace

and Lingerie can be washed with perfect safety if you use the perfect soap. It is just as cheap as common soap and just about ten times as good. Ask your dealer for it. Made only by

COPCO
TRADE MARK.

THE N. K. FAIRBANK CO.,
Chicago. New York. St. Louis.

Night Gowns ❧ ❧

58 inches long, made of the excellent Hill muslin at

$1.00

These exceptional gowns have yoke of fine tucks, pleated back and the front and sleeves are trimmed with pretty guipure pattern embroidery.

Mailed to any address for $1.00 and We pay the postage. Money refunded if desired.

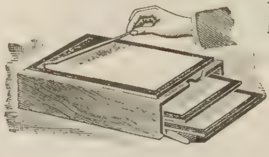
STRAWBRIDGE & CLOTHIER.
Dry Goods. PHILADELPHIA.



The Lawton Simplex Printer

saves time and labor; money too—100 letters, postal cards, copies of music, drawings, or typewritten copy, in almost no time, and exact copies at that, by using the Lawton Simplex. Requires no washing or cleaning, and saves its cost over and again in sending out notices. Costs but little ($3 to $10).

CAUTION.—Other things are being made and called Simplex Printers. The only way to be sure of getting the genuine is to see that yours is the Lawton Simplex Printer. Send for circulars. Agents wanted.

LAWTON & CO., 20 Vesey St., New York

Arnold Constable & Co.

SPRING NOVELTIES.

Ladies' Wash Fabrics

FRENCH PIQUÉ,
EMBROIDERED LINONS,
STRIPE & PLAIN LINON BATISTE.

Grass Linen Batiste

WHITE EMBROIDERED NAINSOOK,
FRENCH ORGANDIES,
PRINTED DIMITY.

Printed Linen Lawns

D. & J. ANDERSON'S

Celebrated

ZEPHYRS

The Spring styles of Fancy Zephyrs are very striking both in novelty and design. The Checks, Stripes, and Plaids are still unrivaled for durability and wear.

Broadway & 19th st.

NEW YORK

The Business World

China to Float Another Loan Last Saturday it was telegraphed from Pekin that the Deutsche Ostasiatische Bank and the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation have secured the contract to issue a 5 per cent. Chinese Government loan of 100,000,000 taels, to cost 89½. The loan is to be issued at 95.

Iron Production Declining Last November pig-iron production reached its maximum—over 217,000 tons a week. January figures, however, show a product of only 207,500 tons. The "Iron Age" says that "while this is progress in the right direction, it is doubtful whether consumption is even now capable of coping with the output." Last week, however, iron and steel advanced in price.

Canal Trolley vs. Canal Mules A contemporary reports Mr. Campbell Adams, the State Engineer and Surveyor of New York State, as saying that within three years the canal mules will have to say good-by to the tow-path. By the time the Erie Canal is deepened from seven to nine feet, and those locks strengthened which now will admit but one boat, he thinks the canal trolley will be ready for use. The only obstacle is found in the transmission of power over long distances, but Mr. Adams adds that it is not necessary that power should be generated at one point only, even at Niagara Falls.

Railway Stocks The principal changes last week in quotations for railway stocks were advances of one point and over each in New York Central, Susquehanna pfd., Omaha and Iowa Central pfd.; of over two points in Lake Shore; of three points in Lake Erie and Western pfd. and in Lackawanna; of four points in Metropolitan Traction, and of five points in Illinois Central. There were declines of one point and over in Canada Southern and in Rock Island, and of two points in Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy. The bond list shows a larger proportion of gains than is seen in the above. This circumstance is indeed a gratifying one. The volume of business is somewhat restricted from the fear of tight money, resulting from bond-issue payments.

The New York City Clearing-House On Wednesday of last week the beautiful new Clearing-House in New York City was dedicated with appropriate exercises. It may not be generally realized how small is the sum of actual currency necessary to discharge Clearing-House balances after the exchanges of checks and securities have been arranged. In his oration, Mr. J. Edward Simmons, the President of the Fourth National Bank, said that the total transactions of the Clearing-House from October, 1853, to October, 1895, amounted to the sum of $1,092,815,818,055. The balances found necessary in connection with this almost fabulous total were but a little more than 4.5 per cent. of the clearings, and even these balances were discharged, not in currency, but principally by certificates on a common depositary. Mr. Simmons instanced the balances for 1883. One-half of 1 per cent. of these balances and less than one-fiftieth of 1 per cent. of the entire earnings were paid in legal tenders and coin.

The Government Bond Issue The two most notable events of last week in the financial world were, first, the dissolution of the syndicate formed by Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan to bid for the new Government bond issue; and, second, the circular put forth by Secretary Carlisle extending the time for paying subscriptions to the issue. On both of these incidents we comment elsewhere. In regard to payments for the bonds, gold is being imported from Europe (nearly $5,500,000 came in last week) by some intending subscribers; others are arranging to buy gold in this market at a premium of ½ to 1 per cent. Let it not be forgotten, however, that (though last week's gold exports were only half as much as the imports) gold is being continually withdrawn from the Treasury for export without premium, while with premium gold is imported. The Treasury thus continues to suffer. Its gold reserve is now less than $54,000,000. Preparation for the new issue was plainly seen in last Saturday's statement of the New York City associated banks. Their specie holdings have now increased to over $73,000,000, of which almost all is gold. None of the metal most recently added has come from the Treasury; but largely from checks taken by smelters for gold bars deposited in the United States Assay Office. These checks are deposited by the smelters in the various banks, which in turn exchange them at the Sub-Treasury for gold-coin certificates.

The Transvaal Mines In spite of the excitement caused by Dr. Jameson's filibustering raid and the colossal setback during the latter half of 1895, the South African gold-mining securities have held their own during the past fortnight with remarkable and encouraging steadiness. At the statutory meeting of the Barnato "Bank" on Tuesday of last week, Mr. Barnato said that the three companies belonging to the bank could pay 90 per cent. of their capital, and that the others could repay that capital ten times over. He said that in spite of the fact that they had gone through an unprecedented financial crisis, and that the depreciation of South African shares had been from £120,000,000 to £130,000,000 during the last six months, the bank could declare a dividend of 20 per cent., which would have been doubled, he asserted, under favorable circumstances. This may be "bluff," and the London "Statist" gives the following impressive table of fluctuations as a warning:

	Price Jan. 2, 1895.	Highest price, 1895.	Lowest, January, 1896.
East Rand	2 9-16	12¾	3½
Glencairn	3¾	4⅞	2½
Randfontein	20s. 6d.	4⅜	1⅝
Goldfields Deep	3⅝	14	4¾
Rand Mines	21½	45½	17½
Barnato Consols	....	5 11-16	1½
Cons. Goldfields	....	19⅝	8⅛
S. A. Gold Trust	4	12¾	6¾
Barnato Bank	....	4¾	1
Johannesb'g Investm't.	2¾	6⅞	2¼
Chartered	42s.	8 13-16	3⅛
De Beers	19⅜	32½	21

The "Statist" proceeds to say:

> We are of opinion that eventually, through force or through redress being granted and grievances removed, the outcome must be improvement in the economic conditions: and while there undoubtedly will remain the discomfort of soreness and friction between the Uitlander and Boer parties, this soreness will gradually disappear, particularly if there is resumption of business activity. . . . Not a few persons have been alarmed by silly talk about the Boers taking steps to destroy mining property in case of resort to arms. If mines were house property, and contending armies by bombardment were destroying such property, the loss would be a certain one; but, even with many conflicts in the mining area, the gold in the ground would remain, the shafts and levels of mining companies would still exist, and damage would be in respect of the surface equipment. Is it conceivable that the Boers would lay themselves out to wantonly destroy mining plants? Of course it is out of the question that the Uitlanders would do so. Apart from the common sense of the subject, there is the expediency of the Boers offending their Continental friends, for in the destruction of mining property they would be interfering with the prospects of a great number of French, and to a less extent Germans, investors in South African mines. This point leads up to the subject of whether or not, in deference to at least that portion of the capitalists who have supported the Transvaal, concessions will not be made to ameliorate the mining and general commercial situation, and reforms of police, etc., inaugurated. While the prospect of the franchise question may be further deferred, the probability is that modifications of monopolies and duties will be effected, to the benefit of the mines.

Mica Few people know about mica-mines and that they constitute a valuable industry of North Carolina. The center of the mining interests is the little town of Bakersville, in the western part of the State. Mica can be mined cheaply. Dealers who handle it occupy little shacks which are furnished with a crude work-bench and a pair of shears. All about Bakersville mica may be seen; its formation is somewhat like that of stone, and it is found in the formation of almost any rock. The purer kinds are found between walls of slate. It is taken from the mines to shops where it is split and prepared for the market.

FINANCIAL

AMERICAN FIRE
INSURANCE COMPANY
A.D.1810.
Office, Company's Building,
308 & 310 Walnut St.,
Philadelphia

YOU make your own selection. You own your lot, out and out. It's yours—to build on, to hold, or sell.

And the profits on your shares are yours as well.

A moderate-means syndicate, operating in real estate in the direct line of New York's development—anything safer?

Mutual
Realty & Loan Corporation,
Room 17. American Surety Building.
New York.

Make a few Comparisons;
they are not always odious
Compare, for instance, the palace-car express with the day-car accommodation train.
Compare the 20-knot Atlantic liner with the tramp coaster.
Compare the metallic circuit line and long-distance telephone with the old grounded line and Blake transmitter.
Then you will appreciate that something has been done for you.
All New York Telephone Subscribers have
Metallic circuit underground lines.
Long-distance telephones.
Rapid service.
Communication with
13,500 telephones in New York city.
27,000 " in "Greater New York" and neighboring places.
100,000 telephones in towns and cities east of the Mississippi River.
New York City service from $75 a year.
THE METROPOLITAN TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO.
18 CORTLANDT STREET

SAFE INVESTMENTS
GOOD AS GOVERNMENT BONDS—DOUBLE THE RATE
5% 6% 7%
Made in strictly first-class Real Estate Mortgages, State, County, City, and School Warrants and Bonds, with a view to absolute security and prompt interest payments. Best references. Correspondence solicited.
JOHN P. DORR & CO., Investment Brokers
Seattle, Washington

WE PAY POSTAGE
All you have guessed about life insurance may be wrong. If you wish to know the truth, send for "How and Why," issued by the PENN MUTUAL LIFE, 921-3-5 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

YOU SELL WE BUY
DO YOU WANT TO SELL A
Western Mortgage
or Western Land—avoid foreclosure costs—stop sending good money after bad—get a good 5% investment instead! State exact location, condition of title, and your lowest price. Over $2,000,000 in Western securities successfully handled by the present management of this corporation.
THE BOSTON REALTY, INDEMNITY AND TRUST CO.
Send for our Bond List. 33 Equitable Building, Boston.

GOVERNMENT,
RAILROAD, and
MUNICIPAL BONDS

BANK STOCKS

and other

SELECTED SECURITIES

paying a fair rate of interest.

Harvey Fisk & Sons

24 Nassau St., New York

During the Month of January,

If you are like most readers of this paper, you will have a few dollars to invest—perhaps a few hundreds or thousands. You doubtless wish the best possible rate of interest consistent with safety.

Now, the Provident Trust Co. is organized for the express purpose of making safe investments for colleges, societies, estates, and individuals.

It offers guaranteed gold mortgages on improved city property, bearing 6% to 7% interest. It issues certificates of deposit at 5% to 7%, according to time.

The Provident Trust Co., 45 Milk Street, Boston, Mass.

Our book on investments is sent free.

Please mention The Outlook

Think it Over

Do you wish your savings to earn 6% and 8% combined with perfect security?

We offer to investors of any sum from $100 upwards 6% and 8% investments secured by First Mortgages on Gilt-Edged Real Estate.

YOUNG & CO.

Temple Court, 5 Beekman St., New York

A FIXED INCOME FOR LIFE

s secured by a Perfected Annuity Bond. They banish care, and thus prolong life. They double the income of elderly people. Adapted to all ages. SECURITY ABSOLUTE. Address (stating age)

B. G. CARPENTER, 256 Broadway, New York.

WESTERN MORTGAGES

DEFAULTED AND OTHERWISE,
Bought for Cash.

CHAS. E. GIBSON, 45 Milk St. Boston, Mass.

Broker for the Assured

I save my customers thousands of dollars annually. IF you intend insuring your life, or IF you carry life insurance taken out within the past three years, confer with me.

JAS. A. STEELE, 45 Broadway, New York

-THE- CINCINNATI BELL FOUNDRY Co
CINCINNATI, OHIO.
SOLE MAKERS OF THE "BLYMYER" BELLS
FOR CHURCH SCHOOL, FIRE ALARM &c
Catalogue with 2500 testimonials. Prices and terms FREE.

Guaranty Trust Co.
of New York.

Formerly New York Guaranty and Indemnity Co.
Mutual Life Building
65 CEDAR STREET, N. Y.

Capital, - - - $2,000,000
Surplus, - - - $2,000,000

ACTS AS TRUSTEE FOR CORPORATIONS, FIRMS, AND INDIVIDUALS, AS GUARDIAN, EXECUTOR, AND ADMINISTRATOR. TAKES ENTIRE CHARGE OF REAL AND PERSONAL ESTATES.

INTEREST ALLOWED ON DEPOSITS
subject to check or on certificate.

WALTER G. OAKMAN, President.
ADRIAN ISELIN, Jr., Vice-President.
GEORGE R. TURNBULL, 2d Vice-President.
HENRY A. MURRAY, Treas. and Sec.
J. NELSON BORLAND, Assist. Treas. and Sec.

DIRECTORS:

Samuel D. Babcock,
George F. Baker,
George S. Bowdoin,
Frederic Cromwell,
Walter R. Gillette,
Robert Goelet,
G. G. Haven,
Oliver Harriman,
R. Somers Hayes,
Charles R. Henderson,
Adrian Iselin, Jr.,
Augustus D. Juilliard,
James N. Jarvie,
Richard A. McCurdy,
Walter G. Oakman,
Alexander E. Orr,
Henry H. Rogers,
Henry W. Smith,
H. McK. Twombly,
Frederick W. Vanderbilt,
William C. Whitney.

Made in a Minute!

A delicious drink instantly made from WHITMAN'S INSTANTANEOUS CHOCOLATE. Perfect in flavor and quality. Put up in pound and half-pound tins.

Stephen F. Whitman & Son,
Sole Mfrs., Philadelphia.

Only a few of our issue of twenty year

6%

Gold Bonds left.
They may be obtained for a few days longer
at 90.
Price will be advanced to 95 about Feb. 1st.
These bonds will net you 7%
for the twenty years,
and are a most excellent investment.
You may easily satisfy yourself as to their unquestionable safety by writing us
for full particulars,
references, etc.

Roseland Improvement Co.,
178 Devonshire Street,
BOSTON.

CLARK J. BROWN, Treas.

A Few Extracts from Letters concerning the Illustrated Magazine Numbers of The Outlook

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, United States Senator from Ohio: Your first illustrated number of The Outlook is certainly very handsome and interesting.

President JAMES H. CANFIELD, Ohio State University: I looked forward with much interest to your copy of the first Illustrated Magazine Number of The Outlook. When it reached my hands it entirely fulfilled my anticipations. This effort is not only unique, but it is certainly most excellent and satisfying in its results.

Hon. GEO. F. HOAR, United States Senator from Massachusetts: I have examined with great pleasure the copy of The Outlook for December 21, 1895. If it is kept up to that standard it will be one of the best family papers in the world.

Mr. S. S. McCLURE, Publisher "McClure's Magazine," New York City: I think it by far the best idea introduced into weekly journalism in our generation. It enables The Outlook to enter one of the most profitable and popular fields in the whole publication business. It enables you to make a ten-cent magazine which, while it strengthens your weekly, will likewise in itself become a great force and a great property. If I am any judge of the value of an idea, I should say that it would easily double your circulation in twelve months. It makes The Outlook far more valuable than any ordinary weekly, and enables you to make it more valuable than any monthly. It gives you at one stroke the command of two of the greatest fields in journalism, and I don't see but that your table of contents would make glad the heart of any magazine editor.

Mr. JACOB A. RIIS, of New York City: In the enormous pressure of things that ought to be studied and cannot be for want of time, I have long since learned to take my point of view, in matters upon which I am not personally informed, from The Outlook, because it both knows and can be trusted. Holding this view of it, I am not astonished at its latest development of the "Magazine Number" feature. It is simply to me another evidence that The Outlook is always ahead in everything that goes to make a distinctly first-class journal of civilization. Success to it and to you in this and all coming years, as long as the world is forging ahead toward a better and purer life. If it ever goes off on the other tack, I expect to see The Outlook suspend.

President CHARLES W. ELIOT, Harvard University: I should think that an occasional illustrated number would be welcome to your subscribers; but I hardly think that illustrations are necessary to make The Outlook acceptable. It is the intellectual and spiritual quality of the paper which commends it to a large public.

Hon. J. STERLING MORTON, Secretary United States Department of Agriculture: If sufficient patronage can be obtained to warrant the publishing of such a magazine as part of the issue of a regular weekly paper, it will result in affording the very best character of literature at such moderate prices that the homes of the plain people throughout the country may enjoy it.

Professor BRANDER MATTHEWS, Columbia College, New York: I congratulate you on the success of your new departure. You seem to be in a fair way of solving the difficult problem of uniting literature to journalism.

Rev. Dr. FRANCIS E. CLARK, President United Society of Christian Endeavor: The first illustrated number of The Outlook is a most captivating one. Your unique idea of combining a weekly paper with a monthly magazine I should think would meet with immediate and deserved success.

President J. H. SCHURMAN, Cornell University: This new venture can hardly fail, it seems to me, to double the desirability of The Outlook in the eyes of all, by giving it a more permanent form without lessening its value as a weekly budget of news.

Rev. Dr. HENRY A. STIMSON, Pastor Broadway Tabernacle, New York: The Magazine Number of The Outlook is really dazzling in its beauty and surprising in its completeness. It ought to mark a new epoch in our religious papers.

R. H. CRUNDEN, LL.D., Director and American Manager Henry Gaze & Sons, New York: I am happy to send you sincere congratulations on this new departure, which, without any increase of price, must inevitably tend to immensely increase your popularity and circulation.

Rev. ALEX. V. G. ALLEN, D.D., Professor of Church History, Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge: The Outlook did not require this addition to add to its interest or value, but this combination of the monthly magazine with the weekly journal will form a strong attraction, I trust, as it is sure to be a source of pure pleasure in every home where it goes.

President H. B. FRISSELLE, Hampton Institute, Hampton, Va.: I feel a sense of personal gratitude to The Outlook for its helpfulness in many lines, and I consider the new venture most enterprising. In this day, when some of our leading magazines allow stories of questionable character, it is a great comfort to have a periodical that is attractive to young and old alike, which one does not feel the necessity of looking over before placing in the hands of the family. The new feature will add greatly to its attractiveness.

Rev. Dr. HENRY VAN DYKE, Pastor Brick Church, New York: To have an idea which is both new and good is a fine thing. To be able to realize it is something even better. The editors of The Outlook have been blessed with this double good fortune. The new venture, not attempting rivalry with the existing magazines, bids fair to meet a want that was not felt until it was supplied.

Rev. C. F. THWING, President of Adelbert College, Cleveland, O.: This method of a weekly newspaper having one number of each month essentially a magazine seems to me wise; for such a number takes on more the character of genuine literature.

Rev. DAVID H. GREER, D.D., Rector of St. Bartholomew's Church, New York: I have seen and read with much pleasure and satisfaction the first number of the Magazine issue of The Outlook; and, as one of your subscribers, I beg to thank you for the new interest which you are thus imparting to your already most interesting and admirable paper.

Mr. WILLIAM S. HAWK, Proprietor of the Windsor Hotel, New York: Until the receipt of a copy of the Illustrated Number of The Outlook, I had always considered it about as nearly perfect as a paper could be, and the illustrations are so much of an addition to the publication that in its present shape I do not see how it could be surpassed. I know of no publication we read with more pleasure than The Outlook, and I believe that if I could afford to subscribe for only one paper for my family, The Outlook would be the one chosen by all of us.

Mrs. MAUD BALLINGTON BOOTH, The Salvation Army, New York: You know how much absorbed we are in our own work, and can imagine how little time we have for reading any publications. So you will the better understand how much interested we must be in your paper when I say that we look forward to its arrival and keep on file its copies in our own home.

Rev. Dr. T. T. MUNGER, New Haven, Conn.: Your new departure in making one number of The Outlook each month of the nature of an illustrated magazine is every way to be commended. I wish you all success.

Rev. Dr. GEORGE C. LORIMER, Pastor Tremont Temple, Boston, Mass.: I had great pleasure in examining the first Illustrated Magazine Number of The Outlook. I am sure that your subscribers will appreciate your enlightened policy.

Mr. T. M. EMERSON, Traffic Manager Atlantic Coast Line: I think this is a move in the right direction, and will make an already interesting magazine more interesting and popular. In our opinion it increases its value as an advertising medium.

Hon. JAMES H. KYLE, United States Senator from Dakota: There is great need to-day for wholesome, pure literature in the family, and I think The Outlook Company is doing a great work in supplying this want.

Mr. HARVEY E. FISK, of New York City: The Outlook is absolutely indispensable in our family, being read by all, from the four-year-old up to the oldest member. We think the Illustrated Magazine Number a bright idea and a valuable addition to a paper which was already the best of its kind which came into our home.

President WM. PRESTON JOHNSTON, Tulane University, of Louisiana: Your idea of publishing a monthly number of The Outlook seems to me a very good one.

Hon. W. J. BRYAN, United States Senator from Nebraska: I write to compliment you upon your enterprise in adding the monthly magazine feature to The Outlook.

Mr. N. J. POWER, General Passenger Agent Grand Trunk Railway, Montreal, Can.: The interest I always take in The Outlook will be very greatly increased by your new departure in issuing an illustrated magazine every month, the first of which is very attractive and cannot fail to please all your readers as it has myself.

Rev. Dr. ALEX. MacKENZIE, Pastor First Congregational Church, Cambridge, Mass.: I think the proposed modification of The Outlook, by an occasional magazine number, will increase its value as a family paper.

Rev. MERRILL E. GATES, D.D., President Amherst College: It seems to me that your Illustrated Magazine Number, gathering up in somewhat more permanent form some of the most picturesque and some of the most permanently valuable articles, is a novel idea which must find great favor with your subscribers and with others.

Rev. GEORGE A. GORDON, D.D., Pastor Old South Church, Boston, Mass.: I think your Magazine Number of The Outlook is rich and full of interest, and cannot fail to win new charm for the ample worlds of thought and literature, from the light of religious feeling and purpose that it sheds upon them.

Mrs. CANDACE WHEELER, New York City: It seems to be a very happy thought to add the more deliberate utterances of a magazine to those of an authoritative weekly newspaper, and in this way bring a satisfactory acquaintance with the general and literary activities of the world to the many who are not in them.

Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH, of Toronto: I have read The Outlook with great interest and pleasure, and I feel sure that it must be a wholesome and elevating element in the literature of the United States. It has my best wishes for its prosperity.

Rev. Dr. CHARLES CUTHBERT HALL, Brooklyn, N. Y.: I can only testify to my hearty admiration of the breadth, symmetry, and charm of your Illustrated Number. The Outlook is at all times intellectually opulent, but on the new basis it becomes sumptuous.

Miss GRACE H. DODGE, New York City: It is the first time I have ever seen a weekly religious paper take such a strong, dignified stand, and I feel that The Outlook, as always, has been wise in this new venture.

President D. O. GILMAN, of Johns Hopkins University: The new Magazine Number of The Outlook is most attractive, and I have no doubt that the proposed plan will give pleasure to your readers—among whom I am glad to be numbered.

Professor NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER, of Columbia College: It seems to me that the idea of publishing one number of The Outlook each month in the form of an illustrated magazine, without depriving it of its character as a weekly newspaper for cultivated and thoughtful people, is a most excellent one, and I trust that it will be markedly successful.

Mr. HERBERT WELSH, of Philadelphia: I think your idea is a capital one, and I wish you every success in carrying it out.

Rev. JULIUS H. WARD, Brookline, Mass.: The high character of your special articles, all of which are on subjects of immediate and wide interest, is a clear advance on anything you have yet done, and it lifts The Outlook into a new and larger sphere of usefulness.

Rev. FRANKLIN CARTER, D.D., President of Williams College: It is a fine number, and the illustrations are beautiful.

Mr. JAMES B. REYNOLDS, Head Worker University Settlement Society, New York: The illustrated form of The Outlook is most refreshing. I like pictures, if they are good ones, and every face that I know among your character-sketches of December 21 is a good likeness.

Hon. NELSON DINGLEY, Jr., Chairman Ways and Means Committee, House of Representatives, Washington: It is a most creditable publication, and I trust it may prove a profitable monthly addition to your excellent weekly.

Mr. THOMAS NELSON PAGE: It seems to me that your plan is an excellent one.

Rev. W. S. RAINSFORD, D.D., Rector St. George's, New York: For several years I have always felt it a privilege to do what little I could to promote the circulation of your paper. I believe it to be by far the best weekly paper in the United States, and I think I do not know any one who takes it steadily who does not coincide in that belief.

Mr. SAMUEL CARPENTER, Eastern Passenger Agent Pennsylvania Railroad: The Outlook itself is in the front rank of periodicals of its class. I wish you every success in the new undertaking.

Mr. F. I. WHITNEY, General Passenger and Traffic Agent Great Northern Railway, St. Paul, Minn.: It cannot now be said that "there is nothing new under the sun," since the idea of publishing a monthly as a part of the regular issue of your weekly has become a matter of fact. I may say that there is no need of the element of novelty to recommend The Outlook to its readers in the weekly or magazine form.

Ex-Mayor ABRAM S. HEWITT, New York City: I congratulate you and the public on the production of so interesting and valuable a serial, combining as it does the best features of the weekly paper and the more solid attractions of the monthly magazine. I am sure that it will prove to be a great success, as it is a marked advance upon existing publications, and in the right direction.

Rev. WASHINGTON GLADDEN, D.D., First Congregational Church, Columbus, Ohio: I wish that you might circulate five hundred thousand copies of The Outlook.

Rev. F. W. GUNSAULUS, D.D., President Armour Institute, Chicago, Ill.: I congratulate you most heartily on the excellence of the first illustrated number of The Outlook.

Mr. GEORGE H. DANIELS, General Passenger Agent New York Central and Hudson River Railroad, New York City: I congratulate you upon the enterprise displayed in such an original scheme of publication, which must necessarily be much appreciated by your subscribers, and at the same time add largely to the advantages of advertising in your publication. I shall look for the next Magazine Number with a great deal of interest.

Rev. R. HEBER NEWTON, New York City: It strikes me as an admirable new departure, happy in conception and happy in execution.

Rev. WILLIAM BURNET WRIGHT, D.D., Buffalo, N. Y.: I do not take kindly to illustrated newspapers. They prick my vanity by suggesting that I can't understand "c-a-t" without the picture to help me. But this first copy of the Illustrated Outlook has restored my faith and given me profound satisfaction. I shall believe without questioning whatever your future illustrations tell me, and have resolved to do what I never did before with any paper or periodical—preserve and bind all coming numbers for a Christmas present to—myself.

A Weekly Newspaper and a Monthly Magazine

IN ONE—FOR THREE DOLLARS A YEAR

The unique new departure which The Outlook has made in establishing these Magazine Numbers secures for all subscribers a Weekly Newspaper and an Illustrated Monthly Magazine in a single publication, and without any increase of price. Three Dollars pays for the whole fifty-two issues, twelve of which are the Magazine Numbers, marked off by a special cover, made attractive by a wealth of illustrations, and tied together in interest by the monthly installments of Ian Maclaren's novel, "Kate Carnegie," which promises to be equal to "Beside the Bonnie Brier-Bush."

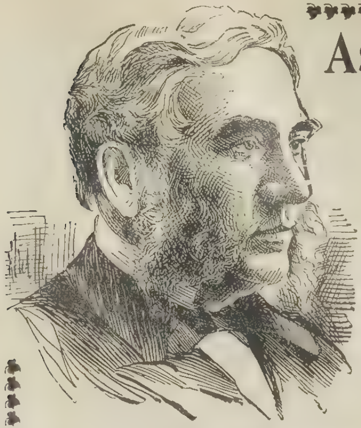
EVERY NEW SUBSCRIBER to The Outlook who sends three dollars for a year's subscription and mentions this offer will receive the paper for a full year from March, 1896—fifty-two issues—and will also receive all the issues between the date of his order and March 1, with the Illustrated Magazine Numbers of December, January, and February FREE

THE OUTLOOK COMPANY, 13 Astor Place, New York



Asthma, Bronchitis and Kindred Diseases

"Catarrh Permanently Cured"

Boston, Mass., April 20, 1894. (Care Jordan, Marsh & Co.)

Dear Sir: I had catarrh for twenty years, and the last ten years (all of which time has been passed in this great establishment) I suffered fearfully. One half-dozen handkerchiefs per day would be used. It extended to my throat; the base of my tongue was badly affected. I constantly kept in my mouth cardamon seeds, or some such breath purifier. I could not sleep with my mouth closed. I began using Hyomei in December, and in two weeks I was entirely—and now, after four months and no return of the disease, I can say, permanently—cured. I am going to ask the head of the firm, Mr. Eben D. Jordan, to indorse this statement. MRS. ELVIRA E. B. GIBSON.

Indorsed—Eben D. Jordan.

Hyomei is a purely vegetable antiseptic, and destroys the germs which cause disease in the respiratory organs. The air, charged with Hyomei, is inhaled at the mouth, and, after permeating the minutest air-cells, is exhaled through the nose. It is aromatic, delightful to inhale, and gives immediate relief. Consultation and trial free at my office.

Pocket Inhaler Outfit, Complete, by Mail, $1.00, consisting of pocket inhaler, made of deodorized hard rubber (beautifully polished); a bottle of Hyomei, a dropper, and full directions for using. If you are still skeptical, send your address; my pamphlet shall prove that Hyomei cures. Are you open to conviction?

R. T. BOOTH, 18 East 20th St., New York.

BOOTH'S POCKET INHALER OUTFIT BY MAIL, $1.00.

The Australian "Dry Air" Treatment of Asthma, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Coughs, Colds, Laryngitis, Etc.

"Pride of the West"
Bleached Muslin.

For Sale by all Wholesale and Retail Dry Goods Dealers in the United States, in 36, 41 and 45-inch widths.

Manufactured by the Slater Cotton Company,
Pawtucket, R. I.

Coffin, Altemus & Co.
Sole Agents,
NEW YORK,
PHILADELPHIA,
BOSTON

Peter Möller's Cod Liver Oil

IS ESSENTIALLY A MEDICINAL COD LIVER OIL, as it is prepared from the livers of cod-fish only that are perfectly fresh and free from indication of disease.

THE OIL IS EXTRACTED at a proper temperature, and is kept from atmospheric contact from the beginning of the process of extraction until it is safely corked up in bottles.

Put up only in flat, oval bottles, sealed with date of production in perforated letters.

Send for pamphlet on "Norway's Lofoten Islands."

Schieffelin & Co., New York, Sole Agents.

MADE HIS X MARK with a DIXON American Graphite PENCIL. Used by successful folks everywhere. If not sold by your dealer, send 16c. for pencils worth double the money. Jos. Dixon Crucible Co., Jersey City, N. J.

PISO'S CURE FOR CONSUMPTION
25 CTS. 25 CTS.
CURES WHERE ALL ELSE FAILS.
Best Cough Syrup. Tastes Good. Use in time. Sold by druggists.

Sense IN Under-Dress

In healthfulness is comfort—in comfort is happiness—in Jaros Hygienic Underwear is continual healthfulness—Book for nothing.

Jaros Hygienic Underwear Co.,
831 Broadway, New York.

THE

Handy Binder

for The Outlook, made to hold compactly and conveniently twenty-six numbers, will be sent by mail on receipt of sixty cents.

THE OUTLOOK CO., NEW YORK

"Silver Plate that Wears"

SPOONS, FORKS, KNIVES, ETC., STAMPED

1847 Rogers Bros.

ARE GENUINE ROGERS GOODS.

Book of Illustrations
(16 pages) FREE ON REQUEST.
KINDLY MENTION THIS PUBLICATION.

Meriden Britannia Co.
Meriden, Conn.

SUBSCRIBERS' WANTS

Want advertisements of thirty words or less will be published under this heading at one dollar a week. Four cents a week is charged for each word in excess of thirty.

A YOUNG WOMAN desires a position as traveling companion or chaperon. Has lived abroad five years. Speaks French and German. Is capable of taking charge of young women wishing to study abroad, or to travel either in Europe, Egypt, India, or to go around the world. Has visited India twice, and has spent some time in Syria. References of course will be given as well as required. Address No. 139, care of The Outlook.

HOUSEKEEPER.—Wanted, by young widower, refined Christian woman of mature years, competent to take entire charge of an infant and do work of small apartment. Comfortable home, Brooklyn; reasonable compensation. Address No. 153, Outlook Office.

HOUSEKEEPER.—An educated woman desires position as housekeeper or mother's assistant; capable of taking entire charge of household; accustomed to children; good sewer. Address M, No. 160, care of The Outlook.

A YOUNG WOMAN desires a position as traveling companion, or chaperon; has lived abroad for 3 years. Speaks French; is musical. Capable of taking charge of young women wishing to study or travel abroad. References exchanged. Address No. 184, care The Outlook.

MRS. KIMBALL, late with Edward A. Morrison & Son, will do shopping without commission, also select goods for merchants for a moderate commission. Address Mrs. L. M. KIMBALL, 215 West 44th St., New York.

SCOTCH WOMAN OF 35, trustworthy, capable, economical, wishes situation as working housekeeper. Five years in present situation. Box 1,026, Hudson, N.Y.

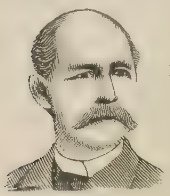
ASK YOUR DEALER FOR

W. L. DOUGLAS

$3. SHOE BEST IN THE WORLD.

If you pay $4 to $6 for shoes, examine the W. L. Douglas Shoe, and see what a good shoe you can buy for $3.

OVER 100 STYLES AND WIDTHS,



CONGRESS, BUTTON, and LACE, made in all kinds of the best selected leather by skilled workmen. We make and sell more $3 Shoes than any other manufacturer in the world.

None genuine unless name and price is stamped on the bottom.

Ask your dealer for our $5, $4, $3.50, $2.50, $2.25 Shoes; $2.50, $2 and $1.75 for boys.

TAKE NO SUBSTITUTE. If your dealer cannot supply you, send to factory, enclosing price and 36 cents to pay carriage. State kind, style of toe (cap or plain), size and width. Our Custom Dept. will fill your order. Send for new Illustrated Catalogue to Box N.

W. L. DOUGLAS, Brockton, Mass.

25 years

Holmes & Edwards guarantee

Sterling Silver Inlaid

Spoons and Forks for twenty-five years in family use.

At New York City

Salesroom, 2 Maiden Lane, may be seen a full line of

STERLING SILVER INLAID

Sterling Silver Hollow Ware, Sterling and Plate Novelties, Rich Cut Glass, Silver Plated Knives, Forks, Spoons, etc.

Inlaid goods are for sale by all Jewelers. Ask for them.

The Holmes & Edwards Silver Co.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN. 85

CHICAGO. ST. LOUIS. SAN FRANCISCO.

POZZONI'S

Complexion Powder

Refreshing, cleanly, healthful and harmless. It is the ideal complexion powder. For a short time only we are presenting to each purchaser a handsome Scovill's Gold Puff Box in commemoration of our 40th anniversary.

Sold by druggists and fancy goods dealers everywhere.

ASK FOR POZZONI'S.

FRY IT in Cottolene

Fry your food in Cottolene instead of lard and it will be free from that greasiness and "richness" so distressing to dyspeptics; the flavor will be delicious instead of rancid, and your food will do you good. Put it in a cold pan, heating it with the pan. Cottolene reaches the cooking point much quicker than lard—care should therefore be taken not to overheat it. Follow these instructions—you will never use lard again.

Genuine Cottolene has trade-marks—"Cottolene" and steer's head in cotton-plant wreath—on every tin.

THE N. K. FAIRBANK COMPANY,

Chicago. St. Louis. New York. Boston. Philadelphia. San Francisco. Montreal.

CRITERION

STEREOPTICONS, MAGIC LANTERNS & ACCESSORIES.

PERFECT APPARATUS for VISUAL TEACHING

SCIENTIFIC PROJECTIONS & PRIVATE USE.

ELECTRIC FOCUSING LAMPS

for Photo-Engravers, Stage Lighting, Etc.

J. B. COLT & CO., 115-117 NASSAU ST. NEW YORK.

BOSTON. PHILADELPHIA. ATLANTA. ST. LOUIS. BUFFALO. CHICAGO. SAN FRANCISCO.

Palatable, Nourishing,
Strengthening

—three qualities that go to make

Somatose

a perfect food for the pale, thin anæmic, dyspeptic and overworked, and those needing improved nourishment.

Somatose-Biscuit, 10% Somatose. A valuable addition to the diet.

Runkel Bros.' Somatose-Cocoa (10% Somatose), for nursing mothers, invalids and convalescents. A pleasant and strengthening beverage for table use.

Runkel Bros.' Somatose-Chocolate (10% Somatose), for eating and drinking.

All druggists. Descriptive pamphlets free of Schieffelin & Co., New York, Sole Agts.

A New Method of Bible Study

LESSONS ON LUKE

Originally prepared for and used by the Sunday-school of Center Church, New Haven, Conn. Thoroughly revised for Sunday-schools and Bible classes. Suggestive for teachers using other lessons. Send stamp for sample copy. Sample set, 25 cents. Address P. O. Box 1,626, New Haven, Conn.

EDUCATIONAL

New York City

SCHERMERHORN'S TEACHERS' AGENCY

Oldest and best known in U. S.
Established 1855. 3 East 14th Street, N. Y

The Misses Ely's School for Girls

RIVERSIDE DRIVE
85th and 86th Streets, New York

TEACHERS COLLEGE Morningside Heights, New York (120th St., West).—Professional training for general teachers and specialists: Manual training, science, kindergarten, English, form, drawing and color, history of art, domestic science, general pedagogy. Degrees given by Columbia College to both sexes. Circulars of Information. "Teachers College Bulletin." WALTER L. HERVEY, President.

Miss Peebles and Miss Thompson's Boarding and Day School for Girls

30, 32, and 34 East 57th St., New York

Special students admitted.

California

POMONA COLLEGE, Claremont, Cal.—Full College courses leading to degrees of B.A., B.L., B.S. Degrees recognized by University of California and other similar graduate schools. Thirty-five miles from Los Angeles. An Academic course. Preparatory school preparing for all institutions connected with the College. Address C. G. BALDWIN, President.

Connecticut

DARIEN, CONN.—PRIVATE HOME AND School for Feeble-Minded Youth offers every facility for care, education, and training, with the advantages of a pleasant country home.

J. J. KINDRED, M.D., Med. Supt., formerly Clinical Ass't Dareuth School for Feeble-Minded, London, Eng.
M. Lila Kindred, Principal.

FAIRFIELD ACADEMY.—HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS. Fits for business or college. Genuine home; individual teaching; healthful; 50 miles from New York. Francis H. Brewer, A.M., Prin., Fairfield, Ct.

WOODSIDE SEMINARY

Terms, $500 to $700. City advantages for culture and study. Rural surroundings.
Miss SARA J. SMITH, Principal, Hartford, Conn.

Massachusetts

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN TEACHERS' BUREAU

3 Park St., Boston

Native language teachers a specialty.

New York

RIVERVIEW ACADEMY

60th year. Prepares thoroughly for College, the Government Academies, and Business. U. S. Army officer detailed at Riverview by Secretary of War.
Joseph B. Bisbee, A.M., Principal, Poughkeepsie, N.Y.

Mount Pleasant Military Academy

A College-Fitting and Character-Building School for Boys. 76th year. Library of 12,000 volumes. Summer Session. Reference, Hon. Joseph H. Choate. Send for catalogue.
Charles F. Brusie, A.M., Arthur T. Emory, A.B., Principals. SING SING-ON-HUDSON, N. Y.

Pennsylvania

Miss Gordon's French and English Boarding and Day School for Young Ladies and Little Girls

4110 and 4112 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Information about any Winter Resort anywhere will gladly be sent you, without charge, by the

Recreation Department, The Outlook

13 Astor Place, New York. We are thoroughly posted as to all resorts and ways of reaching the same.

A Trip to the Garden Spots of the South

On January 28, February 11, and March 10, tickets will be sold from principal cities, towns, and villages of the North to all points on the Louisville & Nashville Railroad in Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, and a portion of Kentucky, at one single fare for the round trip. Tickets will be good to return within thirty days and will allow stop-over at any points on the south-bound trip. Ask your ticket agent about it, and if he cannot sell you excursion tickets write to C. P. Atmore, General Passenger Agent, Louisville. Ky., or Jackson Smith, D. P. A., Cincinnati. O., J. K. Ridgeley, N. W. P. A., Chicago, Ill., Geo. B. Horner, D. P. A., St. Louis, Mo.

Noon Train Between Boston and New York via Springfield Line

The Boston and Albany Railroad has in service a 12 o'clock, noon, train between New York and Boston. This train leaves either city at 12 o'clock, noon, and arrives at its destination at 5:30 P.M., thus making the trip in five and one-half hours. Station, Kneeland St., Boston. Fare, $4 98; parlor-car seat, $1. A. S. Hanson, G.P.A.

TRAVELERS' R. R. GUIDE Formerly Appletons'.
R. R. Maps and Time-Tables. Conveniently Indexed. Monthly—25 cents. 24 Park Place, N. Y.

TOURS AND TRAVEL

ALL WINTER RESORTS IN

FLORIDA, CUBA, and WEST INDIES

can be reached direct by the

RAILWAY AND STEAMSHIP LINES OF

THE PLANT SYSTEM

and its connections from the North, East, and West.

Four magnificent hotels on the West Coast of Florida, owned and operated by the Plant System, under the management of Mr. D. P. Hathaway.

TAMPA BAY, Tampa, Fla.
SEMINOLE, Winter Park, Fla.
THE INN, Port Tampa, Fla.
OCALA HOUSE, Ocala, Fla.

Semi-weekly service, via Plant Steamship Line, from Port Tampa to Key West and Havana; also to all fishing and hunting resorts of the Gulf Coast.

Six special excursions to Jamaica, leaving Port Tampa, Fla., Jan. 17th and 31st, Feb. 14th and 28th, March 13th and 27th, by United States Mail Steamships of the Plant S.S. Line.

☞ Secure tickets reading via the lines of the PLANT SYSTEM and CONNECTIONS.

Three daily trains with through Pullman Sleeping-Cars from the North and East, via Pennsylvania R. R. and Atlantic Coast Line; also via Steamship Lines from Boston, New York, and Baltimore to Savannah, connecting with Plant System.

Literature on Florida and Cuba mailed on application.
B. W. Wrenn, P.T.M., Savannah, Ga.
J. J. Farnsworth, E.P.A., 261 Broadway, New York.
A. P. Lane, N.E.P.A., 207 Wash'n St., Boston, Mass.

Six Days to Hawaii!

Better than Going to Europe!

ONLY SIX DAYS TO HONOLULU
S.S. AUSTRALIA

Hawaii is the favorite winter resort. A trip over a summer sea. Ideal climate. Steamers of the OCEANIC S. S. CO.

sail twice a month. Special party rates Feb. 15th, March 10th. Send 5c. stamp for descriptive pamphlet to OCEANIC S. S. CO., 114 Montgomery St., San Francisco.

Tours and Travel

"SEA ROUTE TO SAN FRANCISCO"

A Trip for HEALTH, REST, and PLEASURE

passing within view of Cuba, crossing the historic Isthmus of Panama, and calling at ten Pacific ports of Central America and Mexico, with opportunity to visit these Spanish-American countries. The educational advantages of this trip, in addition to the pleasures of the journey, render it peculiarly attractive, so much so that tourists repeat the voyage year after year. THIRTY-DAY TRIP FOR $120. EXCURSION, $216. All expenses included. Steamers have superior accommodations and leave New York every ten days. For full particulars apply at Company's Office, 29 Broadway.

JOHN MUIR, Traffic Manager.
Steamers sail from Pier foot West 27th St., N. Y.

A Mission Cruise Around the Pacific Ocean

A unique tour, visiting Japan, the Pacific coasts of Asia, Java, the Banda Sea, Australia, New Zealand, and the Tonga, Fiji, Samoan, and Hawaiian groups of islands, has been organized by The Evangelist. Starts April 8; gone about five months; cost $1,350 or $1,400, including supplementary trip to Alaska. Party limited to 25. Illustrated itinerary furnished on application to

THE EVANGELIST
156 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

A SMALL PARTY OF GENTLEMEN will be organized for a

BICYCLE TOUR ABROAD

during the coming summer, leaving middle of June, returning end of September, route to include England, northern France, Holland, and Belgium. Price, $550.00. Address Channing Ellery, 228 W. 38th St., New York.

FOR THE WINTER GO TO
FROST UNKNOWN BERMUDA MALARIA IMPOSSIBLE
48 hours by elegant Steamships weekly.
FOR WINTER TOURS GO TO
WEST INDIES

30-days trip, 15 days in the Tropics. $5 a day for transportation, meals, and stateroom. A. E. Outerbridge & Co., Agts. for Quebec Steamship Co., Limited, 39 Broadway, N. Y., or Thos. Cook & Sons, Agents.

Baker's European Tours

Four all of Europe tours, embracing England, France, Holland, Belgium, Switzerland, the Rhine, Germany, Austria, and Italy; June 13th, Etruria, $395; Campania, June 20th, $425 to $450; June 29th, Servia, $380—also tour for $365; Swiss section, $255 to $275. Send for programs.
FRANK BAKER, 93 Nassau St., New York.

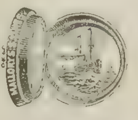
BAY LINE

For Old Point Comfort, Norfolk, Va., Virginia Beach, Florida and South

Leave New York via Pennsylvania R.R., 2:10 P.M., Philadelphia 4:41 P.M. Parlor-car to Baltimore.

Leave Baltimore on arrival of train at steamer, 7 P.M., arrive Old Point Comfort 7 A.M.; Norfolk, 8 A.M.; connecting with all Southern trains.

Apply at Pennsylvania R.R. ticket offices, or
H. V. TOMPKINS, G.P.A., 287 Broadway.



MALLORY STEAMSHIP LINES
Delightful Ocean Trips to the Ports of Texas, Georgia, Florida.
Tourists' Tickets to all Winter Resorts in Texas, Colorado, California, Mexico, Georgia, Florida, &c. Our 64-page "Satchel Handbook" mailed free. C. H. MALLORY & CO., Pier 20, E. R., N. Y.

DR. CHENEY'S PARTY TO EUROPE. (9th season.) Personally conducted by O. D. Cheney, M.D., and wife, of Haverhill, Mass. Limited to 25. 78 days. Cunard steamer, June 27.

Excursions to Europe Send for Program. Holy Land excursions start Jan. 22 and Feb. 29 via Gibraltar; $550 and up. First-class. Accompanied by F. C. Clark, ex-U. S. vice-consul at Jerusalem, 111 B'way, N. Y.

Tours and Travel

GREAT SOUTHERN & WESTERN RAILWAY.

The Overland Route between America and Europe.

IRELAND

Queenstown—Cork, Blarney Castle, Glengarriff, Lakes of Killarney, Dublin. Special trains run from Queenstown in connection with American steamers. Tickets issued in New York are good for three months, allowing stop-over privileges.

Baggage checked New York to London.

For descriptive folders, tickets, tours, etc., apply to
C. A. BARATTONI, Gen'l Agt. 852 Broadway, New York.

THE REV. H. A. TODD, Corona, L. I., will again direct a select party for the "Ideal Summer Tour," SCOTLAND TO SWITZERLAND, that has met with such favor the past two years. 250 miles of grand coaching. Also choice Tour to ITALY.

FOREIGN HOTELS

Austria

European Winter Resort

Innsbruck, Tyrol, Austria

1,900 feet above the sea, with dry, bracing climate; center for sleighing excursions; fine university, hospital, &c.

HOTEL TIROL (Open all the year.) Large, airy, sunny rooms, well furnished; superior cuisine; modern conveniences. Best references. Reduced rates in winter. Illustrated pamphlets on application. Carl Landsee, Prop'r.

Bahamas

ROYAL VICTORIA HOTEL

NASSAU, BAHAMA ISLANDS
Opens December 23, 1895.
A LAND OF PERPETUAL SUMMER
S. S. MORTON, Proprietor and Manager

Steamer Northumberland leaves Palm Beach, Florida, 3 times a week. 15 hours' sail.
The Outlook will furnish full information.
Cable address, Morton, Nassau, N. P.

Bermuda

THE LAND OF THE LILY AND THE ROSE

HAMILTON HOTEL,
HAMILTON, BERMUDA.
MEAD & BROOKS.

For circulars, etc., address
Mead & Brooks, Hamilton, Bermuda.

BERMUDA

THE IDEAL WINTER RESORT.

The Princess Hotel

This new and commodious hotel is now open. For terms, circulars, etc., address
N. S. HOWE, Hamilton, Bermuda, or
OUTERBRIDGE & CO., 39 Broadway, N. Y.

HOTELS AND RESORTS

California

HOTEL GREEN PASADENA, CAL. Accommodation for 400 guests. Occupies an entire block. Souvenir mailed.
G. G. GREEN, Owner. J. H. HOLMES, Mgr.

California

CALIFORNIA
HOTEL VENDOME

SAN JOSE Charming summer and winter resort. Sunny skies; climate unexcelled; modern, comfortable, first-class, and so are its patrons. Headquarters for tourists to the great Lick Observatory. Send for illustrated souvenir. GEO. P. SNELL, Mgr

Colorado

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colo.: The Antlers
Illustrated book, describing Colorado Springs, sent on request by E. BARNETT, Proprietor.

Connecticut

CREST VIEW SANITARIUM GREENWICH, CT.
Especially adapted for mild nervous diseases; home attractions. H. M. HITCHCOCK, M.D.

District of Columbia

The Ardmore Thirteenth St., bet. E. and F., N.W.
Washington, D. C.
Family hotel; central location; convenient to cars and places of interest; no liquors. Terms, $1.50 to $2.50 per day. T. M. HALL.

EBBITT HOUSE
WASHINGTON, D. C.
H. C. BURCH, Manager.—Popular prices. Regular rate, $4 per day up; 50 rooms on sixth floor, steam heat, electric light, reduced to $2 50 and $3 per day; 50 rooms on other floors, reduced from $4 to $3.50 per day; parlors and alcove parlors at equally low rates.
Special rates for Army and Navy Officers and Clergy.

WASHINGTON, D. C., 1706 F St., N. W. Convenient Central Home for transients, one square from cars, White House, Art Gallery, and Departments. Terms most reasonable. Address Mrs. MASON.

Florida

"Untouched by the Frost"
TROPICAL FLORIDA AT
PUNTA GORDA

THE PUNTA GORDA

On Charlotte Harbor. Accommodates 300. Opens Dec. 20th, 1895. Tarpon fishing, shooting, boating, driving; 400 feet of veranda. Plenty of fruit. Special rates for the season. For pamphlet address F. H. ABBOTT, Prop.

THE SPRINGFIELD
Orange Park, Florida
NOW OPEN
Fourteen miles from Jacksonville, on St. John's River. One of the most charming locations in Florida. Entirely free from malaria. Rates from $2.50 to $3.00 per day. Special rates by the week.
CHARLES H. MOWRY, Manager.
Also of the Springfield, Nantucket, Mass.

Lake Standish House
PLYMOUTH, ORANGE CO., FLA.
New England Management and Cooking
REST AND NOT STYLE
Open from Jan. 1st until May 1. Terms moderate.
Former guests referred to by permission: R. Hollings, 525 Washington St.; Geo. A. Fisher, 5 Park Sq.; P. B. Smith, 2389 Washington St.; and Dr. J. T. Sherman, 29 Virginia St., Boston. H. E. SMITH, Prop.

Indianola, Fla.
Indianola House
G. W. SCHUYLER
Comfortable House on banks of Indian River. Accommodates twenty-five. Good hunting and fishing. $1.50 per day; $8 per week; no extras.

THE BARCELONA
ST. AUGUSTINE, Florida. Good family table and home comforts. R. E. HASSELTINE.

A TALLY-HO COACH
or any other carriage can be had for any drive in Britain
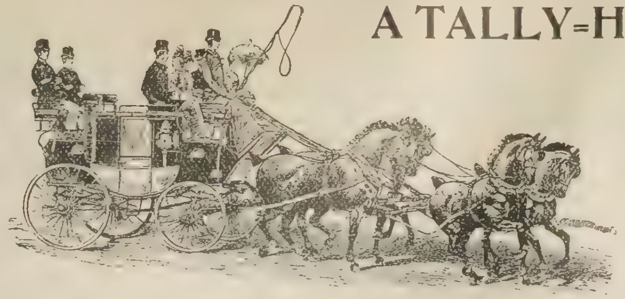
at a fixed price for any period.
AGENTS
THOS. COOK & SON
at all their offices in England and America.
LONDON



Coaching in England by the Halford L. Mills Co.,

THE HOT SPRINGS
OF ARKANSAS

UNUM
E PLURIBUS
HOT SPRINGS, ARK.
THE CARLSBAD OF AMERICA.

THE ONLY
HEALTH RESORT
Owned, Endorsed and Conducted by

THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT.

RECOGNIZED WINTER CAPITAL
Of the Best Society of the Nation.

THE SUPERB HOTEL EASTMAN IS NOW OPEN.

The MAGNIFICENT ARLINGTON and 300 other Hotels and Boarding Houses open the year round at prices to suit all.
Climate mild with abundance of sunshine.
Average winter temperature 60°

Reduced Excursion Rates on Railroads.

Inquiries answered and illustrated pamphlets sent free upon application to
H. DURAND, Manager Advertising League,
HOT SPRINGS, ARK.

Florida

DE LAND, FLA.
The Putnam Largest hotel. In beautiful orange grove. Attractive and homelike. Moderate rates. M. E. GOULD.

NEW ROCKLEDGE HOTEL ON INDIAN RIVER Rockledge, Fla.
Homelike and attractive. Northern help. Orange groves in bearing near by. Send for Illustrated Circular.
H. P. SHARES, Prop'r, New Haven, Conn. H. E. BEMIS, Mgr., Mohonk Lake, N. Y.

THE PLAZA ROCKLEDGE, FLORIDA
Located on highest ledge on Indian River; amidst 30 acres of orange grove. New and elegant. Send for booklet. S. H. PECK, Owner-Proprietor.

Georgia

THOMASVILLE, GA.
PINEY WOODS HOTEL
NOW OPEN
For circulars, etc., apply to F. H. Schofield, Metropolitan Bldg.; The Outlook, 13 Astor Place, N. Y., or WILLIAM E. DAVIES, Thomasville, Ga.

Georgia

HOTEL BON AIR
AUGUSTA, GA.
Enlarged and remodeled, will open Dec. 20, 1895, under former management of Mr. C. A. Linsley, who has given the Hotel widespread popularity. Fifty rooms, mostly with private baths, have been added to the hotel, giving a total capacity of 225. For booklet and particulars address C. A. LINSLEY, Augusta, Ga.

PERRY, GA.—Private board; old-fashioned Southern home, pleasantly situated; sunny rooms; open fires; halls heated; delightful climate; Northern management; references. Mrs. M. E. BATES.

Illinois

Chicago Beach Hotel 51st St. & Lake Shore
CHICAGO, ILL. HARVEY S. DENISON, Mgr.
Demonstrated the most delightful and comfortable abiding-place throughout the year in Chicago.

New Jersey

TRAINS FOR LAKEWOOD leave New York, via Central Railroad of New Jersey, foot of Liberty Street, North River, at 4:30, 8:15 A.M.; 1:45, 3:40, 4:40 P.M.

THE MADISON LAKEWOOD N. J.
Madison Ave. & First St. | Address Mrs. E. H. Merriman

(For other advertisements in this department see following pages.)

New Jersey

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

THE SHELBURNE

On the Ocean Beach

Open throughout the year. Every convenience, including hot and cold sea-water baths, passenger elevator, etc. J. D. SOUTHWICK, Manager.

Galen Hall—A Sanatorium

With all the conveniences of a first-class, quiet hotel. Elevator, steam heat, open-grate fires. Massage, electricity, baths, etc. Table unexcelled. Open all the year. Address Dr. WM. H. H. BULL, Atlantic City, N. J.

New York City

ST. DENIS

Broadway and 11th St., NEW YORK

Opposite Grace Church EUROPEAN PLAN

Rooms $1.00 per Day and Upward

In a modest and unobtrusive way there are few better conducted hotels in the metropolis than the St. Denis. The great popularity it has acquired can readily be traced to its unique location, its homelike atmosphere, the peculiar excellence of its cuisine and service, and its very moderate prices.

WILLIAM TAYLOR & SON.

Westminster Hotel

Irving Place and 16th Street, New York

A quiet hotel of established reputation, with a cuisine of noted excellence. Conducted on the American plan at rates from $3.50 per day upward.

E. N. ANABLE, Proprietor.

"A little book about a big city" mailed free.

ALMOST EVERY TRAVELER

Wants a hotel full of cosey nooks and comfortable corners. They invite repose.

GO TO

THE GRAND UNION HOTEL

Fourth Ave., 41st and 42d Sts.

OPPOSITE GRAND CENTRAL DEPOT.

Central for shopping and theatres.
Baggage to and from 42d St. Depot free.

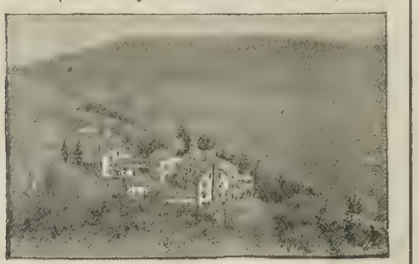
ROOMS, $1.00 PER DAY AND UPWARDS

New York

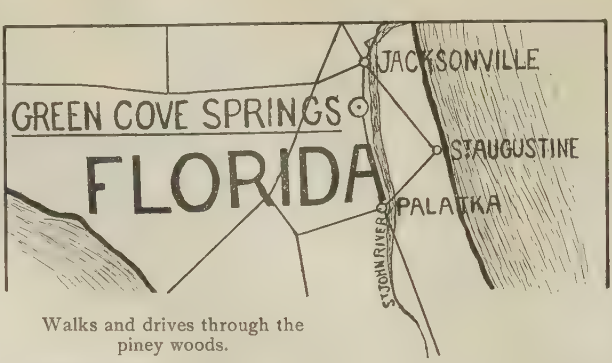
Gleason Sanitarium

ELMIRA, N. Y.

1852 (Formerly Elmira Water Cure) 1896



A comfortable winter home for invalids of both sexes. All modern improvements. All forms of baths, massage, electricity, etc.; under care of regular medical graduates of long experience. Send for illustrated booklet.



Walks and drives through the piney woods.

The Hotel St. Elmo

If you are coming South, write for our illustrated booklet.

J. L. SCOTT, Manager.

New York

Dr. Strong's Sanitarium

Saratoga Springs, N. Y.

For health or pleasure. The appointments of a first-class Hotel. Elevator, electric bells, steam, sun-parlor, and promenade on the roof. Suites of rooms with baths. Massage, Electricity, all baths and health appliances. New Turkish, Russian, and Natural Sulphur-water baths. Dry tonic air, Saratoga water, and winter sports. Open all the year. Send for illustrated circular.

North Carolina

ASHEVILLE, N. C.

Oakland Heights Hotel

Modern improvements; steam heat; electric lights.
C. A. WOOD.

ASHEVILLE, N. C., THE SWANNANOA First-class; central; family and transient hotel; $2 to $3 per day. R. R. RAWLS, Owner and Prop.

Hotel Berkeley ASHEVILE, N. C.—Centrally located; handsomely furnished steam heat; electric lights throughout; every modern comfort; rates, $12 50 to $17.50 per week.
P. H. BRANCH, Mgr. FRANK LOUGHRAN, Prop.

"Hickory Inn" HICKORY, N. C.—An all-the-year-round resort; altitude 1,400 feet; hotel fireproof; lighted by gas and electricity; quail-shooting; rates. $12.50 to $17.50 per week.
FRANK LOUGHRAN, Owner and Proprietor.

Pennsylvania

WALTER'S SANITARIUM

Walter's Park, Wernersville, Pa.

In Southern Penna., has all the elements of a great WINTER RESORT. Steam heat and open grates sun parlor, electric light, hydraulic elevator; baths, massage, Swedish movements, electricity. Address for circulars as above, always using the name WALTER'S.

South Carolina

LAND OF THE PINES
AIKEN, S. C.

Dryest climate east of the Rocky Mts. Golf, Fox-Hunting, and Polo. Plenty of sunshine. Average temperature, 52°.

HIGHLAND PARK HOTEL

Renovated and refurnished, now open under new management. For rates and illustrated booklet write PRIEST & EAGER, Managers.

PEBBLE LEDGE AIKEN, S. C.—New house; modern convenences. May be rented furnished for winter season; or select boarders taken. Address P. O. Box 176.

South Carolina

"THERE is no place like Charleston."—THE CHARLESTON HOTEL, Charleston, S. C. This historic Hotel has had One Hundred Thousand Dollars ($100,000.00) expended on its renovation, rearrangement, decoration, and improvement. Completely equipped with all modern appointments. Best sanitary arrangements. Cuisine and service unexcelled. For rates, pamphlets, and further particulars address CART & DAVIDS.

UFTON COURT, Camden, S. C.—Old-fashioned Southern home, beautifully situated, half a mile from depot, post-office, etc. Charming walks and drives. No malaria. Sandy soil and pines. For terms, Northern references, and printed matter address Mrs. ROGER GRISWOLD PERKINS.

Virginia

HYGEIA HOTEL

Old Point Comfort, Va.

Unrivaled as a health and pleasure resort. Air balmy and full of life-giving ozone. New sanitary plumbing and all the comforts of the modern home. Castalia Spring Water supplied to guests without charge. Circulars may be had at the OUTLOOK, 13 Astor Place, N. Y. F. N. PIKE.

OLD POINT COMFORT.—For rent, "Bay View Cottage," furnished or unfurnished; eleven rooms, 1½ acres of beautiful grounds; water-front. Address Mrs. CURRY, Box 154, Phœbus, Va.

New York and Central American SS. Line

Steamers "Regulus" and "Flamborough" will sail semi-monthly for Kingston, Belize, Livingston, Porto Cortez, and Porto Barrios from North Central Pier, Atlantic Docks, Brooklyn. A charming 27-day voyage through tropical seas, at a cost of less than $5 a day. Superior passenger accommodation. Excellent cuisine.

For passage and particulars apply to

Bowring & Archibald, Agents
9 STONE STREET, NEW YORK

Mexico The best Coffee, Cane, and Tobacco region in the World.

Lands in the semi-tropical belt, suitable to the production of Coffee, Cane, Cacao, Tobacco, Rubber, Corn, etc., etc., in lots to suit the home-seeker or speculator. Cultivated and virgin soil, upon navigable river and near railroad. Location perfectly healthful. Correspondence solicited. Refer by permission to Rev. J. W. Butler, D.D., Mexico City. ROBERT L. MILLER,
Apartado No. 291, Mexico City, Mexico

FOREIGN TRAVEL AGENCY.

LONDON & NORTH WESTERN RAILWAY.
CALEDONIAN RAILWAY
GREAT SOUTHERN & WESTERN RAILWAY.

EUROPE

Shortest and popular routes. Queenstown, Liverpool, Glasgow and London. Luxurious Parlor Sleeping and Dining cars. Tours in Ireland, Scotland, Wales, England, Paris, &c.—Picturesque Lakes, Ancient Cathedrals and Castles, Great Universities, Shakespeare's Country, &c.

Baggage Checked Through New York to London.

MONEY SAVED; COMFORTS SECURED; INCONVENIENCES AVOIDED.

For Estimates, Folders, Maps, Tickets, etc. apply to

C. A. BARATTONI, Gen'l Agt. 852 Broadway, New York.

St. James Hotel

JACKSONVILLE, FLORIDA

TO those who are familiar with the beauties and attractions of Florida, the splendid location, complete equipment, and many advantages of the St. James, Jacksonville, are well known. Those who visit Jacksonville for the first time during the present season will find in the St. James a great hotel, centrally but beautifully located on the highest ground in the city, facing the St. James Park, and accommodating 500 guests. They will find in Mr. J. R. Campbell, the proprietor of the house, an able and experienced hotel man. The St. James is supplied with all the appointments of a modern first-class house. A fine orchestra is one of the attractive features of the house.

For further particulars address, by mail or telegraph,

J. R. CAMPBELL, Prop.

Atlantic Coast Line to the SOUTH

VIA RICHMOND, VA.

Quickest to Florida and Cuba, Jamaica and Nassau, Aiken, S. C., Augusta, and Middle Georgia

Only Line running Solid Trains between New York and Florida.

1 NIGHT OUT
Boston to St. Augustine
Season 1895–96.

Route of the CELEBRATED

"New York-Florida Special"

(Exclusively Pullman Vestibuled Train between New York and St. Augustine)

HEATED BY STEAM LIGHTED BY ELECTRICITY

NO EXTRA FARE

For Winter Excursion Tickets to Southern Resorts apply to General Eastern Office, 229 Broadway, N. Y.

The Frazar

Tours

Eight Limited Tours to Europe

FOR THE SUMMER OF 1896

Under Personal Escort

INCLUDING
The British Isles, Holland, Belgium, Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Italy, and France.

DATES OF SAILING
May 9th, June 6th, June 20th (two parties), June 24th, June 27th (two parties), July 4th.

SEND FOR ITINERARIES TO

MRS. M. D. FRAZAR & CO.

Managers of Foreign Tours

70 & 71 Globe Building, Boston, Mass.

A party will leave New York, Saturday, March 21, for a TOUR THROUGH SPAIN, PORTUGAL

FRANCE, BELGIUM, and ENGLAND, with visits to Gibraltar, Ronda, Seville (during the Holy Week Ceremonials), Malaga, Granada, Cordova, Madrid, The Escorial, Toledo, Lisbon, Oporto, Braga, Salamanca, Biarritz, Paris, Brussels, Antwerp, London, and other places of interest.

A party will leave New York on the same date (and same steamer) for a inclusive of an extended round of Southern France (the Riviera), Italy, Greece, The Levant, Turkey, Bulgaria, Servia, Bosnia, Herzegovina, Austria-Hungary, Germany, France, and England; with visits to Venice, Rome, Naples, Corfu, Athens, Smyrna, Constantinople, Budapest, Vienna, Munich, Paris, London, and scores of other cities.

TOUR THROUGH SOUTHERN EUROPE

Other Tours through Europe—May 16, May 23, June 20, and July 4.

California Tours—Jan. 24, Feb. 6, Feb. 11, Feb. 14, March 3, and March 6.

Florida Tours—Jan. 24, Feb. 6, 14, and 28.

Mexico Tours—Jan. 24 and Feb. 14.

Second Tour to Japan and China—Feb. 24.

Independent Railroad and Steamship Tickets to all Points

Send for descriptive book, mentioning the particular trip desired.

RAYMOND & WHITCOMB

31 East Fourteenth St., Lincoln Building, Union Sq., New York
296 Washington Street, Boston, Mass. 20 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Eager to get it—

SOZODONT —Pure and Fragrant.
Economy to Use It.

This popular dentifrice is always delightful and effective. Used every day, the powder twice a week, it insures better teeth, firmer gums and sweeter breath. SOZODONT is known the world over, having stood the test of half a century as the standard dentifrice of America. Sold by druggists everywhere.

Sample Free by mail if you mention this magazine. Address Hall & Ruckel, Props., New York.

THE

Queen and Crescent

Route

The winter schedules for 1896 present to the traveler and tourist the most complete train service known.

THE NEW ORLEANS LIMITED

and

THE FLORIDA LIMITED

are complete palaces of travel, carrying one to Southern winter resorts quickly and with comfort. Solid vestibuled trains from Cincinnati without change. Three through sleepers daily to Jacksonville, Fla. Low tourist rates are now in effect.

Send to W. C. Rinearson, General Passenger Agent, Cincinnati, Ohio, for illustrated and descriptive literature, time-tables, etc.

THE

Jackson Sanatorium

AT DANSVILLE, NEW YORK

[Main Building absolutely Fireproof]

For thirty-seven years the leading Health Institution in America, is under the personal care of regularly educated and experienced physicians, and is distinctive in its methods and character.

Location in hillside park, overlooking charming Genesee Valley region. Clear, dry air. Thorough drainage and sewerage.

All forms of Baths, Massage, Swedish Movements, Electricity, Inunction, etc. Instruction in Hygiene and Physical Culture.

A HEALTH SCHOOL

where the invalid, while getting well, learns how to keep well, also a delightful home for health and rest seekers in which every provision is made for comfort and good cheer, as well as for skilled medical care and treatment.

Superior cuisine, under supervision of Mrs. Emma P. Ewing, of Chautauqua Cooking School. Electric bells; electric lights; safety elevator; open fires; telegraph, long-distance telephone; library; chapel; daily papers; roof and piazza promenades; and every appliance for healthful and enjoyable indoor and outdoor life.

On line Del., Lack. & Western R.R., from New York or Buffalo without change.

For illustrated pamphlet or other information address
J. ARTHUR JACKSON, Secretary.
P. O. Box 1894.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS

EDITED BY MR. GLADSTONE

THE WORKS OF JOSEPH BUTLER, D.C.L.

SOMETIME LORD BISHOP OF DURHAM

Divided into Sections, with Sectional Headings, an Index to each Volume, and some Occasional Notes, also Prefatory Matter.
Edited by the Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE.
2 volumes, demy 8vo, cloth, $7.00 net.
Vol. I.—Analogy, etc. Vol. II.—Sermons, etc.

Browning and the Christian Faith

On the Evidences of Christianity from Browning's Point of View. By EDWARD BERDOE. Crown 8vo, cloth, 256 pages.

The Commentary of Origen on St. John's Gospel

The Text Revised, with a Critical Introduction and Indices, by A. E. BROOKE. M.A., Fellow and Dean of King's College. 2 vols., crown 8vo.

BY THE POET LAUREATE

ENGLAND'S DARLING

By ALFRED AUSTIN, Poet Laureate. With Portrait. 12mo, cloth, $1.25.

⁂ "We cannot but think that this straightforward and simple poem will be well received by the public. The author makes no pretension to be a rival of Tennyson or Wordsworth, but he has told his story in an interesting manner, and with a dignity and modesty which will commend it to the reader."—New York Times.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR:

THE TOWER OF BABEL. 12mo, $1.75.
SAVONAROLA. 12mo, $1.75.
PRINCE LUCIFER. 12mo, $1.75.
THE HUMAN TRAGEDY. 12mo. $1.75.
LYRICAL POEMS. 12mo, $1.75.
NARRATIVE POEMS. 12mo, $1.75.
FORTUNATUS THE PESSIMIST. 12mo. $1.75.
MADONNA'S CHILD. 16mo. $1.00.
THE GARDEN THAT I LOVE. With Illustrations. 12mo. $2.50.
IN VERONICA'S GARDEN. With Illustrations. 12mo. $2.50.
ENGLISH LYRICS. Edited by William Watson. Fourth Edition. 12mo. $1.25.

"It is Manning himself as revealed in his correspondence."

LIFE OF CARDINAL MANNING

Archbishop of Westminster

By EDMUND SHERIDAN PURCELL, Member of the Roman Academy of Letters. With Portraits. 2 vols., 8vo, cloth, $6.00.

Vol. I.—Manning as an Anglican. Vol. II.—Manning as a Catholic.

"The world to-day, more than ever before, insists on knowing the truth about the men whose lives are deemed worthy of record. It has little patience with legends, even when consecrated by time and glorified by the genius of poetry. Still less will it allow the lives of its present-day worthies to be turned into legend and myth."—New York Tribune, on Cardinal Manning.

"We are sure that no history of the religious men and movements of this century will be complete which does not give a high place among its authorities to Mr. Purcell's 'Life of Cardinal Manning.'"—The Speaker.

Evolution and Man's Place in Nature

By HENRY CALDERWOOD, LL.D., F.R.S.E., Professor of Moral Philosophy, University of Edinburgh. Second Edition. 8vo, cloth, pp. xx. and 316, $3.25 net.

New Book by Professor Sayce.

The Egypt of the Hebrews and Herodotos

By the Rev. A. H. SAYCE, Professor of Assyriology at Oxford. 12mo, cloth, $2.00.

Jewish Ideals and Other Essays

By JOSEPH JACOBS, author of "Studies in Jewish Statistics," "The Jews in Angevin England," and "An Inquiry into the History of the Jews in Spain." 8vo, cloth, pp. xvii. and 242, $2.50.

LIFE, LETTERS, AND WORKS OF LOUIS AGASSIZ

By JULES MARCOU. With Portraits and Illustrations. 2 vols., crown 8vo, $4.00.

"It is impossible to do justice to this valuable work. It must suffice to say that the two volumes are exceedingly attractive in their outward form, are properly illustrated, and will give a great many hours of pleasure to the reader. In every way, in the matter of style, in the arrangement of incidents, in the impartial criticism of the work of Agassiz, it is altogether charming, and I feel free to assert that it is one of the most delightful biographies I have ever read."—New York Herald.

New Edition of Gibbon.

The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire

By EDWARD GIBBON. With Introduction, Notes, Appendices, and Index, by J. B. BURY, M.A., Hon. Litt.D. of Durham; Fellow and Tutor of Trinity College, Dublin; Professor of Modern History in Dublin University. In seven volumes. Vol. I. Now Ready. 12mo, cloth, uncut, gilt top, $2.00 per volume.

The Child and Childhood in Folk-Thought

(The Child in Primitive Culture)

By ALEXANDER FRANCIS CHAMBERLAIN, M.A., Ph.D., Lecturer on Anthropology in Clark University; sometime Fellow in Modern Languages in University College, Toronto; Fellow of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, etc., etc. 8vo, cloth, $3.00, net.

AN IMPORTANT HISTORICAL WORK

ECONOMIC HISTORY OF VIRGINIA IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

An inquiry into the material condition of the People, based upon Original and Contemporaneous Records. By PHILIP ALEXANDER BRUCE, author of "The Plantation Negro as a Freeman," and Corresponding Secretary of the Virginia Historical Society. With a map. 2 vols. crown 8vo, $6.00 net.

⁂ "A book that may be fairly termed unique from the viewpoint of exhaustive research in its particular field. . . . The mass as well as the extraordinary variety of material which enters into the economic history of Virginia in the colonial period will be appreciated when we point out that these two volumes, each of which comprises some 600 pages, only cover the first ninety-three years of the community's existence."—The Sun.

"Incomparably the most valuable contribution to the social and economic literature of Virginia. This superb work not only establishes Mr. Bruce's right to the fame in authorship, but it imposes on him a logical sequence, the obligation of continuing his labors. The Economic History of Virginia will find a place not only in the public and private libraries of Virginia, but also in the libraries of the whole country."—Pittsburgh Index Appeal.

"The most exhaustive history of the period with which it deals we have ever seen, with everything to commend it to the student or general reader. . . . The result of his study, compilation, and literary work is so admirable that it cannot, we think, fail to commend itself to all readers."—Southern Churchman.

The Empire of the Ptolemies

By J. P. MAHAFFY, Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin; Hon. Fellow of Queen's College, Oxford; author of the "Prolegomena of Ancient History," "Social Life in Greece from Homer to Menander," etc. 12mo, cloth, $3.50.

History of the Post-Office Packet Service

Between the Years 1793-1815

Compiled from Records, Chiefly Official. By ARTHUR H. NORWAY. With 6 full-page Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, $3.50.

Woman Under Monasticism

Chapters on Saint Lore and Convent Life between A. D. 500 and A. D. 1500. By LINA ECKENSTEIN. 8vo, cloth, $4.00 net.

THE MODERN READERS' BIBLE

A Series of Works from the Sacred Scriptures Presented in Modern Literary Form

Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by RICHARD G. MOULTON, M.A. (Camb.), Ph.D. (Penn.), Professor of Literature in English in the University of Chicago.

The purpose of this Series has regard to the Bible as part of the world's literature, without reference to questions of religious or historic criticism.
32mo, cloth, each 50 cents. Now Ready.

WISDOM SERIES

PROVERBS. A Miscellany of Sayings and Poems embodying isolated Observations of Life.

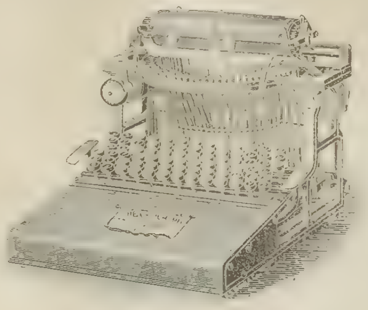
ECCLESIASTICUS. A Miscellany including longer compositions, still embodying only isolated Observations of Life.

THE BOOK OF JOB. A Dramatic Poem in which are embodied Varying Solutions of the Mystery of Life.

MACMILLAN & CO., 66 Fifth Ave., New York

Dr. Parkhurst in the "INDEPENDENT," Dec. 12, 1895:

"The value of a machine is not in the exquisiteness or even the antiquity of its build, but in the amount of good work it will turn out."



Measured by this standard the

Caligraph Typewriter

is absolutely without a peer

"It Outlasts them All"

Youngstown, Ohio, January 3, 1896.

American Writing Machine Co., 237 Broadway, New York:

Gentlemen—To illustrate the durable qualities of the Caligraph, I submit to you this letter, written on a Caligraph which has been in my possession since [illegible] being kept in almost constant use, rented out time and again, used by scores of students for practice, and has turned out as much and probably more manifold work than any other typewriter in existence. It bids fair to serve us in the hardest sort of work for many years to come. It has never cost us one cent for repairs. Wishing yourselves and the Caligraph a Happy New Year and a long and successful career, which is well deserved, I am very truly yours,

A. I. NICHOLAS, Att'y-at-Law.

(12 years Court Reporter New York and Ohio.)

Our illustrated Catalogue for 1896 will be sent on request. Ask also for sample book of Typewriter papers.

American Writing Machine Co. 237 Broadway, New York, U.S.A.

Cotton Dress Fabrics.

Highest Novelties of French, Scotch, and Irish manufacture.

Exclusive designs in French Printed Organdies, French Plumetis, India Dimities, Silk-and-Cotton Dresdens.

White and Colored Swiss and Piques.

Scotch Zephyrs, Scotch Lappets, Madras Shirtings.

Linen Batistes, Linen Ducks.

Teviots, the latest for Golf and Cycling Gowns.

James McCreery & Co.

Broadway and 11th St.,

New York.

Faultless Form,

delightful comfort, perfect health and grace—every breath a free one, every move an easy one—the invariable result of living in the

FERRIS' GOOD SENSE

CORSET WAIST

The favorite of all women who wish to dress well and feel well. Made in styles to suit every figure—long or short waist, high or low bust. Children's, 25c. to 50c. Misses', 50c. to $1. Ladies', $1 to $2. For sale by all retailers.

OUR CONSTANT AIM

TO MAKE THE FERRIS HAMS

THE FINEST!

The Outlook

A·Family·Paper

Volume 53 Saturday, 22 February, 1896 Number 8

THE Queen's Speech last week was, as usual, a kind of formal and non-communicative prelude to the opening of the new session of the English Parliament. The principal interest in it centered in the expressions with regard to Armenia, Venezuela, and South Africa, but on all these matters the tone of the message, while distinctly pacific, was vague and noncommittal. The Queen conveyed the rather stale information that the Sultan had sanctioned reforms proposed for the Armenian provinces, and expressed her regret that the fanatical outbreak among the Turkish population had resulted in a series of massacres. She also regretted the sudden excursion into the South African Republic of an armed force, and declared that the matter would be made the subject of a searching inquiry. The Government of the United States having expressed a wish to co-operate in the termination of the differences between England and Venezuela, the Queen expressed her sympathy with the desire to come to an equitable arrangement. In a word, the Speech, as usual, was purely a formal matter, but the debate which followed was significant as showing the attitude of the parties. Lord Rosebery severely criticised the Government's policy toward Armenia, which he declared was most mysterious and led to the conclusion that the Ministry had decided to abandon the cause of Armenia. Touching on the Venezuelan question, Lord Rosebery said that he welcomed the intervention of the United States because it introduced the important element of a substantial Government offering to guarantee the permanence of any settlement that might be arrived at. The whole speech was distinctly friendly in character, and Lord Salisbury, who followed, declared that the chief obstacle to settlement had been the extravagant claims of Venezuela, but that the difficulty would, in his judgment, be solved before long by the mutual development of a desire for arbitration. On Monday of this week an amendment to the reply to the Queen's Speech was moved in the House of Commons urging that the whole question should be submitted to arbitration. A most interesting debate followed, which was closed by the assurance of Mr. Balfour that the amendment would only hinder the object in view. Sir William Harcourt declared that both inside and outside the House the consensus of opinion was in favor of arbitration. The feeling seems to be very general in London that an early adjustment of the affair is now assured. Pressure has been brought to bear by our own Government on Venezuela to resume diplomatic relations with Great Britain, and when a Minister from Venezuela arrives in London, it is believed that the way will be open for a prompt adjustment of the differences between the two countries. The immense advantage of treating international affairs with calmness and deliberation instead of bluster and buncombe is plainly seen in the contrast suggested by the speeches of Lord Rosebery in the House of Lords, and of Mr. Frye in the United States Senate. Lord Rosebery's attitude was that of a trained statesman dealing with affairs of world-wide moment with dignity and a deep sense of responsibility. Mr. Frye's attitude was that of an angry boy who shakes his fists and declaims.

*

The legal opinion of Professor Bernay, of the University of Lausanne, which we publish on another page, is a very important document. It was obtained, as will be seen, by the British Peace Association, and has been forwarded to The Outlook by a special English correspondent. It is distinctly a judicial opinion, wholly free from political and national bias. It has the authority of an impartial opinion, and settles, as far as any opinion from a single unprejudiced and disinterested expert can settle, some of the disputed questions involved in the Venezuela controversy. According to this opinion, the Monroe Doctrine does not justify our intervention in the Venezuelan dispute; the claims of Secretary Olney in this respect are unfounded, and, moreover, were not presented in proper forms of diplomatic courtesy. On the other hand, our declaration that England's refusal to submit the Venezuelan question to arbitration would be regarded as unfriendly, though "ill conceived from some points of view," is not a menace of war; nor is the appointment of the Commission an infraction of international law. Finally, while intervention by one State in a controversy between two other States is sometimes legitimate, notably when a stronger State is committing an unlawful act to the injury of a weaker State, it appears impossible to discover in the issues between Venezuela and England any conditions which justify such intervention by the United States. Such, in brief, is the substance of this opinion, which we commend to the studious consideration of our candid readers. This valuable paper gives us the gift to "see ourselves as others see us"—always a valuable though not always a welcome gift.

*

The chief figure of the week in England has been Mr. Chamberlain, whose very able management of the difficulties in South Africa has elicited praise even from his political enemies. The notable quality which has characterized Mr. Chamberlain's treatment of South African matters has been directness. He seemed to grasp the situation the very moment the startling news was conveyed to him, and before the newspapers had published the reports the Secretary for the Colonies had taken every step necessary to disavow Dr. Jameson's enterprise in every form. There was none of the usual diplomatic evasion and procrastination. In the House of Commons Mr. Chamberlain has shown the same qualities. He has apparently taken the whole English public into his confidence, and told them the entire story without any of the usual diplomatic reservations and concealments. He has substituted complete publicity for the traditional diplomatic policy of secrecy, and it is not surprising that this new method has secured popular approval on the instant. From the very beginning Mr. Chamberlain has made the newspapers free of all the information which he possessed. Twenty-four hours before the debate on the Transvaal affair in the House of Commons he had published the dispatches, and when he stood on his feet to meet his critics he practically disarmed them by telling the whole story simply, frankly, and apparently without any evasions. His critics had expected to make a point of his unwise haste in printing the dispatch to the British High Commissioner in South Africa, in which he had set forth the grievances of the foreign residents of the Transvaal and suggested a scheme of reforms which included the practical autonomy of the residents of the Rand. To this suggestion President Kruger took serious offense, and has refused to carry out his intention of visiting England for the purpose of conference with the Government.

* * *

Mr. Chamberlain described this whole transaction, went over the whole question with the greatest apparent candor, said frankly that he had irritated President Kruger by his unwise action, and had possibly prevented his proposed visit; that he had made a mistake in making public a scheme of reform in the government of the Rand without previously submitting it to President Kruger; that his action had been met by an angry protest; that he withdrew it as a mere tentative suggestion; and closed a very able speech by the declaration that the English Government intended, under all circumstances, to stand by its rights in South Africa. The speech, by reason of its lucidity, intelligent arrangement of detail, and general air of candor, disarmed criticism and has made the most favorable impression in England. While Mr. Chamberlain was speaking in the House of Commons, Baron von Vieberstein, the German Minister of Foreign Affairs, was also speaking in the German Reichstag. He said that Germany had never attempted to obtain any kind of a protectorate over the Transvaal, but that the German Government will uphold the status quo at Delagoa Bay, the rights involved in the ownership of the German railways, and the maintenance of the independence of the South African Republic. In other words, Germany apparently conveys to England the decision that she will not stand by and allow English intervention in the affairs of South Africa. The situation undoubtedly contains elements of danger. It may be doubted whether the English Government proposes to send an army corps of twenty thousand men to South Africa, as is reported in the newspapers, and whether the German Government is also making preparations looking to the same end; but the English cannot leave the difficulty with the Boers where it is, and, if German declarations are to be believed, England cannot interfere to change the conditions for the better without antagonizing Germany.

* * *

The prophecy has been freely made of late that the Bourgeois Ministry would go out of power in France, as its predecessor went out, on the question of the Southern Railway scandals, and the large attendance of visitors in the galleries of the Chamber of Deputies on Thursday of last week was an indication of the popular interest in the subject and in a possible Cabinet crisis. The trial of the first group of speculators involved in the Southern Railway scandal resulted in the defeat of the Ribot Ministry. An examination of all the matters involved has been in progress for several months, and the question upon which the Bourgeois Ministry was to stand or fall last week related to the appointment of what is called in France a Judge of Instruction to conduct the inquiry. Judge Poitevin was selected for the work, and the charge has been freely made that this official was too much under Ministerial influence. On that ground the Ministry had been beaten in the Senate, and its opponents expected to beat it in the popular body. How much sincerity there is in the charge against Judge Poitevin it is impossible to say, but the opinion seems to be that the charge was simply a pretext under cover of which the opponents of the Ministry hoped to overthrow it. Out of 581 members of the Chamber, 326 voted for the Ministry and 43 against it, leaving a large group of Deputies, 212, who seem to have preferred to leave the present Ministry in office, but who were not willing to indorse it. The affirmative vote came largely from the Moderate Republicans. In the Senate the Ministry is accused of being too radical; among the Radicals it is charged with being too conservative. But it is probably having as comfortable a time as any French Ministry can under the existing conditions in the Chamber of Deputies. All parties and groups are now looking more to the municipal elections, which will take place throughout France in May, than to the carrying out of any distinct policy.

* * *

In the United States Senate last week five free-coinage Republicans voted with the Democrats and Populists against the consideration of the House tariff bill. The Republicans who thus broke away from party lines upon a question involving what has been the cardinal principle of the party were: Senators Jones, of Nevada, Teller, of Colorado, Dubois, of Idaho, and Carter and Mantle, of Montana. With their aid the Democrats and Populists buried the tariff bill by a vote of 29 to 21. Some Republican papers express confidence that this action will be reconsidered, but the general belief is that the tariff bill is killed and that the bolting Republicans have formally served notice that they care as little for the protection of Eastern manufacturers as the latter for the protection of Western silver-miners. Whatever the outcome, the vote furnishes another sign that Republican unity is increasingly difficult to maintain. When so many Western Republicans will vote with Southern Democrats against a tariff bill, the union of the free-trade and free-coinage sections of the country in one political party certainly seems less remote. In the House of Representatives the important event of the week was the defeat of the Senate's free-coinage amendment to the Bond Bill by a majority of 125 votes. This majority against free coinage was without precedent in recent years. Even in the fall of 1893, the free-coinage amendment to the bill repealing the Sherman Act received 125 votes, as against 226 in opposition. This year the free-coinage proposition received but 90 votes, as against 215 in opposition. An analysis of the two votes shows that the increased strength of the opposition was due to the increased strength of the Republican party. In 1893 the Democrats voted 114 to 101 against free coinage; this year they voted 58 to 31 in its favor. In 1893 the Republicans voted 112 to 13 against free coinage; this year they voted 184 to 25 against it. In 1893 the free-coinage proposition had the support of 11 Populists; this year of only 7. It was, therefore, to the displacement of Democrats and Populists by Republicans in the elections of 1894 that the extent of last week's anti-silver victory was due. Only seven Republicans from east of the Missouri River supported the free-coinage proposition. This vote is admitted by silver men to be a decided setback to free coinage.

* * *

In interpreting the significance of this action the reader must recall the classification of parties on the financial question which The Outlook has heretofore given. These parties are not two, but three: the first is in favor of gold monometallism; the second is in favor of a double or alternating standard of gold and silver, kept at parity by being made legal tender for all debts, private and public; the third is in favor of free silver coinage. Some bimetallists are in favor of free silver coinage, either because they think it will lead to bimetallism or because they think that, if it does not, the evils of silver monometallism will be less than the evils of the present gold system; other bimetallists are opposed to free silver coinage, because they fear it will retard bimetallism, and they prefer to endure present evils rather than fly to ills they know not of. The free silver coinage men are reinforced by the silver-mining and co-related industries. The vote in the House indicates, if it does not demonstrate, a popular majority against free silver coinage, but it does not demonstrate such a public majority against bimetallism, and we doubt if it even indicates such a majority. It does indicate an increasing determination that every dollar shall possess the same purchasing value, whether it is redeemable in gold or silver. This is a wise determination; bimetallists all believe that it can be realized under bimetallism; if not, bimetallism is scientifically false. The way to secure a test vote of the opinion of the House on that question would be to introduce a bill requiring the Secretary of the Treasury, when the gold reserve fell below a certain definite minimum, to redeem in silver coin the notes which, by the terms of the act providing for their issue, are payable in silver at the option of the Government. Every vote against such a law would be a vote against National bimetallism; every vote for it would be a vote for bimetallism.

⁂

Secretary Morton, of the Department of Agriculture, is trying to institute an important reform, the purpose of which is to be heartily commended, but by a method which ought not to pass unchallenged. Since 1839 the Government has expended sums gradually increasing from $1,000 a year to $150,000 for the distribution of seeds, plants, vines, and the like, in order to diversify and promote the horticultural and agricultural industries of the country. The aim was to bring the attention of farmers to new seeds and plants which our consuls abroad or correspondents in different parts of our own country brought to the attention of the Bureau of Agriculture. Naturally, the number of rare products really deserving to be thus distributed was very small, and the institution framed for the advancement of science and agriculture has developed into an institution for enabling Congressmen to show personal attentions to farming constituents. Though the total amount appropriated seems small, the number of packages of seeds distributed last year was upwards of nine million, of which about eight million went to farmers through the favor of Congressmen. The exact amount spent in purchasing and handling these seeds in 1894 was $123,000, and the cost to the Post-Office Department of transporting them free of charge was in the neighborhood of $30,000 more. Secretary Morton rightly insists that the system has developed into a gross abuse, and urges that, instead of this wholesale and indiscriminate sending of seeds to constituents, it would be better for the Government to appropriate $500 for each of the forty-eight agricultural experiment stations, permitting these to distribute as they see fit. Unfortunately, however, Secretary Morton does not stop here. Unable to persuade Congress to change the law, he discovered and followed a method by which he claims he may legally refuse to extend the appropriation. The method pursued was, in brief, to advertise for competitive bids for the furnishing of the seeds, plants, and so on, but to find that no one of the bids received by the date specified was satisfactory at all points. Those most interested in the promotion of agriculture in this country agree with Secretary Morton that the present law which he opposes is a bad one; but the way to get rid of a bad law is not to evade it. We regret to see Secretary Morton making use of a questionable means to accomplish a very commendable end. The foundation of democracy is government by law as opposed to government by officials; and when officials, in the Nation, State, or city, set out to defeat the obvious purpose of the law, even when that purpose is pernicious, by evasive methods, they set an example which, unfortunately, is quickly and skillfully adopted by those who wish to break the force of good laws.

⁂

Several bills distinctively in the interest of morality have been introduced at the present session of Congress. One of them, forbidding prize-fights in any territory of the United States, has passed both Houses. The others have not been brought to a vote in either House, but may be helped to one by those in sympathy with them. One of these measures forbids the issue of Federal liquor licenses except to dealers possessing State licenses. The object is to reduce the number of illegal dram-shops in high license, local option, and Prohibition States by making the lawbreakers subject to the severe penalties of the Federal law as well as the comparatively mild ones of the Commonwealths. The measure was introduced in the Senate by Mr. Peffer, of Kansas, and in the House by Mr. Denny, of Mississippi. The New York "Voice" reports that the Mississippi Legislature will memorialize Congress in favor of the measure. In that State, under the local-option law, more than four-fifths of the counties have prohibited saloons, and the public sentiment in favor of the enforcement of the law is so strong that the traditional hostility to the strong arm of the Federal Government has been forgotten. It is noteworthy that most of the Congressmen quoted in the "Voice" as heartily supporting the bill are Southern Democrats. The two remaining bills especially notable for their moral purpose have been introduced by Mr. Gillett, of Massachusetts. One forbids the granting of a divorce in any Territory unless the applicant has resided in the Territory for one year. The other is so short and so important that we print it in full:

> "Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any person who shall be a party to the transmission by telegraph or telephone or mail or express or otherwise, from one State or Territory into another State or Territory, or from or into the District of Columbia, of any gambling bet, or report of such bet on any race or prize-fight or other event, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punishable in the first offense by imprisonment for not more than two years or by a fine of not more than one thousand dollars, or both, and in the second and after offenses by such imprisonment only."

Already the transmission of any such bets or reports of bets from one State to another by mail or express is forbidden by National law, but the transmission by telegraph, aimed at in this bill, is a far more important way of nullifying the anti-gambling laws of various Commonwealths. By all means let this bill be pressed forward.

⁂

The annual report of the New York State Factories Inspectors has been published. The most startling part of the report is that in regard to the violation of State laws in bakeries. The worst conditions prevail in New York and Brooklyn. The men are reported to work fourteen, sixteen, and even eighteen hours a day. The overworked men in many cases sleep in the bake-shop on the bread-troughs; not infrequently it is their only home. The bread and other products are made, in the majority of the bakeries, in cellars damp and unfit for use, which are without means of lighting or ventilation. The details of the investigation are sickening, and make immediate reform imperative. The day must come when bakers will pass examinations before they can hold a license to make bread. All bread will then be made by machinery, and in buildings in which the most careful obedience to the laws of sanitation will prevail. A people who permit an industry, whose product is a food common to every home, to be carried on under conditions that are so revolting as to produce nausea, must recognize in this fact the mark of its low degree of civilization. A bill was passed last May which was intended to improve the conditions under which bread and other bakery products are manufactured, reducing the hours of labor, and requiring rooms separate from the bake-shop for the sleeping-rooms of the bakers—sanitary conditions that merely come within the bounds of decency. To enforce the provisions of the bill it was recommended that four deputy inspectors be appointed. The factory inspection has been as thorough as could be expected when it is remembered that there is but one inspector of bakeries for the entire city of New York. The Factory Inspectors advise the passage of a bill which will prohibit the making of bread in cellars. Regarding the general condition of labor throughout the State, the Inspectors' report is decidedly encouraging. The enforcement of the law regulating child labor has resulted in marked improvement in the conditions surrounding child labor in the State, and a marked increase in school attendance throughout the State.

⁂

Last week a resolution was passed at Albany requiring the Superintendent of Public Instruction to transmit to the Legislature whatever information he possessed as to the number of children refused admission to the public schools of New York and Brooklyn because of lack of room. The resolution also called for a general statement of the need of additional school buildings in these two cities. The police census, which has just been completed in New York, throws some light on the question. The total number of children of school age in New York City is given as 448,493. Of this number 192,929 are attending the public schools, 65,285 are attending other schools, 22,780 are at work, 983 are known as truants, 65,117 children between the ages of four and eight years are not attending school, and 101,399 between eight and twenty-one years of age are out of school. Of this last number 5,685 do not speak or write English, 907 are deaf and dumb, 133 are blind. These figures are open to question, doubtless. Many of the children reported as attending school are attending half-day sessions—this compromise the schools have been compelled to make because of the pressure in certain districts. One school below Fourteenth Street has seven hundred children attending half-day sessions. The effect of this state of things is demoralizing.

⁂

In Brooklyn the able Superintendent of Education, Mr. W. H. Maxwell, recently called attention to the educational conditions of that city. On September 30, 1895, 9,200 in that city were attending school on half-day time. The overcrowding of classes in Brooklyn is as great as in New York. 262 classes have registers of over 60. Forty-nine have registers of over 70. Twenty-two classes register over 80. Five have registers of over 100 and below 120. One had a register of over 140. Where the register numbers over 80, the classes are divided into two half-day sessions. About 25,000 children in Brooklyn are attending other than public schools. The difficulties attending the gathering of correct data of the number of children of school age unprovided for by the Department of Public Education are many. In New York, for instance, every child who is refused admittance to a school is counted as one. That one child may make application in a half-dozen schools, and count in each school as one. Then the children in the corporate schools are not counted at all in the school census, though the chief reason advanced for the maintenance of those schools is the inadequacy of the public school. There is in New York City, not a system of public education, but systems. The corporate schools draw from the State, county, and city funds hundreds of thousands of dollars a year to develop and maintain an entirely independent system of education; that is, to maintain as part of a system of charity a number of schools. The income of these corporate schools is on a per capita basis—a most pernicious system because of the temptations it offers to induce children to attend the corporate in preference to the public schools, where no material inducements are offered. In at least two of the wards in New York there are empty class-rooms in the public schools near which are two corporate schools overcrowded. The Amended Laws of the New York State Constitution, Article IX., Section 1, says:

> "The Legislature shall provide for the maintenance and support of a system of free common schools, wherein all the children of this State may be educated."

Governor Morton in his first message says:

> "The new provision of Section 1 of Article IX. requires the Legislature to provide for the maintenance and support of a system of free common schools, wherein all the children of the State may be educated. That is now far from being the case, and the Legislature ought to take immediate steps to fulfill this mandate."

The resolution referred to above is a step toward carrying out the purpose of the amendment and the advice of Governor Morton.

⁂

No scientific discovery since that of the principle of the telephone has aroused such wide interest as that of Professor Röntgen's now famous "X-rays." In this country as well as abroad, Professor Röntgen's experiments have been repeated by a host of scientists, and new developments are daily reported. Photographs have already been reproduced showing clearly marked outline pictures of such objects as keys, coins, eyeglasses, pencils, and the like, taken through leather or wooden cases or other solid substances, and of the human hand, showing the shape and articulation of the bones with great plainness. The discovery has already been applied with success in surgery: in Montreal a bullet was located in a man's leg by the X-rays and extracted; in Chicago a buckshot was located in a man's hand in the same way; in Berlin, Professor Röntgen himself, the cable tells us, located a needle which had been swallowed by a seamstress, it being discovered in a corner of her stomach by the new photography, and extracted with safety and with the result, probably, of saving the patient's life. In view of these and similar facts, there can hardly be any doubt that the discovery will be of extraordinary value in a practical way. Thus far the attention of scientists has been directed rather to repeating or improving upon Professor Röntgen's experiments than to defining the exact nature of the new medium. The most original advance is the partly proven discovery that not only can the rays be used for photographic purposes, but that they may be so treated as to present a direct shadow-picture of the hidden object to the eye without the intervention of photography. As to the exact nature of the "rays" which possess the extraordinary properties now brought to light, nothing more definite has been learned than the tentative theory put forth by Professor Röntgen himself. He says:

> "A kind of relationship between the new rays and light-rays appears to exist; at least the formation of shadows, fluorescence, and the production of chemical action point in this direction. Now it has been known for a long time that, besides the transverse vibrations which account for the phenomena of light, it is possible that longitudinal vibrations should exist in the ether, and according to the view of some physicists must exist. It is granted that their existence has not yet been made clear, and their properties are not experimentally demonstrated. Should not the new rays be ascribed to longitudinal waves in the ether?"

◆

The news—if it be really news and not rumor—of Dr. Nansen's safe return from his Polar expedition is so incomplete and scanty that it will only arouse the liveliest curiosity and impatience to learn the history of the great explorer's achievements. The news first came from Irkutsk, and merely stated that Nansen was safe and "returning from the North Pole." Little credence was given to the report at first, as it came from an unexpected quarter, and as several unconfirmed rumors about Nansen have hitherto been printed. Another dispatch, however, was soon received from Archangel, briefly reasserting the same thing. It is supposed that the news may have been brought by natives of the Lena River region, and may possibly have come to them from New Siberia. At present geographers and Arctic experts are inclined to believe that there is basis in the reports that Nansen has been seen, but to doubt the vague statement about the explorer's success in reaching the North Pole. The surprising thing about this report is that it indicates that Nansen has returned to his original starting-point. It will be remembered that his plan was to proceed to the New Siberian Islands or as near them as he could get, and then force his way northward in the sturdy Fram, until he should find the current which he firmly believed would in the course of two or three years carry him across the Polar circle and down to the coast of Greenland, thus following the course taken, it is supposed, by the Jeannette relics which (it has been alleged, though the fact is now doubted) were found on the southwest Greenland coast in 1884, three years after the Jeannette sank north of the New Siberian Islands. If Nansen is now returning by way of Irkutsk, it is quite clear that his original plan has failed, and the most reasonable theory of his having penetrated the region adjacent to the Pole is that he found land at a very high altitude, made the last part of his journey northward by sledge, returned to the Fram, and slowly pushed his way south and east by steam-power and drifting until he again reached the Siberian coast. The Fram was last heard from two and a half years ago, steering into the Kara Sea, and it is known that the plan of stopping at the Lena Delta and New Siberian Islands was not carried out, the season and circumstances having apparently warned Nansen against going too far east before making his course to the north. Of all recent Arctic explorers Dr. Nansen is the most interesting in personality and most fascinating as a descriptive writer. If he be now really returning from the Polar seas with a record of new and great achievements, the reading world has before it a rare treat in the story as it will be told by him.

The Salvation Army

The Church of Christ has always been a democratic organization; that is, it has appealed to the common people, and has grown by recruits from their ranks. The effect of Christianity has been growth intellectual as well as moral, in culture and wealth as well as in character. Thus, gradually the Church has grown rich and aristocratic, and then the spirit nurtured in the heart of the Church has gone out from it to the poor and the uncultured, and a new growth has started from the roots. The Christianity of Jesus Christ, beginning in the heart of the Jewish Church, laid hold upon the common people whom the Jewish Church did not reach; Lutheranism gathered its recruits from the peasant population of Germany, between whom and the priesthood a great gulf had opened; Puritanism gathered its recruits, not from the Cavaliers and aristocracy, but from the "tapsters and serving-men;" Methodism went out from the Established Church with its Gospel to the farm laborers and the colliers; and in our time the Salvation Army, beginning in the Church, went beyond its bounds to gather in the destitute and the outcast, whom the Church by its customary methods failed to reach. In three articles we give in this issue of The Outlook an account of this great movement—as truly great as that of primitive Christianity under the leadership of Paul, Protestant Christianity under the leadership of Luther, Puritan Christianity under the leadership of Cromwell, or Methodist Christianity under the leadership of Wesley.

Perhaps this is the place to say that we hope that the result will not show that General Booth has made an irreparable mistake in recalling Commander and Mrs. Booth from this country. Loyalty doubtless requires that all the members of the Salvation Army should accept with unquestioning obedience the orders of their Commander-in-Chief, but it does not require that the general public should do so, and it must be frankly said that this recall has administered a severe blow to the public confidence which Commander and Mrs. Booth had won for the Salvation Army by their consecrated zeal and practical wisdom. That confidence may be secured by the successor of Commander and Mrs. Booth. It will be easier for him to secure it than it was for them when they took command in this country ten years ago. But he will have to secure it by his administration; it will not be given to him as of course. For that confidence, so far as this country is concerned, has been largely personal confidence in the Commanders rather than in the organization, whose principle of autocracy does not commend itself to the American habit of mind.

Grounds for Courage

The forces of evil are very apparent; the forces for good less visible—necessarily less visible, for beneficence sounds no trumpet before her, accomplishes her mission unwitnessed, unadvertised. Faint heart never won anything worth winning, and there is sometimes advantage in reinforcing our courage in our combat against evil influences by considering the invisible but potent influences which co-operate with us in the battle of life.

First among these is the home. The police reports a few years ago showed 4,800,000 lodgings in police stations and lodging-houses in one year in New York. That seems an appalling number; but if we multiply the population of the city and the number of the nights in the year, we shall find that between 400,000,000 and 500,000,000 people slept in homes; and though some of these homes are nurturing-places of ignorance and vice, on the whole the influence of the home in America is good, not evil. This is true even of indifferent homes; sometimes even of homes that are bad. A number of years ago the writer visited in Cherry Street a man who had the reputation of being the "wickedest man" in New York. This hero of iniquity put his little boy, four or five years old, on the dinner-table to make a speech for us. "He is a bright boy," said the proud father; "he will be a Senator one of these days. The older boy is not so bright; he is going into the ministry." "Will they live with you?" was asked him. "Oh, no," he said; "they cannot live here. The older boy has gone to his grandfather's in the country already; the younger boy is going soon." The "wickedest man" in

New York did not want his children to be the wickedest children in New York. The husbands who do not go to church are glad to have their wives go, and often insist that the children go to Sunday-school. There are millions of homes in the United States whose invisible influence is, on the whole, on the side of virtue, and is quietly and effectively combating the more apparent but less potent influence of the saloons and the gambling-hells.

The influence of the churches is not insignificant. A certain glamour surrounds the preachers of the past; the pulpit and the church are supposed to have lost their power; but this is not true. Even the revival meetings of Whitefield, Finney, and Lyman Beecher were not so largely attended nor accompanied by such significant results as those of Dwight L. Moody and B. Fay Mills. Why do not young men attend the church? the newspapers are asking. The answer is, More young men attend the church than ever before. The membership roll of the Young Men's Christian Associations, the Young People's Societies of Christian Endeavor, and the Epworth League attest the truth of this statement. The preaching of the present is more practical, has more to do with actual life, concerns itself more with business, with politics, with the household, with the life that now is, with the kingdom of God on the earth, than preaching ever did before. The churches are not all they ought to be, but they are more schools of virtue and less schools of theology, more working forces and less social clubs, more aggressive, more forthputting, with a greater variety of enterprises, philanthropic and Christian, than ever in the past history of the Nation. We have not been accustomed to think of the pawnbroker's shop as a Christian or even a philanthropic institution, but it has been consecrated to the service of humanity through the inspiring instrumentality of one great church in New York. The churches, too, are the reservoirs of the best moral sentiment. When lately the note of war was sounded from Washington, and echoed throughout the country from ocean to ocean and from lake to gulf, it was not statesmanship, nor journalism, nor commercial interest that first cried Halt; it was the Christian ministry of America, speaking in every city, East and West, North and South, without agreement, without mutual understanding, that bade the Nation pause and solve this problem by reasonable and amicable measures.

Many are the institutions growing out of these churches, drawing their life from them and really though not visibly rooted in them, which are working for a higher life. Preeminent among these are the colleges and private seminaries established and maintained by Christian beneficence. Less visibly associated with the church, though not less really dependent upon and inspired by it, is the public-school system. Serious limitations have been put upon this system, which the future, we hope, will remove. Politics has put into the schools some incompetent teachers. Ecclesiastical prejudice has taken out from them religious and even moral instruction. Nevertheless the public-school system as carried on by the State in America is doing more religiously for the children of America, more to make them intelligent and noble men and women, more to fit them for all the duties of citizenship, than ecclesiastically managed schools have ever done in the world's history; more than the parish schools of the Roman Catholic Church are doing to-day in the United States; more than the parish schools are doing in England, Spain, or Italy.

Add to these forces the tremendous force of the Bible, which has carried light and life with it wherever it has gone. Is it nothing that to-day this is a free book and men can read it if they wish? Nothing that it is in every library, in nearly every institution of learning, in most homes? Nothing that, despite the imperfections of Sunday-school instruction, it is being studied and by a greater number of pupils than ever before? Nothing that every Sunday an overwhelming majority of children in the United States are learning such simple lessons as "Thou shalt not kill," "Thou shalt not steal," "Thou shalt not commit adultery;" such a simple law of life as "Do unto others as you would have others do unto you;" such an illustration of righteousness as is afforded by the life and character of Jesus of Nazareth? Is it nothing that the spirit, the doctrine, the figures, the very phraseology of the Bible, have gone into all current literature? gone so thoroughly that the English literature of to-day dates from Wyckliffe's Bible, as the German literature of to-day dates from Luther's Bible? Is it nothing that, almost despite itself, literature, and even journalism, are disseminating spiritual ideals, inculcating spiritual principles, and furnishing for the test of life spiritual standards?

Religion to-day transcends all religious institutions; it finds expression in innumerable so-called secular forms; it utters itself in such poetry as that of Browning and Whittier, in such sonnets as those of Watson, in such novels as "The Tale of Two Cities" and "Marcella," in such music as Gounod's "Redemption" and Wagner's "Parsifal," even in such discussions of divine themes as the ecclesiastical debates in our churches, carried on through the ministry of the public press, force upon the attention of the public.

More vital and more potent than all are the forces within the human soul which make it respond to all that is highest, purest, best. The power of conscience is greater than the power of the pocket. When a Garrison denounces slavery, a thousand sleeping hearts awaken and answer to his call. When a Parkhurst denounces corruption, all that is chivalric in manhood and womanhood responds with applause, if not with service. God is in the hearts of men. The soul is not dead that slumbers, and the voice of God speaking through the prophet is heard despite itself by his careless children. More powerful than the passions of men, their covetousness, their ambition, is conscience. To doubt this is to doubt that God is God, or at least to doubt that he has to do with his children. The powers that make for righteousness are divine powers and cannot be conquered. It is well sometimes to take account of these reinforcements and take new courage.

A Truth for the Times

Perhaps the greatest refreshment which men gain from Nature at this end of the century flows from the unconsciousness in which her forces are put forth and her processes carried on. The unconsciousness of childhood, says Froebel, is rest in God—a deep saying, which goes far to explain a great deal of current skepticism and pessimism. For nothing breeds doubt and despair so quickly as a constant and feverish self-consciousness, with inability to look at life and the world apart from our own interests, emotions, and temperament. This is, in an exceptional degree, an epoch of morbid egoism, of exaggerated and excessive self-consciousness; an egoism which does not always breed vanity, but which confirms the tendency to measure everything by its value to us, and to decide every question on the basis of our personal relation to it. It is always unwise to generalize too broadly and freely about contemporary conditions, but there are many facts to bear out the statement that at no previous period in the history of the world have so many men and women been keenly and painfully self-conscious; never a time when it has been so difficult to look at things broadly and objectively, to see things as they are with entire sanity of soul and clearness of vision. All the arts are saturated with morbid self-consciousness; in literature especially, sane, wholesome, and real books in certain departments have become exceptional. Pathology has usurped the place of art, and the artist has become a specialist in diseases of the nerves. Every morbid nature rushes into print, until the weary reader of current fiction is tempted to think that the making of a modern novel involves nothing more unusual in the way of gifts than a diseased mind, a bottle of ink, a few reams of paper, and a friendly or speculative publisher. Introspective meditation, egotistical personal records, crude yearnings, immature ambitions, sickly emotions, unwholesome or premature passions, are spread out before the world with a fullness of detail of which only the wholesome and eternal verities of character and experience are worthy. Poor human nature, as illustrated in some modern fiction and verse, seems to have gone mad with the passion for publicity, and stands naked in the public squares, content with any shame if only people will look at it. The hospital and the dissecting-room have become places of habitual resort, and every morning this humanity of ours, whose diseases we used to shield from public gaze, is laid out on the operating-table while the surgeon cuts down to the last quivering nerve for our entertainment. It seems at times as if fiction had become a vast clinic, without the hush and awe with which human suffering has always been witnessed by the pure-minded. Morbid curiosity has bred an irreverence which violates the innermost sanctity of the human soul. How far this attitude is from that of a really devoted and noble nature! "We are struck by something bewildering and ineffable when we look down into the depths of an abyss," writes Amiel; "and every soul is an abyss, a mystery of love and pity. A sort of sacred emotion descends upon me whenever I penetrate the recesses of this sanctuary of man, and hear the gentle murmur of the prayers, hymns, and supplications which rise from the hidden depths of the heart." We have become so egoistic that we would rather show our deformities than be passed without notice.

From this heated atmosphere and from these representations of disease, put forth as reproductions of normal life, we fly to Nature, and are led away from all thought of ourselves. We escape out of individual into universal life; we bathe in the healing waters of an illimitable ocean of vitality; we come into contact with a mighty organism which continually receives and as constantly gives out in perfect unconsciousness of its functions. In health we hardly know that we have bodies; we breathe, move, and live without taking thought. Pain is physical self-consciousness, and when self-consciousness becomes a positive element in our lives it is an evidence of disease. A perfectly sane nature, perfectly adjusted to its time, its task, and its fellows, and expressing itself normally through normal activities, is free from abnormal self-consciousness, and therefore free to pour all its power into objective and creative work. For nothing limits normal growth and expression so inevitably as consciousness of self. In the diffusion of this morbid consciousness lies the explanation of the obvious limitation of so much genius, talent, and beauty which ought to have been large and free and sane. The talent of men like Leopardi and Verlaine commands the most generous recognition, but it is sheer blindness to accept such men as authoritative interpreters of life. Both were diseased; neither was sane in the real sense of the word, and neither saw life as it is, any more than the man in a fever, looking through the hospital window, sees Nature as she is. Byron, with the most powerful and spontaneous lyrical gift which has appeared in English literature since the days of the Elizabethans, could not escape from himself, and, when he attempted to deal with the problem of personality, painfully revealed his incapacity. Intensely self-conscious, he lost the power of seeing and reflecting life broadly and simply, and parted with that clearness and breadth of vision with which the really great poet must supplement the gift of song. Such a man, on the other hand, as we have reason to believe Shakespeare to have been, presents the entire surface of his mind to the world unvexed by a morbid sense of self, and reflects the whole order of things, as the still surface of the water gathers into itself the landscape and the sky. If for a single generation we could lose our abnormal self-consciousness and live simply, reverently, and actively, the whole race would be reinvigorated; we should see things as they are and not as they appear in our distorted vision; for society is full of sick people who see themselves more distinctly than they see anything else, and we have been taking our reports and interpretations of life largely from sick men and women, forgetful of the fact that, however interesting such reports may be, and however artistic in form, as revelations and records they are absolutely worthless. The sane mind is the only mind that can authoritatively report or interpret the immense diversity and range of experience which we call life, because it is the only mind that can see life.

The secret of productive living lies in the preponderance of the unconscious over the conscious life: for we do not really possess an experience or a truth until these things have become so much a part of ourselves that we have ceased to think of them as distinct from ourselves. Feeling, experience, conviction, tradition, never find noble expression in art until they have sunk far below the conscious into the unconscious life of a man or a race; the artist has not gained complete freedom of expression until he has completely mastered the material in which he works and the instrument which he employs. So long as he is hampered by the consciousness of himself in dealing with them, he falls short of mastery. It is significant that the descriptions of childhood are often impressive and beautiful in books which deal very feebly and ineffectively with the experiences of maturity. The reason is obvious. Childhood lies so far back in our experience that it has become part of ourselves. We do not reproduce it by observation; we do not possess it because we have consciously studied it; it possesses us because it is part of our deepest selves. It lies there, as we look back upon it, in a light at once clear and soft, apart from our self-consciousness; a vision of that which we once were. Those mountains which so often appear in Titian's pictures were the hills which gathered about the home of his childhood, and became so much a part of his memory that his whole life seemed to be lived at their feet. To drain into ourselves the rivulets of power which flow through Nature, art, and experience, we must hold ourselves open on all sides; we must empty ourselves of ourselves in order to make room for the truth and power which come to us through knowledge and action; we must lose our abnormal self-consciousness in rich and free relations with the universal life around us; we must turn our conscious feeling, acting, and living into unconscious feeling, acting, and living. For the more a man can learn to do instinctively and unconsciously, the more complete will be his emancipation from the drudgery of living, and the more complete his freedom to develop his own personality.

The Salvation Army

I.—The Story of its Beginning, Growth, and Achievements

By the Rev. J. M. Whiton, Ph.D.

THE ARMY HEADQUARTERS IN NEW YORK

Dora Greenwell, a gifted Christian Englishwoman, defined man as "a being capable of being saved." This way of thinking about men is the distinguishing characteristic of the Salvation Army. With this ruling idea it has, in a comparatively few years, initiated in all parts of the world what Mr. Depew, in Carnegie Hall, pronounced "a movement superior in its operation and influence to anything done in this generation." One may say more: that it goes beyond any Christian movement since the Apostolic age.

Its beginnnigs, some thirty-five years ago, were in the work of a Methodist minister among the poor of East London—the Rev. William Booth. Experience deepened his conviction that the debased and ignorant could be saved only by seeking them in ways not favored by the churches. For freedom to do this he severed his ministerial connection in 1861, and in 1865, seconded only by his noble wife, Catherine, the "Mother" of the Army, as he is the "Father," he began an open-air mission, with no more thought whereunto it would grow than Columbus, sailing from Palos, had of these United States. Friends were gradually attracted to the work, for which all sorts of rough, temporary shelters were utilized. In 1869, known as "The Christian Mission," it had branches in various parts of Great Britain. The organization was Methodistic until the co-operators unanimously resolved for greater effectiveness to place the entire control in the hands of Mr. Booth. Experience, by removing prejudices, promoted the Army idea, and since 1878 the mission has been known as the Salvation Army.

In March, 1880, "seven illiterate but earnest young women" landed at Castle Garden, New York. They were the vanguard of the Army, ably led by Commissioner Railton. We all remember the prejudice then generally felt. But fifteen years pass, and instead of the general wish that they would depart out of our coasts, a mass-meeting, addressed by the Mayor of New York and other chief citizens, proclaims its admiration of the work, and petitions that Commander Booth and his wife may stay with us to carry it on.

Statistics are less eloquent than such a contrast. At present there are 597 corps in the country, with a total of 4,564 officers of various grades. During eleven months the total attendance on Sunday services is reported at over eight millions, and on week-day meetings at nearly thirteen millions, with 58,390 professed conversions. The circulation of the Army's weekly publications is 122,187, and of the monthlies 18,330. There are also twenty-six social institutions of various kinds.

Considering the formidable difficulties at first encountered both in prejudice and persecution, it is certain that if the work were not of God, it would have come to naught. The Army has its critics still, and who has not? People whose Puritan ancestors were called to the New England meeting-house by drum-beat object to the Army drum. People who glibly sing in cushioned pews,

Onward, Christian soldiers,
Marching as to war,

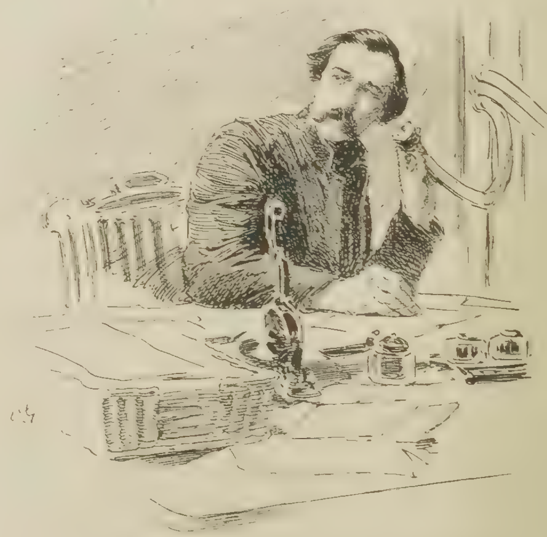
think the Army should take these words figuratively. But, apart from all the conversions which the Army statistics report, unreportable numbers of conversions have taken place in the churches themselves, as the seal of the Spirit to the work of the Army. They have seen the Army take up the work they did not, or could not, do, and do it. They have seen the slum-sisters carrying the incarnate Christ into kennels

Where the smoldering fire of fever creeps across the rotted floor,
And the crowded couch of incest in the warrens of the poor.

There they have seen them washing the filthy, nursing the sick, rescuing the victims of the brothel, and singing grace into souls that were "damned into the world," as Bishop South said, rather than born into it. They have seen the Salvationist loving his way into the hearts of "Hell-fire Jack" and hundreds of his comrade toughs, and converting them into God-fearing, orderly, and industrious citizens. By the logic of such facts antagonism has been converted into alliance, and the experience of Jesus at Samaria has been repeated—coldly received, then besought to abide.

Imitation is the best commendation. Not only have a Church of England Army, a Methodist Army, and others sprung up, not only have the Salvationist hymns been borrowed, and even stolen under fraudulent copyright, but their "self-denial week," a thing much closer to the life of their work, has been widely imitated; and large numbers in various churches have identified themselves with the work of the Army by becoming members of its "Auxiliary League."

What the Congregationalists did in England three hundred years ago, and the Methodists more than a hundred years ago, in preaching the Gospel to the poorest and lifting up the lowliest, the Salvation Army is now doing—only that poverty and degradation to-day are deeper than ever in degree as wealth is greater. The Army, however, has taken for its field the world. It may ask, with Æneas, "What region on earth is not full of our toils?" It may say: Finns and Hottentots have knelt with us. The Kaffir and the North American Indian are enrolled with us. Our uniforms are worn by Frenchmen and by Argentines. Our ranks are recruited from Canada and Australia, from China and India. After the immense hindrances overcome, and with the momentum and sympathy gained, what may we not hope to do?



COMMANDER BALLINGTON BOOTH AT HIS DESK

The missionary revival at the close of the last century, noble as its fruits have been, has nevertheless taken heart-hold of but a small minority of the Church. In view of the appalling wastes of heathenism, and the even more terrible brutishness inveterate in Christendom, thoughtful men have felt that only a new breed of Christians could succeed in converting the world—that is, in renovating the character of the masses of mankind. Such men, one might antecedently think, would have to stand clear of the existing divisions and controversies of Christendom in the original simplicity of Christ, on the Pauline line of becoming all things to all men, and winning all by the eloquence of love and self-sacrifice in purity of life and greatness of service. The Salvation Army seems to meet these conditions, besides having the immense practical advantage of thorough subordination to centralized control. Its Gospel is Christ's simple evangel to the lost. Its conviction of the Holy Spirit's presence and power is absolute. Its faith in Christ as the Captain of salvation is unqualified and unquestioning. Its self-forgetfulness is heroic. Its consecration is all-devoting. Its loyalty to its General is filial. Under such conditions its fitness for apostleship to the evangelized is indubitable.

MRS. BALLINGTON BOOTH

The prejudices against its peculiarities, which still inspire some with coldness or aversion, are those which the members of the Army itself, even its General, once had, but have been disciplined out of by the exigencies of their work. But the Salvationist himself, however criticised by his fellow-Christians, is strictly forbidden, even were he inclined, to criticise in turn. Hearing what others say, he is content to let them see what he does. In view of what he does, the critic often comes to himself in the words of Professor J. S. Blackie:

> "Salvation Army!" Well, they mean to save,
> And in their own rough way they do, no doubt;
> And I would liefer fling wild words about
> With them than slip through life a smooth-lipped slave
> Of reputable forms. Far better with too much
> Of zeal to swell, and hot aggressive love,
> Than sit in cleanly state, and fear to touch
> The clouted sinner, lest you soil your glove.

The Salvation Army soldier is much the same sort of person the world over—a cosmopolitan Christian. His versatility of adaptation is remarkable. In a university town, as at Upsala in Sweden, he—or in that instance she—can call out the students by a poster in classical Latin, "Cives Academici!" In India he and she live and dress as the poorer natives do, except that the dress is of the yellow color held sacred there. Wherever they take hold of things, their line is the same, "from the least to the greatest," beginning at the bottom and working up. Their subsistence is frugal: $6 weekly for a Captain, and $5 for a Lieutenant, out of which they pay rent and buy food. The 3,700 officers in work as foreign missionaries do not draw from the general treasury more than an average of $25 yearly, so largely is their work self-supporting. Their General has always served without salary. Gifts for the work they receive and turn in; gifts for themselves they will not; it is forbidden. Silver and gold they have none, even for watch-chains; they abjure them. But in their self-denial week, by stinting their frugal rations, they save in the aggregate many thousand dollars to spend upon their work. They love to do it; they are a cheerful though serious folk; they allow no black mourning; the joy of the Lord is their strength. They live not by bread alone, but by the word of God. Constant Bible-reading, the same portions daily in whatever part of the world, imparts to their utterance a vigor and purity at which college-bred men sometimes wonder. In their prayers, as in their toils, they strive together, all over the world at half-past twelve o'clock joining in supplication, especially for all in persecution, poverty, or peril.

But mere love, however fervid, must be schooled. "God hath given us," said St. Paul, "a spirit of power and love and discipline." The early Methodists saw this; hence their name. To discipline Napoleon and Wellington owed victory—a discipline not neglectful of shoe-strings. The achievements of the Army are conspicuous; its not less wonderful organization and discipline must be studied in the manuals prepared by General Booth. The "Orders and Regulations for Soldiers" is a pamphlet of sixty-three pages; that for Field-Officers, a volume of seven hundred and eleven—the text-book next to the Bible in their forty Training Homes. Consummate genius is manifest in these Order books, dealing first and thoroughly with things of the spirit and character, then with all conceivable matters of outward life—not only

COMMANDER BALLINGTON BOOTH

Army work, but conduct in all sorts of situations, with minute cautions and directions about personal appearance, diet, clothing, exercise, hours of sleep, etc. All this, of course, has been gradually elaborated through experience. So thoroughly organized is the Army that in twelve hours its General's order is heard by its million soldiers from Hindustan to Manitoba. In this organization the children are included, and have their little book of "Orders and Regulations for the Junior Soldiers' War," with 304,974 attending their meetings during the last year. To nourish this organization a copious literature serves, not only in periodical issues, but in a library of one hundred and twenty-six volumes, mostly written by General and Mrs. Booth. As one contemplates all this, one of the Army mottoes recurs: "You can only keep company with God by running at full speed."

COMMISSIONER BOOTH-TUCKER IN INDIAN COSTUME

Space forbids to speak of equally noteworthy facts—the Labor Colonies for the outplanting of London slum-dwellers in the country; the Homes of Hope open here for girls rescued from the white-slave market; the Prison Gate Brigade to save discharged convicts; the industrial work for the relief of the unemployed and the manufacture of Army supplies; the honesty and exactness in money matters, in which the Army management has been demonstrated equal to that of any bank. Read Mrs. Ballington Booth's inspiring book of Army sketches, "Beneath Two Flags." For the Army we owe England much. But it is not, as some object, governed from England. Of its officers in this country five-eighths are our fellow-citizens. Here it is distinctively American, as well as Christian. As such it should be sustained by all who are concerned about our terrible social problems, which, in its root-and-branch method of changing characters as well as conditions, it is trying to solve. At the opening of Oklahoma the Army rode in on the train which carried eight thousand to plant the town of Enid. Thus is its chosen place ever in the forefront of the battle, and wherever the fighting is hardest. The main body must see to it that it is well followed up.

II.—Commander and Mrs. Ballington Booth and their Work

By a Member of Commander Booth's Staff

Commander Booth was born in the town of Brighouse, Yorkshire, England, on the 28th of July, 1857, and is the second son of General William Booth and his late wife, Catherine. His childhood and boyhood did not point favorably to a robust, active future. For many years Ballington was looked upon as the delicate member of the family; tall, thin, intensely high-strung, it was evident that he had outgrown his strength. But he began the work which he has carried out so characteristically, consistently, and successfully throughout his life in his early boyhood. He began conducting little meetings on the playground, and was often struck and knocked down by schoolmates who took issue with him. His first serious work was undertaken in Manchester, England, when he had attained the rank of Captain in the Salvation Army. During his work there he was arrested and imprisoned, so violent was the opposition to the methods of the Army at that time. He was treated as a common felon, given prison clothes and prison diet. This, however, far from quelling his enthusiasm and stopping the work, only acted as a further incentive to Captain Booth and his brave assistants, and brought thousands to hear him who would otherwise have ignored his appeals.

Captain Booth became Major Booth, then Colonel Booth, father of the first Training Home in 1880. This was the Old Devonshire House Training Home so dear to the memory of men who are now Commissioners and Colonels and Brigadiers and Majors, and was the first step toward the Training Home system for the Army. His next work was in Australia, for which country he sailed in 1884. Nearly two years of faithful, untiring toil left their deep mark upon the Australian Colonies. On the 16th of September, 1886, General Booth, just previous to sailing to the United States, united the lives of America's future Commanders, Ballington and Maud Booth. In April of the following year the steamship Servia brought the Commander and his wife to this country. His enthusiasm, hope, and faith in the American field is unbounded. After the darkest trials and most discouraging obstacles the Army finally won recognition.

Commander Booth stands about six feet three inches, is of striking appearance, and has keen eyes. His reputation as a ready and powerful speaker has traveled throughout the country. He is also a musician, playing a number of instruments. He has a full baritone voice, and many of the most popular songs in the organization are of his composition, both words and music. To see him personally conducting a great meeting of the Salvation Army, directing the music, introducing the speakers, appealing to the audience, interjecting apt and epigrammatic comments or illustrations during the exercises, and making his own speech, is something worth seeing and hearing, as the great audiences who have crowded Carnegie Hall on two recent occasions will testify. He is a tireless worker, and possesses marvelous vitality. The work of the Salvation Army in the United States is focused in his office. But his work is not confined to his office, for he travels thousands of miles on Army business.

Mrs. Ballington Booth is the daughter of the Rev. Samuel Charlesworth, a rector of the Church of England. This youngest of his three children was born at Lympsfield, near London. Three years after her birth, Mr. Charlesworth was given charge of a large and important parish in the East End of London. It is rather a singular coincidence that the "penny gaff" which the Rev. William Booth had captured for his mission was just opposite the church in which Mr. Charlesworth preached; and still more singular that when the police drove Mr. Booth from the streets, the Rectory gates were thrown open, and upon those grounds were held many successful open-air meetings.

Her mother, too, was one who made the people's interests her own, and in their parish no one was so reverenced and loved for kindly deeds and cheering words as the rector's wife. It was her indefatigable toil and self-sacrifice for others that shortened her life by many years, and brought to Maud Charlesworth a loss that was irreparable. Mrs. Charlesworth had frequently taken her little girls across to Mr. Booth's mission, and it was no surprise or disappointment to her when her youngest daughter consecrated herself to God in one of these meetings.

Shortly after her mother's death, at the age of seventeen, Maud Charlesworth, accompanied by her father, crossed to France to begin an active warfare by the side of Catherine Booth, the General's eldest daughter, amid the darkness and infidelity of Paris. Two years in a warfare which still counts as the most difficult and bitter in Salvation Army history made of the timid girl a tried veteran. Returning to England at the end of two years, Miss Charlesworth spent some time visiting all the large cities, on the Army's behalf, in England, Scotland, and Ireland. Later she also visited Norway, Sweden, and other parts of Europe where the Army was carrying on operations.

Mrs. Ballington Booth has always been a co-worker with her husband, and has been as active in service. Her constant travels and many important meetings are well known, and there is not a woman in America who is more widely listened to or whose opinions carry more weight from the public platform. Few people are able to interest both extremes of society and to deal wisely with both. But Mrs. Booth's influence has been felt alike in the drawing-room and in the slum, and she is thoroughly at home whether surrounded by an audience in a Bowery saloon or in the rich parlors of an up-town residence.

Mrs. Booth has also been known as a writer, one who has, notwithstanding her crowded and busy life, contributed largely, not only to Salvation Army publications, but to the public press and magazines of this country. Her book "Beneath Two Flags" has been widely read, as also two very popular booklets written a few years ago—"Wanted, Antiseptic Christians" and "The Cause of Septic Soul-Treatment."

Mrs. Booth has two children, a boy and a girl—both bright, intelligent, well-cared-for children.

Recently her father, the Rev. Samuel Charlesworth, visited this country and remained in the home of Commander and Mrs. Booth. He expressed his delight and appreciation of the good and noble work Mrs. Booth was doing.

One word more is due Mrs. Booth, and that regarding the warm feeling entertained by all classes for her. She is one of the best-loved women in the United States. It is certainly true that she and her husband have a future of large prospect and opportunity wherever their work may carry them.

COLONEL AND MRS. WRIGHT, OF THE ARMY IN JAPAN

When the Commander and Mrs. Booth arrived in New York, in April, 1886, they found the Salvation Army recovering from what was one of the severest blows it has ever received, in the form of a breach of trust on the part of persons in whom confidence had been misplaced. True, they were the second leaders after this event, but although much had been done and suffered by those who immediately preceded them, they found that there was plenty of both toil and trial for them.

The number of corps has been multiplied by three, and there has been a corresponding increase in the figures for officers. The Army had then no training garrisons, no slum work, no rescue work, and no shelter depots; nor had any such valuable adjuncts as Charioteers or Outriders been thought of. Indeed, the representatives of the Salvation Army on the Pacific coast in those days found their hands quite full in holding all the meetings required by regulation so as to get a quiet hearing, and without personal assaults becoming too violent; which remark applies more especially to the open-air exercises.

In those days, also, the municipal authorities knew little good of the Salvation Army, and in many instances they had heard much that was calculated to produce a bad impression upon the minds of those responsible for peace and good order. The prospect of the labors of the officers of the force being increased by clearing streets blocked by open-air meetings, and the arrest of drunken hoodlums irritated by "flat" drums and discordant cornets, was not enchanting, and the fact that most of the Army halls were supposed to be in "low" and poor neighborhoods did not suggest pleasant company or extensive "tips" for the officers who would spend their evenings in these places.

Nor were the modes of the Army specially attractive to the members of the churches, and others who wished to hasten the coming on earth of the kingdom of God. Just where the "religion" lay in marching up a slushy road jingling a tambourine and singing

Bright crowns! Bright crowns!
Bright crowns laid up on high!
For you-u-u! and me-e-e!
There's a crown of victory-y—
There's a crown of victory!

was not immediately apparent to persons whose ideas of church services ran chiefly in the direction of worship and adoration of God. And then, too, the idea of holding meetings in places that had been only a few weeks before used as stores, or saloons, or dance-halls, or even worse, could not but offend the tastes of those who had always associated religious meetings with "sacred edifices." Then, again, the idea of sending young men and young women out into the world as religious teachers who had never been to college, and who only a year or two before had been mechanics, school-teachers, or "helps"! What could these people really know about theology and the Bible, and the deep things of God? Surely, if there were no "money in it," and these folks were sincere, they must be presumptuous.

And the noise! Some of these people prayed as if they feared the Lord was deaf. And as for the singing—why, they never seemed satisfied unless the congregation was positively roaring out the choruses of the songs! And the tunes! The less said about them the better. The words were all right, of course. "The Suwanee River," "Three Cheers for the Red, White, and Blue," "Dixie's Land," and the tunes of the popular street songs of the hour were good enough in their places, but it seemed positively irreverent to sing "sacred" words to such airs. And so on.

No, there really was nothing much about the Salvation Army at that time to attract the average church-goer.

And then, too, other thing were against the Army. It was looked upon as English—it had a military government—it took collections at every meeting—it wore red shirts—it sent its women into saloons with "War-Crys"—it gave no entertainments—it condemned tobacco as well as whisky—it forbade theater-going, card-playing, and dancing; and insisted on the real denial of self and sacrifice of personal interests in a way that was as novel to the average American citizen as it was repugnant to him.

There are now six thousand members of the Auxiliary League—an association of persons outside the ranks of the Army, who subscribe five dollars a year to its funds. These friends comprise, not only members, but prominent ministers in all the leading evangelical denominations, while Roman Catholics, Jews, and skeptics are not unrepresented.

In all the largest cities of the Union now occupied by us the Army stands well with the churches and the religious people. And this not because the Army has changed—for it has not—but because its leaders have been able to obtain the ear of the ministers, and the poor people, and to explain to them the why and the wherefore for what seemed grotesque, bizarre, and unnecessary.

We would not for a moment have it thought that the Salvation Army had become too "respectable;" it has won its present standing and the approval of the American public not by deserting its mission to the outcast, not in any instance by toning down its measures or making easy its truths, but by the fact that it has demonstrated itself a success. The Commander and Mrs. Booth have insisted, in all their dealings with their soldiers and officers, that rather than become more "respectable" the Army shall become more disreputable, that it may more thoroughly reach the class for whom it lives—the lost, the outcast, the black sheep of society.

Perhaps in no country in the world is the Army more strong in its lively military and unique practices than in this land, and more than ever are its officers and soldiers determining that they will make no compromise, but go down into the deepest depths, in which their help and comfort are so needed. The Commander and Mrs. Booth, it is true, have spoken in the drawing-rooms of the wealthy and in the churches of the rich, but they have done so only to explain their work and pave the way for their dear people; they have themselves led the midnight meetings on the streets, they have themselves worked in connection with the slum officers, and their dealings with the respectable and wealthy have been only for the Army's sake. They have lived among their own people, they have lived upon the level of their own officers and soldiers, and have distinctly shown in dress and actions as well as word that they wished the world always to regard them as humble and devoted followers of Christ Jesus beneath the flag.

III.—General William Booth

By Commissioner George S. Railton, of the London Headquarters

GENERAL BOOTH IN 1862

After having known General Booth in the most intimate manner for twenty-three years, during nine of which I lived in his house, and during all of which I lived in the utmost imaginable fellowship with him, it is not only an easy but really a delightful task to describe him. His character and work I shall not pretend to estimate worthily, for both appear to me far beyond the possibility of a just estimate till, say, a century or two has rolled away.

Never can I forget our first interview. I had offered myself to him, and he had insisted upon my coming to London, so that he might see me, and that I might see the Christian Mission which he had founded. Somehow or other, I had imagined I should find a venerable, solemn personage. What was my astonishment to discover a middle-aged man, full of vigor, who scarcely ever kept still two minutes while he talked, who stood up, hand in pocket, just as frequently as he sat down during any conversation, and who was every inch a man of business!

Such was the reverend founder of a mission to the heathen of London, which had then only a dozen meeting-places, most of them small and by no means prepossessing in their appearance, their street doors and windows being generally well spattered with dirt and vegetable refuse. Yet when I heard him speak to the people I saw that he was, on the platform, every inch the true minister of religion. In those days, let it be remembered, the Christian Mission stood almost alone in England, at least in the use of the platform for religious speakers. Elsewhere the use of pulpit, to which I had myself been accustomed, was all but invariable. The Rev. William Booth, however, had already descended entirely from the pulpit, and there was nothing about his style of preaching that would have fitted those elevated boxes. Yet, all the more because he came so near to the people, and moved about as freely as in his own house while he talked to them, I felt that he was truly their minister. His care for and knowledge of them, his determination to make them not only hear and understand but agree with and follow him, was manifest in every word, look, and gesture. Everything about him, on or off the platform, indicates the simple purpose of a man who, having got a great object in view, is determined to attain it if he can.

And then I saw, at a glance, his close relationship to all his people. They all evidently stood as much in awe of him as if he were a huge locomotive; and yet the very grimiest, in his working clothes, could stand beside him without feeling any more stiffness or awkwardness than if he were just a fellow-workman. A great leader, to whom no one could dare to say a disrespectful or idle word, he was yet so intimately acquainted with the family and business affairs of all who marched regularly under his command that with a word as he passed them in a doorway he could say more to their hearts than a stranger could have put into a long interview.

Of course the growth of the Mission into the Salvation Army soon made it impossible for him to have anything like so precise an acquaintance even with officers as he had with all his people in those days of small things. But nothing gladdens us all more than the fact that no amount of renown or earthly greatness has in the slightest altered our "father and general" in that continual exhibition of brotherly love which makes him such a favorite with every poor man who comes into close contact with him. He really cares for everybody, and that is the chief reason why he has come to be so widely and fully obeyed.

There could not be a more absurd misconception than that which paints General Booth as a man who has imposed his will upon others. His energy and power of will are, of course, very extraordinary; but his modesty and hesitation with regard to the correctness of his own views, and his eagerness to learn from anybody, were to me always quite as striking. In the early days of the Mission's growth into the Army, when we lived together almost day and night, there was nothing about him that I so disliked as his everlasting unwillingness to insist upon the carrying out of his own view of what ought to be done by the little people, with their "buts" and head-shakings, whose duty it was to follow him. "Wait, and let us see," he would always say, and it was only when practical lessons had forced the dullest to see that his way was the best one that he would make that way the regulation path for the future. It was his patience, his willingness to hear all that everybody had to say, his constant consideration for the weaknesses and ignorances of others, even more than his desperate courage or zeal for the right, that gained for him the hearty obedience of many thousand.

In private as well as in public the General always dealt very largely in similitudes, and one that he used perhaps more frequently than any other in home consultations with Mrs. Booth, his eldest son, now the Chief of Staff, and myself, was deserving of universal attention. "Look," he would say, "at the peep-show man, who goes to captivate the thousands at the fair. If his show were provided with only one row of spy-holes, placed, say, five feet from the ground, he could exhibit only to the six-footer. But he has enough rows of glasses to suit the height of all possible comers, from the little child to the big man, and thus he manages to get all to see what he has to show them." How often he would extinguish all our pleas for insistence upon some course, or for the use of some phrase in print that he thought all would not at once properly understand, by the remark: "It's your one row of holes again!"

I never had the pleasure of seeing the General in really good health. It was, even in our smallest and easiest days, an extremely rare thing for him to get a good night's sleep, and his appetite was generally so poor and his digestive power so bad that it used to be a constant trouble to Mrs. Booth to so provide for him as to induce him to eat without incurring the after reproach of having made his work or his sleep more difficult. How often in after times have

I heard him complain of the "great spread" which the loving care of officers and friends would set before him on his travels—the "great spread" simply being an ordinary square meal! "Oh, if you would only let me have a cup of tea and a bit of dry toast, how grateful I should be to you!" he would remark. Since great ocean voyages have become part of his usual yearly programme he has set up the custom of a little private tea of this sort, instead of the huge, prolonged dinner included in his passage-money.

Not that there was ever any leaning towards asceticism on his part. Instead of wishing to get people to fast, he was always on the stretch for some means of getting the poor better fed. Tea-meetings were one of the most useful and honored institutions of the Mission from the first, and the General was always glad when he could give Mrs. Booth the cheering assurance that he had eaten a hearty meal anywhere. But he regards eating and drinking as bothersome necessities, to be submitted to for the sake of maintaining the body in health and vigor, rather than to be needlessly indulged in, lingered over, or talked about.

GENERAL WILLIAM BOOTH

For work is the great guiding star, one might almost say, of the General's life. He does nowadays at sixty-six a very great deal more than in the first years of our acquaintance, but it is not because he was then less entirely absorbed in his great task, but because the ever-multiplying appliances of civilization, and still more the growth and improved efficiency of the Army, enable him to get through more in a day than we could then hope to accomplish in a month. From the very first day I knew him he has just lived entirely to carry on his one business—the salvation of the world.

Of his character as husband and father I will say little. Surely the many of us who have felt how much he can love those who have no personal claim upon him, and even the multitude who have only seen all this as exhibited in his life, can form some sort of estimate of the intensity and depth of his affection for "his own." How much the General endured during the terrible years of Mrs. Booth's last illness, or how much to this day the great blank of her absence haunts his grandest as well as his loneliest hours, God only can ever know. But the triumph of a father who has eight grown-up sons and daughters spending their whole life in carrying out his plans in various parts of the world is too great for one to attempt in one article to describe it, and that triumph is perhaps the fullest description that could be given of the General's private life.

Of his religion, for the same reason, I have little need to write. Is it not written in living battalions across the world? But I will just say that I think we have in the General's private life a picture of the religion of Christ as it really should be lived nowadays. I have never known him to have time to spare for the prolonged prayers and meditations which we read of in the lives of saints of other days. Much less has he had leisure for those profound religious speculations which have, as we think, disgraced the present generation. Believing the Bible as simply as on the day of his conversion, half a century ago, and accustomed always to look upon God as a friend ever at hand to hear and help, the General has been, I think, a man of prayer in the best possible understanding of the word, a man to whom it is just as natural to speak to God in the street or the railway carriage as in a cathedral or a bedroom. And he has convinced others of the truths he proclaims, not by means of highly elaborated argument or much-studied discourse, but by forcing them to treat with God as naturally, personally, and fully as he has himself done.

To hear him denounce the sin and unbelief of his hearers, whether they be a crowd of workmen gathered round a railway truck, or an assemblage of the élite of a great city in one of its finest edifices, finishing with a call for instant decision in favor of Christ, is to understand at once why he has been so successful and why he is in many circles so much disliked.

If he has held aloof mostly from all sorts of reformatory and civilizing movements, it is not that he lacks interest in them, or appreciation of every honest effort to improve the condition of the people, but that he has little hope from anything that does not lead up, and that very quickly, to the transformation of the individual heart and life.

Naturally, the General has been misrepresented and abused as few men ever have been. This could not but be the case with any man who attacks unsparingly the forces of evil. To carry on a great work, large sums of money must needs be gathered, and the General has suceeeded in this as well as in any other branch of his efforts, notwithstanding all the attempts that have been made from time to time to arouse suspicion of his motives, his integrity, or his economy. Intensely sensitive as he naturally is, he felt abuse and slander, especially when they came from the religious press, very acutely for some years, and all the more as they tended always to lessen the Army's opportunities to do good.

His restlessness has perhaps done more in the past and promises more for the future than any other characteristic of his life. Far from any inclination to settle down or cling to long-cherished habits of thought or action, he is never to be found, after any triumph, however great, in a state of contentment, but always full of regret as to the little accomplished, the slowness of our progress, and the blunders of the past.

The Higher Life of Chicago[1]

By Melville E. Stone

REV. D. L. MOODY

It is doubtless the first impulse of the average reader to put in concrete form his opinion of the "higher life of Chicago" in Betsy Prig's words respecting Mrs. Harris. Certainly if he has been moved at all by the observations of Editor Stead or Dean Hole or any of the thousand and one other candid friends who have given a waiting world the benefit of their impressions of this wicked city, such will be his view. For it has become quite the proper thing to deride Chicago. Follow almost any current criticism and you will be told that it is the abode of the braggart and the parvenu, where every rich man is a nouveau riche, long on cash and short on good taste, where every temple is filled with money-changers, and where no altar is ever raised but for the worship of mammon. You will be warned that in every way it is a most unwholesome and unholy place.

Yet, if you make the city your home, it will surprise you to find among your neighbors a civic pride and loyalty the like of which does not exist elsewhere. As was once said of Venice, while other towns have admirers, this alone inspires affection. You must regret, as many others do, that the marvelous growth of the city, its singular natural advantages for commercial prosperity, and the consequent accumulation of vast fortunes with astonishing rapidity, have led to an undue quickening of the business instinct and an excess of zeal for money-getting. You may feel that the average citizen's perspective of life would be more accurate if he would somewhat foreshorten the shop and the factory. You will doubtless wish that something else than the Commercial Club were the goal of a man's social ambition. You are likely to long for more devotion to art and music and letters and godliness.

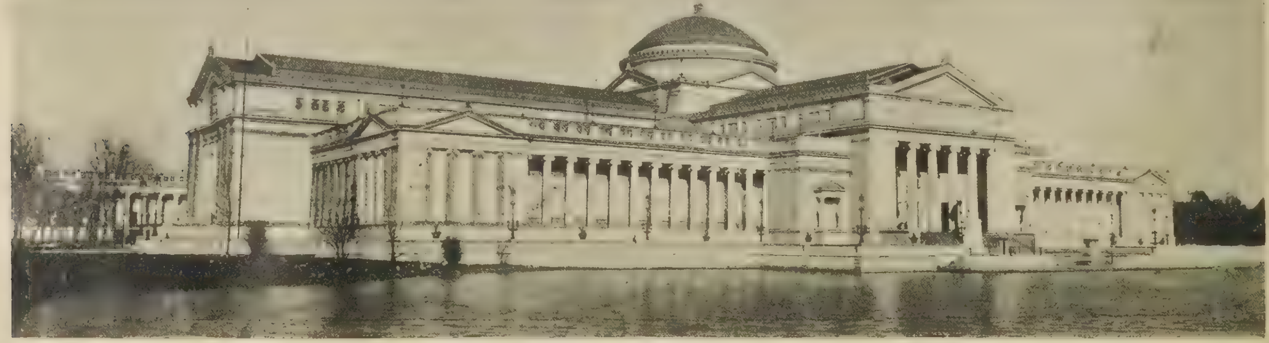
THE ART INSTITUTE

All of these facts will impress you. But they will not lead you to say that this is the veriest Sodom of all the earth, nor even to think it. If you have traveled far, you will agree that Chicago differs very little in point of culture or morals from the other great cities—differing rather in modes of vice than in degree. More guilty of tax-dodging, and bribery, and franchise-grabbing, and public jobbery, and all of those forms of misdoing that spring from lusting after wealth, if you please, but certainly far less chargeable with those offenses which attach to idle and luxurious living. Such, it seems to me, is likely to be the analysis of a thoughtful and dispassionate student.

The columns of The Outlook do not afford space for a fair survey of the good works in which Chicago has been zealous. Beneath all the surging waves of profligate energy, beneath all of the apparent indifference to any form of vice which does not interfere with business, there is now and has ever been a deep and wide undercurrent of artistic sense and religious feeling. This has found expression in many ways. The most notable among the earlier apostles of righteousness was Mr. D. L. Moody. His influence upon the life of the city was great and lasting. For a dozen years preceding the great fire he devoted himself unceasingly to mission work in Chicago. He was closely identified with the Young Men's Christian Association, and to his efforts are due, in large measure, the efficiency of that institution. It now numbers among its members a large body of conspicuous merchants, and occupies as a home and workshop one of the finest of the great office buildings of the city. The structure is thirteen stories high, faced with white marble, cost over a million dollars, and is admirably provided with the requisites for practical Christian effort. There are large halls for evening classes in language, stenography, telegraphy, bookkeeping, and kindred studies, gymnasiums, laboratories, reading-rooms, baths, and chapels. The Young Women's Christian Association, with a new eight-story palace overlooking Lake Michigan, and the Athenæum, a people's college, paying less heed to ethical culture, represent much the same idea. These and similar societies are gathering in the young men and women who come as strangers to the metropolis, saving them from the saloon, the gambling-hell, and the brothel, finding honorable employment for them, furnishing them with temporary homes, and giving them free or inexpensive tuition. At each of the railway stations, continuously on duty, are volunteer agents, badged and uniformed, to direct the unwary to these places of refuge.

PRESIDENT W. R. HARPER

Towering up among the "sky-scrapers" which have attracted so much attention in Chicago is another stately pile, the Temple of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. It has few if any equals among the commercial buildings of the world. In architecture it is a striking departure



THE FIELD COLUMBIAN MUSEUM

---

[1] Previous articles in this series have been: "The Higher Life of American Cities" (introductory), by Mr. Theodore Roosevelt (The Outlook for December 21, 1895), and "The Higher Life of New York City," by Albert Shaw (The Outlook for January 25, 1896). Other articles will be on "The Higher Life of Boston," by the Rev. Edward Everett Hale, D.D.; on New Orleans, by Miss Grace King; on Philadelphia, by Mr. Talcott Williams; on St. Louis, by the Rev. John Snyder; and on Buffalo, by the Rev. William Burnet Wright, D.D.

THE LAKE SHORE MALL

from the conventional type. It is a good example of English Gothic, with shapely gables and broad expanse of red tile roof. The thirteen vast floors furnish accommodation for a great army of professional men, besides ample provision for the local and national headquarters of the society. Here are the offices from which Miss Frances E. Willard gives direction to the great reform of which she is the acknowledged high priestess. Here are the publication rooms from which issue vast quantities of tracts and other printed matter on behalf of the propaganda.

JOHN V. CHENEY
Librarian Newberry Library

These four institutions are always in evidence. They have world-wide fame. It may well be doubted, however, whether the fruits of their local service count for more than those of some less pretentious establishments. Scattered over the city are unnumbered oases in the desert of ignorance, poverty, and vice. The polyglot population is divided into colonies. Every nation of the earth is represented. And each nationality has its own charities, its own hospitals, its own libraries, its own culture clubs, all working in the same direction. The agencies are thus multiplied indefinitely. They would doubtless prove more efficient if there were more co-operation among them, if one could know better the methods of the other, if each could profit by the other's experiences. But the conditions are such as to inspire great individual effort, and this, of course, has special value. The Armour charity comprises a fine group of buildings located in the heart of a depraved district of the South Side. It includes a large apartment-house, a manual-training school, kindergarten, dispensary, and Sunday-school. It is handsomely endowed by a wealthy packer, who has wisely turned the control over to the Rev. Dr. Gunsaulus, the energetic young pastor of Plymouth Congregational Church. The attendance is large and steadily increasing. Fees and rentals are adjusted to meet the necessities of the case. There are two hundred apartments which yield a fair income, and the proceeds are applied to the maintenance of the mission. It is Mr. Armour's wise purpose to make the Institute self-supporting. In doing so he has adopted a policy which, happily, characterizes very generally the Chicago charities. As a rule, the founders aim to put them beyond the need of appealing to the general public. The Chicago Manual-Training School, the Newsboys' Home, and the Home for Incurables are all so endowed.

The social settlement idea has taken a strong hold on the city. Hull House, the oldest and best-known of these agencies, was opened six years ago. A fine old residence stood alone in the heart of a congested ward. All the better world had moved away, and Italians, Bohemians, and Russian Jews had come in to supply the place. Two young women saw the opportunity. They rented this abandoned mansion and opened in a modest way a second Toynbee Hall. They sought to adapt themselves to the work at hand. At first the untamed youngsters of the neighborhood broke their windows and despoiled their grounds. The priests and rabbis looked askance and prepared to guard against proselytes. The young women were patient and tactful, however, and slowly but surely they won their way. It was neither a University Settlement nor a religious mission. The object, as stated in the charter, was "to provide a center for a higher civic and social life, to initiate and maintain educational and philanthropic enterprises, and to investigate and improve the conditions in the industrial districts." Miss Jane Addams, the leader in the movement, has very clear ideas upon the subject. "It is an effort," she says, "to add the social function to democracy." Not that there is any objection to the use of the settlement idea in either the purely scholastic or strictly religious work. Far from it. Rather, the local conditions must finally govern the nature and direction of the effort. The good and the bad, the ignorant and the cultured, are brought together. When this is done, the leadership of the Hull House management is very gentle, beautifully subtle, and never offensive. There is boundless play of the sympathies. There is a careful avoidance of the didactic. Self-governing clubs are formed, admission to which can be gained only by ballot. One of them includes forty factory-girls, who rent an outlying tenement from Hull House, board themselves at a nominal rate, take their meals at the coffee-house, and attend nightly classes in the lecture-room. There is a men's club of a similar character. Then there is the men's social club, which has a billiard-room; members may do about as they please, although drinking and gambling are forbidden. The Jolly Boys' Club for reading, the Gymnasium Club, the Woman's Club for the study of household economics, the German Woman's Social Club, the Italian Fencing Club, the Debating Club, the Mandolin Club, and twenty others, all have their places in the institution. The Kindergarten and Day Nursery occupy an independent building. Other departments are the free dispensary, the visiting nurses, factory inspection, street and alley inspection, food inspection, art studio, penny savings-bank, circulating library, labor bureau, music school, and relief bureau. It is a busy place. There are eighteen or twenty "residents," a large corps of working visitors, and an average attendance of persons from the vicinage of about 2,500 per week.

REV. F. W. GUNSAULUS, D.D.

THE NEWBERRY LIBRARY

Miss Addams is the official street inspector for the ward, and Mrs. Kelley, one of the residents, is a State inspector of factories. It follows that Hull House must take a deep interest in civic affairs. At this moment it is arranging for the spring campaign, with large hope that it may compass the defeat of certain corrupt aldermen who now hold seats in the City Council as representatives of its neighborhood.

While the work of Hull House thus divides itself, as Miss Addams says, "according to the receptivity of the neighbors, into social, educational, humanitarian, and civic" effort, The Commons, a settlement of the Chicago Theological Seminary, located in the Scandinavian colony, naturally takes on a more distinctly Christian character. The residents consist of two ministers, five women, and five theological students, two of whom are physicians. There are daily prayer-meetings, Bible classes, and song services. Certain of the residents regularly visit the county hospital, the jail, and the poorhouse for inspection and ministration. There are sixty classes for educational work, besides free lectures on hygiene and household sanitation, neighborhood clubs, and friendly visitations. The University of Chicago has a similar settlement in the stock-yards district, with five residents and nine neighborhood helpers, and the Northwestern University, the Methodist institution, maintains one in the Polish and Bohemian district. The Seventh-Day Adventists have a prosperous establishment devoted chiefly to medical mission effort, and recently two young Jews have opened a house in the Chicago Ghetto and seem to be doing excellent service. This work is rapidly extending. One by one the plague-spots are brought under the influence of these Christian gentlefolk, the heavy loads which so weigh upon the lives of the toiling multitude are lightened, and reciprocal benefits which spring from correct living and intelligent voting by the multitude are felt by the whole city. It is a hand-to-hand struggle with the ills which fret us who have in mind Mr. Herbert Spencer's axiom that "the type of society is determined by the natures of its units."

ARMOUR INSTITUTE

Going into the field of pure scholasticism, one cannot fail to be impressed with the astonishing advancement of this young city. Of course every one knows of the great Chicago University, which at a single bound has taken the very forefront among institutions of its kind. The story of its liberal endowment by Mr. John D. Rockefeller, and of the generous gifts which have poured in from every direction, is too well known to justify repetition. Million has followed million with bewildering rapidity. The President, Dr. Harper, has seemed a veritable magician. He accepted office in July, 1891, began the buildings in the succeeding November, and opened the doors a year later with nine hundred students. The enrollment for 1896 will reach eighteen hundred, while the income now exceeds $600,000 per annum. There are one hundred and sixty-four teachers (including a number of specialists of very high rank), besides another hundred in the University Extension department and a large corps connected with the administrative branches. There is a library of 300,000 volumes; an observatory with the largest telescope ever constructed; and a list of halls, museums, and laboratories which might well stand for the labor of a century. But besides this great enterprise, Chicago boasts another University of no mean proportions, the Northwestern. Indeed, in enrollment of students it stands third in the country. Its equipment includes an excellent astronomical observatory and a full complement of professional schools of a very high order. Its endowment, largely in Chicago business property, yields an annual income, even in hard times, of over a quarter of a million dollars.

CHICAGO PUBLIC LIBRARY

These great institutions, not to mention a dozen or more independent but well-sustained medical, divinity, and technical schools, combine to give Chicago a high place among educational centers.

The Public Library, supported by a city tax, contains over two hundred thousand volumes. It owes its origin to a handsome donation of books by the people of England after the great fire. This gift included offerings by Queen Victoria, the Oxford and Cambridge Universities, and the British Government. The library, thus founded, has been in a special sense an object of local pride. No other in America has enjoyed as large patronage from the general public. Last year 55,000 readers held drawing cards, and borrowed 2,500,000 books and periodicals. The reference-rooms are visited by over a million persons annually. For the convenience of those living at a distance, six branch reading-rooms and thirty-two free-delivery stations are maintained. A new building for the library will be completed next autumn. It will cover an area of 62,000 square feet, and will cost something over two million dollars.

THE W. C. T. U. BUILDING

The Newberry Library, a fine collection of books adapted to the uses of specialists, has an endowment of three million dollars, and contains 160,000 volumes. Two other large library funds, the Crerar and Lewis legacies, are awaiting investment.

The Art Institute, the Academy of Sciences, and the Field Columbian Museum are also noteworthy enterprises.

These are some of the things which make answer for a higher life in Chicago. And it is not so bad a showing, after all. So qualified a critic as Edmund Clarence Stedman wrote a few days since:

Y. M. C. A. BUILDING

> The Fair showed the country what Chicago really was and is Certainly there is no other American city where the richest classes appear so enthusiastic with respect to art and literature. "The practice of virtue makes men virtuous," and even if there was some pretense and affectation in the culture of ten years ago, it has resulted in as high standards of taste as can elsewhere be found. Moreover, if our own "four hundred" had even affected or made it the fashion to be interested in whatever makes real culture, the intellectual life of this metropolis would not now be so far apart from the "social swim."

LYMAN J. GAGE

MISS FRANCES E. WILLARD

HENRY WADE ROGERS
President Northwestern University

It is in its indifference to its civic duties that Chicago betrays the greatest weakness. There is nothing like an organized Tammany Hall, nor is the tenure of the dominant rascals by any means assured. But there is the unfortunate neglect of municipal affairs by good men, and the baneful tendency to divide on national party lines. Meanwhile the public enemies are united and always alert. It is only now and then, in some great emergency and under pressure of intense excitement, that all the right-minded people are aroused. Then comes an upheaval, and a short era of proper administration.

Concerning Sunday observation the situation is far from satisfactory. The enactments of the Illinois

HULL HOUSE—CHILDREN'S BUILDING

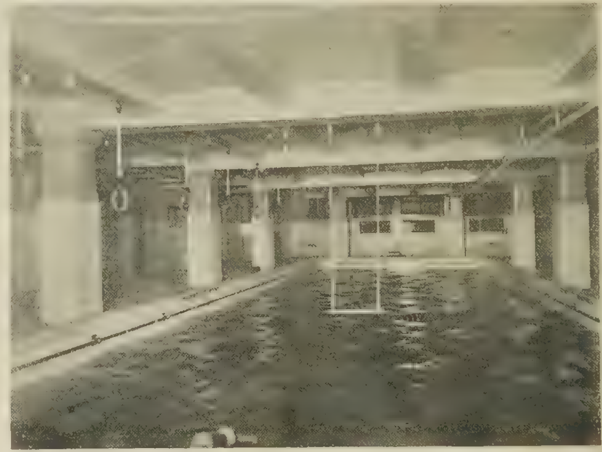
MISS JANE ADDAMS

Legislature are plain and subject to no dispute. They require the closing of every tippling-house on Sunday. This has been the law of the State for many years, and every Mayor of Chicago has taken an oath to enforce it. Yet it is a far day since any real or sincere effort was made in this direction. Republicans and Democrats alike have said that local public sentiment was against all sumptuary legislation, and by common consent of the active politicians Chicago has enjoyed all the delights of a "wide-open Sunday." To quiet the clamor of those who demanded better things, the Aldermen have passed ordinances providing for screens upon the saloon doors, and this was taken to be a compliance with the State law. But even this practice has fallen into desuetude.

Not the least among the deplorable features of this business has been the attitude of many Christian people. It is by no means an uncommon thing to hear persons of high repute say, "This Sunday law cannot be enforced. Don't try. Let us seek good government on other lines, and be content with half a loaf rather than no bread." It is needless to suggest that infinitely worse than a "wide-open Sunday," with all that it may imply, is the corrupting influence of this theory that a public officer, whose duties are purely ministerial, is to be permitted to enforce one law and ignore another. A people who tamely submit to government of this kind should not be surprised to find that it leads to all forms of abuse. Yet, unfortunately, this is the condition in Chicago to-day. The Mayor, who is, or was until recently, a Methodist Sunday-school teacher, makes no effort whatever to enforce this law for Sunday observance, and the city betrays no indignation at his neglect.

But there are signs of progress. At the instance of the journeymen barbers and the shop clerks, the Legislature at its last session passed stringent Sunday-closing laws, and an earnest effort for their enforcement is now making, and with fairly successful result. What those who have been striving for good government failed to accomplish bids fair of realization from the purely selfish labors of the overworked employees.

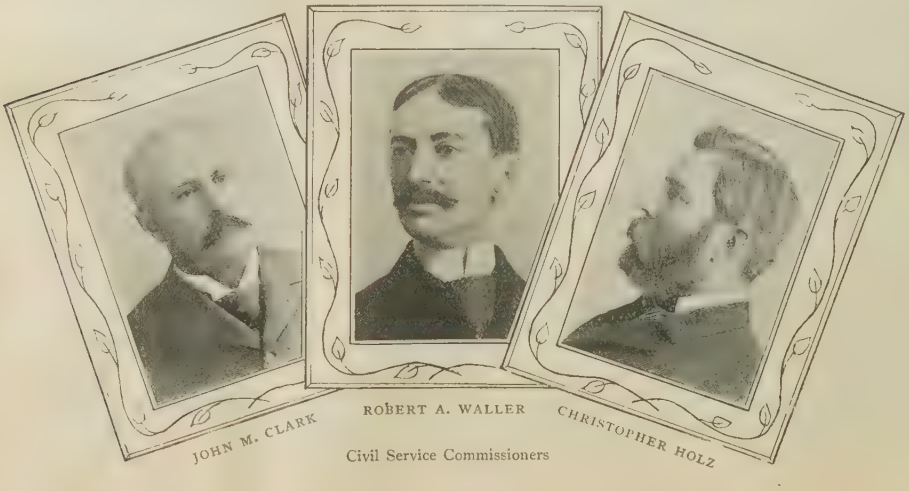
Chicago has gathered its full share of the ripe fruit of misgovernment. Swindling contractors, corrupt and corrupting franchise-grabbers, and "boodling" public officials have all found here a rich field for their operations. There has, however, always been a little upper room with a devoted band struggling against great odds. The Civil Service Reform League, with barely enough members to fill an attorney's office, labored diligently for a dozen years, and finally secured the passage of an ideal law, the enforcement of which has been placed in the hands of an honest, intelligent, and resolute commission. Under the operation of this act, which is far and away the best in the country, the rule of the spoilsman is fast disappearing, and, since this is believed to be the fundamental reform, an era of better things is hoped for.



THE NATATORIUM IN THE Y. M. C. A. BUILDING

The Citizens' Association has been, periodically, an important agency for good. Some years ago it took up the work of prosecuting corrupt officials, and succeeded in sending a dozen or more to the State prison.

The Civic Federation, which represents in a degree a temporary outburst of public spirit in anticipation of the World's Fair, has done much good work in the way of cleaning the streets and alleys, finding work and food for the unemployed, and punishing offenders against the election laws.



JOHN M. CLARK ROBERT A. WALLER CHRISTOPHER HOLZ

Civil Service Commissioners

The Christian Citizens' League has taken high ground, has endeavored to arouse godly men to a sense of their duty in public affairs, has accomplished much.

It has been possible to do no more than enumerate the phases of the higher life of Chicago. The influences for good are becoming more numerous every day, although, as suggested above, the effort so far has been too spasmodic, too inconstant, for speedy regeneration. It is, nevertheless, gratifying to know that now and again this busy, rushing, money-making, free-and-easy city does astonishing things. So it did when the Anarchists threatened to make it their sport. So it did when it adopted the present admirable election law. So it did also when it put the merit system into force. And so it may again.

HULL HOUSE—DINING-ROOM OF CRECHE

Melville E. Stone: A Sketch

Mr. Melville E. Stone, the author of "The Higher Life of Chicago," is an Illinoisan by birth and a lifelong resident of Chicago. His establishment, shortly after the great fire of 1871 (by which he suffered seriously), of the first one-cent daily newspaper of Chicago, the "Daily News," was an event full of importance to the city, compelling, as it did, after many years of struggle, the reduction of the price of every English daily in the city to that figure. In 1881 Mr. Stone added to his evening paper a morning edition, known now as the "Chicago Record." This paper, too, he brought to the point of success before selling the whole property to his partner, Victor F. Lawson. Retiring for a time from journalism, Mr. Stone gave his energies to banking, but the proverbial tendency of the journalist to return again to his calling overcame him, and he became manager of the Associated Press. As citizen and as journalist, Mr. Stone has been a considerable force for good government in Chicago. His newspapers were independent in politics, and their influence was always wisely and courageously directed. More than one threatening municipal abuse was corrected through their efforts, more than one rascal in public place brought by them to justice. It is probably fair, and in effect accurate, to say that scarcely one of the institutions which he notes as illustrative of Chicago's progress toward a broader intellectual and philanthropic life has been without substantial aid, in one way or another, from him. Political office he has never sought; such as he may have held, like the treasurership of the Sanitary District, for example, having been appointive wholly and dependent only remotely upon political influence. Since his retirement from journalism, nearly nine years ago, his voice has been only occasionally heard in public matters. As newspaper owner and publisher, however, he manifested what is perhaps a wholly unparalleled interest in purely local matters, burrowing with indomitable persistence into every department of municipal government, detecting corruption however shrewdly hid, and exposing culprits whatever their political or social standing. It may be of interest to note that he is eminently the architect of his own fortunes.

HULL HOUSE—OUTDOOR SPORTS

MELVILLE E. STONE

JOHN BURROUGHS SITS IN HIS OLD SEAT IN THE DISTRICT SCHOOL AND TALKS WITH THE CHILDREN

Recollections of My Boyhood

By John Burroughs

As Interviewed by Clifton Johnson[1]

ONE autumn day I left the Hudson River at Rondout and made a three hours' journey by a little branch railroad far back into the Catskills. At the little town of Roxbury I left the train and climbed a steep, mile-and-a-half hill, and that brought me to the boyhood home of John Burroughs, where I found John Burroughs himself sitting at the kitchen window. The region is one of great, mounding, mountain-like hills, with now and then a small village lost among them, and farms scattered sparingly along their slopes. The fields and patches of woodland checker their sides, and the drifting cloud-shadows add to the intricacy of the pattern. The hills turn blue in the distance, and look like great waves rolling in from a distant ocean.

The Burroughs farm-house is in a wide hilltop hollow with a fine panoramic view across the low valleys and hills eastward. In our walks about the place we visited the sugar-bush, the scene of many of Mr. Burroughs's youthful exploits with the family musket, we gathered nuts in a neighboring beech-wood, and we explored the brook where once he swam and fished. Most interesting of all, we followed the winding road he had trodden so often on his way to and from school, and we did not stop till we came to the little rusty-red school-house that looks just as it did forty-five years ago. It was recess time, and we went inside. The same old box desks were in use that had been there when Mr. Burroughs was a district school-boy. He found the same seat that long ago was his, and there among the other jackknife hewings were the initials he had cut—J. B.

The reminiscences I report below were the results of two conversations, given as nearly as possible in the speaker's own words. The first was an evening talk in the kitchen, where the farm family had gathered after the day's work was done and the supper dishes had been cleared off the long table. The second was a morning talk in the neat, rag-carpeted sitting-room, where a wood fire burned in the sheet-iron stove to temper the chill of the windy autumn day. Mr. Burroughs said:

"About the first thing I have any remembrance of is of being scared. The folks went off to Pennsylvania on a visit, and left us children to take care of things while they were gone. We got along well enough in the daytime, but, come night, it was different. I know that first night the older children were out quite late—I believe they'd gone down to the village. It got dark, and still they didn't come home, and we three or four younger ones sat huddled up in the kitchen and didn't dare go to bed. I don't know what scared the others, but I remember looking into the dark cavity of the bedroom—that was father's and mother's room, and the door was open—and every time I looked into its gloom and vacancy I was filled with dread and foreboding.

"We used to hear a good many spook stories. Grandfather was a great hand for spook stories. He'd been one of Washington's soldiers and had had a good deal of experience, and he believed in 'em just as thoroughly as we don't believe in 'em. He'd seen a great many spooks, and he'd sit down in the evening and tell these ghost stories by the hour. It would make our youthful hair stand on end as we listened to the tale of things he'd seen—those dreadful apparitions. He used to tell bear stories, war stories, and Indian stories, besides. But the spooks made the most vivid impression, and I didn't outgrow my fear of them till I got old enough to go to see the girls. Then suddenly my fears all left me. I'd been thinking I couldn't go to see the girls at all and stay out late, I was so afraid as soon as night came.

"From the age of ten to fourteen I couldn't even go down to the barn, just across the road, after dark, for fear some hobgoblin would get me.

---

[1] The illustrations (with the exception of those on pages 335 and 337) are from photographs taken by Mr. Johnson.

"The other barn, down in the next field, I was afraid to go to in the daytime. We kept cows there, and it was my task to go daily and turn them out and clean the stables. I would go in fear and trembling. I was particularly afraid in the stable, for there was a hole there that opened down into the vacant space under the barn. This cavity was always dark and mysterious, and I used to call the dog and send him under the barn to drive the spooks away, and then I'd work like a beaver to clean out the stables while the dog was under there. These fears all came from grandfather's stories of witches and things. He was very good at telling such stories. He was very superstitious, and he would give them a true air of mystery.

"This little burying-ground up the hill here at the turn of the road used to trouble me a good deal. I knew spooks liked to haunt just such places, and you couldn't have drawn me there with ox-chains after dark. I didn't think of spooks in broad daylight, but when dusk came and I had to pass the burying-ground I would walk lively and step lightly. I was too scared to run. I thought if I did run I'd have a whole pack of ghosts right on my heels. I suppose many have the same feeling. But, as I said, when I began to go to see the girls my fears left me and I could come home past the burying-ground in the little hours of the morning without a tremor.

THE LITTLE BURYING-GROUND

"I don't think I was naturally timid—it was only because my imagination had been stimulated and distorted by what I heard. People believed in apparitions thoroughly in that time. I wasn't scared by sounds in nature—not by anything I knew about. I was never afraid of thunder-storms. I rather liked the racket and was agreeably impressed by the elemental display. I heard owls hoot, but I didn't mind that, for I knew what they were. I did not mind the barking of the foxes, either. They would bark on the hills up back of the house. It was a wild, weird sort of sound, and I liked to hear it. But if I had to go through the woods in the dusk, then I was scared. I remember driving the oxen home in the evening along the edge of the woods down here, and how fearful I was. I didn't know what I feared—only the mysteriousness of the woods and the liability to see things made a deep impress on me then. The woods themselves were quiet enough. They always are. You know Thoreau says, 'A howling wilderness never howls. The howling is done chiefly by the imagination of the traveler.'

"No doubt most children have their fears, about the same as I did. I don't think my boy ever did, though. He was never told any ghost stories—only he believed in Santa Claus. I think I never had that belief myself—my folks didn't cultivate the Santa Claus myth. We would hang up our stockings in the chimney-corner, but we always knew where the things in 'em came from. Sometimes we'd find cakes mother had put in; other times it would be some ridiculous things the older children had put in—shavings, perhaps, or a raw potato.

"My boy believed in Santa Claus through and through. One day, a little before Christmas, he found a new sled out in the barn. He came to the house in the greatest state of excitement about that sled, and we explained to him that perhaps Santa Claus intended to give it to him, and, if he kept quiet, like enough he would get it on Christmas morning. Sure enough, on Christmas morning there he found the sled hitched to his bed. That made a great impression, and it was a cruel shock to the boy when he was told there was no Santa Claus. He felt a personal loss. I remember how he sighed and said, 'Well, if there ain't any Santa Claus there's an awful lot of lying in this world.'

"Speaking about being afraid, there was an old man, half crazy, used to wander about the country here that we children made a good deal of a bugbear of. He was perfectly harmless and innocent, but we were in mortal terror of him. Whenever we saw any one coming slow along the road the way he did, we'd say, 'Guess that's old John Corbin.' Then we scurried over the fence and hid. He was simply a little off, you know, and would go mumbling to himself along the road. He had an orchard down near the school-house, and he buried his apples there in the ground. Some of the bigger boys broke into his apple-hole and stole apples, and I can remember just how he caught them at it and chased them away and shook his stick.

"We used to have an apple-hole up back of the house—most people did. We would stow fifteen or twenty bushels of our best apples there. Toward spring we'd dig them out, and they had a delightful flavor that apples kept in the house didn't have. They seemed to be seasoned and concentrated. We'd reach down through the hole we'd cut through the frozen ground, and part away the straw that lay over them, and pick out such apples as we wanted. We'd get so expert we could tell the different kinds by the sense of touch. There was a difference in the shape and in the surface, and there was the winesap that I could tell by some peculiarity of the stem. There were all kinds in the apple-hole mixed together, and a good part of them went to school to eat with our dinners.

"When I was a little fellow I used to help mother a good deal. Mother used to spin wool. She had the wheel up in one of the chambers, and you'd hear the wheel go wz-z-z-z, and her footsteps going backward and forward. It was a pleasant enough sound, but it grew rather monotonous when you heard it all day. In the hog-pen chamber, back of the house, we had a loom where mother wove cloth and carded wool into rolls. Sometimes there'd be a great pile of those delicate rolls in the hog-pen chamber. I used to run the quill-wheel and fill the hollow elder-stalks with thread. I can't say I liked the work much—boys are not apt to be fond of work.

"I pulled flax some, and mother spun and wove it and made garments out of it for us to wear. That linen was stout, too. If you fell out of a tree and you caught on trousers or shirts made of that stuff, it would hold you—you'd hang there—it wouldn't tear. The things were pretty harsh wear when we first put them on at the beginning of warm weather. They were full of shives, and scratched like blazes. They were like the hair shirts the pious old fellows used to wear, and if you were doing penance for anything they were good things to have. But by August, with the wear and the rubbing the things got on the washboard, the shives would get broken up and we'd begin to have some comfort. At first the cloth was grayish in color, but in time the washing and the soap and the laying out on the grass to dry would fade it out whitish. We didn't have underclothing in summer, but in winter we had red flannel undershirts that would shrink in the wash and get thick as boards.

WHERE JOHN BURROUGHS WAS A SCHOLAR FORTY-FIVE YEARS AGO

"I used to help make cheese. I was very fond of eating the curd, till one day I ate so much of it I was sick—made a hog of myself, you know. I got thoroughly cloyed that time, and never could eat any curd since. But I like the pot-cheese they make out of lobbered milk.

"We would get up at five o'clock in the morning, about the same as they do here now. In winter it wouldn't be quite so early, but it would be early enough so we'd have breakfast by candlelight. Bedtime came pretty early. Eight o'clock was the time for the youngsters, but I know I used to get sleepy before that. Mother was apt to sit up latest. I suppose she'd often be up till ten or eleven sewing for us.

"We had a wide, open fireplace. The most I remember about it is lying on the broad hearthstone before the fire watching the crickets come up out of the cracks to sing. I would catch them and kill them. Mother said they ate holes in the stockings. They were never caught in the act that I know of, and I imagine that was just a household superstition without foundation. It's all vivid, too—mother frying meat with the long-handled frying-pan, and her sharpening the knife by rubbing it on the jambs. Up at one side of the fireplace was the great brick oven where she baked bread. Mother would say in the morning, 'Well, we're going to bake to-day, and I want some oven-wood.' Then we'd have to hunt the place over for dry wood—wood that would flash up quick and make a hot fire.

"Cider apple-sass was a great institution in those days. We used to cook a great lot of apples for 'sass' every fall, and we boiled down cider for flavoring them in a big kettle out in the yard.

"Tallow candles were our light. We used dipped candles. I remember seeing mother make them—dip, dip, dip, forty times or so, and after each dip she put the rods the candles were hung on across the backs of two chairs to let the tallow harden. Our candlesticks had hooks on 'em. The hook was made to fit over the back of a chair. Mother would hook her candle, or perhaps two of them, on the back of a chair to do her work by, and I'd sit in the chair and study arithmetic, or read 'Robinson Crusoe or 'The Life of Murphy the Indian-Killer,' and other books of the sort.

"I was about seven years old when we had an anti-rent war here. A great many of the farms in this and adjacent counties were of leased land. King George had granted immense sections of the country here to certain of his court favorites, and these favorites divided it up among favorites of their own, and all this land had to pay a tax to them of a shilling an acre. Of course these owners never had anything to do with the land, and settlers took it and improved it and made their homes on it.

"The people who lived on the land thought the tax was unjust, and they took the law into their own hands and said they weren't going to pay this tax. They got the idea of disguising themselves as Indians. They wore leather caps pulled over their faces, and were all paint, fur, and feathers—dreadful-looking creatures. Father sympathized with their side, and they used to call at our house and we would give them apples and things. They were usually just out on a lark. It was all boys' foolishness, and didn't amount to anything; but the feeling was very bitter, and it divided the neighborhood.

"The up-renters we called 'tories.' The down-renters, fixed up as Indians, would roam around nights, mostly, but they would come together any time of day at the signal of the blowing of a horn. They made a law that nobody should blow a horn but to call them together. Jay Gould's father was an up-renter; he was a stiff-necked old fellow, and he was going to blow his horn to call his men to dinner, whether or no. So the first thing he knew he had his house full of Indians threatening to tar and feather the old gentleman. Another time it was known around that the sheriff was going to sell a man out who wouldn't pay his rent, and the Indians gathered and shot the sheriff.

"They got so lawless the Legislature had to take the matter in hand, and it undertook to suppress the Indians and imprison their leaders. I'd see the sheriff and his posse riding past—twenty or thirty or even fifty men going pell-mell. It scared me. They'd go rushing along on their horses, flourishing swords and muskets; it was a terrible sight for a youngster. Then, besides, the posse represented the law, and my sympathy, of course, was with my people. I wasn't so afraid of the Indians.

HIS BOYHOOD TROUT-BROOK

"Father thought the posse was after him one day, and he ran over to grandfather's and got under the bed. We had great fun over that, for they always said his feet stuck out, and that his hiding wouldn't have done him any good if they'd really been after him, which they weren't. But they did hunt a neighbor who was a leader among the down-renters. He got away to Michigan and stayed there several years before he dared to come back.

"I went to a great Indian meeting one time. The horns blew long and loud over the hills, and you'd see the Indians come from the farms and places where they'd been to put on their things. Their caps were of leather, something like a bag with holes cut for eyes, nose, and mouth. They had horns on the caps and a fringe round the neck, and a cow's tail tied on behind, and I don't know what all. They were hideous-looking things—perfectly infernal—and there were no two alike. Then the Indians wore blouses of striped calico, belted at the waist, and some of them had pants of the same or of red flannel. Take a hundred men dressed up in that style together and it made a sight to behold. They had their meeting in a big empty hay-barn. I went and peeked through the cracks, and the Indians inside stuck out straw at me. They had their orators, and it seemed to me the affair was something tremendous—such a lot of them, too—I thought they'd carry everything before them after that.

"But they didn't go at it in the right way. Their lawlessness and outlandishness hurt their cause, and the farmers still have to pay rent. This farm, like the rest, has to pay its shilling an acre just as it did when I was a boy.

"This house isn't the one I was born in. That we moved off out in the orchard, and built this one in its place, when I was thirteen years old. That house was rather a small, unpainted, squarish building, one story high, with a big chimney in the middle. To move it, we pried it up, put runners under it, and asked all the neighbors and their oxen to the moving. We hitched eight or ten yoke of oxen to each runner—all we could get in the neighborhood—and such a bellowing, hawing and geeing, and whip-cracking as there was I never heard in my life. It took some time to get all those oxen to pull together, and when they did get started how they would hump up! We broke three or four chains that day, but we would double them up—fix 'em some way and go on.

"I remember the first day I went to school I wore a suit my mother made. It was a little striped suit, and it had flaps on the shoulders that went up and down like a dog's ears as I ran. I couldn't have been more than four or five years old. It was my first great journey. All I remember is that I asked of my older sister, who led me, 'Who lives there?' every house we passed on the way.

"The seats in the school-house seemed very high. The seat that I and some of the other smaller ones sat on was just a slab from the sawmill, flat side up, with some widely slanting legs put underneath. I couldn't touch my feet to the floor from it. One day the teacher didn't let me go out, and I got asleep and fell over backwards and knocked a great hole in my head. The next thing I knew I was lying in a house that was near the school, and there was a smell of camphor in the air. I don't know how I got home, but I must have got home somehow.

"I learned my alphabet in Cobb's spelling-book. It had the alphabet arranged with first the vowels and then the consonants. They had the most mechanical way of drilling that alphabet into you. It took months to learn it. The teacher called us up three or four times a day and, with a penknife, pointed out the letters one by one, skipping around, and saying, 'What letter's that?' 'What letter's that?' Hen Meeker sat next me. He was older and larger than I was, and I remember once the teacher had him up saying his letters, and he came to small c and couldn't tell what it was. The teacher kept at him, but there Hen stuck at the c. 'Why,' the teacher said, 'I'll bet little Johnnie Burroughs can tell that letter.' So he called me up and I said 'c,' and was very proud of my knowledge.

"I was the only one of our family that 'took to larnin',' as my father would say, and I don't think I hankered after the studying very much. The days in school were very long, but we had royal fun in playtime. We played tag and den and, in the late autumn, ball—yes, and we could have fun out of nothing in those days.

"Children have nimble brains—how easily their imaginations are kindled! I remember one noon in particular, when all the girls at school were crying because they thought the end of the world was coming. They wept and wailed, and I was scared with the rest. A storm was rising over the hills. The black clouds looked very portentous—I could see that. I expected things were going, though just what the end of the world meant I didn't know. Of course the storm passed away, the trumpets were not sounded, and we went back into the school thinking the thing was postponed—that it wasn't to come off till the next day, or the day after, or some other day—it had missed fire, anyway. I don't know how the girls got their idea; there were no grown people in the neighborhood who were looking for the passing away of the earth. They might have heard some one read an item of the sort from the newspapers, for it wasn't far from the time that the Millerite excitement swept over the country. Anyway, there those big girls stood, and the rest of us looking on to see the thing go.

JOHN BURROUGHS AND THE CHILDREN

AN OCTOBER ROADSIDE

"It was a two-mile road to the school I attended. The road was roundabout, and there was a short cut through the woods. But I was afraid of the woods, and usually went the long way. I had plenty of time then. A cousin went with me, and in winter some of the older children. We used to start by half-past seven o'clock, so as to have ample opportunity to loiter and play along the road.

"Once in a while we ventured through the woods on a summer morning and stopped by a spring there to get crinkle-root, which we liked to carry to eat with our dinners. It is a kind of cress—an appetizing thing, almost as strong as horseradish. We were timid about taking that route, but as we grew older we would occasionally summon up courage and go that way for the sake of variety. In the deepest, dampest spot in the woods near that spring run we used to see those ghostly insects—I hardly know what you call them—that collect in masses on the branches of trees. They are white as snow, very fuzzy, with a long down on them. They'd collect in a ropy mass bigger'n your fist strung along a branch, and they would stir and throb with a rhythmic pulsation that filled us with a sort of dread. You see we didn't know what they were; had never heard of them. Sometimes we'd hit the branch a rap which would make them come stringing down, and then we'd run.

"We carried bread and butter, pie, cake, and our pockets full of apples for dinner. In the long noontime, after we'd emptied our dinner-baskets, we'd go over to the brook and have a swim in the swimming-hole, or fish for trout. We'd roll up our pants the whole length of our legs, and our sleeves 'way up to our shoulders, and then we'd wade in and feel for the trout with our hands under the bank. Once in a while we'd get hold of one and get him out, but oftener we'd feel their slippery forms glide through our fingers. The trout got under the bank to hide. Sometimes they'd run in a hole like a sack and you'd see their tail sticking out. Then we'd run our fingers under the trout and slide 'em very carefully along towards its head, tickling it underneath at the same time. If you were gentle, the trout would hold perfectly still, as if it actually enjoyed being tickled. They fish that way in England, I believe. We discovered, as boys, that trout liked tickling. When we'd slid our fingers along far enough we'd nip the fish right behind the gills and toss him out.

"One used to get well spattered in this paddling in the water, but we didn't mind that—that was nothing in summer. But I had an adventure one winter with the brook that wasn't so pleasant. We were having a freshet and the stream was very full, and the board we usually walked across on was washed away. The older ones jumped across all right, but when I tried it, in I went, kersouse—right under water. I scrambled out quickly enough and went on to school. Then I pulled off my boots and poured the water out, and the teacher let me stand around the stove most of the day, and, strange to say, I didn't take cold, either.

"Another winter experience was the hooking up of suckers through the ice. One day I was out at recess, and there came along a sleigh with three or four men in it. They were neighbors I knew, and they asked me if I wanted to go along. So I jumped on behind and we drove down to the river. We selected a pool and cut some holes in the ice; at the holes a man would lie down with his face close to the water and a straight staff in his hand with a hook of wire loops on the end, and with that he'd pull up the fish. Some of the men went up above with their axes and hammered on the ice to drive the fish down, and I stood at the other end of the pool working a long pole through a hole in the ice to keep the fish from going out. They would hook the fish up just as fast! and the ice was soon all alive with them. They'd hook up a basket or two in that way, and in a little while the fish all froze stiff as pokers.

"When the sport was over they divided the fish in piles, a part for each man that took part in the expedition. They dropped one fish at a time in each pile till all had been allotted, and then they drew cuts for choice of piles. Of course there wasn't much difference in the piles, but one pile might have an extra large one in it, or perhaps there might be a trout among the suckers. They didn't count me in when they made the division, but at the end they said, 'There's Johnny, we ought to give him some,' and they each gave me a fish or two from their piles.

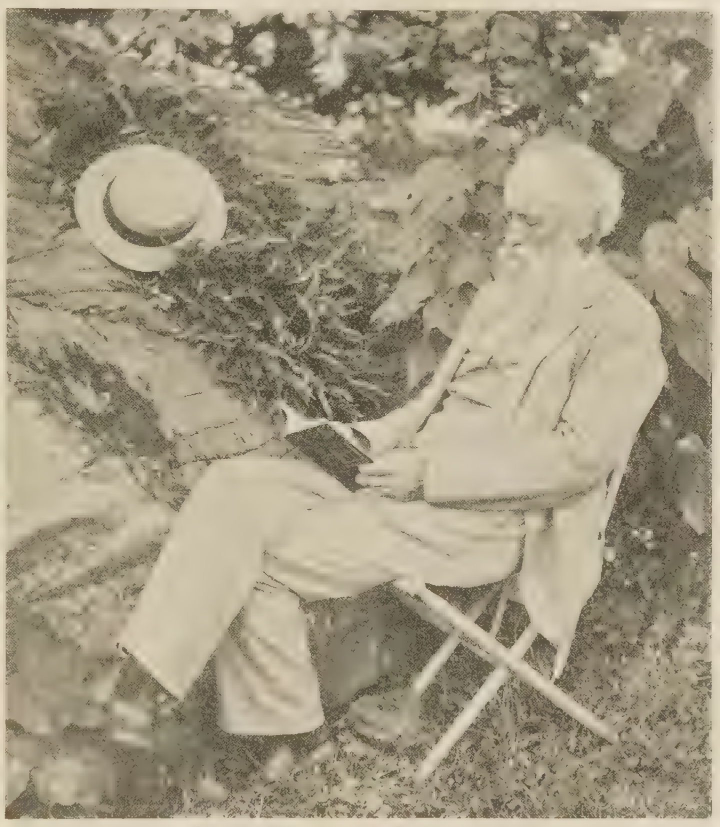
"If you took home the frozen fish and put them in water, they'd thaw out and come to life and be none the worse for their freezing. The trout, though, had a more delicate organization, and they wouldn't revive. I suppose I ran away from school to go fishing, but I don't think I was reproved much for it. Probably I didn't do it often. I'd have been hauled up for it next day if I had.

"Once in a while we children at school would play hooky and make a trip down to Stratton Falls, a mile and a half distant, after slate-pencils. There were high ledges there, and a horseshoe fall of water that you could get in behind, and we used to like to hang around there and play. We would run away at noon and not get back until long after school had begun. Our excuse was that we had to go to get slate-pencils. It was a great adventure. Streaks of slate cropped out in the ledges, and we used to get little slabs of it and carry them home. Some of it was red and some blue. The way to tell if the slate would do for pencils was to rub it across the ends of your under teeth. You could tell instantly by the grit if it was too hard or too soft.

"We took the little slabs of slate home, and in our spare time would work them up into slate-pencils. I'd cut two straight, deep gashes with my knife about the width of a pencil apart on one side, drawing the knife back and forth and back and forth by the hour. Then I'd turn the slab over and start other cuts to meet the first ones. By and by you broke off the slab along the gashes, and then you could whittle your splinter of slate into shape. We got all our slate-pencils that way. You couldn't buy them at the store—never heard of such a thing.

"We children never paid much attention to flowers. It isn't a country that abounds with wild flowers, but there were plenty of violets. We gathered those—chiefly, though, to 'fight roosters' with them. The way we did that was for two of us to each take a violet and hook them together and see which fellow's would pull the other's head off—see which violet would stand the most strain.

"I used to know every inch of the road between here and school, and had many little adventures all along it with one thing and another. My first sweetheart lived in a little red house on that road. She was my playmate. I remember going over there once with father when I was a little fellow. He took his oxen and was going to spend the day working there. He said I might go along and play with Eleanor. Mother thought she'd be in school, and when we got there, sure enough, Eleanor had gone to school. But her father lifted up his voice and called to her. He had a tremendous voice. The schoolhouse was half a mile away—I don't know how she heard, but she did, and pretty soon came running up the road to the house, and we played together all day.



JOHN BURROUGHS

"She continued to be the girl I was fondest of up to the time I was thirteen or fourteen, though there was one other girl I had a fancy for in the same period. But this second girl quickly alienated my affections by exposing one of my misdemeanors to the teacher one day. She said, 'Johnny Burroughs put his feet on the desk.' It hurt my feelings dreadfully—how could that girl, of all others, be so hard-hearted! After that there was a coolness between us.

"When I was just on the edge of the awkward age that lasts from fourteen to eighteen, I went to an apple-cut one evening. We worked away until nine or ten o'clock, and then it was in order for the boys to go home with the girls—those they took a shine to. The boys had been at me all the evening about Eleanor, asking if I was going home with her. I wanted to, but when the time came there were the boys and girls all standing around to see who was going with who, and I hadn't the courage.

"The proper thing would have been to sidle up to Eleanor and say, 'May I have the pleasure of your company home this evening?' That was a good deal of a choker for a fellow of fourteen. If you were the one the girl fancied, she'd take your arm and off you'd go. If she liked some other fellow better, she'd say, 'I beg to be excused'—at least that was the right way, but I suppose very often the girl said 'No,' bluntly. Then you got the 'mitten,' as they called it. Eleanor's brother Jim went with my sister. They'd been plaguing him about her, same as they'd been at me, but he was sixteen or over and not so easily frightened as I was, and he saw her home just the same. Eleanor had to go off without me, and to excuse myself I told the boys 'I wasn't going 'way off down there in the cold and darkness.' We sort of grew apart then, and not long after that another fellow turned his attention to her.

"When a family was going to have an apple-cut, they sent one of the boys round the neighborhood to say they'd like to have the young people come on such and such a night. We would arrive about seven o'clock, and the young fellows hung up their hats and the girls would put their things in the other room on the bed, and we'd get to work.

"The parers sat in the center of the room. They had brought their paring-machines with them, and each machine was on a board which the parer put on a chair-seat and then sat on. The apple was put on a prong, and the parer turned the crank of the machine and made the apple revolve against a knife he held in his hand. The apples were brought into the kitchen in big bushel baskets, and sometimes there was a great strife as to which machine could do a basketful first. The apples, when pared, were put in pans and passed to the rest of the company sitting around the borders of the room. Some quartered and cored them, and others would string them ready for drying.

"The crowd would be talking and laughing meanwhile, and jokes would be flying from one side of the room to the other. Sometimes there were other things flying too. Suppose a bashful fellow liked a girl on the other side of the room—he very likely was not too bashful to throw an apple-core at her. If she was friendly toward him, she would smile and look sweetly at him out of the corners of her eyes. If she didn't like him, she would frown.

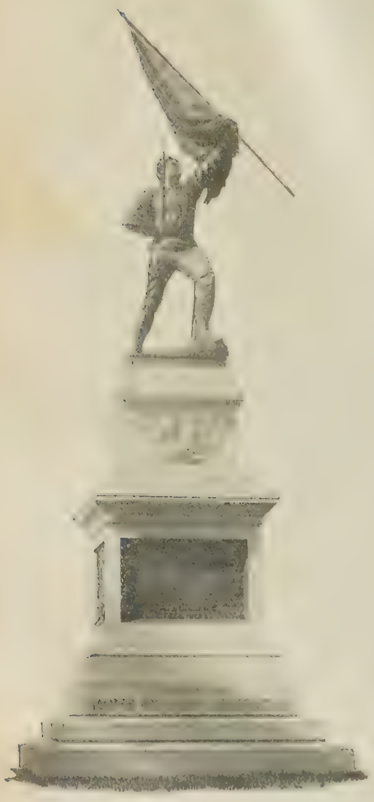
"We cut two hours, till nine o'clock. Then the apples were taken away, the room was swept up, and the boys stepped outdoors and gathered in knots to stretch and air themselves. But after a little we all got together in the kitchen again for refreshments. We always had apple pie, pumpkin pie, and two kinds of cake. We'd sit down around the room and they'd keep bringing in the plates with the food on a waiter till all were served. After we'd eaten, the amusements would begin. Sometimes we had dancing, but not much. It was considered extreme, and the old people rather frowned on it. We generally had those sentimental plays, you know, that used to be so common. There was 'Button, button,' for instance—the silliest thing! You had to guess who had the button, and if you didn't guess right they said to the one you thought had it, 'What must this one do for accusing you so wrongfully?' Then you had to pay some forfeit, and the forfeit always had kissing in it.

"So we went on with 'Button, button' and 'Blind man's buff' and one game and another for about an hour. Then the girls would begin to get their things, and the boys would stand around the door, each one waiting for his victim—the right one—to emerge. They accompanied the girls to their home gates, said 'Good-night,' and separated. They don't have those apple-cuts any more."

From Atlanta to the Sea

II.—Central Georgia and Savannah[1]

By Willis J. Abbot

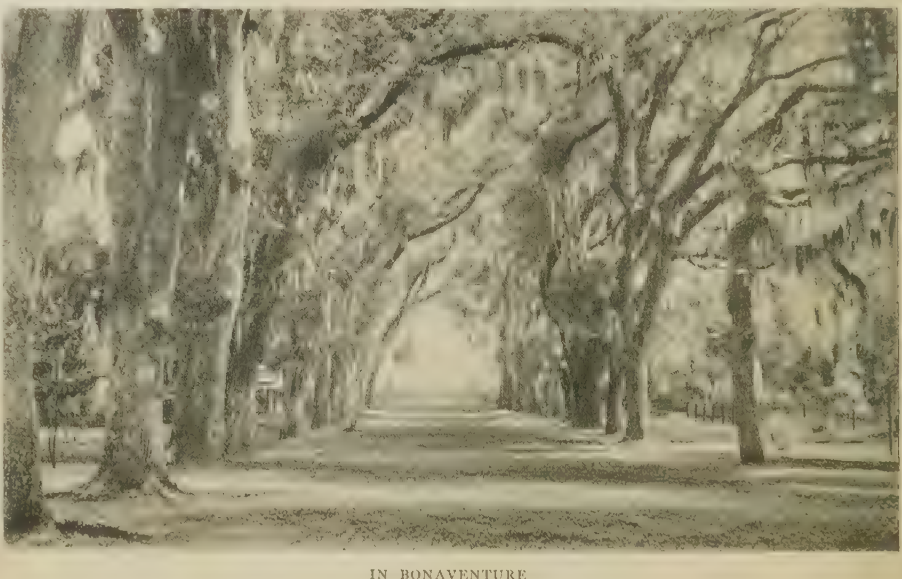


JASPER MONUMENT
(Savannah)

The new invasion of Georgia, and indeed of the entire Southeast, is still a Northern invasion, and, to a very great degree, is a repetition in peaceful guise of the invasion, with all the enginery of war, which Sherman led. That Northern capital is flowing into the South is only natural, but there is a certain picturesqueness, wholly distinct from any business or commercial importance, attaching to the fact that members of the Grand Army of the Republic by the thousands are flocking into Georgia and Alabama to make their homes. In Georgia has lately been established a colony, membership in which is limited to members of the G. A. R. Its age is reckoned by months; its population is reckoned by thousands. Where there was a broad expanse of untilled fields or uncleared forests, now stands a town like one of those which in late years sprang up so quickly within the borders of Indian reservations opened suddenly to settlement. Fitzgerald is scarcely three months old; its population to-day is almost 5,000. The method of its organization savors at once of communism and individualism. Only Grand Army men have place in the organization, and the amount of land that any who purpose earning their living by cultivation of the soil may hold is limited. Excepting these limitations, however, the settler is free to do as he will. A curious feature about this colony, and about divers other colonies established by Northern people in the South, is that they absolutely bar the negro from participation in the rights of colonists, and, more than this, deny him the right of residence or of employment within the limit of the colony. Southerners comment upon this curious fact with not unnatural satire.

It may be doubted whether there is to-day in the United States any other movement of such great importance as this flocking of Northern people into the South. Evidences of its vigor are not to be found alone in the Southern States, and, indeed, to discover them there requires somewhat extensive touring, for the colonies are established, naturally, in little-frequented and out-of-the-way spots. But one has only to take up to-day a newspaper published in the Northwest, or a folder of a railroad connecting the Northwest with the Southeast, in order to discover that the movement of settlers from the far Northwestern States, which but a few years ago were considered the agriculturist's El Dorado, toward the Southeastern States, with their less fertile soil but more equable climate, has developed to a degree which commands the attention and the fostering care of the great railway systems.

Naturally enough, the settlers who come to Georgia come seeking agricultural land. The Northern capital which flows into Georgia is directed toward the many small manufacturing centers which are springing up in that State. Probably the greatest of these is Augusta, a city which, by its exceptionally fortunate location, and even more because of the unusual public spirit of its citizens, bids fair to become the chief manufacturing city of the State, although possibly not the most populous. It might be too much to say that the prosperity of Augusta was founded upon what might be called an essay in municipal socialism, yet, after all, the canal that the people of the city dug to the Savannah River, at a cost of one and a half million dollars, has been the chief factor in building up the large and growing cotton-manufacturing industry, which is now the chief mainstay of the town. Along this canal are ranged imposing cotton-mills, one of which, the Sibley Mill, the citizens point to proudly as the handsomest, if not the largest, cotton-mill in the world. It has, indeed, what very few mills or factories enjoy, a certain architectural excellence, and it secures, furthermore, a little historical luster by occupying the site of the factory which furnished the gunpowder for the Confederate armies during the war. Sherman did not go into Augusta, but he came near enough to lead the Confederate officials in charge at that point to demolish their powder-mill, leaving nothing but its towering chimney. The chimney stands to-day unused on the grounds of the Sibley Company. It is left as a monument to the Confederate cause, and bears in its massive side a stone tablet explaining what it commemorates. Thirteen thousand horse-power is furnished by the canal on which this mill fronts, and it is utilized by other manufacturing concerns. In cotton alone 160,000 spindles are turned and nearly 4,000 operatives employed. About 70,000 bales of this staple are used annually. The population of Augusta, as estimated at this time, is 40,000. The city, aside from its characteristics as a manufacturing town, is beautiful as a point of residence, and its main street, broad beyond anything else I have seen outside of Washington, and paved throughout with asphalt, has in it



IN BONAVENTURE
(Savannah)

---

[1] For the first article in this series see the last Magazine Number of The Outlook (issue January 25).

the possibilities of beauty beyond anything in the South.

THREE SAVANNAH CHURCHES

(Independent Presbyterian Church at top; Christ Church beneath; St. John's Church at right)

Columbus, among the other towns of interior Georgia, is distinctively a manufacturing town, and ranks well toward the top. Here are the largest cotton-mills in the South, notable among them the Eagle and Phenix Mills, those of the Swift Manufacturing Company, and the Hamberger Cotton-Mills. The almost unlimited water-power furnished by the Chattahoochee River at this particular point gives a tremendous impetus to manufacturing business, and is used also to run the electric railways of the city. There are large iron and steel foundries, ice-factories, woolen-mills, and hundreds of small factories. Like the other Georgia cities, outside of Atlanta, Columbus did not suffer at the hands of General Sherman on his march to the sea, but just before the close of the war Wilson's raiders leveled almost all of the houses to the ground. All the warehouses in which cotton was stored were burned. This was a needless sacrifice of property, as the war had practically ended, Lee had surrendered, and the fighting was done. A more serious setback to the city, however, was the "carpetbaggers'" control of the city government after the war. The colored people are well cared for at Columbus, are being educated, and are looked upon as good citizens. Three public schools are maintained for them, a dozen churches, a newspaper is owned and edited by negroes, and there are other evidences of the material as well as intellectual prosperity of that race. The negroes have embarked in almost every kind of business, some of them having drug-stores, dry-goods stores, and, in fact, following almost every pursuit. Inside the mills they are not in evidence as yet. It was found, when the experiment was made, that the negro was not sufficiently skilled to do the work in the mills, but some of the mill-owners are now teaching the negroes this branch. Columbus has nine railroads, and is at the head of navigation on the Chattahoochee River. There are four steamship companies conveying freight and passengers down the river to Apalachicola and the seaboard.

To enumerate and even briefly characterize the thriving towns of Georgia would transcend the proper limits of this article. Griffin, the seat of the Georgia experiment farm, and a town with no small pretensions to manufacturing preeminence, should not be ignored. Americus, Cuthbert, and Marshallville are all places worth more than passing mention. Each has felt the enlivening touch of foreign capital, each has its special qualities of fitness for agricultural or manufacturing pursuits.

A PRIVATE RESIDENCE

(Savannah)

When the visitor making, like Sherman, the trip from Atlanta to the sea, reaches the Atlantic coast at Savannah, he discovers that, after all, nature has its compensations, even in the rivalries of cities. Atlanta may have quadrupled its population since the war, while Savannah has grown barely 10,000 in the same period. Yet Savannah has retained and developed a certain Southern beauty, a spaciousness of street and park area, a stateliness of architecture, both ecclesiastical and domestic, which cannot but result in making of it a resort for people seeking a beautiful home city, or an attractive abiding-place in which to escape the asperities of a Northern winter. Not that the city is lagging at all in its commercial activities. As a distributing point for the Southeast and as a port of shipment for the products of that naturally rich region it ranks first. Its harbor, developed at very heavy cost within the last decade, is probably the best on the South Atlantic coast, and it has accordingly taken away from Brunswick the large shipping interests which formerly made of that point a notable and prosperous port. The Savannah "Morning News," a paper of marked ability and National reputation, in its commercial edition of September 11, 1895, fixes the tonnage of vessels engaged in foreign trade which enters the port of Savannah at 315,285 tons, distributed among 317 ships. In that harbor, during the busy season, when cotton is being shipped to foreign ports, the flags of all the world may be seen, the scarlet ensign of Great Britain with the cross of Saint George, of course, predominating. Besides this very heavy foreign trade, Savannah is the headquarters for two notable lines of coastwise steamers plying between that city, New York, and Boston. The coastwise clearances at the port for the year ending the first of September, 1895, were 420, with a gross tonnage of 649,303. As a matter of fact, Savannah is the water-gate to the same territory to which Atlanta holds the key. An enormous amount of freight traffic is carried on by means of the steamships plying from New York and Boston to this port, and the railroads proceeding thence to Atlanta. Just at present there is much ado made in the Northwest because Chicago, though nearer Atlanta than New York, cannot secure for its wholesale merchants freight rates as favorable as those enjoyed by New Yorkers. The explanation of this seeming injustice lies in the fact that, by utilizing the water carriage between New York and Savannah, the actual cost of transportation from the Eastern metropolis to the heart of Georgia is made less than that by Chicago's all-rail route. While this situation persists—and there is nothing conceivable which can change it—Savannah will always prosper as a point of transshipment from vessels to freight-car, and vice versa. It will always, too, remain a great center for jobbing houses dealing with merchants throughout Georgia, in Florida, and in certain sections of South Carolina and Alabama. In this branch of trade there has been heavy falling off in the last year, owing to the doubtless temporary hard times in Florida resulting from the failure of the orange crop of 1895. There was, too, in the value of the shipments of cotton last year an apparent heavy decrease; yet the actual shipment by bales in 1895 exceeded those of the year previous by 43,000, the unusually low price of cotton having caused the seeming decrease in the volume of business. In exporting naval stores, notably resin and turpentine, Savannah ranks first among the cities of the world.

THE HERMITAGE
(Savannah)

Its harbor and its geographical location will keep Savannah always a prosperous and a principal distributing point of the Southeast, yet to the visitor its advantages as a home place, its qualities as a city almost wholly free from squalid poverty, and equally without that even more threatening feature of modern city life, enormous concentration of wealth, are most engaging. The city, to begin with, is laid out as if it was made more to live in than to do business in. The streets are broad, many of them with central strips of verdure and lined with double rows of live-oaks. At almost every second block is a public square, and in almost every square a monument which impresses on the mind of the visitor the fact that here is a historic community, a city which has had its heroes, and which has forgotten no tradition in an ignoble race for mere commercial triumph. The very churches are full of historic associations, though none of the present edifices date from any time prior to the opening of this century. Christ Church as a building is comparatively new, having been completed in 1840. As an organization, however, it has had continuous existence since about 1740, has had three church structures—one destroyed by fire and one by a hurricane—and enjoys some ecclesiastical fame as being the church in which the first Sunday-school the world ever knew was established by John Wesley, nearly fifty years before Robert Raikes undertook a like enterprise in England. The Independent Presbyterian Church, of which a picture is given, also inhabits a new edifice, and a singularly handsome one, but has a history extending over a century or more. A curious incident connected with this church is the fact that by the will of one of its members a large sum of money was left as an endowment to the church in consideration that the towering and massive pulpit of pre-Revolutionary design should always be kept. Shortly thereafter the church burned to the ground, pulpit and all, but the trustees, at infinite pains, replaced the original pulpit by a perfect facsimile, a procedure which apparently has been held to comply sufficiently with the terms of the will. It may be doubted whether in a more litigious community such a device for observing the spirit while involuntarily violating the letter of the testator's purpose would have defeated the covetousness of possible legatees. A third notable church in the city, not for its age, nor for any historic features attached to it, is St. John's Episcopal Church. Not very large, it is still one of the most beautiful of American churches. The stained-glass windows, presented by different members of the congregation, were made in England, and are among the most perfect examples of that branch of art in this country.

It is not without significance that in a city of such comparatively small size there should be a foundation, through private beneficence, of a really creditable public art gallery and art school. The Telfair Academy of Arts and Sciences is housed in a building which, both for architectural dignity and by its eminent adaptability to the purposes for which it is designed, should rank high among the art galleries of the United States. It had its origin in a bequest of Miss Mary Telfair, who bequeathed her noble ancestral mansion, together with a fund of $100,000, for the purpose of founding an art museum and academy. The architect who adapted the old residence to its present purpose achieved a real triumph, and the collection of casts, photographs, and other objects of art useful for academic purposes may fairly be regarded as complete.

After all, that sort of public spirit which manifests itself in bequests for purposes of public education, or in a lively interest in the higher life of a city, is a thing of slow growth. An old city, though small, almost always will be found to manifest it in a much higher degree than a young city of ten times the population. Savannah's history has impressed itself upon its people. That it has done so is made evident by the number of statues to heroes, not only local but national, erected in its parks by public subscription. It is made evident by the existence of a historical society, dating from 1839, housed in a spacious and handsome building of its own, and having a library which is one of the largest in the South. It is made evident, furthermore, by the interest with which the citizens have maintained all their old institutions. Their military companies—and, by the way, Savannah has more militiamen in proportion to its population than almost any other city in the United States—date from Revolutionary times. Everything which is hallowed by age is protected in Savannah. Whether it be a theater like the Savannah Theater, the oldest in the United States, an educational establishment like that of the Chatham Academy, dating from 1788, or even a cemetery in the center of the town, the origin of which was so far back that no man can now give you its date, it is protected with loving care by the Savannahians of to-day

Few cities in the Union have so beautiful an environment as Savannah. Some of its show places are celebrated from one end of the country to the other. Perhaps first of these is Bonaventure, once a stately plantation, now a cemetery where the dead lie under the spreading limbs of gigantic live-oaks, draped with the funereal Spanish moss. About the base of the bluff on which this God's Acre is laid out, the salt tides of the Savannah River rush back and forth. Looking across the stream, nothing is to be seen but the broad green expanse of the savannas which gave the city its name. The town itself is far away. Nothing is there to vulgarize the spot, or to rob death of its strange and sudden dignity. Perhaps somewhere in this broad land of ours, which comprehends within its bounds the sandy reaches of Long Island and the peaks of Colorado, there may be a spot more full of dignity, more stimulative to the contemplative mind, than this burying-ground at Bonaventure, where live-oaks serve for monuments and somber moss hangs in gloomy clusters over all, but we will have far to seek for it.

KATE CARNEGIE[1]

By Ian Maclaren

Author of "Beside the Bonnie Brier-Bush," "The Days of Auld Lang Syne," etc., etc.

CHAPTER V.—CONCERNING BESOMS

It is one of the miseries of modern life, for which telephones are less than compensation, that ninety out of a hundred city folk have never known the comfort and satisfaction of dwelling in a house. When the sashes are flying away from the windows, and the skirting-boards from the floor, and the planks below your feet are a finger-breadth apart, and the pipes are death-traps, it does not matter that the walls are covered by art papers and plastered over with china dishes. This erection, wherein human beings have to live, and work, and fight their sins, and prepare for eternity, is a fraud and a lie. No man compelled to exist in such an environment of unreality can respect himself or other people; and if it come to pass that he holds cheap views of life, and reads smart papers, and does sharp things in business, and that his talk be only a clever jingle, then a plea in extenuation will be lodged for him at the Great Assize. Small wonder that he comes to regard the world of men as an empty show, and is full of cynicism, who has shifted at brief intervals from one shanty to another, and never had a fit dwelling-place all his years. When a prophet cometh from the Eternal to speak unto modern times as Dante did unto the Middle Ages, and constructs the other world before our eyes, he will have one circle in his hell for the builders of rotten houses, and doubtless it will be a collection of their own works, so that their sin will be its own punishment, as is most fitting and the way of things.

Surely there will also be some corner of heaven kept for the men who, having received a charge to build the shell wherein two people were to make a home, laid its foundations deep, and raised strong walls that nothing but gunpowder could rend in pieces, and roofed it over with oaken timber, and lined it with the same, so that many generations might live therein in peace and honor. Such a house was the Lodge in those days, although at last beginning to show signs of decay, and it somehow stirred up the heroic spirit of the former time within a man to sit before the big fire in the hall, with grim Carnegies looking down from the walls, and daring you to do any meanness, while the light blazing out from a log was flung back from a sword that had been drawn in the '15. One was unconsciously reinforced in the secret place of his manhood, and inwardly convinced that what concerneth every man is not whether he fail or succeed, but that he do his duty according to the light which may have been given him until he die. It was also a regeneration of the soul to awake in a room of the eastern tower, where the Carnegies' guests slept, and fling up the window, with its small square panes, to fill one's lungs with the snell northern air, and look down on the woods glistening in every leaf, and the silver Tochty just touched by the full risen sun. Miracles have been wrought in that tower, for it happened once that an Edinburgh advocate came to stay at the Lodge, who spake after a quite marvelous fashion, known neither in England nor Scotland; and, being himself of pure bourgeois blood, the fifth son of a factor, felt it necessary to despise his land, from its kirk downwards, and had a collection of japes at Scottish ways, which in his provincial simplicity he offered to the Carnegies. It seemed to him certain that people of Jacobite blood and many travels would have relished his clever talk, for it is not given to a national decadent to understand either the people he has deserted or the ancient houses at whose door he stands. Carnegie was the dullest man living in the matter of sneering, and Kate took an instant dislike to the mincing little man, whom she ever afterwards called the Popinjay, and so handled him with her tongue that his superiority was mightily shaken. But there was good stuff in the advocate, besides some brains, and after a week's living in the Lodge he forgot to wear his eyeglass, and let his r's out of captivity, and attempted to make love to Kate, which foolishness that masterful damsel brought to speedy confusion. It was also said that when he went back to the Parliament House every one could understand what he said, and that he got two briefs in one week, which shows how good it is to live in an ancient house with honest people.

"Is there a ghost, dad?" They were sitting before the fire in the hall after dinner—Kate in her favorite posture, leaning forward and nursing her knee. The veterans and I thought that she always looked at her best so, with her fine eyes fixed on the fire, and the light bringing her face into relief against the shadow. We saw her feet then—one lifted a little from the ground—and V. C. declared they were the smallest you could find, for a woman of her size.

"She knows it, too," he used to say, "for when a woman has big feet she always keeps them tucked in below her gown. A woman with an eight size glove and feet to correspond is usually a paragon of modesty, and strong on women's rights."

"Kate's glove is number six, and I think it's a size too big," broke in the Colonel—we were all lying in the sun on a bank below the beeches at the time, and the Colonel was understood to be preparing a sermon for some meeting—"but it's a strong little hand, and a steady; she used to be able to strike a shilling in the air at revolver practice."

"Ghost, lassie? Oh, in the Lodge, a Carnegie ghost—not one I've ever heard of; so you may sleep in peace, and I'm below if you feel lonely the first night."

"You are most insulting; one would think I were a milksop. I was hoping for a ghost—a white lady by choice. Did no Carnegie murder his wife, for instance, through jealousy or quarreling?"

"The Carnegies have never quarreled," said the General, with much simplicity; "you see the men have generally been away fighting, and the women had never time to weary of them."

"No woman ever wearies of a man, unless he be a fool and gives in to her—then she grows sick of him. Life might be wholesome, but it would have no smack; it would be like meat without mustard. If a man cannot rule, he ought not to marry, for his wife will play the fool in some fashion or other, like a runaway horse, and he has half the blame. Why did he take the box seat?" and Kate nodded to the fire. "What are you laughing at?"

---

[1] Copyright, 1896, by John Watson.

"Perhaps I ought to be shocked, but the thought of any one trying to rule you, Kit, tickles me immensely. I have had the reins since you were a bairn, and you have been a handful. You were a 'smatchit' at six years old, and a 'trimmie' at twelve, and you are qualifying for the highest rank in your class."

"What may that be, pray? it seems to me that the Scottish tongue is a perfect treasure-house for impertinent people. How Scots must congratulate themselves that they need never be at a loss when they are angry, or even simply frank!"

"If it comes to downright swearing, you must go to Gaelic," said the General, branching off. "Donald used to be quite contemptuous of any slight efforts at profanity in the barrack yard, although they sickened me.

"'Toots, Colonel; ye do not need to be troubling yourself with such poor little words, for they are just nothing at all, and yet the bodies will be saying them over and over again like parrots.

"'Now a Lochaber man could hef been saying what he was wanting for fifteen minutes, and nefer hef used the same word twice, unless he had been forgetting his Gaelic. It's a peautiful language, the Gaelic, when you will not be fery well pleased with a man.'"

"That is very good, dad, but I think we were speaking in Scotch, and you have not told me that nice complimentary title I am living to deserve. Is 'cutty' the disreputable word? for I think I've passed that rank already; it sounds quite familiar."

"No, it's a far more fetching word than 'cutty,' or even than 'randy' (scold), which you may have heard."

"I have," replied Kate, instantly, "more than once, and especially after I had a difference in opinion with Lieutenant Strange. You called me one or two names then, dad—in fact, you were quite eloquent; but you know that he was a bad fellow, and that the regiment was well rid of him; but I'm older now, and I have not heard my promotion."

"It's the most vigorous word that Scots have for a particular kind of woman."

"Describe her," demanded Kate.

"One who has a mind of her own," began the General, carefully, "and a way, too; who is not easily cowed or managed; who is not . . . "

"A fool," suggested Kate.

"Who is not conspicuously soft in manner," pursued the General, with discretion; "who might even have a temper."

"Not a tame rabbit, in fact. I understand what you are driving at, and I know what a model must feel when she is being painted. And now kindly pluck up courage and name the picture." And Kate leant back, with her hand behind her head, challenging the General—if he dared. "Well?"

"Besom." And he was not at all ashamed, for a Scot never uses this word without a ring of fondness and admiration in his voice, as of one who gives the world to understand that he quite disapproves of this audacious woman, wife or daughter of his, but is proud of her all the time. It is indeed a necessity of his nature for a Scot to have husks of reproach containing kernels of compliment, so that he may let out his heart and yet preserve his character as an austere person, destitute of vanity and sentiment.

"Accept your servant's thanks, my General. I am highly honored." And Kate made a sweeping curtsey, whereupon they both laughed merrily; and a log blazing up suddenly made an old Carnegie smile who had taken the field for Queen Mary, and was the very man to have delighted in a besom.

"When I was here in June"—and the General stretched himself in a deep red-leather chair—"I stood a while one evening watching a fair-haired, blue-eyed little maid who was making a daisy-chain and singing to herself in a garden. Her mother came out from the cottage, and, since she did not see me, devoured the child with eyes of love. Then something came into her mind—perhaps that the good man would soon be home for supper; she rushed forward and seized the child, as if it had been caught in some act of mischief.

"'Come into the hoose, this meenut, ye little beesom, an' say yir carritches. What's the chief end o' man?'"

"Could she have been so accomplished at that age?" Kate inquired, with interest. "Are you sure about the term of endearment? Was the child visibly flattered?"

"She caught my eye as they passed in, and flung me a smile, like one excusing her mother's fondness. But Davidson hears better things, for as soon as he appears, the younger members of a family are taken from their porridge and set to their devotions.

"'What are ye glowerin' at there, ye little cutty? Toom (empty) yir mooth this meenut, and say the twenty-third Psalm to the minister.'"

"Life seems full of incident, and the women make the play. What about the men? Are they merely a chorus?"

"A stranger spending a week in one of our farm-houses would be ready to give evidence in a court of justice that he had never seen women so domineering or men so submissive as in Drumtochty.

"And why? Because the housewife, who sits in church as if butter wouldn't melt in her mouth, speaks with much fluency and vigor at home, and the man says nothing.

"His normal state is doing wrong and being scolded from morning till night—for going out without his breakfast, for not cleaning his boots when he comes in, for spoiling chairs by sitting on them with wet clothes, for spilling his tea on the tablecloth, for going away to market with a dusty coat, for visiting the stable with his Sunday coat, for not speaking at all to visitors, for saying things he oughtn't when he does speak—till the long-suffering man, raked fore and aft, rushes from the house in desperation, and outside remarks to himself, by way of consolation, 'Losh keep's! there's nae livin' wi' her the day; her tongue's little better than a threshing-mill.'

"His confusion, however, is neither deep nor lasting, and in a few minutes he has started for a round of the farm in good heart, once or twice saying 'Sall,' in a way that shows a lively recollection of his wife's gifts."

"Then the men love to be ruled," began Kate, with some contempt; "it does not give me a higher idea of the district."

"Wait a moment, young woman; for all that goes for nothing, except to show that the men allow the women to be supreme in one sphere."

"In the dairy, I suppose?"

"Perhaps; and a very pleasant kingdom, too, as I remember it, when a hot, thirsty, tired laddie, who had been fishing or ferreting, was taken into the cool, moist, darkened place, and saw a dish of milk creamed for his benefit by some sonsy housewife.

"Sandie and I used to think her omnipotent, and heard her put the gude man through his facings with awe, but by and by we noticed that her power had limits. When the matter had to do with anything serious, sowing or reaping or kirk or market, his word was law.

"He said little, but it was final, and she never contradicted. It was rare to hear a man call his wife by name; it was usually 'gude wife,' and she always referred to him as the 'maister.' And, without any exception, these silent, reserved men were 'maister;' they had a look of authority."

"They gave way in trifles, to rule in a crisis, which is just my idea of masculine government," expatiated Kate. "A woman likes to say what she pleases and have her will in little things; she has her way, and if a man corrects her because she is inaccurate, and nags at her when she does anything he does not approve, then he is very foolish and very trying, and if she is not quite a saint, she will make him suffer.

"Do you remember Dr. Pettigrew, that prim little effigy of a man, and his delightful Irish wife, and how conversation used to run when he was within hearing?"

"Glad to have a tasting, Kit," and the General lay back in expectation.

"'Oi remember him, as foine a young officer as ye would wish to see, six feet in his boots.'

"'About five feet ten, I believe, was his exact height, my dear.'

"'Maybe he wasn't full grown then, but he was a good upstanding man, and as pretty a rider as ever sat on a horse. Well, he was a Warwickshire man. . . .'

"'Bucks, he said himself.'

"'He was maybe born in both counties for all you know.'

"'Alethea!' with a cough and reproving look.

"'At any rate, Oi saw him riding in a steeplechase in the spring of '67, at Aldershot.'

"'It must, I think, have been '66. We were at Gibraltar in '67. Please be accurate.'

"'Bother your accuracy, for ye are driving the pigs through my story. Well, Oi was telling ye about the steeplechase Jimmy Brook rode. It was a mile, and he had led for half, and so he was just four hundred yards from the post.'

"'A half would be 880 yards.'

"'Oi wish from my heart that geography, arithmetic, memory, and accuracy, and every other work of Satan, were drowned with Moses in the Red Sea. Go, for any sake, and bring me a glass of irritated water.'"

"Capital!" cried the General. "I heard that myself, or something like it. Pettigrew was a tiresome wretch, but he was devoted to his wife in his own way."

"Which was enough to make a woman throw things at him, as very likely Alethea did when they were alone. What a fool he was to bother about facts; the charm of Lithy was that she had none—dates and such like would have made her quite uninteresting. The only dates I can quote myself are the Rebellion and the Mutiny, and I'll add '75, when we came home. I don't like datey women; but then it's rather cheap for one to say that who doesn't know anything," and Kate sighed very becomingly at the contemplation of her ignorance.

"Except French, which she speaks like a Parisian," murmured the General.

"That's a fluke, because I was educated at the Scotch convent, with those dear old absurd nuns, who were Gordons and Camerons and Macdonalds, and didn't know a word of English."

"Who can manage her horse like a rough rider," continued the General, counting on his finger, "and dance like a Frenchwoman, and play whist like a half-pay officer, and—"

"That's not education; those are simply the accomplishments of a besom. You know, dad, I've never read a word of Darwin, and I got tired of George Eliot and went back to Scott."

"I've no education myself," said the General, ruefully, "except the Latin the old dominie thrashed into me, and some French, which all our set in Scotland used to have, and . . . I can hold my own with the broadsword. When I think of all those young officers know, I wonder we old chaps were fit for anything."

"Well, you see, dad," and Kate began to count also, "you were made of steel wire, and were never ill; you could march for a day and rather enjoy a fight in the evening; you would go anywhere, and the men kept just eighteen inches behind; you always knew what the enemy was going to do before he did it, and you always did what he didn't expect you to do. That's not half the list of your accomplishments, but they make a good beginning for a fighting man."

"It will be all mathematics in the future, Kit, and there will be no fighting at close quarters. The officers will wear gloves and spectacles—but where are we now, grumbling as if we were sitting in a club window? Besides, these young fellows can fight as well as pass exams. You were saying that it was a shame of a man to complain of his wife flirting," and the General studied the ceiling.

"You know that I never said anything of the kind; but some women are flirty in a nice way, just as some are booky, and some are dressy, and some are witty, and some are horsey; and I think a woman should be herself. I should say the right kind of man would be proud of his wife's strong point, and give her her liberty."

"He is to have none, I suppose, but just be a foil to throw her into relief. Is he to be allowed any opinions of his own? . . . It looks hard, that cushion, Kit, and I'm an old, broken-down man."

"You deserve leather, for you know what I think about a man's position quite well. If he allow himself to be governed by his wife in serious matters, he is not worth calling a man."

"Like poor Major MacIntosh."

"Exactly. What an abject he was before that woman, who was simply—"

"Not a besom, Kate," interrupted the General, anxiously—afraid that a classical word was to be misused.

"Certainly not, for a besom must be nice, and at bottom a lady—in fact, a woman of decided character."

"Quite so. You've hit the bull's-eye, Kit, and paid a neat compliment to yourself. Have you a word for Mrs. MacIntosh?"

"A vulgar termagant"—the General indicated that would do—"who would call her husband an idiot aloud before a dinner-table, and quarrel like a fishwife with people in his presence.

"Why, he daren't call his soul his own; he belonged to the kirk, you know, and there was a Scotch padre, but she marched him off to our service, and if you had seen him trying to find the places in the Prayer-Book! If a man hasn't courage enough to stand by his faith, he might as well go and hang himself. Don't you think the first thing is to stick by your religion, and the next by your country, though it cost one his life?"

"That's it, lassie; every gentleman does."

"She was a disgusting woman," continued Kate, "and jingling with money; I never saw so many precious stones wasted on one woman; they always reminded me of a jewel in a swine's snout."

"Kate!" remonstrated her father, "that's . . ."

"Rather coarse, but it's her blame; and to hear Mrs. MacIntosh calculating what each officer had—I told her we would live in a Lodge at home and raise our own food. My opinion is that her father was a publican, and I'm sure she had once been a Methodist."

"Why?"

"Because she was so Churchy, always talking about celebrations and vigils, and explaining that it was a sin to listen to a Dissenting chaplain."

"Then, Kate, if your man—as they say here—tried to make you hold his views?"

"I wouldn't, and I'd hate him."

"And if he accepted yours?"

"I'd despise him," replied Kate, promptly.

"You are a perfect contradiction."

"You mean I'm a woman, and a besom, and therefore I don't pretend to be consistent or logical, or even fair, but I am right."

Then they went up the west tower to the General's room, and looked out on the woods and the river, and on a field of ripe corn upon the height across the river, flooded with the moonlight.

"Home at last, lassie, you and I, and another not far off, maybe."

Kate kissed her father, and said, "One in love, dad, . . . and faith."

CHAPTER VI.—LOVE IS ETERNAL

The General read Morning Prayers in brief, omitting the Psalms and lessons, and then, after breakfast, with much gossip and ancient stories from Donald, the father and daughter went out to survey their domain; and though there be many larger, yet there can be few more romantic in the north. That Carnegie had a fine eye and a sense of things who, out of all the Glen—for the Hays had little in Drumtochty in those days—fastened on the site of the Lodge and planted three miles of wood, birch and oak and beech and ash, with the rowan-tree, along the river that goes out and in seven times in that distance, so that his descendants might have a fastness for their habitation and their children might grow up in kindly woods on which the south sun beats from early spring till late autumn, and within the sight and sound of clean, running water. No wonder they loved their lonely home with tenacious hearts, and left it only because it was in their blood to be fighting. They had been out at Langside and Philiphaugh, in the '15 and the '45, and always on the losing side. The Lodge had never been long without a young widow and a fatherless lad, but family history had no warning for him—in fact, seemed rather to be an inspiration in the old way—for no sooner had he loved and married than he would hear of another rebellion, and ride off some morning to fight for that ill-fated dynasty whose love was ever another name for death. There was always a Carnegie ready as soon as the white cockade appeared anywhere in Scotland, and each of the house fought like the men before him, save that he brought fewer at his back and had less in his pocket. Little was left to the General and our Kate, and then came the great catastrophe that lost them the Lodge, and so the race has now neither name nor house in Scotland, save in the vault in Drumtochty Kirk. It is a question whether one is wise to revisit any place where he has often been in happier times and see it desolate. For me, at least, it was a mistake, and the melancholy is still upon me. The deserted house falling at last to pieces, the overgrown garden, the crumbling paths, the gaping bridges over the little burns, and the loneliness, chilled one's soul. There was no money to spare in the General's time, but it is wonderful what one gardener, who has no hours, and works for love's sake, can do, even in a place that needed half a dozen. Then he was assisted unofficially by Donald, who declared that working in the woods was "fery healthy and good for one or two small cuts I happened to get in India," and Kate gave herself to the garden. The path by the river was kept in repair, and one never knew when Kate might appear round the corner. Once I had come down from the cottage on a fine February day to see the snowdrops in the sheltered nooks—for there were little dells white as snow at that season in Tochty woods—and Kate, hearing that I had passed, came of her kindness to take me back to luncheon. She had on a jacket of sealskin that we greatly admired, and a felt hat with three grouse feathers on the side, and round her throat a red satin scarf. The sun was shining on the bend of the path, and she came into the light singing "Jock o' Hazeldean," walking, as Kate ever did in song, with a swinging step like soldiers on a march. It seemed to me that day that she was born to be the wife either of a noble or a soldier, and I still wish at times within my heart that she were Countess of Kilspindie, for then the Lodge had been a fair sight to-day, and her father had died in his own room. And other times I have imagined myself Kilspindie, who was then Lord Hay, and questioned whether I should have ordered Tochty to be dismantled and left a waste as it is this day, and would have gone away to the wars, or would not have loved to keep it in order for her sake, and visited it in the springtime when the primroses are out, and the autumn when the leaves are blood-red. Then I declare that Hay, being of a brave stock, and having acted as a man of honor—for that is known to all now—ought to have put a good face on his disappointment; but all the time I know one man who would have followed Lord Hay's suit, and who regrets that he ever again saw Tochty Lodge.

"First of all," said the General as they sallied forth, "we shall go to the Beeches, and see a view for which one might travel many days, and pay a ransom."

So they went out into the court with its draw-well, from which they must needs have a draught. Suddenly the General laid down the cup like a man in sudden pain, for he was thinking of Cawnpore, and they passed quickly through the gateway and turned into a path that wound among great trees that had been planted, it was said, by the Carnegie who rode with Montrose. They were walking on a plateau stretching out beyond the line of the Lodge, and therefore commanding the Glen, if one had eyes to see and the trees were not in the way. Kate laid her hand on the General's arm beneath an ancient beech, and they stood in silence to receive the blessing of the place, for surely never is the soul so open to the voice of nature as by the side of running water and in the heart of a wood. The fretted sunlight made shifting figures of brightness on the ground; above, the innumerable leaves rustled and whispered; a squirrel darted along a branch and watched the intruders with bright, curious eyes; the rooks cawed from the distance; the pigeons cooed in sweet, sad cadence close at hand. They sat down on the bare roots at their feet and yielded themselves to the genius of the forest—the god who will receive the heart torn and distracted by the fierce haste and unfinished labors and vain ambitions of life, and will lay its fever to rest and encompass it with the quietness of eternity.

"Father," whispered Kate, after a while, as one wishing to share confidences, for there must be something to tell, "where are you?"

"You wish to know? Well, all day I've been fishing down the stream, and am coming home, very tired, very dirty, very happy, and I meet my mother just outside those trees. I am boasting of the fish that I have caught, none of which, I'm sure, can be less than half a pound. She is rating me for my appearance and beseeching me to keep at a distance. Then I go home and down into the vaulted kitchen, where Janet's mother gives me joyous welcome, and produces dainties saved from dinner for my eating. The trouts are now at biggest only a quarter of a pound, for they have to be cooked as a final course, but those that were hooked and escaped are each a pound, except one in the hole below Lynedoch Bridge, which was two pounds to an ounce. Afterwards I make a brave attempt to rehearse the day in the gun-room to Sandie, who first taught me to cast a line, and fall fast asleep, and, being shaken up, sneak off to bed, creeping slowly up the stair, where the light is failing, to the little room above yours, where, as I am falling over, I seem to hear my mother's voice as in this sighing of the wind. Ah me, what a day it was!

"And you, Kit?"

"Oh, I was back in the convent with my nuns, and Sister Flora was trying to teach me English grammar in good French, and I was correcting her in bad French, and she begins to laugh because it is all so droll. 'I am Scotch, and I teach you English all wrong, and you tell me what I ought to say in French which is all wrong; let us go into the garden,' for she was a perfect love, and always covered my faults. I am sitting in the arbor, and the Sister brings a pear that has fallen. 'I do not think it is wicked,' she says, and I say it is simply a duty to eat up fallen pears, and we laugh again. As we sit, they are singing in the chapel, and I hear 'Sancta Maria ora pro nobis.' Then I think of you, and the tears will come to my eyes, and I try to hide my face, but the Sister understands and comforts me. 'Your father is a gallant gentleman, and the good God pities you, and will keep him in danger,' and I fondle the Sister, and wonder whether any more pears have fallen. How peaceful it is within that high wall, which is rough and forbidding outside, but inside it is hung with greenery, and among the leaves I see pears and peaches. But I missed you, dad,' and Kate touched her father, for they had a habit of just touching each other gently when together.

"Do you really think we have been in India, and that you have a dozen medals, and I am . . . an old maid?"

"Certainly not, Kit, a mere invention—we are boy and girl, and . . . we 'ill go on to the view."

Suddenly they came out from the shade into a narrow lane of light, where some one of the former time, with an eye and a soul, had cleared a passage among the trees, so that one standing at the inner end and looking outwards could see the whole Glen, while the outstretched branches of the beeches shaded his eyes. Morning in the summertime about five o'clock was a favorable hour, because one might see the last mists lift, and the sun light up the face of Ben Urtach, and eveningtide was better, because the Glen showed wonderfully tender in the soft light, and the Grampians were covered with glory. But it was best to take your first view towards noon, for then you could trace the Tochty as it appeared and reappeared, till it was lost in woods at the foot of Glen Urtach, with every spot of interest on either side. Below the Kirk it ran broad and shallow, with a bank of brushwood on one side and a meadow on the other, fringed with low bushes from behind which it was possible to drop a fly with some prospects of success, while in quite unprotected situations the Drumtochty fish laughed at the tempter, and departed with contemptuous whisks of the tail. Above the haughs was a little mill, where flax was once spun, and its lade still remained, running between the Tochty and the steep banks down which the Glen descended to the river. Opposite this mill the Tochty ran with strength, escaping from the narrows of the bridge, and there it was that Weelum MacLure drove Sir George across in safety, because the bridge was not for use that day. Whether that bridge was really built by Marshal Wade in his great work of pacifying the Highlands is very far from certain, but Drumtochty did not relish any trifling with its traditions, and had a wonderful pride in its solitary bridge, as well it might, since from the Beeches nothing could well be more picturesque. Its plan came nearly to an inverted V, and the apex was just long enough to allow the horses to rest after the ascent, before they precipitated themselves down the other side. During that time the driver leant on the ledge, and let his eye run down the river, taking in the Parish Kirk above and settling on the Lodge, just able to be seen among the trees where the Tochty below turned round the bend. What a Drumtochty man thought on such occasions he never told, but you might have seen even Whinnie nod his head with emphasis. The bridge stood up clear of banks and woods, gray, uncompromising, unconventional, yet not without some grace of its own in its high arch and abrupt descents. One with good eyes and a favoring sun could see the water running underneath, and any one caught its sheen higher up, before a wood came down to the water's edge and seemed to swallow up the stream. Above the wood it is seen again, with a meal-mill on the left nestling in among the trees, and one would call it the veriest burn, but it was there that Posty lost his life to save a little child. And then it dwindles into the thinnest thread of silver, and at last is seen no more from the Beeches. From the Tochty the eye makes its raids on north and south. The dark, massy pine-woods on the left side of the Glen are broken at intervals by fields as they threaten to come down upon the river, and their shelter lends an air of comfort and warmth to the Glen. On the right the sloping land is tilled from the bank above the river up to the edge of the moor that swells in green and purple to the foot of the northern rampart of mountains, but on this side also the Glen breaks into belts of fir, which fling their kindly arms round the scattered farm-houses, and break up the monotony of green and gold with squares of dark green foliage and the brown of the tall, bare trunks. Between the meandering stream and the cultivated land and the woods and the heather and the distant hills, it was such a variety as cannot be often gathered into the compass of one landscape.

"And all our own!" cried Kate, in exultation; "let us congratulate ourselves."

"I only wish it were, lassie. Why, didn't you understand we have only these woods and a few acres of plowed land now?"

"You stupid old dad! I begin to believe that you have had no education. Of course the Hays have got the land, but we have the view and the joy of it. This is the only place where one can say to a stranger, 'Behold Drumtochty,' and he will see it at a flash and at its best."

"You're brighter than your father, Kit, and a contented lassie to boot, and for that word I'll take you straight to the Pleasaunce."

"What a charming name! it suggests a fairy world, with all sorts of beautiful things and people."

"Quite right, Kit"—leading the way down to a hollow, surrounded by wood and facing the sun, the General opened a door in an ivy-covered wall—"for there is just one Pleasaunce on the earth, and that is a garden."

It had been a risk to raise certain people's expectations and then bring them into Tochty garden, for they can be satisfied with no place that has not a clean-shaven lawn and beds of unvarying circles, pyrethrum, calceolaria, geranium, and brakes of rare roses, and glass houses with orchids worth fifty pound each, which is a garden in high life, full of luxury, extravagance, weariness. As Kate entered, a moss-rose which wandered at its will caught her skirt, and the General cut a blossom which she fastened in her breast, and surely there is no flower so winsome and fragrant as this homely rose.

"Like yourself, Miss Carnegie," and the General rallied his simple wit for the occasion, "very sweet and true, with a thorn, too, if one gripped it the wrong way."

Whereat he made believe to run, and had the better speed because there were no gravel walks with boxwood borders here, but alleys of old turf that were pleasant both to the touch and the eye. In the center where all the ways met he capitulated with honors of war, and explained that he had intended to compare Kate to a violet, which was her natural emblem, but had succumbed to the temptation of her eyes, "which make men wicked, Kit, with the gleam that is in them."

"Isn't it a tangle?" Which it was, and no one could look upon it without keen delight, unless he were a horticultural pedant in whom the appreciation of nature had been killed by parterres. There was some principle of order, and even now, when the Pleasaunce is a wilderness, the traces can be found. A dwarf fruit-tree stood at every corner, and between the trees a three-foot border of flowers kept the peas and potatoes in their places. But the borders were one sustained, elaborate, glorified disorder. There were roses of all kinds that have ever gladdened poor gardens and simple hearts—yellow tea-roses, moss-roses with their firm, shapely buds, monthly roses that bore nearly all the year in a warm spot, the white brier that is dear to north-country people, besides standards in their glory, with full round purple blossom. Among the roses, compassing them about and jostling one another, some later, some earlier in bloom, most of them together in the glad summer days, one could find to his hand wall-flowers and primroses, sweet-william and dusty-miller, daisies red and white, forget-me-nots and pansies, pinks and carnations, marigolds and phloxes of many varieties. The confusion of colors was preposterous, and showed an utter want of æsthetic sense. In fact, one may confess that the Lodge-garden was only one degree removed from the vulgarity and prodigality of nature. There was no taste, no reserve, no harmony about that garden. Nature simply ran riot and played according to her will like a child of the former days, bursting into apple-blossom and laburnum gold and the bloom of peas and the white strawberry-flower in early summer, and then, later in the year, weaving garlands of blazing red, yellow-white, purple, round beds of stolid roots and brakes of currant-bushes. There was a copper beech, where the birds sang, and from which they raided the fruit with the skill of Highland caterans. The Lodge bees lived all day in this garden, save when they went to reinforce their sweetness from the heather bloom. The big trees stood round the place and covered it from every wind except the south, and the sun was ever blessing it. There was one summer-house, a mass of honeysuckle, and there they sat down as those that had come back to Eden from a wander year.

"Well, Kit?"

"Thank God for our Pleasaunce." And they would have stayed for hours, but there was one other spot that had a fascination for the General that neither years nor wars had dulled, and he, who was the most matter-of-fact and romantic of men, must see and show it to his daughter before they ceased.

"Two miles and more, Kit, but through the woods and by the water all the way."

Sometimes they went down a little ravine made by a small burn fighting and wearing its way for ages to the Tochty, and stood on a bridge of two planks and a hand-rail thrown over a tiny pool, where the water was resting on a bed of small pebbles. The oak copse covered the sides of the tiny glen and met across the streamlet, and one below could see nothing but greenery and the glint of the waterfall where the burn broke into the bosky den from the bare heights above. Other times the path, that allowed two to walk abreast if they wished very much and kept close together, would skirt the face of the high river-bank, and if you peeped down through the foliage of the clinging trees you could see the Tochty running swiftly, and the overhanging branches dipping in their leaves. Then the river would make a sweep and forsake its bank, leaving a peninsula of alluvial land between, where the geranium and the hyacinth and the iris grew in deep, moist soil. One of these was almost clear of wood and carpeted with thick, soft turf, and the river beside it was broad and shining.

"We shall go down here," said the General, "and I will show you something that I count the finest monument in Perthshire, or maybe in broad Scotland."

In the center of the sward, with trees just touching it with the tips of their branches, was a little square, with a simple, weather-beaten railing. And the General led Kate to the spot, and stood for a while in silence.

"Two young Scottish lassies, Kate, who died two hundred years ago, and were buried here."

Then the General and Kate sat down by the river edge, and he told her the deathless story of Bessie Bell and Mary Gray—how in the plague of 1666 they fled to this district to escape infection; how a lover came to visit one of them and brought death in his kiss; how they sickened and died; how they were laid to rest beside the Tochty water; and generations have made their pilgrimage to the place, so wonderful and beautiful is love. They loved, and their memory is immortal. Kate rested her chin on her hand and gazed at the running water, which continued while men and women live and love and die.

"He ought not to have come; it was a cowardly, selfish act; but I suppose," added the General, "he could not keep away."

"Be sure she thought none the less of him for his coming, and I think a woman will count life itself a small sacrifice for love," and Kate went over to the grave.

A thrush was singing as they turned to go, and nothing was said on the way home till they came near the Lodge.

"Who can that be going in, Kate? He seems a padre."

"I do not know, unless it be our fellow-traveler from Muirtown; but he has been redressing himself, and is not improved."

"Father," and Kate stayed the General as they crossed the threshold of their home, "we have seen many beautiful things to-day, for which I thank you; but the greatest was love."

Christ's Teaching on Social Topics

IV.—The Labor War[1]

By Lyman Abbott

Moreover, if thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone: if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother. But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established. And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the church: but if he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican.—Matt. xviii., 15–17.

The three methods which Christ proposes for the settlement of controversies are: first, conciliation; second, arbitration; third, law.

These methods have been tried for a great many years with increasing success in the settlement of all personal controversies. If two street arabs come into controversy about a piece of property, they invoke the remedies which were common in the Middle Ages—they appeal to what historians call the "wager of battle;" in short, they fight it out, and the stronger fellow gets the jackknife. If the piece of property is one of considerable value—if it is, for instance, the right to sell papers on a particular street corner—each boy will have his own comrades to support him, and then you will have something more than a quarrel between two boys—you will have a wager of battle between two sets of city arabs. That was the method of settling personal difficulties in the Middle Ages. All Germany, all Europe in a measure, was desolated in the Middle Ages by what is known as "private battle." The laws of private battle were settled; a method of challenge was adopted; each noble gathered his retainers about him and fought the noble on the other side; until at last the devastation and the desolation were so great that Christ's method was introduced, and what is known as "the Peace of God" came into human history in Europe.

Now, we have abandoned the barbaric way of settling personal controversies. If two merchants get into a controversy respecting a piece of property, they first endeavor to settle it between themselves; if they cannot do that, more and more they are coming to adopt the second method, that of arbitration. This was first introduced, with legal sanction, in the latter part of the last century, and it has made its way since slowly but steadily. I am told that a very large proportion of controversies "on 'Change" are settled by arbitration. Boards of arbitration are recognized among business men and provided for by the laws of many of our States. But when neither of these methods succeeds, then men go to law; that is the last resort. No man in our time thinks of resorting to personal violence to settle a personal controversy with his neighbor—no man, at least, in the more civilized portions of the United States.

And as this method has been adopted in the settlement of personal controversies, so it is coming largely to be adopted as the method of settling national controversies. They are perpetually arising, and are perpetually being settled by diplomacy—that is, conciliation. If diplomacy or conciliation fails, then resort is had to arbitration. As I have said before, within the last three-quarters of a century seventy-five important national controversies have been settled by arbitration—one a year; something like forty through the instrumentality of the United States. And now some famous jurists are proposing to add Christ's third specific; they are proposing that there shall be an International Court, and that all national questions shall be submitted to this International Court; and that the nations who constitute this Court shall stand behind it, and shall pledge their national honor to maintain its decisions, whatever those decisions may be. This is no longer a scheme of visionaries. It was propounded last August, by no less a distinguished man than one of the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and his suggestion was received with applause by the American Bar.[1]

Thus, in the settlement of personal controversies and in the settlement of national controversies we are gradually taking up with Christ's method—conciliation, arbitration, law. This method is equally effective for the purpose of settling labor controversies; in order to apply these principles to labor controversies, I must first try to trace their history and show how they have arisen.

Individualism, or the doctrine of laissez faire, as it is sometimes called, proposes as the remedy for our industrial ills freedom of competition. It was a great advance on feudalism. Under the feudal system a few men owned the land. Every landowner had attached to his land a certain number of villeins, or peasants, and these villeins were bound to do their lord's will, and he, on his part, was bound to protect them from aggression. When this feudal system broke up, there emerged from it the Manchester

---

[1] Sermon preached at Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, January 5, 1896. Reported stenographically by Henry Winans and revised by the author. For the previous sermons in this series and two sermons introductory to the series see The Outlook for January 4, January 11, February 1, February 8, and February 15.

[1] Since this sermon was delivered this plan has been revived for practical discussion on both sides of the Atlantic, in favor of the settlement of all disputes between England and the United States.

School, or the doctrine of competition, or the doctrine of laissez faire, or the doctrine of freedom of contract. That doctrine, briefly stated, was this: Let the men who want labor pay what they are willing to pay; let the laborers who want work take what they are willing to take; as a result wages will adjust themselves. Let every man offer what he is willing to pay for the service to be rendered. Let every man who wants to work, work for the wages that are offered to him; if he does not like it, let him find work somewhere else. If labor is left free, and the employer buys his labor in the cheapest market, and the laborer sells his labor in the highest market, by free competition between laborer and employer wages will adjust themselves.

So long as individuals are dealing with individuals, this method works fairly well. There is no great prospect at the present time, for instance, that the housekeepers will combine together to fix the rate of wages which they will pay their cooks; or that the cooks will combine together and demand a certain rate of wages, adjusted for themselves as a class; and as long as there are a thousand housekeepers wanting cooks, and a thousand cooks wanting employment, on the whole there is no better way to adjust the rate of wages than to let the housekeeper offer Biddy so much wages a month, and let Biddy take it or leave it alone, as she pleases. But as feudalism disappeared, individualism disappeared also. Machinery was invented. Men began to do their work in great gangs. The spinning-jenny put an end to the family spinning-wheel; the steam-loom put an end to the hand-loom; machinery put an end to individual employment and individual industry. The work was carried on, under great roofs, by great bodies of men; and this necessitated an aggregation of capital and a combination of employers. It ought to be said—and it ought to be said with emphasis—that the employers did not, at first, combine to gain an advantage over the workingmen; they combined because it was not possible to do the work by modern methods in any other way than by combination. Instead of one man hired to run a loom, or one man employed to run a spinning-wheel, there were a thousand men, in one cotton-factory, all working under one great captain of industry, with his lieutenants and his sub-lieutenants. What was the result? There was no longer a free competition; no longer an opportunity for a workingman to take a job or leave it alone, as he liked. If this man did not like the wages that were paid to him, he was one man against a thousand, and he was absolutely powerless. Let me illustrate: An employer of labor, who is not over-scrupulous, has a thousand men in his factory. One day he says to himself, "I can take ten cents off the wages of this thousand men, and, if they stand it, that will give me one hundred dollars a day more profit, $30,000 a year in dividends. It is worth trying." This is not an imaginary case. It has been frequently done in America and in England. What next? John says, I cannot afford to work for ten cents less a day. But what is John going to do? He has a home; a mortgage on it; a wife and children dependent on his industry. If he abandons work, he must go tramping through the towns until he can find some other great corporate industry which is carrying on the work in the same way. On the other hand, the employer runs no risk. If he discharges John, he can find some one else, if not to work at lower wages, at least to work at the rate of wages he is paying now. He will have to pay no more when John departs, and he may make something.

Workingmen found this out. They found out that capital was necessarily a combination, and they said this: We also must combine. And thus the Trades-Union arose. Some men have endeavored to trace the Trades-Union back to the old guilds of the Middle Ages, but there is no vital connection between the two. The word Trades-Union came into existence about the year 1830, and the thing came into existence about 1830. What, then, is a Trades-Union? Primarily, it is an organization of workingmen to promote their own interests. It may have for its object, and it often has had for its object, education, insurance, social culture, social enjoyment— matters wholly apart from labor controversy. But it also very often becomes a military organization, with one man, or two or three men, in military command, so intrusted that they are able to direct the whole body of laborers who belong to the Trades-Union to lay down their tools or take them up at an hour's notice. The Trades-Unions of America are very largely such military organizations. They are organized on the plan of an army and for the purpose of battle. When these Trades-Unions were first organized in England, a vigorous attempt was made to destroy them. First, Parliament passed laws prohibiting them as conspiracy; and the laws broke down and were repealed. Then the capitalists banded together and said, We will employ no man who belongs to a Trades-Union. Twice in the history of England they succeeded in breaking up Trades-Unions for a few years, but the only result was new organizations stronger than the old ones. The attempt to destroy the organization of labor has been made in England, under circumstances much more favorable to the attempt than ever existed, or are likely to exist, in the United States, and the attempt has proved an utter failure. The organization of capital and the organization of labor has come, as the phrase is, to stay.

The Trades-Union, then, exists—sometimes a combination of Trades-Unions; and the aggregation of capital exists, and often a combination of aggregations of capital. For when this process of organization once began, it went on increasing, so that we had recently, for instance, all the great railroads centering in Chicago united in one great body for the purpose of conquering in a labor war, and the attempt made (not altogether successfully) to unite all the railroad employees in one great railway union for a like purpose. "The solidarity of labor" has come to be one of the common phrases of our newspaper literature, and the conception that exists in the minds of not a few men, especially of labor leaders, is an organization of all labor in one great army for its own protection. Thus we have two camps: capital gathered in corporations and in aggregations of corporations, or trusts; labor organizations in Trades-Unions, or in great conglomerate organizations, like the Railway Union and the Knights of Labor and the International; and every now and then a bitter war breaking out between them in what are called strikes.

What is a strike? A strike is simply an attempt on the part of the workingmen to carry out by organized action what, under the principle of the Manchester School, or individualism, it was recommended they should carry out in individual action. John says, I will not work for ten cents a day less; and John finds that it is useless for him to say this alone, so he proposes to the other nine hundred and ninety-nine employees in this factory to make common cause. He says: An injury to one is an injury to all: let us all agree that we will not work for ten cents less a day. And when all have made a common cause, and all have said, We will not work for ten cents less a day, then the superintendent of the factory has to stop and think whether he will cut down the wages ten cents a day—whether it will not cost too much. The strike is, in its initiative, simply this: a thousand men saying, We do not like the job and we will leave it, as before the one man said, I do not like the job and I will leave it. So long as one man so acted, it brought no great inconvenience either to the community or to himself; but when a thousand men combine, and not only one thousand men, but when thousands of men all over the country, in a great variety of localities, are continually combining to leave mills idle and cause work to stop, it does produce great inconvenience and great disadvantage.

I think it must be frankly said—although it is not popular to say it in such an audience as this—I think it must be frankly said that workingmen have gained much by their labor organizations, and something by strikes. It is sometimes said that strikes are always failures. It is not true. Mr. Carroll D. Wright, who can be trusted in the matter of statistics as well as any man either in America or Europe, has reported the results of strikes during a period of two years (1891–93) and in about fifty per cent. of those strikes (a little over fifty) the workingmen won, either in whole or in part. It must always be recognized, too, that labor organizations have had the effect to raise wages; the evidence of that lies in the fact that wages are better in organized trades and poorer in unorganized. They are nowhere so poor, and nowhere are working people so badly treated, as where there is no labor organization.

These two facts the candid student of history, I think, must recognize. But, having recognized these, if he is candid, he must also recognize that strikes are war; and war inflicts incalculable injury upon all who are engaged in it. During seven and one-half years, in the principal cities of the United States, there were six thousand controversies between employers and employed, of such considerable size that they were worth reporting in the official reports of the United States—almost a thousand a year; and by means of those strikes the employed have lost thirty-five millions of dollars, and the employers have lost twenty-eight millions of dollars. Sixty-three millions of dollars have been spent in industrial war in seven and one-half years in the principal cities of the United States.

But that is the least of the evil. The loss in wages and the loss in profits is the smallest element. Man has been set against his brother man; classes have been formed; a rift has been made in the community; the laborer has been taught by every new war to regard the employer as his enemy; the employer has been taught to look with suspicion, if not with aversion, upon the employed. No one, I think, can look out upon the present unsettled condition of industry in the United States and not feel that there is real and serious menace to the country in the antagonism between class and class which strikes, lockouts, and labor wars have begotten.

For my own part, I disbelieve in the Manchester School and all its works, whether it is applied to the individual or to great organized bodies. If history demonstrates anything, it demonstrates that it is not true that we can find any method whatever by which men can live in this world on the principle simply of self-interest. So long as the employer is taught, by pulpit, by press, or by school of political economy, that it is right to get his labor in the cheapest market, and the laboring man is taught that it is right to try to get the highest wages paid in the highest market—so long as each one is trying to get all he can and to give as little as possible—so long there will be industrial war. That is not brotherhood. That is not the spirit in which the family is carried on. The husband does not say, How much can I get out of my wife, and how little can I give her? the wife does not say, How much can I get out of my husband, and how little can I give him? the father does not say, How much can I grind out of my children, and how little can I give them? How long would any family cohere on that principle? No! the wife says, How can I get that burden off my husband? and the husband, How can I give my wife a little more? and the father and mother counsel, How can we make our children a little happier, and enlarge and enrich their home a little? and the children get together and consider, What can we do to ease the burdens of over-worked father and over-tired mother? When I write "Looking Backward," I am going to tell the story of a lockout and a strike in the millennium: in one the employer will be anxious to see how few hours of labor he can put on his employed and make the work profitable, and he is going to lock out the workingmen because they insist on working too many hours; in the other the labor union is going to study how it can do the most work for the employer, and it is going to strike because he pays too much wages.

The fundamental principle—if it can be called a principle—that underlies the industrial war is all wrong. The solidarity of labor in the one camp, and the solidarity of capital in the other camp, is against the solidarity of society. Jevons, one of the ablest political thinkers in Great Britain, has laid down the law which is Christian as well as scientific. All organizations, he says, should be perpendicular, not horizontal: that is, all organizations should be an organization of one employer with his employed, in competition with another organization of another employer with his employed; not an organization of all labor in competition with an organization of all capital. That is the politico-economic doctrine, and it is Christian doctrine, and it is common sense.

But, meanwhile, what shall we do when labor controversies arise? We cannot wait for the millennium. What are we to do meanwhile? Christ replies, Conciliation, arbitration, law. First, conciliation. If I were to say what I am going to read, some employers of labor would discount it because it comes from a preacher; but Joseph D. Weekes is known by name to most men who know anything about the industrial situation, as having for many years represented the ironmasters of Pennsylvania in the questions which have arisen between the ironmasters and their men, and in a little pamphlet of his, to which I desire to acknowledge great indebtedness for my own views on the labor question, I find this paragraph. I commend it to your consideration:

> The source of this error is chiefly in the idea, inherited from feudal days and justified by much of the legislation and political economy of modern times, that the employer is the superior, the employee an inferior; that it is the right of the former to determine, the duty of the latter to acquiesce. This view does not often express itself bluntly in words, but it does more or less unconsciously in acts. The employer assumes the sole right to determine, and refuses to discuss questions that arise in connection with wages or the details of employment, in the decision of which the employee has an interest equally with the employer, or, if such discussions take place, they are "permitted;" an interview is "granted." In case of a meeting, the employer assumes the right to dictate its method. "No committee will be recognized." The employer also claims the right, in many cases, to determine the relation an employee shall hold to his fellows, and prohibits his membership in a union. In all of these, and in many similar cases, there is an assumed superiority of condition which does not exist in reality, however much it may be asserted by word or act. The true relation of employer and employed is that of independent equals, uniting their efforts to a given end, each with the power, within certain limits, to determine his own rights, but not to prescribe the duties of the other. The employer has no more right to dictate or even decide how labor shall seek its interests than labor has to dictate to the employer. Whatever may be the views of the latter as to trades-unionism, it will be well, in most cases, especially in great centers of industry or in those employments uniting great bodies of men under one management, if, with the best grace possible, he accept the fact of combination, and deal with its representatives. Such combinations, with all their faults and follies, are not entirely bad.

That is the essential principle that must underlie conciliation. Not a great while ago the railroad employees of the Southern Railway Company sent a committee to the Superintendent asking to have the old rate of wages restored. The official said to the committee, Come back in a week's time and I will show you the condition of our books, and let you judge for yourselves whether we can restore the old rate of wages. In the week's time the committee did come back, and he opened the books to them, and showed them the earnings and the expenditures, and where the company would stand if it paid the increased rate of wages; and the men went back to their work, and the threatened strike was averted. The first thing for the settlement of industrial troubles is the spirit of conciliation in both master and men, the recognition of the fact that both employer and employed are partners in a common enterprise—as Mr. Weekes expresses it, "independent equals."

Conciliation will not always succeed. What next? Arbitration. That is to say, the selection of a body of men who shall represent the interests of both parties, and the submission of the question at issue to that body for its solution. It may be temporary; it may be permanent; what is essential is that it should have the confidence of both classes. England in this respect is certainly in advance of the United States. Daniel J. Ryan, in his monograph on Arbitration, thus describes its results in the iron district in the North of England, where formerly the condition was one of chronic war between laborer and capitalist:

> For sixteen years the disputes of labor and capital in the rolling-mills of England have been settled by arbitration, and it has been an era remarkably free from strikes. The Board of Arbitration for the North of England iron business was, as all efforts of this kind usually are, the outgrowth of a strike. It was formed on March 22, 1869. It is a permanent institution, and has the usual equal representation of employers and employed, as well as the conciliation committee taken from the members of the Board; in truth, arbitration in its just and full application must necessarily be about alike in all systems and trades. Speaking of this Board, Mr. Weekes, in his report, says: "At the close of 1875 it represented thirty-five works and 13,000 subscribed operatives. These works had 1,913 puddling furnaces—more than all Pennsylvania, and half as many as the entire United States. During the year 1875 the standing committee investigated forty disputes. Since its organization there have been eight or nine arbitrations on the general questions of wages, and scores of references in regard to special adjustment of wages at particular works." The awards of the Board from 1869 to 1874 in fixing wages have been freely and honorably accepted without a single repudiation; and this has been uniform, both in the decrease and the increase of wages.

History proves Christ's method practicable. I know men sometimes say, There is nothing to arbitrate. I frankly confess there are some things I would not arbitrate. I would never arbitrate a question of moral principle. I think, if I were a workingman, and my employer said, You must leave the Union, I would not arbitrate that question; I would not surrender my right as an individual citizen to belong to what organization I pleased. And, on the other hand, if the Trades-Union demanded of me, as an employer, as it often has, that I should discharge a man because he did not belong to the Union, I would not arbitrate that. I do not know what bravery I would have as an employer, but I think I would sooner go into bankruptcy. I would not deny the right of my workingmen to belong, or not to belong, to the Trades-Union. I would stand for liberty, cost what it might. But all questions of mere self-interest are properly subjects of arbitration; and the question whether they are subject to arbitration is itself a proper subject of arbitration.

And how about law? There are certain industrial questions which I hope and believe in the near future we shall bring under the dominion and control of law. To illustrate: The streets of a great city belong to the city; the highways of a great nation belong to the nation. A labor war breaks out that blocks the highways of the city, or closes the highways of the nation. We walk to and from our places of business; we allow our passenger trains to be stalled on the prairies; we wait while the great commercial arteries are paralyzed, until the war is fought out. This is folly. It is not within the legitimate limits of authority of any organization, either capitalistic or labor, to compel us to walk from Flatbush to the ferry—no! not for one single hour. As citizens of Brooklyn we have a right to an untroubled, unvexed, unhindered highway. And the time will come when, by all the power and force of law, we shall assert that right. We have a right to have our great railroad highways run untroubled from ocean to ocean, and the time will come when we shall assert that right. How? It is not necessary for me to-night to say how; it is enough for me, in general terms, to affirm the principle that the highways of the Nation belong to the Nation, and whether it is capitalist on one side or laborer on the other, if the highway is blockaded, law should interfere. If two roughs get into a quarrel on Fulton Street, they are not allowed to fight it out; the policeman puts his hand on both of them and says, "Here is the court: you must settle your dispute in another fashion." But when the owners of the trolley-cars and the workmen on the trolley-cars get into a controversy, all that we do by our police is to prevent violence and let the battle go on—while we walk. We shall not do it always. It is not necessary for me to say how, but it is easy to indicate one method by which it is possible to protect ourselves. If a railroad corporation does not pay interest on its bonds, the Government takes the railroad, runs the railroad itself, and pays the interest on the bonds. It takes the railroad, puts it into the hands of a receiver, and so cares for the interests of the creditors. The right of the Nation in the highway is greater than the right of either stockholder or bondholder. It would be a perfectly simple thing for the law to provide that when the corporation cannot run its trains, through a labor war, a receiver shall take the road and run it for the public. That would settle the matter, so far as the corporation is concerned. So far as the employee is concerned, the Supreme Court of the United States has decided, in the Debs case, that a combination for the purpose of blocking the highways of the Nation is a criminal conspiracy.

Conciliation—the recognition by employer and employed that they are partners in a common enterprise; arbitration—the adjustment of all questions of self-interest that cannot be adjusted through conciliation, by reference to a mutually chosen tribunal; and the intervention of law where public rights are infringed upon by controversy between laborer and capitalist—this seems to me to be the application of Christ's method for the solution of the labor war, until we come to the full recognition of the fact that workingman and capitalist are brothers and partners in a common enterprise, and the very motive of war comes to an end.

One word more. When a minister or an editor undertakes to apply the principles of Jesus Christ to the industrial war, practical men shrug their shoulders and say it is not practicable. I think the quotations I have given you here show that it is not wholly impracticable. Meanwhile I ask you to consider a question: Is it practicable to go on as we have been going on? Would the evils that would grow out of a system of conciliation, arbitration, and law be greater than the evils of the present system?—with passion on the one side and prejudice on the other, with the great and growing rift, with employers set over against employed, with labor leaders that are often demagogues and capitalistic leaders that are sometimes inhuman, with the Nation in danger of being rent in twain by a war between the upper and the lower classes—the worst of all conceivable wars, save only a war of religion. Have the results of the system of free, unfettered competition, without conciliation, without arbitration, without law, with disregard of the principles which Jesus Christ inculcates, been so beneficent, so fruitful in good, that we can say that the method of free competition in a selfish struggle is practicable? No! the only method of life that is practicable is the method of justice and of love.

The Baptist Temple, Philadelphia

It is said that the largest Protestant congregation in the United States worships in the Baptist Temple (Grace Church), Philadelphia, of which the Rev. Russell H. Conwell is the pastor. The Temple is a remarkable example of church growth. It has 3,135 numbered chairs and 1,200 extra chairs. Not only are all these seats occupied at the regular Sunday services, but the assistant pastor preaches at the same time in another part of the building to a congregation which numbers from 1,500 to 2,000. Thirteen years ago the number of church members was ninety. The Temple grew out of a mission started by a committee of young men. The worshipers originally met in a hired hall, and, after two years' aggressive work, erected a wooden tabernacle, the sloping roof and the gables of which were of canvas. The mission was a working church, and a great success, and before long became Grace Church. When the council to recognize the church sat in the mother church (the Tenth Baptist), there was considerable discussion among the delegates as to the propriety of using the name "Grace." There was not such freedom allowed among the Baptists then in regard to these matters as there is at the present time. Dr. Cathcart, a clergyman noted for his ringing and vigorous style of oratory, led the opposition, and wound up his speech by saying: "Grace Church! why, bless you, suppose this church should get some graceless rascal for a pastor, what a pitiful plight it would be in!" Ground for the present Temple was broken in 1889; the corner-stone was laid in 1890. Mr. Conwell's theory is that every member should do work of some kind to help the enterprise along. The Temple has a hospital, twenty-seven associations for different kinds of church and humanitarian work, a gymnasium, reading-rooms, etc. Connected with the church is the "Temple College," where pupils, male or female, for a reasonable fee can take a course of study for either college, theology, law, science, art, music, nursing, telegraphy, business, kindergarten training, shorthand and typewriting, or dressmaking. The Temple and ground represent an investment of $250,000, the college $103,000, the hospital $21,000. The money to start and carry on these undertakings came, and comes now, in small sums from "the common people."

The Religious World

Grace Chapel

We have referred before in these columns to the beautiful group of buildings which have been erected by Grace Parish in East Fourteenth Street. They were dedicated with fitting services on Wednesday, February 12. The audience in attendance was very large, and the address by Bishop Potter worthy of the occasion; indeed, it was one of the strongest utterances in regard to the spiritual need of the destitute portions of our cities which we have read from him or from any one. The rector of Grace Parish is the Rev. W. R. Huntington, D.D., a man who has many times refused bishoprics, and who bids fair to make of Grace Parish a large and important diocese in itself. The buildings in East Fourteenth Street constitute a great institutional or people's church, and are thoroughly equipped for every department of religious activity. They prove that the Episcopal Church in New York is alive to the needs of the city. Probably no parish in the country, with the single exception of Trinity, is now so well equipped for a large and aggressive ministry.

What Bishop Potter Said

We make a single extract from the strong and impassioned sermon of Bishop Potter at the dedication of Grace Chapel. It deserves careful reading, and every word of it is true. He spoke as follows:

> The growth of wealth and of luxury, wicked, wasteful, and wanton, as before God I declare that luxury to be, has been matched step by step by a deepening and deadening poverty which has left whole neighborhoods of people practically without hope and without aspiration. At such a time, for the Church of God to sit still and be content with theories of its duty outlawed by time and long ago demonstrated to be grotesquely inadequate to the demands of a living situation, this is to deserve the scorn of men and the curse of God! Take my word for it, men and brethren, unless you and I and all those who have any gift or stewardship of talents or means, of whatever sort, are willing to get up out of our sloth and ease and selfish dilettanteism of service, and get down among the people who are battling amid their poverty and ignorance—young girls for their chastity, young men for their better ideal of righteousness, old and young alike for one clear ray of the immortal courage and the immortal hope—then verily the Church in its stately splendor, its apostolic orders, its venerable ritual, its decorous and dignified conventions, is revealed as simply a monstrous and insolent impertinence!

A New Church Paper

The announcement that a new religious paper is to be published in Boston under the title of "The Church," and to be edited, not in the interest of any party or faction in the Episcopal Church, but of the Church as a whole, will excite very wide attention. The character of the new paper is more significantly suggested by the list of contributors than by its statement of aims. That list will include Professor A. V. G. Allen, the Rev. Percy Browne, the Rev. Dr. Leighton Parks, Dr. E. Winchester Donald, the Rev. Drs. Greer, Huntington, and Grant, of this city, Drs. McConnell, Gould, and Batten, of Philadelphia, Dr. McKim, of Washington, and Dr. Holland, of St. Louis. These names commit the new journal to what may be called the liberal movement in the Episcopal Church. "The Church" will follow the general form of "The Nation," and for the present will be published monthly, with the design of ultimately issuing it weekly. The price for yearly subscription is $1, and subscriptions and communications should be sent to the publishers, E. P. Guild & Co., 308 John Hancock Building, Boston, Mass.

The Time-Limit in the Methodist Church

The "Christian Advocate," of New York, has published a very interesting series of articles on the Time-Limit in the Methodist Church. Dr. Joseph Pullman proposes a new plan—namely, that the pastoral term shall be four years, and that exceptions shall be allowed to the rule of the pastorate under unusual conditions. Whenever these indications point to a longer pastorate, a preacher may be returned for a second term of four years, provided the Quarterly Conference request the same by a vote that is practically unanimous, and the Presiding Bishop approves. Mr. Hiram L. Sibley argues in favor of removing pastors "for cause, and not by counting changes of the moon." He closes his article by saying: "What I advocate is a return to the principles of Wesley, the early years of the Church, and of Asbury, whereby removals were made for cause alone. Give to the episcopacy its proper authority according to the structure of our system, and hold it to strict account for its exercise." Dr. J. F. Chaffee answers objections to the time-limit, while the Rev. Joseph Irons, by a study of statistics, comes to the conclusion that no advantage would be gained by such change. The Rev. H. H. Beattys gives four reasons in favor of removing the limit: (1) The time-limit prevents the stability of work by engendering a spirit of restlessness, both among the ministry and the churches. (2) The time-limit cripples the minister's power and weakens his influence. (3) The time-limit is a playing fast and loose with Divine Providence. When God seems to approve a long pastorate, the Bishop says, "Move on." (4) The time-limit makes the institutional church impossible. The Rev. Edwin Genge argues in favor of the present limited time of service as proved by the growth of Methodism in the large cities. There is evidently a wide difference of opinion in the Church itself. The battle seems imminent both in this country and in Great Britain. What the result will be cannot be definitely predicted, but, so far as we can judge from the experience of the past, we should say that there are likely to be other changes in the near future, as there have been since the time was limited to two years. There are doubtless advantages and disadvantages in the present system. We have long felt that the true ideal, if it were possible to arrange it, would be some combination of the itineracy and the settled pastorate. There are, however, difficulties in the administration of such a plan which might be almost insuperable. The Methodist Church would doubtless gain in large centers by a change in the time-limit of its pastors, but we doubt very much if it would not lose by such change when the whole country was considered.

The Immersion of Dr. Pierson

A dispatch from London announces that on February 4 the Rev. Arthur T. Pierson, D.D., who has long been known as an eminent Presbyterian pastor, had been immersed by the Rev. James A. Spurgeon. When Dr. Pierson was supplying the Temple in London after the death of the Rev. Charles H. Spurgeon, there were repeated suggestions that he was to become a Baptist in order that he might succeed Mr. Spurgeon. That rumor, however, was denied, and nothing more has been heard of it until the cable dispatch which announced that in the church of which his friend, the Rev. James A. Spurgeon, is pastor, at Croydon, London, he had received immersion at the hands of his friend. No one who knows Dr. Pierson will doubt that he has taken this step conscientiously, and no one can now intimate that it is because of any ulterior or selfish motive. His greatest friends in recent years have been men like Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. A. J. Gordon, and they have doubtless had much to do with influencing him to take this step.

The Difficulties of Missionaries in Japan

We have several times in these columns referred to the condition of missionary work in Japan, and some of our references have aroused criticism from those who are working in that Empire. The latest we have seen is a statement in a recent number of the "Examiner" protesting against our declaration that the Kumi-ai Churches are not alone in the troubles which they are having to meet on account of the religious unrest among the people. A Baptist missionary affirms emphatically that "the theological unrest does not exist outside of the Kumi-ai Churches of the American Board to any perceptible degree. . . . The Methodists and Presbyterians are also numerous, and they do not have it. . . . A deal of the theological disquiet is due to the fact that there is not as much of solid, old-fashioned, vigorous theology in the American Board's missionaries' preaching as in that of missionaries of other denominations. The Presbyterians seem to have not the least trouble, nor have we Baptists." We have no desire to enter into any controversy, and shall not refer to this matter again, but it is due to the Kumi-ai Churches and to the missionaries of the American Board to say that the statements which have here appeared have not been without the best evidence. On the testimony of an eminent Methodist missionary, who knew from personal experience of many years of what he spoke, we made our statements concerning difficulties among Methodists of the same kind as those in the Kumi-ai Churches. On the testimony of one of the most eminent Baptist ministers in Japan, who knows Christian work in Japan perhaps as well as any other man in it, we have stated, and fully believe, that, in proportion to the numbers, the difficulties are as great in that denomination as in any other. Our informant is not a witness to be impeached. The Rev. Henry Loomis, of Yokohama, has assured us very positively that there are no difficulties among Presbyterians, but, on the other hand, we have been told by other Presbyterian missionaries, and still more positively by some of the most eminent of Japanese themselves, and by a missionary official in New York, that the same unrest prevails, though perhaps not to so large a degree, among the members of the Presbyterian churches. We do not mention names in any of these cases, because the testimony was given in private conversation. As to lack of fidelity to Biblical truth on the part of the missionaries of the American Board we need only say that we know positively that the statement is entirely without foundation. A more faithful, consecrated, and absolutely true body of Christian ministers is not to be found in any mission field or among pastorates in any country. If any reply is made to this paragraph, all that we should be able to say in return would be that evidently workers and eye-witnesses on the ground interpret the same facts differently. All our evidence comes directly from the field, from Japanese Christians and from missionaries of the Presbyterian, Baptist, Reformed, Methodist, and American Boards. The most that can be said on the other side is that opinions differ—and there we must leave the whole question.

Lenten Readings

A growing custom among non-Episcopal churches is that of having a course of Readings through Lent, which are open to all, but which, in the nature of the case, are chiefly attended by women. The first course of the kind of which we have known was that in the Congregational church at Montclair, where the custom has been observed for about ten years. The plan adopted is for the pastor to take some book of current interest, reading from and commenting on it for about an hour and a half one day each week. The reading is followed by a conference, and in this way great interest has been excited and the attendance has been large. Among the books which have been already read are Bushnell's "Christian Nurture," Maurice's "Social Morality," the Life of Christ with "The Light of the World" as an outline; "The Epic of the Inner Life," by Genung; "Education," by Herbert Spencer; "Culture and Religion," by Shairp; "Immortality," by Gordon; and this year the audience will be taken through a course of instruction on the Bible as Literature, with the usual conferences. Other churches in which this plan has been followed are the Congregational church at Glen Ridge; that at Upper Montclair; that at Westfield, under the ministry of the Rev. G. H. Patton, who has now gone to Duluth and who writes that the book which he will read to his people this year is Dr. Bradford's "Heredity and Christian Problems." The interest which has attended these meetings shows that large numbers in our congregations are hungry for careful and systematic study of the profoundest questions of the religious life. These readings are usually prized in proportion as really great subjects with bearing on practical life are selected. Each pastor must adjust the plan to his own conditions, but there are few churches in which such a course of reading would not be a blessing both to the minister and to his people.

A Great Paper

One of the greatest religious newspapers is "The Guardian" (London), representing the Church of England. Its first number was published January 21, 1846, and it has just celebrated its fiftieth anniversary by the publication of a special historical number. All the matter is valuable and interesting reading. Among the various subjects treated is one on the progress which has been made in the direction of spiritual freedom. We quote as follows:

> In the border-land between the citizen and the Churchman, in which ecclesiastical and civil questions cross and intermingle with one another, the last fifty years have seen many changes. Acts have been passed whereby Jews, and non-Christians generally, have been admitted to the Legislature; compulsory Church rates have been abolished; marriage has been made, for those who choose, a mere civil contract; and burial has been disjoined from any necessary connection with the Church. In the long discussions which have preceded all these measures our influence has been uniformly thrown on the side of freedom, but with the condition that the same freedom should be extended to the Church which was granted to her opponents. We have not desired to coerce unwilling recusants, but we have always claimed for ourselves the same freedom from coercion in the exercise of our spiritual functions. And, on the whole, this object has been fairly, if not as yet completely, gained. The re-establishment of Convocation, the multiplication of bishoprics at home, the renewal of the useful office of Suffragans, the great expansion on freer principles of the Colonial Church and the Colonial and Missionary Episcopate, all bear witness to the extent to which the hands of the Church have been untied from the legal fetters which were supposed—often erroneously—to have bound them.

The Anglican Church and Other Churches

Perhaps the most interesting article in the historical number of the "Guardian" to which we have referred is the one by Canon Charles Gore on "The Relation of the Church of England to Other Christian Bodies." It will be remembered that Canon Gore was for a long time Master of Pusey House in Oxford, and that he is a High Churchman ecclesiastically, and a Liberal theologically. He is now a Canon at Westminster, and perhaps the most prominent figure in the ecclesiastical life of the Established Church in London. In speaking on the subject he takes the following positions: "The Church of England has come to stand more on its ecclesiastical principles, both before the world and in the minds of its supporters, and less on the basis of its established position." He makes substantially the same claim for Nonconformists, for he says: "On the whole, the Church of England and the Nonconformists, both Roman and Protestant, are found to have passed from a position determined by their relation to the State and to society into a position determined by ecclesiastical or anti-ecclesiastical principles." He calls attention to the fact that the attitude of Church people fifty years ago toward Nonconformists was largely determined by the fact that they were Dissenters; they were a sort of rebels to be classed with other disturbers of society. But now the expressed objections of Churchmen to Nonconformity rest almost entirely on ecclesiastical principles. He finds great changes both in the Church and among Dissenters. He says: "The chapel is no longer what the chapel was—as in Silas Marner's youth, or in Robert Browning's 'Christmas Eve.'" In Protestant Nonconformity the dogmatic, evangelical elements are tending to retire into the background, while the political and social have become prominent. When he speaks more positively of his own Church, Canon Gore says that it may be called "Liberal Catholic," for four reasons: (1) It declines Scripture without tradition; (2) it declines tradition unchecked by Scripture; (3) it appeals in the maintenance of its position to the facts of human nature; and (4) it makes its appeal to historic evidence. Canon Gore makes two statements worthy of special notice. He says: "If we are to do our work in promoting a general unity, we must first promote more vigorously than we are doing at present unity among ourselves on the basis of our own principles." The Church of England must be truer than it has been to its essential principles, and by exalting them it will make its best contribution toward the unity of the Church. Later he says: "We must be conscious that any work she (the Church of England) will eventually do toward the reunion of Christendom will be done in a large measure unintentionally." His position is, briefly, that by being true to herself the Church of England will rid herself of everything except those essential truths which have in them the principle of universality. He believes that the time is not far distant when Nonconformists in larger numbers will return to the hospitality of the Anglican Church. We are not interested at this time in controverting any of Canon Gore's positions. One of them, however, is especially worthy of emphasis. The Anglican Church and all other churches will do most toward promoting that unity for which we all pray, by emphasizing the principles which they have been chosen in the providence of God to champion. Not by stifling our inmost convictions, but by being true to them, and finding some common ground on which we can meet and harmonize with the convictions of others, is ultimate unity to be realized.

Anniversary at Duluth

The Pilgrim Church of Duluth, Minn., of which the Rev. C. H. Patton is pastor, has just celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary with exercises which are reported to have been peculiarly helpful and inspiring. The church was organized under the ministry of Dr. C. C. Salter, and it has already colonized two or three times. The sermon at the anniversary was preached by the Rev. E. M. Noyes, of Newton Center, Mass., who preceded Mr. Patton in the pastorate. Greetings from the churches of the State were presented by Dr. Ingersoll, of St. Paul, while a historical paper was read by Mr. W. S. Woodbridge, who has been with the church from its organization. Pilgrim Church is one of the strongest in the Northwest, and it has for its pastor in Cornelius H. Patton a man who has proved himself, by a peculiarly useful ministry in New Jersey, to possess many eminent qualifications for ministerial leadership. Duluth is one of the most enterprising of American cities, and Pilgrim Church and its pastor cannot fail to exert a wide and beneficent influence in the development of the city and of the State.

Brief Mention

A letter from Tokyo, under date of January 17, states that Brigadier Powell (second in command to Colonel E. Wright) was about to start a corps in Yokohama—the first city "opened" outside Tokyo, the capital.

Another conspicuous illustration of the fact that ministers are often indifferent to mere pecuniary considerations is the fact that the Rev. Cornelius Woelfkin, of Brooklyn, recently declined a call to succeed Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, at an advance of $4,000 over his present salary. Similar cases are not difficult to find.

Work is soon to be started on the Phillips Brooks Memorial Library, to be erected in Hyde Park, Mass. It is the gift of Mrs. E. F. Stetson, of Boston, whose country home is near the site of the proposed building, and who is deeply interested in the Blue Hill Chapel, where Bishop Brooks preached his last sermon. The building will cost about $1,000, and will be given to the Directors of the Blue Hill Chapel.

One of the most prominent men in the Methodist Episcopal Church was the Rev. Dr. Sanford Hunt, of the Methodist Book Concern, who died in Cincinnati on Monday, the 10th. He was the senior agent of the Methodist Book Concern, and had long occupied a distinguished position in the Church. He was an author as well as a preacher, but his most distinguished service was as manager of the great business interests connected with the publication departments of the Church of which he was a member.

The Liberation Society of Great Britain, which is composed of representatives of all branches of Nonconformity in the Kingdom, and which is the recognized leader in the movement for Disestablishment, holds its anniversary in the City Temple, London, May 6. It has invited the Rev. Amory H. Bradford, D.D., of Montclair, N. J., and of the staff of this paper, to be the speaker at that anniversary. The letter conveying the invitation contains these words: "It is desirable that citizens of the United States should appear on English platforms just now, if only as a protest against policies and sentiments calculated to make bad blood between two Anglo-Saxon countries."

The Newspaper Sermon Association, in behalf of the Boston "Herald," recently offered prizes aggregating $500 for the best sermon for newspaper publication. Nearly three hundred sermons were received by the committee. Of the number four were so nearly equal in merit that the prizes were equally divided. The committee making the awards were the Rev. E. A. Horton, the Rev. J. B. Werner, the Rev. George Hodges, D.D., and Mr. W. E. Harmon; and the four among whom the prizes were distributed were the Rev. George R. Vandewater, D.D., New York; the Rev. Robert E. Campbell, Bellevue, Pa.; the Rev. Henry K. Hannah Lexington, Mass. and the Rev. Charles James Wood, York, Pa.

Books and Authors

Bismarck and Gladstone[1]

I.

Prince Bismarck

Two biographies, published in identical size and binding by Messrs. Roberts Brothers, Boston, are books of peculiar interest, since they narrate the lives of the two most eminent living statesmen. The "Life of Prince Bismarck" is told by Mr. Charles Lowe, and is condensed from his large two-volume work published ten years ago, with the addition of such fresh material as has come to light in the decade. Mr. Lowe's style is clear and concise, but not over-picturesque. It is well suited, however, to his subject, who, as is well known, is also clear, concise, and not always over-picturesque. It may be that we are so near to Bismarck's policy and history of recent years that the first pages have for us an even greater significance than those which follow; at all events, the story of the life of the young Otto, of the student and the squire, of the parliamentarian, of the ambassador, deserves to be told, as Mr. Lowe has told it, for it was the deep-laid foundation on which his successes as a world-genius and as a nation-maker rest. Then comes the period when the statesman, through the difficult days first of the German Diet, then of army reforms, of conflict between Crown and Chamber, and, above all, of the growing preponderance of Prussia, kept an admirably courageous and consistent course. This is followed by the second period—the war with Denmark, the war with Austria, the North German Confederation, and the war with France. These four events stand, we think, as a four-square foundation of German unity. They were each such epoch-making crises in the development of a nation that we must admit as far more satisfactory than Mr. Lowe's chapters the lengthier and more detailed descriptions of other writers. Nevertheless, our author gives an intelligent condensation, explanation, and interpretation of the events which characterize the stirring years between 1864 and 1871. The personality of the Bismarck of those years was the same as that which we know now; indeed, Motley's description of the Chancellor at the time of the latter's silver wedding would exactly answer to-day:

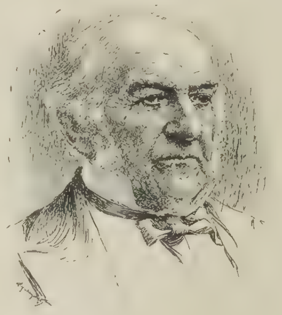
> I found him very little changed in appearance since 1864, which surprises me. He is somewhat stouter and his face weatherbeaten, but as expressive and powerful as ever. . . . After dinner Bismarck and I had a long walk in the woods, he talking all the time in the simplest and funniest and most interesting manner about all sorts of things that had happened in these tremendous years, but talking of them exactly as every-day people talk of every-day matters—without any affectation. The truth is, he is so entirely simple, so full of laissez aller, that one is obliged to be saying to one's self all the time, This is the great Bismarck—the greatest living man, and one of the greatest historical characters that ever lived. When one lives familiarly with Brobdingnags, it seems for the moment that everybody is a Brobdingnag too, that it is the regular thing to be; one forgets one's own comparatively diminutive stature.

The third period of Bismarck's life, if we may arbitrarily divide it into divisions unindicated by others, has been mainly occupied with what might be termed "bulldogism." The Iron Chancellor needed to be an iron chancellor. First of all he had to be Europe's peace-keeper, as we learn from perhaps the best-written chapter in this interesting book. To him was due, first, the Drei-Kaiser-Bund, and then that more important compact, the Triple Alliance. The Eastern Question was a greater factor than it is to-day, and the utterance of no statesman had anything like so much influence in settling it as Bismarck's "I shall not advise our participation in the war as long as no German interest shall be called in question that may be considered worth the healthy bones of a Pomeranian musketeer." The African colonial schemes were the work of Bismarck, though he was far from being as much of a Kolonialmensch as were many of his countrymen; he knew well that there has never been but one truly colonizing power, and that the sun never sets on the British flag. Above all, the influence of the Chancellor was directed towards the maintenance of friendship with Russia. So heartily in sympathy with this was the old Emperor William that his last words were an injunction to his grandson to keep on good terms with Russia. Mr. Lowe calls our attention to the fact that, while Alexander III. has been called by his eulogists the peace-keeper of Europe, he has no claim to such a designation in comparison with Bismarck, who had achieved for himself this proud title before the Czar's accession. The great Chancellor was not only a peace-keeper, he had also been a peace-maker; which, as our author reminds us, is a totally different and a much higher thing.

Though Bismarck kept the peace of Europe, it cannot be equally said of him that he did the same for Germany. He had secured the Empire from external foes; his task was as much to secure it from internal enemies. Foremost among the latter, in his opinion, were the Jesuits. We have, therefore, witnessed a Kulturkampf, in which the German Emperor, unlike Henry IV., did not go to Canossa. With the advent of Leo XIII., however, a better order of things prevailed, and conciliation was substituted for combat. The foreign relations of the Empire were certainly complicated enough to engage the undivided attention of a great statesman, but the gigantic brain of a Bismarck could direct domestic affairs at the same time. In his own person he formed a ministry of all the talents. His were the laws, and his care the execution of those laws. Right or wrong, his vicarious, often despotic, government held the Empire together as with hooks of steel. He had not only created that Empire; he consolidated it as well. He organized Alsace-Lorraine as a Reichsland, as a quasi-autonomous province duly represented in Parliament. He saw to it that the five milliards from France were devoted to generous provision for the victims of the war, to the construction of new fortresses and of strategic lines of railway, to the building of a new navy, to the establishment of a War Emergency Fund. His, too, was the idea of the Military Septennate which was repeatedly renewed, each time with a great increase of men. This last burden on the vitality and progress of the Empire could be effected only by dissolutions of the Reichstag, and appeals from party spirit to patriotism. As Mr. Lowe truly says, these further additions to the Empire's fighting forces gave the Chancellor substantial reason to boast about the irresistible power of the furor Teutonicus when once aroused, and to exclaim: "We Germans fear God, and nothing else in the world!" The repressive powers by which he proposed to gag the Social Democrats were not granted by the Reichstag, though he was successful in passing a far too stringent anti-Socialist law, which was dropped four years ago. The ill success of that law is shown by the fact that in 1871 about 100,000 Socialist votes had been recorded; in 1893 this number had swelled to 1,780,000 out of a total ballot of 7,670,000. Perhaps Bismarck's dearest aim was in the nationalizing of the sixty-three railway administrations of Germany, but the opposition of Parliament proved too much for him, and all that he could do was to induce his own Prussia to perform "an act of abdication in favor of the Empire."

In 1889, on the occasion of the visit of Alexander III. to Berlin, the latter had said to Bismarck, replying to some pacific assurances, "Prince, I believe you; but are you yourself confident of the security and durability of your position?" The Chancellor replied: "Sire, I am absolutely sure of the unlimited confidence of my master, and persuaded that I shall remain at my post to the end of my days, at least as long as I can be of any use, and the weight of years does not destroy my health and strength." No wonder, then, that Mr. Lowe, like many another, exclaims that Bismarck's fall five years ago was like Lucifer's. For a continuous period of twenty years he had served as Chancellor of the Empire with splendid and unrivaled distinction. To-day he is a lonely old man at Friedrichsruhe, scorning to accept the pension that has been offered him for his services, or to become entombed in a new ducal title.

II.



W. E. Gladstone

The second of these biographies is of the "Right Honorable W. E. Gladstone: A Study from Life," and is by Mr. Henry W. Lucy, the well-known Parliamentarian journalist. Mr. Lucy has had unusual opportunities of information. His personal notes of the great Englishman's speeches were made over a period of twenty years. We find interesting accounts of Mr. Gladstone's boyhood and his kinsfolk, but it is only when he becomes Member for Newark in 1831 that the real interest of the book begins. Mr. Gladstone's maiden speech in the House of Commons was, strange to say, in defense of the domestic institution of slavery. His views were naturally tinged with the fact that his father owned many slaves in Demerara, and therefore to denounce the institution of slavery was to impugn the humanity of his father. Sir Robert Peel had already taken note of the young Member from Newark, and when, in 1834, a Ministry was formed in succession to that of Lord Melbourne, Mr. Gladstone was offered the post of Junior Lord of the Treasury. Mr. Gladstone was then only in his twenty-fifth year. In 1835 he became Under-Secretary for the Colonies. In the next five or six years his chief was out of office, and so was he. During these years were published some of Mr. Gladstone's most famous pamphlets. The mere enumeration of all of his literary efforts, from 1827, when he wrote under the pseudonym of "Bartholomew Bouverie," to the present, fills twenty-two pages in the catalogue of the British Museum. In 1841 Sir Robert was back in power, bringing with him the "young man of unblemished character" whom Lord Macaulay had already spoken of as a possible future rival. Mr. Gladstone was now Master of the Mint and also Vice-President of the Board of Trade, in the following year becoming President. In 1845 he resigned, as the Government had determined to bring in a bill dealing with Maynooth College in a way that did not satisfy his Church principles. In the year after he returned to the Ministry as Secretary of State for the Colonies. He transferred his membership to Oxford. In 1850 Sir Robert Peel died. In 1853 Mr. Gladstone became Chancellor of the Exchequer, having made an end of Disraeli, of the latter's Budget, and of the Ministry of which he was the prop. His acceptance of this office under Lord Aberdeen marked his passage across the gulf which separates Tories and Liberals. According to Mr. Lucy, whose descriptive comment at this point is of special value and interest, Mr. Gladstone's conversion had been going on for some time. During the Crimean War Mr. Gladstone's financing was so remarkable that when Lord Palmerston undertook to construct a Government, the Chancellor of the Exchequer continued to hold his office. However, he resigned it soon after, and remained "out" some years. It was during this period that he completed and published his studies on "Homer and the Homeric Age." In 1859 he again joined the Ministry formed by Lord Palmerston. We regret to find so little account of Mr. Gladstone's attitude on the question of our Civil War. The several Premierships, on the contrary, are well described, and the history of the past twenty years, with which Mr. Lucy is so familiar by reason of his close connection with "the place where history is made," is of course specially well done. It is interesting to note that Mr. Gladstone's position before the world is to-day more what it probably will be considered in time to come than it was in 1885; indeed, in that year it was necessary for Mr. Chamberlain (perhaps little dreaming how his own position towards Mr. Gladstone might change) should defend the Liberal chief in these fine words:

---

[1] The Life of Prince Bismarck. By Charles Lowe. Roberts Brothers, Boston. $1.25.

The Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone. By H. W. Lucy. Roberts Brothers, Boston. $1.25.

> I sometimes think that great men are like great mountains, and that we do not appreciate their magnitude while we are still close to them. You have to go to a distance to see which peak it is that towers above its fellows; and it may be that we shall have to put between us and Mr. Gladstone a space of time before we shall know how much greater he has been than any of his competitors for fame and power. I am certain that justice will be done to him in the future, and I am not less certain that there will be a signal condemnation of the men who, moved by motives of party spite, in their eagerness for office, have not hesitated to load with insult and indignity the greatest statesman of our time; who have not allowed even his age which should have commanded their reverence, or his experience which entitled him to their respect, or his high personal character, or his long services to his Queen and to his country, to shield him from the vulgar affronts and the lying accusations of which he has nightly been made the subject in the House of Commons. He, with his great magnanimity, can afford to forget and forgive these things. Those whom he has served so long it behooves to remember them, to resent them, and to punish them.

The following year occurred the Irish controversy and the great disruption of the Liberal party into Unionists and Gladstonians, the latter following the changed attitude of their leader. Even in those troublous and labyrinthine times the magic personality of that leader often fascinated the whole House of Commons. It seemed as if he would sometimes talk with the House as with a man, so completely did he occasionally bewitch it out of all consciousness of itself. This power, of course, also fascinated electors everywhere, even very poor people of small intelligence, in the remotest districts. A Haddingtonshire woman told Mr. Lucy the following as an instance:

> An auld man, Geordie Paul, lived all alane in a wee cot up there. He used to sit at his door reading the paper spread on his knee, and mony's the time, when he thoucht naebody was looking, I've seen him greetin', and the tears drapt doon on the paper, and he aften muttered to himsel', "To think they'd use Gledstane sae ill, and he sic a man!" The nicht afore Geordie deed I gaed in to see what I could dae for him. There he was, sitting in the corner o' his bed, sae weak he could na get on more than ane arm o' his jacket; but he had the paper propped up against the ither (upside doon), and the last words he said to me were: "There's ae [one] thing, Liz; if I could only see that Irish question settled!"

We are glad to note that the chronicler is not so overpowered with Mr. Gladstone's Parliamentary achievements as to omit these more personal touches, which indeed had so much to do with the success of those achievements. Furthermore, it is a pleasure to read in these pages, as one did in the London papers of 1886–92, of that increasingly respectful and often deferential attitude which the Ministerial majority in general, and Mr. Balfour in particular, bore towards the leader of the Opposition. This is perhaps the most interesting part of the book. Though it deals with events fresh in the mind, it reads already like a crystallized history of the past, and the familiar names of Lords Salisbury, Iddesleigh, and Rosebery, the Duke of Devonshire, Sir William Harcourt, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Morley, Mr. Parnell, and others come before us somewhat as do those of more genuinely historical characters. Taking it all in all, we like Mr. Lucy's work extremely, for it is written by one who knows well what he is talking about. Whatever one's views may be as to Mr. Gladstone's politics and policies, no one can deny the noble and Herculean proportions of the venerable statesman who happily still dwells among us, astonishing the world by continual feats of tireless memory, oratory, argument, and versatility. Mr. Lucy explains this last characteristic by declaring that Mr. Gladstone, like all great workers, finds recreation in change of employment. Asked once what was the secret of his impregnable vitality, the Premier replied: "There was a road leading out of London on which more horses died than on any other. Inquiry revealed the fact that it was perfectly level. Consequently the animals in traveling over it used only one set of muscles."

* * *

The influence of Dr. Hermann Lotze upon contemporary thought and philosophy has been extensive. His correction of the somewhat mechanical idealism of Hegel has been a positive benefit. While we acknowledge fully and frankly the debt that modern thought owes to Hegel, yet his influence has been to reduce God, the soul of man, and the external world into logical processes. Against this tendency Lotze has raised a protest, and he and those who think with him have pointed out the certainty of a knowledge from other sources than pure ratiocination. Professor Henry Jones, of Glasgow, has entered into a study and criticism of Lotze's system and embodied the results in a volume entitled A Critical Account of the Philosophy of Lotze: The Doctrine of Thought. (Macmillan & Co., New York.) Mr. Jones points out that Lotze's contributions to philosophic thought have consisted chiefly in deepening the idealism which he has essayed to overthrow, and that, however unwilling, he still remains a witness to that idealistic conception of the world which he denies. The author remarks that the first part of "the task of Lotze consists in proving that the real and ideal are not identical; the second, in proving that, while they are not identical, they are still not separate." In his criticism of Lotze we do not think that the author is very clear; but he is undoubtedly correct in maintaining that Lotze, in attempting to refute skepticism, grants all that skeptics could desire; nevertheless he does not get rid of Lotze's logicalness. In point of fact, Mr. Jones does not seem to us to understand what Lotze means by intuition. The chief value of this study and criticism may be found in the author's attempt to define more accurately the limits of thought. In this task he would have been more successful, we believe, had he gone back to Kant's "Kritik." Had he done so he would have understood the sense in which Lotze maintains that knowledge begins with an inner world of subjective states and then strives to find a way outward. While such an assertion is subject to misunderstanding, it is capable of scientific demonstration.

General Biology. By William T. Sedgwick and Edmund B. Wilson. Second edition, revised and enlarged. (American Science Series. Henry Holt & Co., New York.) During the nine years between the first and second (present) edition of this book a curious change has taken place in the minds of the authors. Certain things emphasized in the first edition are now considered of less importance; certain plans then in mind have been abandoned. The change has not been confined to our authors; it is general. Biology may still be spelled with a capital B, but it no longer threatens to drive Botany and Zoölogy to the wall. It is unquestionably important as an introductory study to these; it will never supplant them. Biology must be taught, and taught practically. The laboratory with its scalpel and microscope is essential. The ideal introduction to the study of plants and animals is to gain general ideas of life and vital processes, by careful study of a few type-forms considered as living structures. The types selected by our authors are, first, the earthworm and fern, then certain unicellular forms—protococcus, yeast, bacteria, amœba. Terse, accurate, and sufficient description of each of these forms is given; form, structure, function, are carefully presented. The English is excellent—a rare thing in American science—and attractive. The illustrations are good. The laboratory directions are relegated to an appendix, and consist of suggestions to teachers rather than set directions, in detail, for scholars. The book is a good one, but we suspect it will still undergo considerable change in form. On the whole, the mechanical work is fine, but there is occasionally a misprint, or a false reference in a figure, and the index is not complete.

Fundamentally, the doctrine of Christ is social righteousness. The trend of Christian teaching in the last four centuries, by reason of the influence of philosophy, has been too much in the direction of individual righteousness. While social righteousness is not possible without individual righteousness, yet individual righteousness has been so taught as not to include social righteousness. The religious teachers of our day are one after another awakening to the necessity of delivering the social message of Christ. A cheering sign of this general awakening of the social consciousness is the continual appearance of volumes of sermons upon applied Christianity. Civic Christianity, by William Prall, S.T.D., Ph.D., Rector of St. John's Church, Detroit, Mich., is an instance to the point. Dr. Prall has evidently studied not only books but "human documents" as well. His sermons are, as a whole, eminently practical, and stand upon the solid ground of facts.

Here and there some of his inferences from statistics and legislation may be amenable to objection or criticism, but the main lines of his arguments cannot easily be controverted. The purpose of his volume is the furtherance of social righteousness, especially in cities. In every case he bases his teachings upon the principles of the religion of Christ. (T. Whittaker, New York.)

A book called Spiritual Law in the Natural World: A Metaphysical and Psychical Exposition of the Operations of the Holy Spirit and Other Agencies, by J. W. Thomas (Longmans, Green & Co., New York), was a distinct disappointment to us. We had long ago, after the appearance of Professor Drummond's famous book, hoped that some one would write a work on precisely this subject. We took up the volume with interest and began reading with avidity; but, alas! the book was hopelessly dry. Its method is a combination of purely superficial reasoning and conventional religionism. It is stuffed with theological assumptions from beginning to end, and is lacking in scientific spirit. The chapter on "Conscience," however, has a new thought, as well as that on "No Total Depravity." On the whole, in the realm of philosophy and theology, which are one and the same thing, the writer has taken a stride backward. He is probably correct in his belief that not one of his suggestions involves the relinquishment of any of the old fundamental, evangelical dogmas that he dearly loves and cherishes.

It has been said that the Middle Ages had religious doubts, but that our time is afflicted with religious doubt. This is probably so true that one of the problems of the religious teachers of our day is to solve the question, not only of "pangs of nature," "sins of will," and "taints of blood," but also "defects of doubt." The Rev. John W. Diggle has undertaken to discuss Religious Doubt: Its Nature, Treatment, Causes, Difficulties, Consequences, and Dissolution. (Longmans, Green & Co., New York.) His object is twofold: first, to persuade doubters not to be content with doubting, but to examine critically the causes of their doubt; and, secondly, to persuade believers to treat doubters and doubt with broad charity. Through many closely printed pages the author forges on, saying many good things in a world of words. We believe that religious teachers who have to deal with doubt will have the patience to undertake the labor of reading this book, but we despair of persuading a doubter to attempt the task.

While Miss Helen Jastrow was translating from the French Selected Essays of James Darmesteter (Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston) that distinguished Jewish Orientalist of France died, and at the early age of forty-five. After Renan's death, Darmesteter was easily the first of the French Orientalists. He was a son of a poor Jewish bookbinder, and his parents desired him to enter one of the learned professions. He early made his mark as a scholar, and his French translations of the Zend-Avesta, with a Commentary, may almost be called the final version of the Bible of Zoroastrianism. The essays in this volume were selected with a view of illustrating the several sides of Darmesteter erudition. They are brilliant and suggestive as well as learned; the translation is smooth and easily managed. A preface in the way of a sketch of the life and work of James Darmesteter has been added to the volume by Professor Morris Jastrow, Jr., of the University of Pennsylvania. It is judicious and complete.

Professor Alfred Wiedemann, of Bonn, has put forth, through the press of G. P. Putnam's Sons, an unusually interesting and learned little work on The Ancient Egyptian Doctrine of the Immortality of the Soul. Professor Wiedemann has correctly traced in short compass the main lines of the development through centuries of the doctrine of immortality among the ancient Egyptians. He gives a clear analysis of their psychology in the earlier and later times, and a description of their views or speculations on the state of the soul after death. The book contains many and appropriate pictures which illustrate or prove the points he makes. To these things he confines himself, without attempting to determine to what extent the Egyptian doctrine of immortality originated in Egypt, or was influenced by the neighboring religions. For a small book it contains an amazing quantity of well-digested and well-arranged matter.

Tourists in Egypt and students in Egyptology will be glad to know that Maspero's Manual of Egyptian Archæology has appeared in a new and revised edition. The translation which was originally made by the late Amelia B. Edwards, with the assistance of Mr. Flinders-Petrie, has been retained, but with additions and revision made by M. Maspero himself. The work itself is very thorough in its scope, though condensed into one portable volume. It covers a description of the civil and military architecture, of the temples, of tombs, of painting, sculpture, and of the industrial arts. It is illustrated with over three hundred apt pictures, many of which are fresh. This volume also contains adequate accounts of the main archæological results of recent Egyptian excavations. The orderly arrangement of the book, coupled with its full index, renders it a most useful handbook. (G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.)

Literary Notes

—Mr. Ruskin has just celebrated his seventy-fifth birthday. His health is reported as fairly good.

—Mrs. Flora Ann Steel, whose novels on India have attained such a deserved reputation, thinks "The Potter's Thumb" the best of her books.

—It is announced that a volume of romantic incidents in the history of Kentucky is being prepared by Mr. James Lane Allen, the author of "A Kentucky Cardinal."

—We learn that the "Quatre Portraits"—the title of M. Jules Simon's forthcoming volume—are to be those of Renan, Cardinal Lavigerie, Kaiser Wilhelm, and Lamartine.

—In the poem "Mutation," by Priscilla Leonard, published in The Outlook for February 15, the ninth line should read "And the new yearnings of each day," the word new having been inadvertently omitted.

—We learn that the biography of Phillips Brooks, which had been begun by his brother Arthur, will be completed by Professor Alexander V. G. Allen, of the Episcopal Theological School at Cambridge. There could be no better biographer of Bishop Brooks than Dr. Allen.

—The volume of autobiography which M. Jules Breton has written will bear the title "Un Peintre Paysan." The book will contain an account of the artist's early struggles, also much information upon the many famous members of his craft with whom he has come into close contact.

—Mr. E. T. Cook, who has been appointed editor-in-chief of the London "Daily News," is a young man to fill a position which such men as Forster, Dicey, Hill, Lucy, and Robinson have had, but his brilliant career on the "Pall Mall Gazette" and subsequently as editor of the "Westminster Gazette" will undoubtedly be continued in his new field.

—The most gratifying announcement in the literary world is that of the biography of Dr. Holmes. It will appear in two volumes, with many letters, and the editor will be Mr. John T. Morse, Jr. The work fitly follows the Emerson-Carlyle correspondence, the letters of Lowell edited by Professor Norton, and the publication only last week of Mr. Marcou's "Life of Agassiz."

—The late Eugene Field, despite much hasty work, had a vein of conscientiousness which is well illustrated in a novel now about to be published. Mr. Field wrote the story twelve years ago, but was dissatisfied with its condition when he had finished it. He rewrote it after the space of a year and laid it aside again. The following year he rewrote it again, and up to his death had returned to it several times. There were eleven versions in all. It is fortunate that the last one pleased him. The story is called "The Werewolf."

—The New York "Critic" announces that Mr. Julian Hawthorne has arrived in this city from his Jamaica home. His $10,000 prize story, "A Fool of Nature," will be published by the Messrs. Scribner, who will restore to it the 20,000 words cut out for purposes of serial publication in the "Herald." Mr. Hawthorne wrote the story in nineteen days, which means that he earned $500 per diem on eighteen successive days, and $1,000 on the nineteenth. The Messrs. Harper will publish Miss Mollie Elliot Seawell's $3,000 "Herald" prize story.

—In a recent review, M. Gaston Deschamps mourns about the decadence of popular reading in France, and mourns the more because he is chagrined to find that Germany has shot far ahead in this respect. He declares that the "Gartenlaube" has 250,000 subscribers, "Ueber Land und Meer" more than 100,000, "Zur guten Stunde" more than 100,000, "Daheim" more than 100,000—that is to say, about 600,000 subscribers for what he calls the "Revues Protestantes." To these must be added the more than 60,000 subscribers to the Catholic reviews, "Deutscher Hausschatz" and "Die Alte und Neue Welt."

—The book on which M. Clemenceau, the French Radical leader, has for some time been engaged will probably bear some such title as "The Two Sieges of Paris." At any rate, the subject matter of the work deals with events in the capital during its investment by the Germans, and subsequently, when the army of Versailles was fighting its way into the capital. Another history of the Commune, written from quite a different standpoint, is that which M. Alfred Duquet has under way. M. Duquet has just concluded what has been called the best history in French of the Franco-German War. It is expected that his new work will be complete in two volumes.

—The "Pall Mall Gazette" describes Mr. Hall Caine's style as a combination of the "Bible and Daily Telegraph." The "Gazette" is delighted to find that its surmise is confirmed by Mr. Caine himself. He says in "McClure's Magazine," "Whatever strong situations I have in my tales are not of my creation, but are taken from the Bible. 'The Deemster' is the story of the Prodigal Son. 'The Bondman' is the story of Esau and Jacob. 'The Scapegoat' is the story of Eli and his sons, but with Samuel as a little girl; and 'The Manxman' is the story of David and Uriah.'" The "Gazette" adds: "Samuel as a little girl suggests infinite possibilities in the way of the Bible turned into fiction."

—The "Publisher's Weekly," reviewing the books of 1895, says that the year just passed has been the most productive of any in the history of the American book trade. 5,469 books were registered, of which 368 were new editions; in 1894 only 4,484 books were registered, but this showed an increase of nearly one-quarter. Turning to Great Britain, we find a publication of 6,516 books for 1895, an increase of 31 over 1894. On the contrary, in France there was a decrease from 13,007 books in 1894 to 12,927 in 1895. The statistics of Great Britain are obtained from the London "Publishers' Weekly;" those of France, from the "Bibliographie de la France."

—According to the New York "Tribune," Mr. S. R. Crockett, the novelist, has been telling how hard up he was when he was a student in Edinburgh. He lodged with a friend over a great coal station, and he used to go out in the evening and pick up the coals which the carts had dropped in the streets. "Sometimes," he says, "I grew so bold as to chuck a lump of coal at a driver, who invariably looked for the biggest lump on his load to hit back with, which was what I wanted. Thus the exercise warmed me at the time, and the coal warmed me afterward. And occasionally we got a large enough stock to sell to our companions, and buy a book or two. But I wish, here and now, solemnly to state that I never, never condescended to lift a lump off a cart, at least hardly—well, unless it was manifestly inconveniencing the safety of the load or overburdening the safety of the horse, you know!"

[For list of Books Received see Table of Contents]

The Home Club

How to Keep the Baby Warm

By L. M. Boynton

I have a little son about a year old. He is a very active boy, and I have taxed my brain to devise ways of keeping him covered in his bed and in his carriage.

First I sewed up his long flannel nightgown at the bottom. But as he grew older, and winter came on, this was not enough. He is a good sleeper, but a dozen times in a night he would either kick off the coverings, or, if they were fastened, manage to crawl out from beneath them. He often made no sound as he uncovered himself, and if I slept soundly, and did not examine his state at least once in an hour, he was apt the next day to have a little cold. I do not believe in a warm sleeping-room, although usually the thermometer does not go below fifty degrees. I tried using very light coverings—a soft down quilt and a puff—but his active little feet soon removed them.

But a few weeks ago I read in a book of Arctic travel of "sleeping-bags," and the next day I arranged one. I took an old, soft, easily washed blanket, which I doubled and sewed up into the form of a bag. Then outside I put a little larger one, also of soft, warm material. They are so arranged that they are easily separated for airing and washing. That night I put on the baby's little flannel nightgown over a light knit shirt. Over these went one of his washable sacques. His diapers were of soft Canton flannel, like those he wears in the daytime. Then I dropped him into his "sleeping-bag," which was large enough for a great deal of activity on the part of the sturdy little legs, and fastened the bag with flat safety-pins to the sacque just under the arms. That night I slept without "feeling" of him even once, and he did not make a sound all night long. He has not had a cold since I adopted this plan, although we have had some severe nights.

Encouraged by my success in this, I sewed up his new eider-down coat at the bottom, leaving it long enough to rip and hem when he begins to walk. Now I don't have to look every few minutes to see if the blankets are loose in the carriage, nor feel anxious when he is out with the maid for fear she'll forget to tuck him up.

I try to keep the floors warm, but, even with the furnace, on these cold days there are draughts which must be uncomfortable for little folks who can't be kept always perfectly dry. I found in one of the stores some little cheap flannel drawers—not enough wool in them to make them shrink badly—and I bought a number of pairs of the size for a three-year-old child, and put them on over his diapers and down under his woolen stockings. I have enough pairs to be able to change them often if they get damp, and dry them up quickly or have them washed.

I found very simple, serviceable "creepers" could be made with almost no trouble. The regulation "creeper" is not pretty, is some trouble to make, and is not close enough to the little legs for warmth. But petticoats were being ruined, and the long skirts hindered progress in creeping, and something must be done. So I purchased plain cotton drawers for a child of three. I got them for nineteen cents, which was less than the cost of the material for a real "creeper." I took a tuck in the binding, which I have let out from time to time, and, shortening the legs by making a wide tuck, I gathered them and ran in an elastic, and the result was a pretty ruffle below the knee.

I put the dress and petticoats smoothly around the baby, and over all placed the drawers, fastening the binding in the back through several thicknesses with one of his gold safety-pins.

The effect is a really pretty little bloomer costume, which is very comfortable and easy to creep in. With a half-dozen of these, which are washed almost as easily as a handkerchief, the baby can always look perfectly fresh and clean, and yet spend his days on the carpet.

Milk Supply

The Board of Health of New York City has taken the final step, so far as its authority extends, to protect the city from the sale of impure milk. All dealers within the limits of the city must have a permit or license from the Board of Health. This permit must be held by all dealers, grocers, dairymen, and delivery-wagon men. The step taken is a logical one. It is useless to investigate the conditions at the dairy farms if care is not taken to follow the milk to the consumer. This last decision of the Board of Health does this.

A Step that Measures a League

There are a great many women who silently doubt the business ability of women. The reason they doubt it is because the two businesses in which women have been employees and employers are the two fields of labor in which there is the greatest demoralization, the least adjustment between demand and supply—dressmaking and domestic service. The problems are the same everywhere, and the solutions are as difficult in one community as in another. The dressmaking problem is another story. This one is the nearer and more difficult one of domestic service. The solution of this problem is to come from the mistress, not the servant. The mistress must bring her best intelligence and a high degree of altruism to bear on this problem, with infinite patience controlled by sound business sense. In short, woman must turn the executive ability which she is using so freely for the benefit of the outside world to bear on this problem which so closely affects her home life.

The Civic League of Philadelphia, which has so positively affected the conduct of municipal affairs in that city, has now turned its attention to the domestic servant problem. The housekeepers have formed an organization, with its own employment bureau. They have a regular fixed price for each department of domestic service, and one for the several grades of general housekeeper. A servant whose name is enrolled in the association's books is there because her employer is ready to vouch for her. Her record is kept, and she knows that only a violation of certain fixed laws will remove her name from what becomes in time an honor roll. The unreasonable mistress, who is constantly changing servants received through this honor list, finds it more difficult than ever to get servants. Not only are uniform wages paid, but uniform privileges are extended. Servants' rooms become important to the careless housewife, for she finds that her ranking as an employer is based somewhat on her care and consideration for those she employs. The association has taken one step that looks to the realization of the dream of many women.

A Housekeepers' Association formed on a community basis for the purpose of securing and training servants is sure to raise the status of domestic service in any community. Cooking-classes will be the natural outcome of such an association, with short practical talks on the several departments of housework to the servants by the women of the association best able to give them. Practice work in table-setting and waiting will follow the cooking lessons. The mistress will be a better mistress because of the new combination of the brains of mistress and maid. The step from practical talks to more scientific work in domestic science is sure to follow. The social opportunities of the maids will be increased through the educational opportunities. Sewing will be the first step toward better all-round training for the cook and waitress. The servants will have their recognized place in the plans made for the winter's campaign of lectures and classes. Changes will not mean disorganization of the whole household, for the new servant will be from the ranks of those whose brains have been recognized and valued as part of the community's stock of intelligence.

So long as the servant can secure the best wages for indifferent service, so long as the mistress will write and sign a recommendation that she knows is not true, so long as she will tolerate dirt, impudence, and disorderliness and pay wages for them, she will suffer. When she joins with others to devise a fair, honest, progressive, businesslike policy toward her neighbors in kitchen and parlor, being willing to share her knowledge with either when they need it, the solution of the servant problem has been reached. It is not a dream. We live in a wonderful age of self-sacrifice. We need only to limit the field of this spirit and center it on the home of homes—our own—and then to share all that we give it with our neighbors' homes, and the dream is a fact.

Authoritative Questions

The State Superintendent of Education of New Jersey has sent out a circular to the citizens and teachers of the State with a view to obtain the home as well as the school opinion of the public schools. Among the questions were the following:

"Has the character of school boards improved under the township act?" "Has the quality of teachers improved?" "Has the attendance and interest of pupils increased?" "Has the supervision by board or supervising principal improved?" "Has the township act in general been an improvement upon the old district system?"

The Superintendent is to be congratulated. It is stated that answers have been received to about nine-tenths of the circulars sent. This result would indicate that the general average of intelligence in New Jersey is high. In this case the answers approve of the township over the district system.

Any individual or organization that sends out circulars asking for answers and receives thirty per cent. of replies may congratulate itself. Ninety per cent. indicates very active public sentiment in the State of New Jersey on the subject of public education.

Care of the Hair

Perhaps some of our readers can answer the following question:

Will some reader kindly give a remedy for harsh, dry hair and a slightly scabby scalp? Is vaseline good for the hair? A Subscriber.

Another Sign: "Hips Back!"

I am tempted to make a suggestion for the benefit of "C. C." and a host of other unfortunates who find the care of their shoulders a weary burden.

That thoughtful parent should simply say to his child, "Never mind your shoulders; forget them; put your hips back and your head up, and your shoulders will drop of their own accord into proper position." Try it, either sitting or standing, and see how instantly the spine assumes its proper curves, and how easily the shoulders relax into grace and comfort.

The secret of poise in standing and grace in walking lies in bringing the hips back, and I have seen a child's face brighten with satisfaction at the first trial of this very simple method of rectifying a stoop.

E. H. M.

An Opportunity

The "Springfield Republican" demands the appointment of women as overseers of the poor, because of their peculiar fitness for such work. Women as volunteers have accomplished positive good in the direction of improving the conditions surrounding the dependent poor who are under the care of the State and of municipalities. It can hardly be doubted that official power would increase their influence, and it is worth the experiment. Women are now employed in the care of the dependent poor, and they could talk more freely on many matters in connection with their work with women than could men officials.

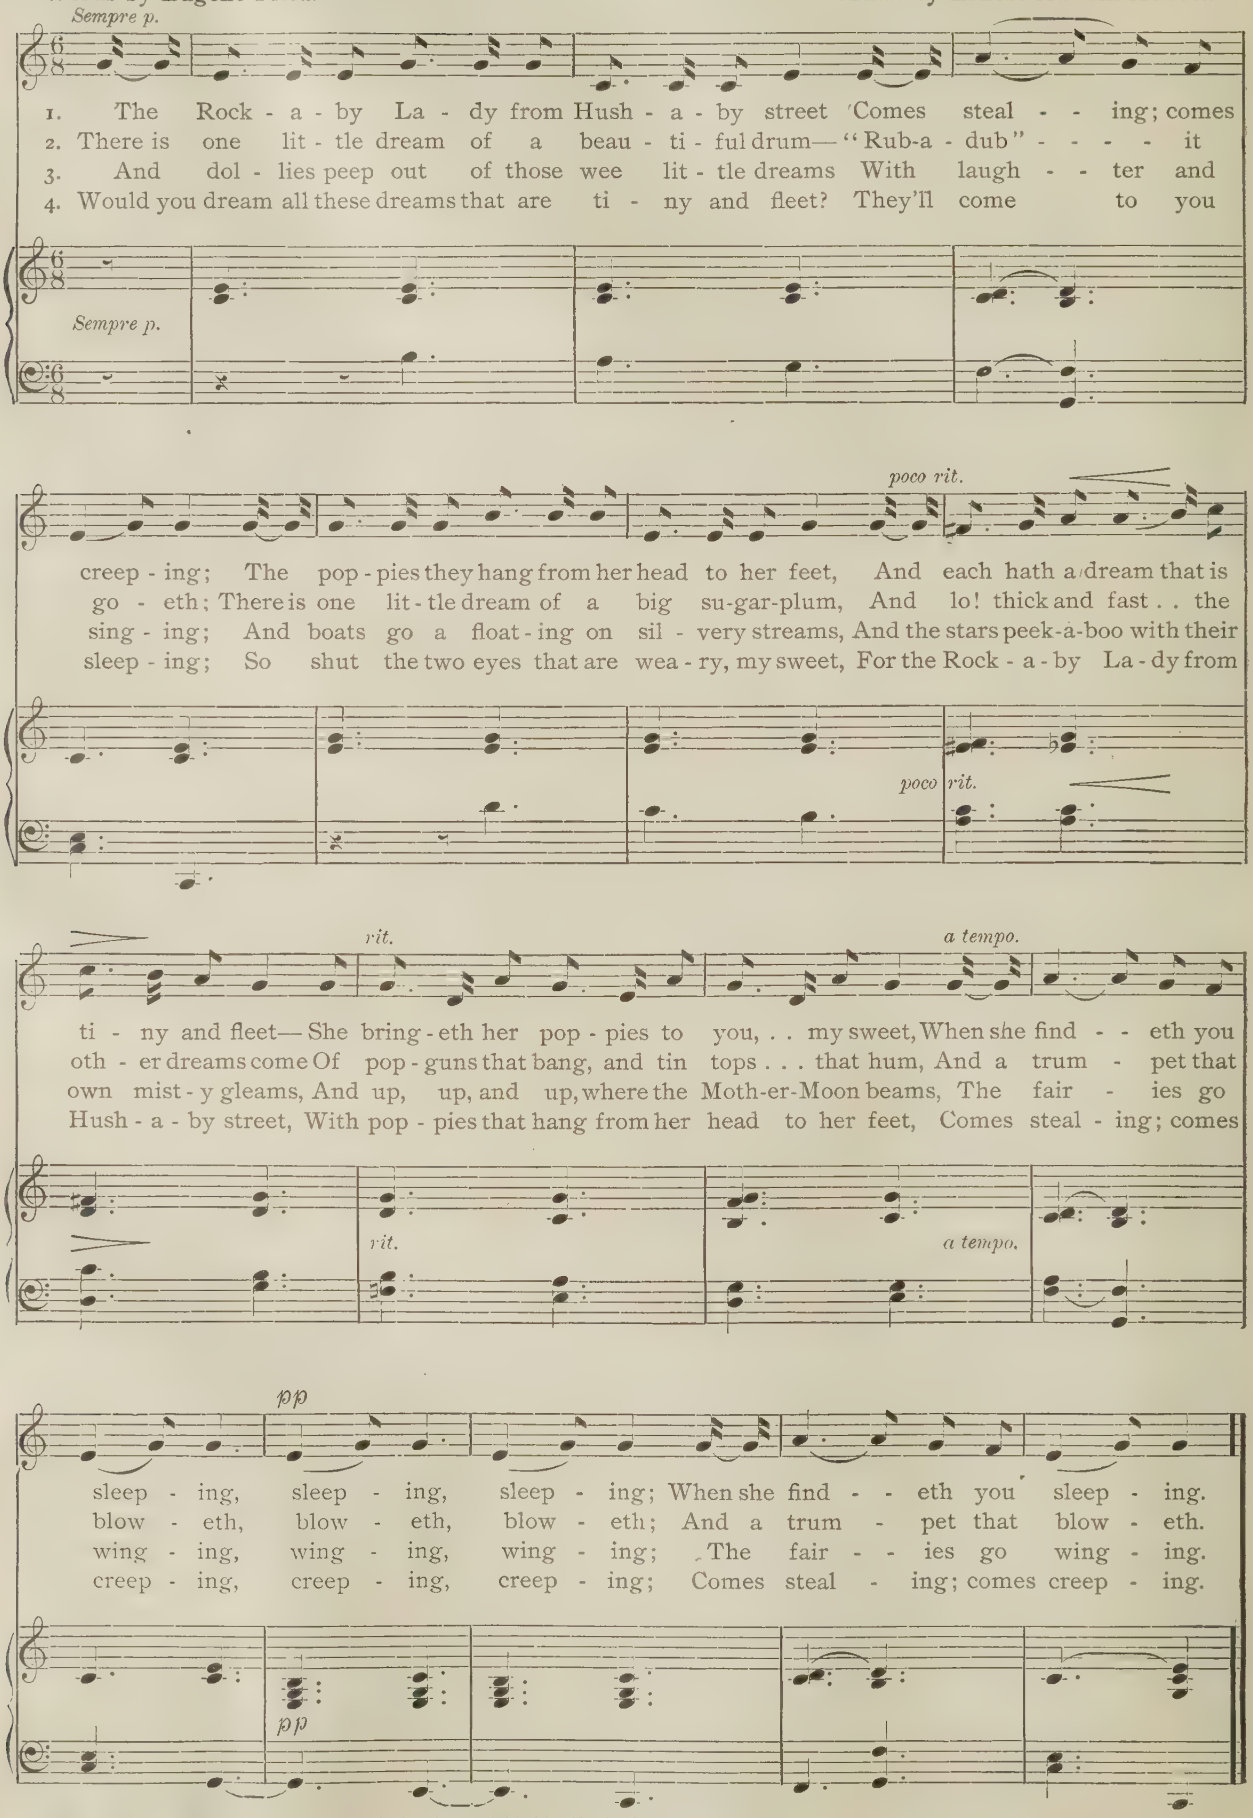
A Protest Against Fraud

The sale of filled cheeses has so interfered with the legitimate trade in cheese that the New York Mercantile Exchange has sent a protest to Washington against a bill regulating their sale. The consumers must learn to protect themselves through legislation against food adulterations.

Domestic Economy.—"What's this!" exclaimed the young husband, referring to the memorandum she had given him: "One dozen eggs, a pound of raisins, bottle of lemon extract, can of condensed milk, dime's worth of ground cinnamon, and half a dollar's worth of sugar. What do you want of all these things, Belinda?" "I've got a dry loaf of baker's bread," replied the young wife, "that I'm going to save by working up into a bread pudding. I never let anything go to waste, Henry."—Chicago Tribune.

The Rock-a-by Lady.

Words by Eugene Field.[1] Music by Ernest Hamlin Abbott.



Sempre p.
1. The Rock - a - by La - dy from Hush - a - by street Comes steal - - ing; comes
2. There is one lit - tle dream of a beau - ti - ful drum—"Rub-a - dub" - - - - it
3. And dol - lies peep out of those wee lit - tle dreams With laugh - - ter and
4. Would you dream all these dreams that are ti - ny and fleet? They'll come to you Sempre p.
poco rit.
creep - ing; The pop - pies they hang from her head to her feet, And each hath a dream that is go - eth; There is one lit - tle dream of a big su-gar-plum, And lo! thick and fast . . the sing - ing; And boats go a float - ing on sil - very streams, And the stars peek-a-boo with their sleep - ing; So shut the two eyes that are wea - ry, my sweet, For the Rock - a - by La - dy from poco rit.
rit.
a tempo.
ti - ny and fleet— She bring - eth her pop - pies to you, . . my sweet, When she find - - eth you oth - er dreams come Of pop - guns that bang, and tin tops . . . that hum, And a trum - pet that own mist - y gleams, And up, up, and up, where the Moth-er-Moon beams, The fair - ies go Hush - a - by street, With pop - pies that hang from her head to her feet, Comes steal - ing; comes rit.
a tempo.
pp
sleep - ing, sleep - ing, sleep - ing; When she find - - eth you sleep - ing.
blow - eth, blow - eth, blow - eth; And a trum - pet that blow - eth.
wing - ing, wing - ing, wing - ing; The fair - - ies go wing - ing.
creep - ing, creep - ing, creep - ing; Comes steal - ing; comes creep - ing.
pp

---

[1] From "Love Songs of Childhood," published and copyrighted by Charles Scribner's Sons.

For the Little People

A Tragedy

By Mary F. Butts

One song lost to the summer day,
Ah me! ah me!
One pair of flashing wings the less
In the apple-tree.

Four moaning babies motherless
In the home nest,
A dying bird upon the ground
With wounded breast.

Who can in such a peaceful place
The wrong have done?
A little thoughtless-hearted boy,
And just for fun!

A Quaint Home

By Katharine Farrand Reighard

The three little American children living in Freiburg, Germany, opened their eyes in astonishment one morning as they looked out of the window. This is what they saw: Far in the distance, high above the city, appeared a tiny dark object, and then another; nearer they came, growing larger and whiter, until finally, by the time they had reached the dark-red spire of the beautiful cathedral, they could be seen to be large birds with twigs in their long beaks and with their red feet streaming out behind. They alighted upon a large chimney, on the broad upper side of which was either the remnant of an old nest or the foundation of a new one. They went to work in a curious way to build up this uncomfortable-looking nest.

For three or four days the birds made repeated visits to the Black Forest, where they found the crooked twigs that they preferred for their little home. When these distorted sticks were set in order to their evident satisfaction, they then brought bits of something in their long bills that the children concluded must be the pine needles to make the nest the least bit softer than the hard branches.

Then came periods through the early spring days when one of the storks that the children picked out to be the mother stork stayed at home and sat upon the nest. And beautiful views she had from her lofty home. Overhead, the blue sky, which towards evening became a wondrous canopy of silver and gold and brilliant colors as the sun went down and the mist came up the Rhine Valley. To the west was the dim outline of the beautiful blue Alsatian Mountains, and in the east the dark mountains of the famous Black Forest, covered with the redolent pine-trees. Near by the dark-red tiles of the irregular roofs and the delicately traced spire of the cathedral made an exquisite setting for this curious little home.

Nor was this mother stork lonely, for the omnipresent English sparrows twittered and flew about with the greatest agitation and curiosity. Now and then a daintily dressed thrush and other unknown birds with sweet and curious notes would pause in their flight, startled by the strange sight.

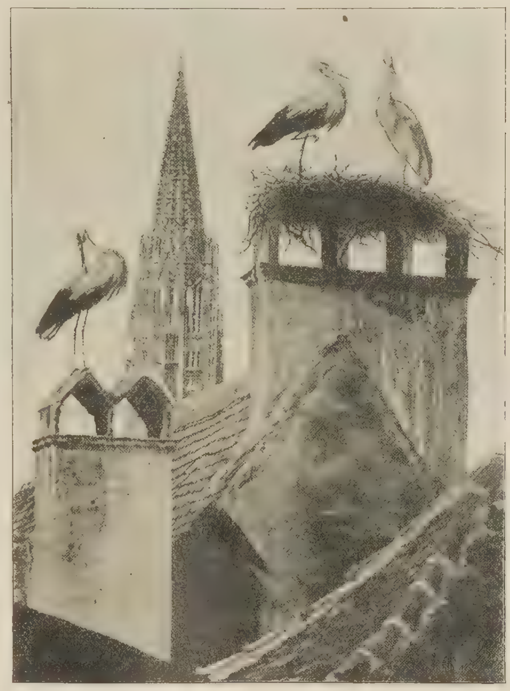
Through the period of keeping the eggs warm Papa Stork was most kind in bringing food to his patient wife, and even taking his share of the duty while Mrs. Stork took an outing in a trip to the Rhine, twelve miles away. Never were birds watched more closely by little bright American eyes.

And now one morning there was a great bustle in the neighborhood of this wonderful nest. A clattering of children's tongues and pointing of fingers to the little home on the chimney, and all eyes were turned up to the pretty sight that the photographer caught a little later with the camera. Three little heads that seemed all beaks and great bright eyes appeared above the twigs of the nest and opened their hungry mouths until their heads seemed quite lost.

From this time on both Papa and Mamma Stork were continually on the wing after food for these hungry babies. At almost any time of day when the children ran to the window to look at the nest, one of the storks could be seen flying homeward with a wriggling frog or a fish in its mouth. Once they brought a friend home with them to show him, with great pride, these baby storks, and it was at this time their picture was taken.

The little storks grew so rapidly that it was not long before they got up on their long, thin, wabbly legs and looked down at the children below.

When at last they reached that stage of growth that their parents thought they ought to try their wings, they began to fly and flop about the neighboring roofs, until their wings and legs grew strong enough to take longer trial trips. Finally, one day, Papa Stork leading, followed by the family, they took their farewell flight, and the American children shouted a last good-by to them as they winged their way up the Rhine Valley.



A QUAINT HOME

The German people are always happy when the storks build their nests on their chimneys, as they think the storks bring good luck to the people in the house, and nothing is done to disturb them during the short time that they stay. Many years ago, when the houses had roofs of thatched straw, it was a very common sight to see these nests on the roofs among the straw; but the thatched roofs are no longer allowed in the cities. In the city of Freiburg, where there are fifty thousand people, there were this spring only two of these families of storks that cared to return to their old homes.

The Man and the Wheelbarrow

By L. W. B.

I watched him with interest. He did not look stupid, but he was. He had an old wheelbarrow; every joint and piece of wood in it looked old; the wooden hub was cracked, and the iron tire about it was very rusty. On this old wheelbarrow the man had tied an enormous trunk by a rope thrown over the center of the top of the trunk and under the wheelbarrow. The trunk projected on either side, and even on the smooth sidewalk it wabbled as if it would tumble one way or the other at every revolution of the wheel. The man had to take the trunk down a steep hill. He turned the corner and started down the hill, pushing the barrow with the heavy trunk in front of him. The trunk was very heavy, and the man could not hold it back. The weight pulled him down the hill. He would stop, look at the trunk, walk around the wheelbarrow, and then pick up the handles and away would go trunk and wheelbarrow and man! Then he would drop the handles and look inquiringly at the trunk. Not once did the idea occur to him of getting between the handles like a horse between the shafts of a wagon, and holding the wheelbarrow back by putting it behind him. Some horses would have known more than that man. About half an hour later the man and the wheelbarrow came back. One support of the wheelbarrow was tied up under the front, one handle was broken, the old wheel was wabbling from side to side, and a big hole was in the bottom. The man looked perfectly discouraged.

The trouble with that man was, he had never learned to think. The best time to begin to learn to think is when we are young. The man knew how to push a wheelbarrow, but he did not know how to make it do work.

The Little Girl and the Lady

She is a dainty, lovable little girl, with hosts of friends. One of the things you discover is that, while the little girl is very young, her friends are of all ages. I think it began with her Christmas-trees. To her first Christmas-tree this little girl invited her friends, and when they came together around the tree they had to smile, for there were gray heads and beards, and people who knew what rheumatism was, and people who were just engaged, and little girls and boys who thought bicycles the greatest invention of man, and boys and girls who thought tops and dolls were the only kind of Christmas present worth having; and there was the little girl in her father's arms so busy giving the Christmas gifts to her friends that she surely thought that Christmas was a day to give presents. Doubtless the little girl continued to think that Christmas was a time to give presents, for she is five years old now, and she still sends out her Christmas invitations, and celebrates Christmas in the way she began. I need not tell you that this is a kindergarten little girl. Not long ago a friend of hers, whose heart is as young as the little girl's, went to see her. This friend asked her if she would not be delighted when the spring came and the flowers were on the trees. The little girl smiled happily, and in her soft sweet tones she said:

Flowers in the garden,
Blossoms on the trees, and the lady with the gray hair and the very young heart wished that she had been a kindergarten little girl, and had been trained to give things their right names.

When a King was Poor

A writer to an English paper tells the following story of a royal grandmother and her little grandson:

> A little anecdote of the Queen of Denmark comes to me as illustrating the kindness and good sense for which she is so well known. It reached her Majesty's ears that one of her little grandsons had spoken slightingly of a poor officer who was much about the Court. The next day the Queen took the child for a walk in that part of Copenhagen where rank and fashion are unknown, and, pointing up to a humble-looking house, "The King lodged there once," she said, "when he hadn't as many kroners in a year as my grandchildren have now for pocket-money. He was a poor officer in the late King's service, much poorer than Colonel ——, and he always thinks of that when the people cry 'Long live the King!' It's not a bad thing for a young prince to be poor."

Notes and Queries

Last November an evangelical minister refused to join in a union Thanksgiving service made up of Congregational, Presbyterian, Baptist, Methodist, and Unitarian churches. He claims that 2 John, 9–11, forbids him to unite in any thanksgiving or religious service where a Unitarian minister sits on the platform or takes part in the exercises. Will you inform your readers (1) how nineteenth-century Christians are to interpret this passage of Scripture, and (2) whether we sanction the religious beliefs of every minister who joins with us in a religious meeting, and whether by so joining we partake "of his evil deeds." N. T.

1. In their own houses they universally disregard it, and show all courtesy to those whom they ostracize in houses dedicated to God. The social principles which control private conduct should control public conduct. 2. We must distinguish religion, which is of the spirit, from theology, which is of the form. We can unite religiously where we cannot unite theologically. "Our theologies must be uncompromising," said Dr. Hedge, the Unitarian; "yet the sanctities of life are not in our separations, but in our communications." This is universally recognized in the house of mourning, where Unitarian and Trinitarian freely serve together, and the interests of pure and undefiled religion are much more harmed than helped by refusal to recognize it anywhere. Any man who is willing to pray with me in private or in public is a man whom I ought to be willing to pray with, then and there.

1. It would gratify me very much to receive a simple statement of what should be understood by the word "sub-consciousness," now frequently met with in print and heard from the pulpit. 2. I read of "The Tripartite Nature of Man," and Heard's discussion of it is, I believe, considered to be a standard work. I also find the expression, "the trinity of man," which may be thought to be derived from the Apostle Paul's "body, soul, and spirit." It is also common to refer to the four characteristics of man—physical, mental, moral, and spiritual. Which of these two statements is correct? W. C. C.

1. Those elements and processes of our psychical nature which do not emerge into the field of observation, knowledge, or reflection, are termed "subconscious." Genius has been defined as the power of drawing at will upon these sub-conscious elements. 2. Each is suitable for a purpose, and so far as the purpose is suited is correct enough. But notice that "soul" in the New Testament is a translation of the Greek psyche, and that in Matthew xvi., 26, the R.V. substitutes "life" for "soul" in the A. V. Psychology now inclines to unify the diverse phenomena of our being under the supreme category of "life," of which the "physical, mental, moral, spiritual" are simply diverse activities.

On Christmas Sunday I heard a prominent city pastor advance this theory to account for the visit of the Wise Men: Zoroaster was contemporary with Terah. When Terah and Abraham left Ur of the Chaldees, it was well known by the school of the Magi (to which they probably both belonged) for what reason they did so. At that time there was a peculiar conjunction of the planets, which they understood would occur again at the birth of the promised Saviour. Through all the years the heavens were watched nightly for the sign, and when it was seen a delegation started at once. Has this theory any foundation except in imagination? C. H.

The only fact in the above story is that a conjunction of planets occurred about or shortly before the date of the birth of Christ.

At close of sermon in The Outlook, January 18, Lyman Abbott says: "I cannot think that Dr. Herron is right, that Christianity has one message for men of wealth and another message for men of poverty." We who have read Dr. Herron's works cannot decide what this statement means nor to what it may refer. Will you please give authority for it, naming book or article, page and line? A.

The statement is based on the two small books published by Dr. Herron, one entitled "The Message of Jesus to Men of Wealth," the other entitled "The Message of Jesus to the Poor."

Some time ago there appeared an article or a review of a book, the theme of which was that the early Church, so often cited as authority for the modern Church, was no more unified in its form of government than the Churches of this century are; that in every city it had a form of administration peculiar to that place; but that all these Churches were united in that they mutually welcomed visitors and members coming from one to the other. Can you refer me to the publication I have so loosely in mind? W. H. W

The article you refer to appeared in the "Contemporary Review" for October, 1895. It is entitled "The Unity of the Church in Apostolic Times."

Please give me the names of some books suitable for Sunday reading for a boy of eleven years who greatly enjoys "Ben-Hur." W. R.

Ingraham's "Prince of the House of David," "The Pillar of Fire," "The Throne of David;" also "Emmanuel," by the Rev. W. F. Cooley. In the current volume of "St. Nicholas" there is a good serial story of this sort, "The Sword-maker's Son."

"I prefer Cleveland's Baking Powder," said the lecturer, "because it is pure and wholesome, it takes less for the same baking, it never fails, and bread and cake keep their freshness and flavor."

Please inform me where or how I can obtain a book or information regarding the conversion of Japan to Christianity by the Jesuits in the sixteenth century. A. F. G.

"The Mikado's Empire," by Dr. W. E. Griffis, obtainable of all large booksellers.

Where can I find a short poem which is an old French peasant's lament, "I've never been to Carcassonne"? I do not know the author. M. I. G.

The poem "Carcassonne" has been translated by Mr. John R. Thompson from the French of Gustave Nadaud. It was reprinted from the "Evening Post" in this journal of the issue of February 16, 1888.

What book on evolution gives the best theory of the origin and purpose of sin? C. A. M.

"Evolution and Religion," by Henry Ward Beecher (Fords, Howard & Hulbert, New York).

Our reference in this column, February 8, to Allegheny College, Meadville, Pa., has been misunderstood. We wish to say positively that Allegheny College offers no courses of study of any kind for non-resident students, either graduate or undergraduate.

"Jesus the Carpenter" is published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York, not by Longmans as stated last week.

If "E. F. W.," who asked for literature on the subject of Woman Suffrage, will send his or her address to Miss Prince, 17 Joy Street, Boston, Mass., a number of pamphlets will be sent giving a much fairer and more able presentation of the arguments of the opponents of woman suffrage than the books suggested in The Outlook's reply. The pamphlets will be supplied to those desiring any or all, on receipt of application, with postage inclosed, and addressed as above directed. They are chiefly publications of the "Massachusetts Association Opposed to the Extension of Suffrage to Women." E. J.

"Pent in his cage
The imperial eagle sits and beats his bars,
His eye is raised to heaven,
Though many a moon has seen him pine in sad captivity—
Still he thinks to dip his daring pinions in the fount of light."

Will some one state where the above lines may be found? S.

Merit

Is what gives Hood's Sarsaparilla its great popularity, increasing sales, and wonderful cures. The combination, proportion, and process in preparing Hood's Sarsaparilla are unknown to other medicines, and make it peculiar to itself. It acts directly and positively upon the blood, and as the blood reaches every nook and corner of the human system, all the nerves, muscles, bones, and tissues come under the influence of

Hood's

Sarsaparilla

The One True Blood Purifier. All druggists. $1.

Hood's Pills cure Liver Ills; easy to take, easy to operate. 25c.

The Spectator

The Spectator received a letter the other day from a young friend who wrote, "I hav livd here very contentedly," etc., etc. The Spectator felt that the trail of the serpent was over that letter. Not satisfied with using this barbarous spelling in letters to his schoolmates, the Spectator's correspondent had placed these offensive symbols before the eyes of one whose age should have entitled him to respect, if not to veneration. As a rule, it is only the young who enjoy such orthographic capers. They have so much trouble with their spelling that they naturally seize with avidity on any clue that promises a way out of the spelling-book. They do not think of the misery they cause to him who has finished his lesson and put the "speller" on the shelf. He loves the familiar redundancies, the silent letters, the convolutions and contortions that make up conventional English orthography. He may admit that the reformed spelling is "scientific;" but that only confirms him in his distaste for "science." He wants flavors in his words, and "hav, liv, and giv" leave only a bad taste in his mouth. And when it comes to "filippic" and "fotograf," the bad taste becomes almost nauseating. Let English orthography be reformed, says the Spectator, but let the reform be confined to the stenographers who write by sound, or to the people who write "reched" and "marij," or to the others who write "B 4" and "Xtian," and do not let us disfigure the fair printed page with these uncouth innovations. They are bad enough in dialect stories and in that professedly humorous writing, now happily fallen into utter disrepute, of which Josh Billings was the most distinguished exemplar.

❖

But, says the Spectator's young friend, where do you leave the heroic figure of Noah Webster securing pledges from the apprentices in the newspaper offices never to spell "center" t-r-e? Are you prepared to praise the innovators of your youth who have given the language its present form in many particulars, while you have only blame for the reformers of our day? The Spectator replies that he has just respect for Dr. Webster, especially as in many of his "reforms" he was avowedly seeking to return to an earlier and simpler usage; but in this matter of spelling the Spectator carefully distinguishes between his "scientific" self and his every-day, ordinary, prejudiced, just-like-other-people self. In his court of reason the spelling reformers make out a good case for themselves; but when the judicial ermine is taken off and the every-day clothes are put on, the Spectator wants to see only the old, familiar words that he learned so painfully in his boyhood.

❖

Those were the days of the spelling-school, before the Philological Society with its list of three thousand reformed words had been thought of, and when it was the teacher's delight to find hard words to "stump" the boys with, instead of seeking to make everything so easy that the stupidest boy could get to the head of the class as easily as the smartest. How delightful was the excitement which followed the old-time teacher's announcement that we could have a spelling-school on Friday afternoon, as a reward for good conduct during the week! There were the "choosing sides," the passing back and forth of redoubtable champions when a word was missed, the "spelling down," the gradual thinning of the ranks, and finally the tragic end, when the last mighty survivor, the hero of a hundred spirited encounters, had to acknowledge himself defeated, unhorsed at last in some Homeric struggle with one of the polysyllables in the back pages of the old spelling-book that always triumphed in the end over the most valiant cavalier orthographical. Where would have been the fun of those Friday afternoons if "phthisic" had been shorn of its terrors and appeared as lamblike "tizik"? if its redoubtable mate "phthisis" had lost its useless letters? if "puisne" had been honored as "puny"? if "secrecy" and "ecstasy" had presented no difficulties? if "apophthegm" and "bdellium" had been turned into "apothem" and "delyum," and the distinctions between "indelible" and "infallible," "millenarian" and "millennial," had been easy to preserve? if even "conjurer" and "battalion" and "jailer" had been as milk for babes? The reformed spelling-school, with its scientific alphabet and its orthography reduced to system and science, can never call forth the delightful memories of its prototype where so much depended on luck and inspiration and a "last look at the book," and so little on rule and reason.

❖

There was always a deal of uncertainty about the outcome of those spelling-matches. If a fellow was unfortunate enough to have a "jaw-breaker" come to him first, he might easily go down; but if he got "reconnaissance" or "hemorrhage" or "psittaci" after they had been experimented with disastrously by others, his guess might well be right. The Spectator remembers that one of his rivals was very uneven in his ability to cope with words. The so-called "hard words" were easy to him, but if an "easy" one came to him he was more than likely to "go down." After making light of "desiccate" and "scirrhous" and "metempsychosis" and "caoutchouc" and "pterodactyl" and "synecdoche" and "houyhnhnms," he would fall before an attack of "despondency" or "ethereal" or "liniment," which, true to his instinct for difficult combinations, he would turn into outlandish shapes, giving point to the schoolma'am's sarcasm, "Why don't you spell it 't-i-o-n-shun-b,' John?" and to her story of the boy who spelled "salt" p-s-a-l-t. Which reminds the Spectator of the other boy who, after "spelling down" several comrades on "Psalter," was asked to define the word, and declared it meant "more salt." The Spectator remembers another schoolmate who, with good-natured recognition of his inability to recall the arbitrary juxtapositions of letters which were dealt out in the spelling-matches, would purposely misspell the first word that came to him; it might be "cancel," and he would spell it k-a-n-s-l-e, and start for his seat, where he would get out his slate and proceed to avenge himself by caricaturing his companions who were left on the line. The Spectator has noticed in later life, also, that those who can't spell usually have compensations of some sort.

❖

As to those flavors in words, how one does enjoy them when once he has become habituated to them! The taste may be disagreeable at first, but, like the Scotchman's haggis or the West Indian's pepper-pot, custom soon makes it loved for its defects. Take that old word "bashaw," for an instance at random. "As proud as a three-tailed bashaw." How empty of pomp and panoply would the comparison be if we said "pasha"! "A grisly phantom;" if, as advised by one of our principal dictionaries, we wrote "a grizzly phantom," would not the image suggested bear, so to speak, an entirely different aspect? And if we wrote of the "salam" of an Eastern servant, as according to the same authority we ought to, where would be the gracious deference, the earth-touching humility, of the genuine "salaam"? The Spectator once knew a very humble but scholarly eating-house keeper who advertised his simple menu under the sign "Billy's Œconomical Restaurant." The flavor of "Billy's" bowl of soup was given to it by that word "œconomical" rather than by the material ingredients thereof. Again, would "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" really have soothed if it had been spelled "sirup"? Not if the Spectator had required soothing. And does a cat ever seem really to purr when her contented susurration is described as a "pur"? Then the Feejee Islanders—can you not see the filed saw-teeth and the cannibal feasts, and hear the "Fee, fo, fi, fum! I smell the blood of an Englishman," much more distinctly in that collocation of letters than in the modern Fiji?—though now that cannibalism is abolished perhaps "Fiji" is more charitable. How much more tropical, fairyland-like, spicy, and altogether sweetly mysterious was the old Kingdom of Candy than the modern stiff, strait-laced, commonplace, and basely alliterative "Kingdom of Kandy"! And, to round out the Spectator's list, what a glamour—not "glamer"—there is about the name "Gaiety Theatre of London," and how empty of fascination it becomes when it is changed into "Gayety Theater"! The Spectator repeats, there are flavors—he is tempted to write flavours—in orthography, and he entreats the reformers to spare his favorites yet a little while!

An amusing story is told of the late Principal Pirie, of Aberdeen, Scotland. Just after "at home" cards became fashionable, one of the driest specimens of the old professional régime was surprised to receive a missive which read as follows: "Principal and Mrs. Pirie present their compliments to Professor T., and hope he is well. Principal and Mrs. Pirie will be 'at home' on Thursday evening at eight o'clock." This was something which evidently required an answer, but the recipient of it was quite equal to the occasion. He wrote: "Professor T. returns the compliments of Principal and Mrs. Pirie, and informs them that he is very well. Professor T. is glad to hear that Principal and Mrs. Pirie will be at home on Thursday evening at eight o'clock. Professor T. will also be at home."—New York Tribune.

Royal Baking Powder
ABSOLUTELY PURE

Upstairs at Night your Silverware is reasonably secure from midnight dangers. The only absolute security against the daylight danger of scratching or wearing is by using that insures the highest degree of brilliancy without the least detriment in any form. ELECTRO-SILICON IS UNLIKE ANY OTHER SILVER POLISH.

ELECTRO-SILICON

At your Grocer's or postpaid, 15 cents in stamps
THE ELECTRO-SILICON Co., Sole Prop'rs, 72 John Street, New York City.

Books Received

AMERICAN BOOK CO., NEW YORK
Heffley, Norman P. A Complete Manual of the Pitman System of Phonography. $1.25.
THE CRITIC CO., NEW YORK
The Critic. July–December, 1895.
GINN & CO., BOSTON
Anderegg, Frederick, and Edward D. Roe, Jr. Trigonometry for Schools and Colleges.
HARPER & BROS., NEW YORK
Harper's Monthly Magazine. Vols. XC. and XCI. January, 1895, to January, 1896.
Harper's Weekly for 1895. Vol. XXXIX.
Harper's Bazar for 1895. Vol. XXVIII.
Moncreiff, Hon. Frederick. The X Jewel.
Davis, Rebecca Harding. Doctor Warrick's Daughters.
Hardy, Thomas. The Trumpet-Major.
Ridge, W. Pett. A Clever Wife.
Howells, W. D. The Day of Their Wedding.
HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., BOSTON
Defoe, Daniel. Robinson Crusoe.
Lowell, Francis C. Joan of Arc. $2.
Smyth, Albert H. Bayard Taylor. $1.25.
Coyle, John P., D.D. The Spirit in Literature and Life. $1.50.
Hamilton, Kate W. The Parson's Proxy. $1.25.
Lawrence, William. Visions and Service. $1.25.
WILBUR B. KETCHUM, NEW YORK
Gilbert, Josiah H. Dictionary of Burning Words. Cyclopædia of Quotations. $2.
Reichel, the Rev. George V. What Shall I Tell the Children? Object Sermons and Teachings. $1.50.
LEE & SHEPARD, BOSTON
Shattuck, Harriette R. The Woman's Manual of Parliamentary Law. 75 cts.
MACMILLAN & CO., NEW YORK
Christian, Sydney. Persis Yorke. $1.75.
Spenser, Edmund. Faerie Queene. Edited by Thomas J. Wise. Illustrated by Walter Crane. Book IV., Part XI. $3.
Shakespeare, William. Troilus and Cressida. (Temple Edition.) 45 cts.
Shakespeare, William. Coriolanus. (Temple Edition.) 45 cts.
Saintsbury, George. A History of Nineteenth Century Literature (1780–1895). $1.50.
Austin, Alfred. England's Darling. $1.25.
Jacobs, Joseph. Jewish Ideals and Other Essays. $2.50.
THE PETER PAUL BOOK CO., BUFFALO
Ladd, Eleanor Mary. Cherry Bloom. Cover Design by Stella H. Aird.
Smith, Luella D. Flowers from Foreign Fields.
PICTURESQUE PUBLISHING CO., NORTHAMPTON
Hawkes, Clarence. Pebbles and Shells: Verses.
CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, NEW YORK
Tyler, John M. The Whence and the Whither of Man. $1.75.
White, Mary. The Book of a Hundred Games. $1.
Hornung, E. W. Irralie's Bushranger. 75 cts.
EDGAR S. WERNER, NEW YORK
Howard, F. E. The Child-Voice in Singing. $1.

In the Interests of Education

The next meeting under the direction of the teachers of the private schools and the mothers of the pupils will be held at Columbia College, on February 28, at 8:30 P.M. The speaker will be Mrs. C. A. Runkle; the subject, "The Ethics of the Relation between Parent and Teacher." The public are invited.

The New England Conservatory of Music in Boston has decided to replace the organ in its concert-hall with one of larger size. The present instrument is an excellent one for church purposes, having three manuals and thirty stops. It will be sold at a very reasonable price, and is in good repair.

VICTOR
YOU WILL MAKE NO MISTAKE IF YOU BUY A VICTOR BICYCLE
THE RECOGNIZED LEADER FOR FINE CONSTRUCTION AND EASY RUNNING QUALITIES. THE VICTOR COSTS MORE TO BUILD THAN ANY OTHER BICYCLE
OVERMAN WHEEL COMPANY
NEW YORK BOSTON DETROIT DENVER SAN FRANCISCO LOS ANGELES PORTLAND ORE BICYCLES
BRADLEY

ALFRED PEATS
PRIZE
WALL PAPER
SAMPLES FREE—FREIGHT PREPAID.

We will mail you samples free of our Prize Patterns, 1896 Series, and our "Guide, How to Paper," if you will send us a description of your rooms to aid us in selecting suitable patterns and colorings.

OUR NEW $1,000 PRIZE DESIGNS are the handsomest and most artistic papers manufactured and are only

10c. and up per roll.

The New York World says:
None so beautiful, so perfect, or offered so cheap.
The Chicago Tribune says:
They will be in great demand by people of artistic taste.

Over 2,000,000 rolls of other paper,
3 cents per roll and up.
WE PREPAY THE FREIGHT.

Agents Wanted.—One Agent in each town who can furnish good references, to sell from our large sample books on commission, and to whom we can refer all requests for samples in their vicinity. Experience not necessary. Agent's outfit complete, $1.00.
Write to nearest address.

ALFRED PEATS
CHICAGO 143-145 Wabash Ave.
NEW YORK 41-43 W. 14th St.

WORLD-WIDE POPULARITY
THE DELICIOUS PERFUME
CRAB-APPLE BLOSSOMS
"A delicate perfume of the highest quality; one of the choicest ever produced."—Court Journal.
AND THE FAMOUS
CROWN LAVENDER SALTS
In crown-stoppered bottles only. Beware of fraudulent imitations put up by unprincipled dealers for extra gain.
SOLD EVERYWHERE
THE CROWN PERFUMERY CO. 177 New Bond Street, London

BREAKFAST—SUPPER.
EPPS'S
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.
COCOA
BOILING WATER OR MILK.

Made in a Minute!
A delicious drink instantly made from
WHITMAN'S
INSTANTANEOUS
CHOCOLATE.
Perfect in flavor and quality. Put up in pound and half-pound tins.
Stephen F. Whitman & Son,
Sole Mfrs., Philadelphia.

Aid for Armenia

Miss Clara Barton and her associates have arrived in Constantinople, and will at once look into the possibilities of applying relief funds for the aid of the Armenian sufferers in the most practical and efficient way. That the work done by the Red Cross representatives will be of the utmost value the past history of the Society makes certain. Reports from the devastated villages continue to show that the wretched condition of the pillaged villagers has not been exaggerated. There is need of instant aid, and there are more opportunities for the use of funds than can possibly be supplied. We urge our readers to continue and increase the relief they have already so generously extended.

In reply to inquiries concerning the possibilities of sending clothing to the sufferers, we quote the circular of the National Armenian Relief Fund, which is working in co-operation with the Red Cross Society: "The only supplies which can be wisely used are grain and coarse cotton and woolen goods in the piece; but no such contributions should be forwarded without previous communication with the Committee. The refugees themselves can be utilized in making up their own clothing if the material is furnished, and so modest are their wants that they can subsist on a pound and a half of bread, at a cost of two cents a day, for each person." The headquarters of this Committee are at 45 William Street, New York City.

THE ARMENIAN FUND

Previously acknowledged	$2,802 40
M. T., Gloucester, Mass	5 00
A Subscriber, Brooklyn, N. Y	1 00
H. C. B.	3 00
Cash	1 00
F. R. S., Marlborough, N. Y	5 00
C. L. C., Marlborough, N. Y	5 00
M. D. B., Marlborough, N. Y	1 00
F. C. C., London, England	5 07
G. L., Walton, N. Y	1 00
B., Willimantic, Conn	2 00
Friends, Windsor, Ont	2 00
M. S. S., Boston, Mass	5 00
P. S., Riverside, Cal	3 00
Mrs. D. S. S., Columbus, O	25 00
Coates College (additional)	3 00
Junior Endeavor Society, Roxbury, Mass	2 00
"For His Sake," Roxbury, Mass.	2 00
Mrs. F. W., Pittsburg, Pa	1 00
T. J. B., Providence, R. I.	3 00
K. D. M., Saratoga Springs, N. Y	5 00
C. E., Otisfield, Me	1 00
Mr. Blank	10 00
Hospital, North Adams	2 00
C. P. C., Waterford, Me	5 00
W., Topeka, Kan	2 00
Eureka Y. P. S. C. E., Elm Grove, Ia	1 60
Monroe Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church, Rochester, N. Y	25 00
Mrs. M. De F., Rochester, N. Y	1 00
A. and L. B. K., New York, N. Y	5 00
Ruggles Street Baptist Church, Roxbury, Mass	28 75
Anonymous, Toronto, Ont	25 00
A Friend, Acushnet, Mass	3 50
S. S. Class of Young Men, Amherst, Mass	4 00
Friends, Savannah, Ga	2 00
Cash	2 00
Dorothy Howard Rogers	1 25
P. B. J., Billings, Mont	10 00
M. E. Berg, Ellenville, N. Y	5 00
C., Paris, France	10 00
M. C. R., Pittsburg, Pa	5 00
Total to February 15	$3,031 57

Good Deeds

It is announced that Chicago is to have a new Home for the Friendless, Mrs. Hiram Kelly giving the site, and Messrs. S. B. Cobb, Thomas Murdoch, and A. C. Bartlett sharing equally the cost of the building.

Dr. Snow, to whom Great Britain owes its immunity from cholera for the last twenty-five years, is almost forgotten in that country, according to the New York "Medical Record." In commenting on this fact, Sir Richard Quain recently said: "Dr. Snow made us masters of the deadly plague of cholera. He thereby saved millions of lives. The sole reward which England has conferred upon him is midnight obscurity. If he had been a soldier instead of a doctor, if he had slain his thousands instead of saving his millions, every town would have hailed him as a hero, and the nation would have honored his memory with monuments more enduring than brass."

SUFFERERS FROM COUGHS, SORE THROAT, etc., should be constantly supplied with "Brown's Bronchial Troches."

A Lady's Sleeve
Is no Small Matter
IN THESE DAYS.
But it is more important still to keep the arm that is inside of it beautiful and healthy, and this can best be done by using
COPCO
TRADE MARK.
in the bath. Copco is the perfect soap. Price only five cents per cake. Ask for it at your dealers.
Made only by
The N. K. Fairbank Company,
CHICAGO. NEW YORK. ST. LOUIS.

How to Fry with Cottolene
Fry everything from potato chips to doughnuts in Cottolene. Put Cottolene in a cold pan—heat it slowly until it will delicately brown a bit of bread in half a minute. Then put in your food. It will pay you to try Cottolene just this way—see how delicious and wholesome it makes the food.
Get the genuine, sold everywhere in one, three, and five pound tins, with trade-marks —"Cottolene" and steer's head in cotton-plant wreath—on every tin.
THE N. K. FAIRBANK COMPANY, Chicago, St. Louis, New York, Boston, Philadelphia, San Francisco, Montreal.

DR. HAYES' treatment for
Has cured and is curing thousands all over the World. ASTHMA
If You Suffer you cannot afford to remain in ignorance of the success which is being attained and what it means for you. Full information free.
Address Dr. HAYES, Buffalo, N. Y.

SICUT PATRIBUS SIT DEUS NOBIS

Old South Leaflets in Volumes
The Old South Leaflets, furnishing so many important original documents relating to American history, can now be procured in bound volumes, each volume containing 25 leaflets. Two volumes have just been prepared, the first containing Leaflets 1 to 25; the second, 26 to 50; and when No. 75 is reached in the rapidly growing series, a third volume will be issued. Price, per volume, $1.50. A complete list of the leaflets sent on application.
Directors of the Old South Work, Old South Meeting House, Boston

LENTEN READING

THE STORY OF THE OTHER WISE MAN

By HENRY VAN DYKE, Author of "The Christ-Child in Art." Illustrated by F. LUIS MORA. Small 4to, Cloth, Ornamental, Deckel Edges and Gilt Top, $1.50.

A STUDY OF DEATH

By HENRY MILLS ALDEN, Author of "God in His World." Post 8vo, Half Leather, Uncut Edges and Gilt Top, $1.50.

BIBLE STORIES FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

By the Right Rev. HENRY C. POTTER, D.D., the Rev. Bishop JOHN F. HURST, D.D., the Rev. JOHN HALL, D.D., and Others. Illustrated. Post 8vo, Cloth, ornamental, $1.00.

LITERARY LANDMARKS OF JERUSALEM

By LAURENCE HUTTON. With Illustrations by F. V. DU MOND. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, 75 cents.

A LIFE OF CHRIST FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

In Questions and Answers. By MARY HASTINGS FOOTE. With Map. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1.25.

THE PARABLES AND THEIR HOME:

The Parables by the Lake. By WILLIAM H. THOMSON, M.D. Post 8vo, Cloth, $1.25.

MODERN MISSIONS IN THE EAST

Their Methods, Successes, and Limitations. By EDWARD A. LAWRENCE, D.D. With an Introduction by EDWARD D. EATON, D.D., LL.D. Post 8vo, Cloth, $1.75.

Rev. WILLIAM M. TAYLOR'S WORKS

RUTH THE GLEANER and ESTHER THE QUEEN.—DAVID, KING OF ISRAEL.—ELIJAH THE PROPHET.—PETER THE APOSTLE.—DANIEL THE BELOVED.—MOSES THE LAW-GIVER.—PAUL THE MISSIONARY.—JOSEPH THE PRIME-MINISTER.—THE SCOTTISH PULPIT. 12mo, Cloth, $1.50 each.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers
NEW YORK

---

5 : Minute : Studies

FOR THE PIANO

By WILSON G. SMITH

These unique studies by the celebrated composer and teacher are designed for Daily Practice, with special reference to the development of the third, fourth, and fifth fingers. In two books. Price of each, $1.00. These books are beautiful specimens of the Engraver's art.

PUBLISHED BY
THE JOHN CHURCH COMPANY
Cincinnati New York Chicago

"EVEN SCRIBBLERS"

like smooth-marking, hard-to-break pencil leads. DIXON'S American Graphite PENCILS are the best for all uses. If not sold by your dealer send 16c. for pencils worth double the money.

JOS. DIXON CRUCIBLE CO., JERSEY CITY, N. J.

Important Forthcoming Books

Ready February 25th

A New Book by Anthony Hope

(COPYRIGHTED)

COMEDIES OF COURTSHIP

By ANTHONY HOPE. 12mo. Uniform with Robert Grant's "The Bachelor's Christmas." $1.50.

Anthony Hope has been called by George Meredith a "master of modern dialogue," and this estimate finds amazing and delightful confirmation in this new volume of stories. They are varied in scene and incident, but possess a common characteristic—a light, romantic spirit. The following are their titles: "The Wheel of Love," "The Lady of the Pool," "A Three-Volume Novel," "The Philosopher in the Apple Orchard," "The Curate of Poltons," and "The Decree of Duke Deodonato."

THE JEWISH SCRIPTURES

The Story of their Origin and History in the Light of the Latest Criticism. By AMOS K. F. FISKE. Crown 8vo, $1.50.

A distinctly popular account of the books of the Old Testament considered as history and literature. The standpoint of the writer is radical and in accord with what has been called the higher criticism. The book summarizes in terse and luminous style the results of the study of Hebrew scholars, and the general reader has in it a thoughtful, complete, and interesting handbook on the subject.

THE INTERNATIONAL CRITICAL COMMENTARY

MARK. By Prof. E. P. GOULD, D.D. 8vo, $2.50 net.

Prof. Gould's work is the latest volume in this new commentary, issued under the editorship of Prof. C. A. BRIGGS in America, and Prof. S. R. DRIVER and Rev. ALFRED PLUMMER in Great Britain. Three volumes have previously been issued—Deuteronomy, by Prof. DRIVER, Judges, by Rev. GEORGE MOORE, of Andover, and Romans, by Rev. WILLIAM SANDAY and Rev. A. C. HEADLAM, of Oxford. Each vol., 8vo, $3.00 net.

"A decided advance on all other commentaries."—The Outlook.

THE EVOLUTION OF CHURCH MUSIC

By the Rev. FRANK LANDON HUMPHREYS. With a Preface by Bishop POTTER, of New York. 12mo, $2 net.

Ready March 7th

A New Novel by Mrs. Burnett

A LADY OF QUALITY

Being a Most Curious, hitherto Unknown History, related by Mr. Isaac Bickerstaff, but not presented to the World of Fashion through the pages of The Tatler, and now for the first time written down by FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT. 12mo, $1.50.

This new novel of Mrs. Burnett's is sure to prove a genuine surprise to all, so complete and marked a departure is it from any work that has hitherto appeared from her pen. The story is laid in the age of Queen Anne, presenting a vivid and frank picture of the time, and, like "Henry Esmond," is written in the language of the period. The Lady of Quality is a unique character in fiction, and her life is full of moving and dramatic incidents, which Mrs. Burnett relates with great power, and in a manner absolutely new to her readers.

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, 153-157 Fifth Ave., New York

THE LIVING TOPICS

Magazine and Cyclopedia.

Unique publications, of rare interest and value to all intelligent readers. Sample copy free. Mention this paper. Address,

JOHN B. ALDEN, Publisher, New York.

The Gospel of Buddha

佛陀の福音

According to Old Records. By PAUL CARUS. Fourth edition. Cloth, $1.00; paper, 35 cents.

"The general reading of such a book as this would have removed a great deal of the intolerance from which we suffer."—The Rev. Dr. J. H. Barrows, Chairman of the World's Parliament of Religions.

X-RAYS.—The Open Court, No. 441, explains in popular manner the details and scientific character of the X-rays of Professor Roentgen, accompanied by a beautiful illustration of a living human hand photographed by this method. 5 cents a copy; yearly, $1.00.

THE OPEN COURT PUB. CO., 324 Dearborn St., Chicago

The Lawton Simplex Printer

saves time and labor; money too—100 letters, postal cards, copies of music, drawings, or typewritten copy, in almost no time, and exact copies at that, by using the Lawton Simplex. Requires no washing or cleaning, and saves its cost over and again in sending out notices. Costs but little ($3 to $10).

CAUTION.—Other things are being made and called Simplex Printers. The only way to be sure of getting the genuine is to see that yours is the Lawton Simplex Printer. Send for circulars. Agents wanted.

LAWTON & CO., 20 Vesey St., New York.

---

600 SECOND-HAND BICYCLES

All MAKES and MODELS, must be closed out. Agents wanted. Send for descriptive bargain lists.

G. G. MEAD & PRENTISS, CHICAGO.

1 8 9 6

MESSRS. HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN AND COMPANY BEGIN THEIR PUBLICATION
FOR 1896 AS FOLLOWS

Visions and Service

Discourses preached in Collegiate Chapels by the Right Rev. WILLIAM LAWRENCE, Bishop of the Diocese of Massachusetts. 16mo, $1.25.

Bishop Lawrence gathers under this felicitous title a group of discourses which cannot fail to attract general attention. They will appeal to all right-minded persons, especially to young men. They are short, definite, interesting, and pleasantly charged with the winning element of Bishop Lawrence's personality.

Joan of Arc

By FRANCIS C. LOWELL. Large crown 8vo, gilt top, bound in handsome library style, $2.00.

A book comprising the fruits of deep, impartial study of the unique career of the Maid of Orleans. Mr. Lowell's review of the trial gains great value from his experience as a lawyer, and the whole book possesses great value and interest.

Bayard Taylor

In the series of American Men of Letters. By ALBERT H. SMYTH. With a Portrait. 16mo, gilt top, $1.25.

This is a careful, appreciative, sympathetic account of the literary career of Bayard Taylor, whose large and diversified achievements entitle him to a highly honorable place in the ranks of American writers.

The Parson's Proxy

A Novel. By KATE W. HAMILTON, author of "Rachel's Share of the Road." 16mo, $1.25.

A vigorous, readable novel of the Southern mountain region. The hero is a rough native who injures the parson, atones for his wrong by taking the parson's place, and makes a supreme sacrifice in his behalf. There is much in the story to engage the reader's interest and admiration.

The Spirit in Literature and Life

By JOHN P. COYLE, D.D. Crown 8vo, $1.50.

A strong, thoughtful book, comprising lectures given at Iowa College, in which Dr. Coyle attempted to interpret the spirit latent in Hebrew literature and life, expressing itself in Jesus Christ, and continuing in the broad stream of Christianity. It is worthy to rank with Dr. Gordon's volume on "The Christ of To-Day," which has made so profound an impression.

The Cambridge Browning

Fourth Edition now ready of the handsome Cambridge Edition of Browning's Complete Poetic and Dramatic Works in a single volume. Clear type, opaque paper, a Biographical Sketch, Notes, Indexes, a fine portrait. Large crown 8vo, $3.00.

Sold by all Booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO.
Boston and New York

Nature Songs for Little Singers

In School, at Home, and by the Way

Written and Composed by N. B. Sargent, A.M.

This is a book of Rote Songs, and consists of school songs, work songs, flower and bird songs, musical lessons in botany, and songs on all the various subjects of interest to child life in nature. The words and music are entirely original, and are melodious, pleasing, instructive, and entertaining. The book will be of great value in the primary and intermediate grades of public schools, as well as in the home. Price, 30 cents.

PUBLISHED BY THE JOHN CHURCH COMPANY
Cincinnati New York Chicago

ARE YOUR CHILDREN A PROBLEM?

The Kindergarten Magazine

brings a monthly budget of all that is practical and potent in current Kindergarten circles. It is the best assistant for mothers and teachers. It will answer your questions.

Yearly subscription price, $2.00
Specimen number, 20 cts.

Child Garden of STORY, SONG, AND PLAY

the mother's nursery helper, is an illustrated juvenile monthly of 32 pages, brim full of home work for busy fingers and bright thoughts for busy brains.

Yearly subscription, $1.00
Specimen number, 10 cts.

PUBLISHED BY
KINDERGARTEN LITERATURE CO.
166 So. Clinton St., Chicago, Ill.

OPIE READ'S

Great Character Novel

The Jucklins (Just Ready)

It blends humor of the unique kind peculiar to Mr. Read with the strongest features of a drama and the delicate touches of exquisite sentiment. Mr. Read's talent is ever bright, cheery, and enthralling, while motives and details are irreproachable and elevating. "Guinea" is a sweet, lifelike portrait one must needs love, and every character in the story stands out in bold relief.

Paper covers, 25c.; extra English silk cloth, gold and ink stamped, gilt top, $1.00.

Already Numbered Among the Classics

A Kentucky Colonel, A Tennessee Judge,
On the Suwanee River, Emmett Bonlore,
Len Gansett, The Colossus,
The Wives of the Prophet,
The Tear in the Cup and Other Stories.

Paper Covers, Each 25c.

☞ For sale at all book-stores, or sent, prepaid, on receipt of price.

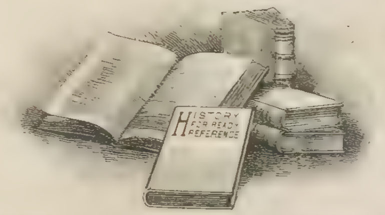
LAIRD & LEE 263 WABASH AVE., CHICAGO



History for Ready Reference

and Topical Reading

By J. N. LARNED, Ex-Pres't Am. Library Ass'n.

☞ Giving History on All Topics in the Exact Words of the Historians Themselves.

Not the opinion of one man, but the thoughts of many men, have been diligently sought out and arranged for the "Ready Reference" of the Reader.

"It supplies what no Encyclopædia known to me can give."—MELLEN CHAMBERLAIN.

"It bids fair to render good historical reading profitable and popular beyond any other work."—E. BENJAMIN ANDREWS.

"Williston Seminary must, all other academies should, have it."—WILLIAM GALLAGHER, Principal.

"It is a most magnificent work in both history and literature. The plan is most ingenious, and its execution most masterful."—HENRY R. PETTENGILL, A.M.

"It provides a standard History for the busiest age the world ever saw, and puts under the eye of the busiest man all that is best from the great historians. To read it is to gain breadth of vision and acquaintance with the best writers of English. Where the Dictionary goes this History should go. The two books come nearer making a complete library than any other two books in the world."—JOHN H. VINCENT, D.D., LL.D.

C. A. NICHOLS CO., Publishers
Springfield, Mass.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE

FOR MARCH

READY FEB. 21

Among the notable features of this number are:

COLONEL WASHINGTON. By Woodrow Wilson. Illustrated by Howard Pyle.	AMERICAN
TO THE BARREN GROUNDS. By Caspar Whitney. Illustrated by Frederic Remington.	CANADIAN
THE "BOSS" OF LING-FOO. By Julian Ralph. Illustrated by C. D. Weldon.	CHINESE
THE GERMAN STRUGGLE FOR LIBERTY. By Poultney Bigelow. Illustrated by R. Caton Woodville.	GERMAN
JOAN OF ARC. Illustrated by F. V. Du Mond.	FRENCH
BRISEIS. By William Black. Illustrated by W. T. Smedley.	ENGLISH

THE NERVES OF A WAR SHIP

BY

PARK BENJAMIN

WHERE FANCY WAS BRED

A characteristic Western story by

OWEN WISTER

For Sale Everywhere

Harper & Brothers, Publishers, New York

Pins Free

Drop a postal to American Pin Co., Waterbury, Conn., for enough free Puritan Pins to prove that they are "The only Pins that Pin"

THE CINCINNATI BELL FOUNDRY CO
CINCINNATI, OHIO.
SOLE MAKERS OF THE "BLYMYER" BELLS
FOR CHURCH SCHOOL. FIRE ALARM &C
Catalogue with 2500 testimonials. Prices and terms FREE.

The Italian Renaissance

The Florentine Painters

Of the Renaissance. With an essay on their genius and a full list of their works in British and Continental Galleries. By BERNHARD BERENSON, author of "Lorenzo Lotto," etc., etc. With a heliotype Frontispiece. Cloth, 12mo, $1.00.

"A highly competent student of Italian art; a practitioner of the most modern methods of investigation. His examination is exhaustive, and in knowledge he leaves nothing to be desired."—London Times.

"We have long wanted just such a handbook. Nothing could be more admirable than the essay itself, and the lists which give us, for the first time, an authoritative index of the works of such masters as Fra Angelico, Andrea del Sarto, Botticelli, Giotto, Leonardo, Filippino, Masaccio, Michel Angelo, Fra Lippo Lippi, Verocchio, Benozzo, Gozzoli, etc., etc."

The Venetian Painters

of the Renaissance. With an Account of their Painting and a List of their Works. By BERNHARD BERENSON, author of "Lorenzo Lotto," etc. 12mo, with Frontispiece, $1.00.

"One of the best things I have ever read upon so delicate a subject. It merits translating into Italian."—SIGNOR BONGHI, writing in La Cultura.

"A genuine contribution to the literature of art."—Boston Transcript.

Lorenzo Lotto

An Essay in Constructive Art Criticism. By BERNHARD BERENSON, author of "The Venetian Painters," etc., etc. With thirty full-page heliotype Illustrations from Lotto's masterpieces. 8vo, gilt top, $3.50.

"The profound study, the great industry, the wide range and minute accuracy of knowledge which the book displays are worthy of all praise. The author's special acquaintance with his subject is infinitely great. The book is admirably printed, provided with every needful aid to the student, and beautifully illustrated with some thirty plates made from the latest and best photographs, many of them taken from the originals expressly for this work."—The Nation.

Renaissance Fancies

And Studies. By VERNON LEE. A Sequel to "Euphorion." 12mo, cloth, $1.25.

"Delightful and sympathetic essays, inspired by that subtle and indescribable spirit which characterizes the Italian Renaissance, and worthy to rank with the studies of this period by such a master as Pater himself."

Lorenzo de' Medici

And Florence in the 15th Century. By EDWARD ARMSTRONG, M.A., Fellow of Queen's College, Oxford. Large 12mo, fully illustrated, cloth, $1.50; half leather, $1.75.

"For the first time, perhaps, we have presented to us, in English, a biography of Lorenzo by a man who combines at once a thorough historical method, a wide acquaintance with fifteenth-century Florence, and a keen and adequate appreciation of the art and literature of the Italian Renaissance. The chapters on the painters and writers of the period are no less appreciative than the historical chapters are painstaking and exact. The illustrations (upwards of thirty in number) are admirable, and include the recently discovered 'Pallas' by Botticelli, and some of the better known works of Mino da Fiesoli, Filippino, Botticelli, Piero di Cosimo, Melozzo da Forli, Pollaiuolo, Ghirlandaio, etc., etc."

The above works will be sent, mail prepaid, on receipt of price, by the publishers,

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS

27 W. 23d St., New York
24 Bedford St., London

For Improved and Economic Cookery

Liebig COMPANY'S Extract of Beef

For Delicious, Refreshing Beef Tea

25 CTS. PISO'S CURE FOR CONSUMPTION 25 CTS.

CURES WHERE ALL ELSE FAILS.
Best Cough Syrup. Tastes Good. Use in time. Sold by druggists.

The Outlook

A·Family·Paper

New Series of The Christian Union

Copyright, 1896, by The Outlook Company.

Entered as second-class matter in the New York Post-Office.

The Outlook is a weekly Family Paper, containing this week sixty-eight pages. The subscription price is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance.

Postage is Prepaid by the publishers for all subscriptions in the United States, Canada, and Mexico. For all other countries in the Postal Union add $1.56 for postage.

Changes of Address.—When a change of address is ordered, both the new and the old address must be given. The notice should be sent one week before the change is to take effect.

Discontinuances.—If a subscriber wishes his copy of the paper discontinued at the expiration of his subscription, notice to that effect should be sent. Otherwise it is assumed that a continuance of the subscription is desired.

How to Remit.—Remittances should be sent by Check, Draft, Express-Order, or Money-Order, payable to order of THE OUTLOOK COMPANY. Cash should be sent in Registered Letter.

Letters should be addressed:

THE OUTLOOK,
Clinton Hall, Astor Place,
New York.

Contents for 22 February, 1896

EDITORIAL:

The Queen's Speech 313
The Venezuelan Question 313
England and South Africa 313
The French Political Crisis 314
Free Coinage in Congress 314
Seed Distribution 315
Factory Inspection 315
School Attendance 316
The New Photography 316
Dr. Nansen's Return 317
The Salvation Army 317
Grounds for Courage 317
A Truth for the Times 318

CONTRIBUTED ARTICLES:

The Salvation Army:
  I. Its Beginning, Growth, and Achievements 320
    By the Rev. J. M. Whiton, Ph.D.
  II. Commander and Mrs. Ballington Booth 322
    By a Member of Commander Booth's Staff
  III. The Founder of the Army 324
    By Commissioner George S. Railton
The Higher Life of Chicago 326
  By Melville E. Stone
Recollections of My Boyhood 332
  By John Burroughs
From Atlanta to the Sea.—III 338
  By Willis J. Abbot
Kate Carnegie. Chapters V. and VI. 341
  By Ian Maclaren
Christ's Teaching on the Labor War 346
  By Lyman Abbott

THE RELIGIOUS WORLD:

Grace Chapel 350
The Methodist Time-Limit 350
Missionaries in Japan 350
The Anglican Church, etc., etc 351

BOOKS AND AUTHORS:

Bismarck and Gladstone, etc., etc 352
Books Received 360
THE HOME CLUB 355
FOR THE LITTLE PEOPLE 357
NOTES AND QUERIES 358
THE SPECTATOR 359

A Good Almanac	is one of the best books to have in the house for reference.

The Sunlight Almanac
for 1896
contains 480 pages, bound in crimson leatherette and stamped in gold (worth 50c.)

Given Free	to users of Sunlight Soap
How to obtain them.	Commencing Nov., 1895, and until all are given out, purchasers of Sunlight Soap will receive one FREE from their grocer.
Contents.	A Complete Almanac, Tables, Directions for Home Management, Language of Flowers, Gardening, Games and Amusements, Dressmaking and Fashions, Recipes, Dreams and their significance (page 330).

Sunlight Soap

Lever Bros., Ltd., Hudson & Harrison Sts., N. Y.

Pure! That's why the Ivory Comb is good for Baby. The soft hair and tender scalp should be touched only by a clean, delicate Baby Comb. We are the largest Ivory Comb cutters in the world. We make them with or without handles—in three grades of Ivory—called, 1st, Pratt Read—2d, American—3d, Saybrook. We will send you a pure Ivory Comb of small size, together with a full description of our many varieties upon receipt of 8 cents in stamps.

PRATT, READ & COMPANY,
P. O. Box 1273. Deep River, Conn.

Vigor belongs to health. Health to well-fed bodies. It's easy to feed some people, but proper nourishment for the invalid, the convalescent and the dyspeptic is hard to obtain.

Somatose

a perfect food; strengthens and nourishes the system; restores the appetite

Somatose-Biscuit, 10% Somatose. A valuable addition to the diet.

Runkel Bros.' Somatose-Cocoa (10% Somatose), for nursing mothers, invalids and convalescents. A pleasant and strengthening beverage for table use.

Runkel Bros.' Somatose-Chocolate (10% Somatose), for eating and drinking.

All druggists. Descriptive pamphlets free of

Schieffelin & Co., New York, Sole Agts.

THE MARCH MAGAZINE NUMBER of THE OUTLOOK will contain the third in the series of articles on "The Higher Life of American Cities,"

The Higher Life of Boston

BY

EDWARD EVERETT HALE

With some thirty Illustrations

Dr. Adolph Harnack, Professor of Church History in the University of Berlin, is the author of an important illustrated paper on Martin Luther, in the series of articles on "The Prophets of the Christian Faith." Among other features will be: The fourth installment of Ian Maclaren's new novel, Kate Carnegie; the third and concluding paper in the series entitled "From Atlanta to the Sea," by Mr. Willis J. Abbot, covering the route of General Sherman's famous march; and an interesting illustrated article on "Picturesque New Orleans."

Extracts from a few Letters received concerning the Illustrated Magazine Numbers of The Outlook:

President D. C. GILMAN, of Johns Hopkins University, and a member of the Venezuelan Commission: The new Magazine Number of The Outlook is most attractive, and I have no doubt that the proposed plan will give pleasure to your readers—among whom I am glad to be numbered.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, United States Senator from Ohio, and ex-Secretary of the Treasury: Your first illustrated number of The Outlook is certainly very handsome and interesting.

President JAMES H. CANFIELD, Ohio State University: I looked forward with much interest to your copy of the first Illustrated Magazine Number of The Outlook. When it reached my hands it entirely fulfilled my anticipations. This effort is not only unique, but it is certainly most excellent and satisfying in its results.

Hon. GEO. F. HOAR, United States Senator from Massachusetts: I have examined with great pleasure the copy of The Outlook for December 21, 1895. If it is kept up to that standard it will be one of the best family papers in the world.

Mr. S. S. McCLURE, Publisher "McClure's Magazine," New York City: I think it by far the best idea introduced into weekly journalism in our generation. It enables The Outlook to enter one of the most profitable and popular fields in the whole publication business. It enables you to make a ten-cent magazine, which, while it strengthens your weekly, will likewise in itself become a great force and a great property. If I am any judge of the value of an idea, I should say that it would easily double your circulation in twelve months. It makes The Outlook far more valuable than any ordinary weekly, and enables you to make it more valuable than any monthly. It gives you at one stroke the command of two of the greatest fields in journalism, and I don't see but that your table of contents would make glad the heart of any magazine editor.

Hon. J. STERLING MORTON, Secretary United States Department of Agriculture: If sufficient patronage can be obtained to warrant the publishing of such a magazine as part of the issue of a regular weekly paper, it will result in affording the very best character of literature at such moderate prices that the homes of the plain people throughout the country may enjoy it.

President CHARLES W. ELIOT, Harvard University: I should think that an occasional illustrated number would be welcome to your subscribers; but I hardly think that illustrations are necessary to make The Outlook acceptable. It is the intellectual and spiritual quality of the paper which commends it to a large public.

Rev. F. W. GUNSAULUS, D.D., President Armour Institute, Chicago, Ill.: I congratulate you most heartily on the excellence of the first illustrated number of The Outlook.

Rev. Dr. FRANCIS E. CLARK, President United Society of Christian Endeavor: The first illustrated number of The Outlook is a most captivating one. Your unique idea of combining a weekly paper with a monthly magazine I should think would meet with immediate and deserved success.

Hon. NELSON DINGLEY, Jr., Chairman Ways and Means Committee, House of Representatives, Washington: It is a most creditable publication, and I trust it may prove a profitable monthly addition to your excellent weekly.

Mr. GEORGE H. DANIELS, General Passenger Agent New York Central and Hudson River Railroad, New York City: I congratulate you upon the enterprise displayed in such an original scheme of publication, which must necessarily be much appreciated by your subscribers, and at the same time add largely to the advantages of advertising in your publication. I shall look for the next Magazine Number with a great deal of interest.

EVERY NEW SUBSCRIBER to The Outlook who sends three dollars for a year's subscription and mentions this offer, will receive the paper for a full year from April 1, 1896—fifty-two issues—and will also receive all the issues between the date of his order and April 1, with the Illustrated Magazine Numbers of December, 1895, January, February, and March, 1896, FREE

THE OUTLOOK COMPANY, 13 Astor Place, New York

The Business World

Exports and Imports of Gold Last week no gold was exported to Europe from this country, but nearly $1,500,000 was received. About $750,000 more than this, arriving on Saturday, was not included in the Custom-House report for the week. Since January 1 we have exported $12,436,000 in gold, and imported $12,502,000.

Call and Time Money Last week's market for call money was not materially different from that of the previous week. The rate was generally 3 per cent. Time money has become easier, but in Boston there was a period of "tight money." For 30 to 60 days quotations are 5 to 5½ per cent., and for longer dates 6 per cent.

Finances Abroad The Bank of England minimum rate of discount remains unchanged at 2 per cent., but the Bank of Germany has reduced its discount rate from 4 to 3 per cent. The Bank of England last week attempted to check the gold movement to this country by advancing its selling price of gold bars to 78 shillings an ounce.

Gross Railway Earnings Advancing Last month's report of gross railway earnings is the most gratifying of any issued in a long time. The percentage of gain is greater than in any previous month but one for three years. Over January, 1895, the gain is about 11 per cent. The most striking gains have been in the West and Southwest.

Iron Production Declining On the first of the present month there were only 215 iron furnaces in blast, as compared with 242 on December 1, and 239 on November 1. The capacity of the furnaces at work has now sunk to 198,600 tons a week, as against 217,300 tons on November 1—when the total was at its maximum. The decline would be more significant if it were not made from the largest output ever reached in this country.

Manufacturers vs. Agriculturists On Monday of last week, at the dinner of the National Association of Manufacturers, a notable speech was made by Mr. Warner Miller, who said that probably nine people out of ten are under the impression that the extent and value of the agricultural products of the United States far exceed the manufactured products. Instead of this being true, the total value of manufactured products in 1890 was $9,370,107,624, whereas the total value of all agricultural products for that year was $3,800,000,000.

Exports for Seven Months Last week, through the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, it was announced that the total value of the exports of merchandise from the United States during the month of January, and during the seven months ending with January 31, 1896, as compared with similar exports during the corresponding period a year ago, were as follows: January, 1895, $81,000,000; January, 1896, $87,000,000; seven months ending January 31, 1895, $510,000,000; seven months ending January 31, 1896, $523,000,000.

Proposed Ship Canal On Thursday of last week the Committee on Railways and Canals of the National House of Representatives made a favorable report on the bill of Mr. Chickering, of New York, ordering the Secretary of War to cause accurate surveys of examinations and final estimates of cost of construction to be made of a ship canal by the most practical route, wholly within the territory of the United States, from the Great Lakes to the navigable waters of the Hudson River. The canal is to be of sufficient capacity to transport the tonnage of the lakes to the sea. The report authorizes an appropriation of $50,000, sufficient to enable the survey to be made.

Surplus Reserve of the New York City Banks Last Saturday the New York City banks' surplus reserve fell to $36,818,875. This table will be interesting to those who remember the circumstances which induced the following results. The figures are given in millions only, showing the reserve at this time for a series of years:

1896	$36,000,000	1891	$18,000,000
1895	33,000,000	1890	7,000,000
1894	74,000,000	1889	17,000,000
1893	13,000,000	1888	17,000,000
1892	33,000,000	1887	15,000,000

Stocks and Bonds Last week's stock market was a decidedly professional one, but the transactions were large; the volume of business, with only five working days, exceeded that of the previous week. The circumstances above the surface which have had influence in advancing or lowering prices were the result of the new Government loan on the gold reserve in the United States Treasury, and the improvement in the international situation, largely due to the pacific character of the Queen's Speech. Stocks with an international character have been very active, but the general list is about the same as a week ago. On the contrary, the bond list—where professionalism has no such sway—shows many noteworthy advances with but few declines. An improvement in bonds coincidently with no particular advance in stocks is significant of a genuine investment movement.

Some Competitors for Government Bonds One difficulty with last week's trading in the new Government bonds was due to a few successful competitors who had not the means to take up their subscriptions, and who were therefore compelled to sell their rights. All this might have been avoided if the Government had declared that a certified check must be received by it as a guarantee of good faith. What a municipality asks may surely be demanded by our National Government. The bonds are now lower than a week ago. The following table gives quotations:

	February 8.	February 15.
U. S. 4s, reg., 1907	109 @110	108½@109
4s, coupon, 1907	109 @111	109 @111
4s, reg., 1925	116 @117½	115¾@115⅞
4s, coupon, 1925	116½@117⅞	115⅞@116⅜
5s, reg., 1904	113 @114	112 @112¾
5s, coupon, 1904	113 @114	112 @112¾

In consequence of the new issue the gold reserve in the United States Treasury has advanced from $44,500,000 on February 7 to $102,500,000 on February 17.

Stock Variations Below we print a list of representative dividend-paying railway stocks, showing their quotations on Saturday of last week and those of a year ago. As stated elsewhere, the present stock-list averages about the same as that of a week ago.

	Feb. 15, 1895.	Feb. 15, 1896.
Boston and Albany	208	213½
Boston and Lowell	199	205
Boston and Maine	165½	168
Canada Southern	48	50½
Central of New Jersey	85	106
Chicago and Alton	145	157
Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy	70	80
Chicago and East Illinois (Preferred)	90	98
Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Paul	54½	76½
" " " (Preferred)	116	129
Chicago and Northwestern	90	104
" " " (Preferred)	136	145½
Chicago, Rock Island, and Pacific	61½	72
Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis, and Omaha (Preferred)	109	123
Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago, and St. Louis (Preferred)	89	90
Delaware and Hudson	127½	127½
Delaware, Lackawanna, and Western	159	163
Denver and Rio Grande (Preferred)	34½	47
Great Northern (Preferred)	101½	111½
Illinois Central	86	96
Lake Erie and Western (Preferred)	69½	74
Lake Shore and Michigan Southern	136½	145
Long Island	85	83½
Maine Central	125	136
Manhattan Elevated	107	105
Michigan Central	95	97
Nashville, Chattanooga, and St. Louis	65	75
New York Central	99	97½
New York, New Haven, and Hartford	196½	185
Pennsylvania	50½	53½
St. Paul and Duluth (Preferred)	90	91½
St. Paul, Minneapolis, and Manitoba	106½	111

FINANCIAL

AMERICAN FIRE
INSURANCE COMPANY
A.D. 1810.
Office, Company's Building,
308 & 310 Walnut St.,
Philadelphia

City of Tampa, Fla.
$300,000
Municipal Improvement
Gold 6s
DUE JAN. 1st, 1921
INTEREST PAYABLE JAN. 1st AND JULY 1st.
Principal and interest payable in New York in gold coin of present weight and fineness.
PRICE TO NET 5½ PER CENT.
Full particulars on application.
W. N. COLER & CO.
BANKERS
34 Nassau St., New York

Guaranty Trust Co.
of New York
Formerly New York Guaranty and Indemnity Co.
Mutual Life Building
65 CEDAR STREET, N. Y.
Capital, - - - - $2,000,000
Surplus, - - - - $2,000,000
ACTS AS TRUSTEE FOR CORPORATIONS, FIRMS, AND INDIVIDUALS, AS GUARDIAN, EXECUTOR, AND ADMINISTRATOR. TAKES ENTIRE CHARGE OF REAL AND PERSONAL ESTATES.
INTEREST ALLOWED ON DEPOSITS
subject to check or on certificate.
WALTER G. OAKMAN, President.
ADRIAN ISELIN, Jr., Vice-President.
GEORGE R. TURNBULL, 2d Vice-President.
HENRY A. MURRAY, Treas. and Sec.
J. NELSON BORLAND, Assist. Treas. and Sec.
DIRECTORS:
Samuel D. Babcock, Adrian Iselin, Jr.,
George F. Baker, Augustus D. Juilliard,
George S. Bowdoin, James N. Jarvie,
Frederic Cromwell, Richard A. McCurdy,
Walter R. Gillette, Walter G. Oakman,
Robert Goelet, Alexander E. Orr,
G. G. Haven, Henry H. Rogers,
Oliver Harriman, Henry W. Smith,
R. Somers Hayes, H. McK. Twombly,
Charles R. Henderson, Frederick W. Vanderbilt,
William C. Whitney.

Municipal Bonds
are the same as Government Bonds
on a smaller scale at higher interest.
Send a postal card request for our Treatise on Municipal Bonds and descriptive list of choice school and other municipal bonds.
5%
TROWBRIDGE & CO.
Incorporated
317 First Nat'l Bank Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

Safe Investments
6% and 7% GOLD
Made on first-class Bond and Mortgage on improved farms in Southern Minnesota. Fifteen years' experience; best Eastern references furnished, including prominent New York Bankers.
Interest collected and remitted without charge. Write for particulars to F. H. DYCKMAN (resident partner), 13 Astor Place, New York.

GOVERNMENT,
RAILROAD, and
MUNICIPAL BONDS

BANK STOCKS

and other

SELECTED SECURITIES

paying a fair rate of interest.

Harvey Fisk & Sons

24 Nassau St., New York

MONEY—WISENESS in investing small sums—that's how fortune-foundations are laid. The wisdom's in the choice of the security.

The one security in plain sight is real estate. And New York real estate has made many a fortune.

That's our business. A syndicate; fifty dollar shares; real estate security.

Mutual Realty & Loan Corporation,
Room 17. American Surety Building, New York.

Have you investigated

the 6 per cent. and 8 per cent. investments offered by us, in which you can invest your savings in First Mortgage on Gilt-Edged Improved Real Estate, with perfect security equal to that of the best Savings Banks?

Full information and references supplied on application to

YOUNG & CO.

Temple Court, 5 Beekman St., New York

Broker for the Assured

I save my customers thousands of dollars annually. IF you intend insuring your life, or IF you carry life insurance taken out within the past four years, confer with me. JAS. A. STEELE, 45 Broadway, New York

SAFE INVESTMENTS

GOOD AS GOVERNMENT BONDS—DOUBLE THE RATE

5% 6% 7% Made in strictly first-class Real Estate Mortgages, State, County, City, and School Warrants and Bonds, with a view to absolute security and prompt interest payments. Best references. Correspondence solicited.

JOHN P. DORR & CO., Investment Brokers
Seattle, Washington

100.00 for a 5-acre farm, covered with wood, in Southern New Jersey; close to railroad; finest markets in the world; especially adapted for small fruits, poultry, vegetables, &c.; high and dry; healthy neighborhood; sold on installments of $1 down and $1 per week, title insured. Immediate possession. Send for full particulars. D. L. RISLEY, 211 S. 10th St., Philadelphia, Pa.

A FIXED INCOME FOR LIFE

is secured by a Perfected Annuity Bond. They banish care, and thus prolong life. They double the income of elderly people. Adapted to all ages. SECURITY ABSOLUTE. Address (stating age)
B. G. CARPENTER, 256 Broadway, New York.

POINTS
Worth Remembering

In the Season of Coughs and Colds.

Möller's Cod Liver Oil

is prepared only from the fresh livers of the cod-fish, and according to the most approved method.

It is entirely free from products of decomposition and all traces of rancidity.

It is acceptable to the most sensitive stomach, and rapidly promotes nutrition.

MÖLLER'S COD LIVER OIL has enjoyed the confidence of the medical profession and the general public for over forty years.

Flat, oval bottles—all druggists.

Schieffelin & Co., New York, Sole Agents.

ASK YOUR DEALER FOR

W. L. DOUGLAS
$3. SHOE BEST IN THE WORLD.

If you pay $4 to $6 for shoes, examine the W. L. Douglas Shoe, and see what a good shoe you can buy for $3.

OVER 100 STYLES AND WIDTHS,

CONGRESS, BUTTON, and LACE, made in all kinds of the best selected leather by skilled workmen. We make and sell more $3 Shoes than any other manufacturer in the world.

None genuine unless name and price is stamped on the bottom.

Ask your dealer for our $5, $4, $3.50, $2.50, $2.25 Shoes; $2.50, $2 and $1.75 for boys.

TAKE NO SUBSTITUTE. If your dealer cannot supply you, send to factory, enclosing price and 36 cents to pay carriage. State kind, style of toe (cap or plain), size and width. Our Custom Dept. will fill your order. Send for new Illustrated Catalogue to Box N.

W. L. DOUGLAS, Brockton, Mass.

CRITERION
STEREOPTICONS, MAGIC LANTERNS &
ACCESSORIES.
PERFECT APPARATUS for VISUAL TEACHING
SCIENTIFIC PROJECTIONS
& PRIVATE USE.
ELECTRIC FOCUSING LAMPS
For Photo Engravers Stage Lighting Etc.
SEND FOR CATALOG.
J.B. COLT & CO.
115-117
NASSAU ST.
NEW YORK.
Agencies: BOSTON PHILADELPHIA ATLANTA ST LOUIS BUFFALO CHICAGO SAN FRANCISCO

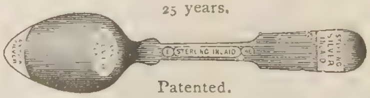
It Pays

us to place our new and handsomely printed brochure in your hands. It is illustrated with Factory views and describes in a very interesting manner the process of manufacture of our

"Sterling Silver Inlaid"
SPOONS AND FORKS.

Different from and superior to all others.

Guaranteed
25 years.



Patented.
Each article stamped on the back.

E. STERLING INLAID HE.

Sold by all Jewelers. Made only by

The Holmes & Edwards Silver Co.,
BRIDGEPORT, CONN. Dep't L. 40

Cudahy's Rex Brand Extract of Beef FOR A FINE... FLAVOR

Tailor-Made Suits $7.50

To every lady who desires to dress well at moderate cost we will mail—free—our handsomely illustrated Spring catalogue of Ladies' Suits, Skirts, Waists, etc., and more than FIFTY SAMPLES of the materials from which we make these garments. Our catalogue illustrates:

Tailor-Made Suits, $7.50 up.
(In Serges, Mixtures, Coverts, Whipcords, etc.)
Mohair, Outing and Blazer Suits, $8 up.
Mohair, Cloth and Moreen Skirts, $5 up.
Jackets, $4 up. Capes, $3 up.
Silk and Satin Skirts, $10 up.
Duck, Teviot and Pique Suits, $4.50.
Silk Waists, $4 up. Bicycle Suits, $6 up.

We also make finer garments and send samples of all grades.

We make every garment to order, and guarantee the perfection of fit, finish and style. We pay express charges to any part of the world. Write to-day; you will get catalogue and samples by return mail.

THE NATIONAL CLOAK CO.,
152 & 154 W. 23d St., New York.

PETER HENDERSON & CO.'S
New Free Delivery System
DELIVERS THEIR FAMOUS SEEDS
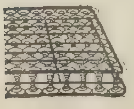
AT CATALOGUE PRICES,
FREE
TO ANY POST OFFICE IN THE UNITED STATES.

Our New Manual of "Everything for the Garden" is the grandest ever issued. It not only points the way to successful gardening, but is, as well, a careful gleaning of the world's newest and best in Seeds, Plants and Bulbs. Its 160 pages, size 9 x 11 inches, are embellished with over 500 engravings, and contain, besides, 6 beautiful colored plates of Novelties in Seeds and Plants.

NOW THEN, to trace our advertising we make the following unusually liberal offer: To every one who will state where this advertisement was seen, and who encloses us 20 cents (in stamps), we will mail the Manual, and also send, free of charge, our famous 50c. Pioneer Collection of Seeds, containing one packet each of New Mammoth Mignonette, New Bonfire Pansy, New "Blue Ribbon" Sweet Peas, Succession Cabbage, Prizetaker Onion, and "Table Queen" Tomato, in a blue envelope which, when emptied and returned, will be accepted as a 25c. cash payment on any order of goods selected from Manual to the amount of $1 and upward.

PETER HENDERSON & CO.
35 & 37 Cortlandt St., New York.

Ideal Spring Beds



"Wide awake facts about sleep."

Our booklet, illustrating and describing them, sent free.

An up-to-date pocket map of your State sent for three 2-cent stamps.

FOSTER BROS. MFG. CO.
Broad St., Utica, N. Y.

Bits of Fun

There are some men who act according to their lights, but there are more who act according to their livers.—Boston Transcript.

The Hostess—Oh, yes! Her people were as poor as church mice; but since her marriage to wealthy John Gotmore she has it easy. The Visitor—Easy? I should say so! Why, she hasn't a single thing to do all day but sit and worry.—Puck.

The verger of St. Mary's, Oxford, on being congratulated by his rector for his constant attendance to duty, said, "I have heard every sermon that has been preached from this pulpit for fifty years; and, thank God, I am a Christian still."—Exchange.

Bridget—The new neighbors next door wants to cut their grass, and they say as would ye be so kind as to lend them your sickle. Puritanical Mistress—Lend my sickle to cut grass on the Sabbath? Tell them, Bridget, that we haven't any.—Brooklyn Life.

"Our whole neighborhood has been stirred up," said the regular reader. The editor of the country weekly seized his pen. "Tell me all about it," he said. "What we want is the news. What stirred it up?" "Plowing," said the farmer.—London Tit-Bits.

There was a good deal of sound human nature in the unexpected reply of the dying old woman to her minister's leading question, "Here, at the end of a long life, which of the Lord's mercies are you most thankful for?" Her eyes brightened as she answered, "My victuals."—Household News.

The Need of the Age.—"The need of the age," said the Rev. Mr. Wilgus, as he leaned back in his chair and placed the tips of his fingers together, "is a more practical Christianity." "Which reminds me," said the captious man, "that your church hasn't cleaned the snow off its sidewalk yet."—Indianapolis Journal.

One day while Millais was engaged in painting his famous picture, "Chill October," among the reeds and rushes on the banks of the Tay, near Perth, a voice came from over the hedge: "Man, did ye never try photography?" "No, never," replied Millais, painting slowly. A pause. "It's a hantle quicker," said the voice. "Ye-es, I suppose so." Another pause. The final thrust was: "An' it's mair liker the place."—London Tit-Bits.

If you need a Tonic
Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate
It stimulates the stomach, nourishes the nerves, builds the brain tissue. A wonderful tonic. Makes a delightful beverage.

Not a Patent Medicine.

In cases of Paralysis
Vertigo Dyspepsia
Insomnia
Constipation
Sick and Nervous Headaches

Freligh's Tonic
A Phosphorized Cerebro-Spinant.

has been prescribed by over forty thousand physicians with wonderful success. Sample by mail, 25 cents; regular bottle, $1.00, 100 doses. Concentrated, prompt, powerful. Descriptive pamphlet, full directions, testimonials, etc., sent to any address.

I. O. Woodruff & Co.,
Manufacturing Chemists,
106-108 FULTON STREET, NEW YORK CITY.

Formula on Every Bottle.

"Pearl top" is nothing.
"Pearl glass" is nothing.
"Index to Chimneys" is nothing.
"Macbeth" with the shape we make for your lamp is all.
We'll send you the Index; look out for the rest yourself.
Geo A Macbeth Co
Pittsburgh Pa

Christian Entertainments!

No church ought to be without facilities for furnishing pure recreation. With a Stereopticon the interesting places of the world can be shown; inspiring moral and temperance stories illustrated; humor made realistic; choicest statuary and artistic gems flashed upon the screen. Do you know of anything better? We don't.

Write for free literature. Large illustrated catalogue 20 cents.

RILEY BROTHERS,
Branches: 16 Beekman St., New York.
BOSTON: 244 Washington St. CHICAGO: 196 La Salle St. KANSAS CITY (Mo.): 515 East 14th St. MINNEAPOLIS: 1564 Hennepin Ave. CHATTANOOGA: 708 Market St. SAN FRANCISCO: 430 Kearny St. PORTLAND: 411 Couch St.

THIS LADY

whose portrait appears on every bottle of Balsam sold, is liked very much by girls and boys, little and grown up, everywhere. For 60 years the pleasant taste of "Madame Porter's" has been in the mouths of the people, and millions own to the wonderful relief it affords when a cold is caught and a cough is mocking good nature. There's safety, too, in "Porter's." Better have it on hand.

Safe and Sure
Good as Candy

Druggists sell it, to cost not over 25 and 50 cents (two sizes).

Proprietors: HALL & RUCKEL, Wholesale Druggists, New York.

SONGS FOR SPRING TIME
HIGHEST PRAISE, FOR THE SABBATH-SCHOOL.
$30 per 100 copies.
CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR HYMNS, FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.
$30 per 100 copies.

Do not substitute inferior books because of lower price. The best are cheapest!!

THE BIGLOW & MAIN CO.
76 East 9th St., New York. 215 Wabash Ave., Chicago.

THOSE answering advertisements appearing in The Outlook will confer a favor upon the advertiser as well as the publisher by mentioning this publication.

A Cloud of Witnesses.

Most people are skeptical about the cure of Asthma, Catarrh, Bronchitis and similar diseases, and this advertisement is intended for any "doubting Thomas" who is a reasonable person. Are you open to conviction? We know from thousands of letters (hundreds from readers of this paper, in which we have advertised for months) that Hyomei, the new and wonderful Australian "Dry=Air" treatment, comprised in relieves 99 out of every 100 people who try it, and cures 99 out of every 100 who use it conscientiously and according to directions. Here are the endorsements of living men and women whom you must believe—you can't help yourself.

Booth's Pocket Inhaler Outfit, by mail, $1.00

Bronchitis.

Hon. FRANCIS H. WILSON, Member of Congress from Brooklyn, writes:

Temple Court, New York City,
November 26, 1894.

My Dear Mr. Wyckoff: On your suggestion, I procured from your friend, Mr. Booth, one of his Pocket Inhalers. It has worked like a charm. The Bronchitis has entirely disappeared, and, thanks to you, is the first thing I have found in ten years that has given permanent relief. There is certainly a great field for a remedy having such merit.

Cordially yours, F. H. Wilson.

[The above is to the late W. O. Wyckoff, Esq., President Remington Typewriter Co.]

Colds.

Boston, Mass., July 30, 1895.

In my family of three we have used the Hyomei, and have been perfectly satisfied with the result. None of us have had a cold since we have had it. I believe it is a great preventitive as well as a cure.

Rev. Stanley Searing,
10 Carter Street.

Loss of Voice.

Brooklyn, N. Y., February 1, 1895.

Booth's Pocket Inhaler works like a charm. The first inhalation gave relief. It is a blessing to humanity, and I am sorry it is not better known. I add my name to the "Pass-It-On-Society."

Sincerely yours,
Rev. J. M. Farrar, D.D.

Asthma.

Deer Park Parsonage,
Baltimore, Md., Oct. 7, 1895.

The Pocket Inhaler came Friday morning. Mrs. Honey had been suffering severely for three weeks daily with Asthma. As soon as the Inhaler came, she began using it, and after a few inhalations, the Asthma ceased, and now, Tuesday, it has not returned. She has had this trouble since she was seven years old, and is now forty. We have spent hundreds of dollars in search of relief, purchasing everything we saw advertised.

Rev. George H. Honey.

Catarrhal Deafness.

Syracuse, N. Y., March 6, 1895.

Having been personally relieved from Catarrh through the use of an Inhaler charged with Hyomei, I take pleasure in recommending it most highly. Mr. H. H. Warner, of Rochester, of Warner's Safe Cure fame, according to his own statement, made in the presence of a friend of mine, Dr. Frank E. Howe, Barrett House, Broadway, New York, has been cured of Catarrh and Catarrhal Deafness of several years' standing through the use of Hyomei.

E. G. Wyckoff, No. 209 Genesee Street.

Chronic Cough.

Manchester, Mass., March 26, 1895.

Inclosed find $1.00 for Pocket Inhaler outfit. The one I bought of you for my mother did her a world of good. She writes me that her cough is completely cured. Success to you.

Abbie J. Gannet.

Catarrh.

Boston, Mass., April 20, 1894.
(Care Jordan, Marsh & Co.)

I had Catarrh for twenty years, and the last ten years (passed in this great establishment) I suffered fearfully. It extended to my throat; the base of my tongue was badly affected. I could not sleep with my mouth closed. I began using Hyomei in December, and in two weeks I was entirely—and now, after four months and no return of the disease, I can say, permanently—cured. I am going to ask the head of this firm, Mr. Eben D. Jordan, to indorse this statement. Elvira E. B. Gibson.

Indorsed, EBEN D. JORDAN.

Consumption.

Buffalo, N. Y., August 21, 1895.

In thirty years' experience in the practice of medicine, I have never given my name in support of a proprietary remedy; for I have never seen one that performed all and more than was claimed for it, until I met with Hyomei, which I indorse with all my heart (professional ethics to the contrary notwithstanding), for I believe it a duty I owe to humanity. Since testing Hyomei in Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, Hay Fever, and last, but far from being least, Galloping Consumption, in an advanced stage, which by the use of the Exhaler one hour a day, and the Pocket Inhaler ten minutes every hour, with no other medicine, in four weeks, was transformed into an assured recovery: I believe in it for itself for what it has done, and I gladly add my name to the "Pass-It-On-Society."

S. H. Morris, . .D., 159 Franklin St.

P. S.—You are at liberty to use this as you may deem best.

Hyomei is a purely vegetable antiseptic, and destroys the germs and microbes which cause diseases of the respiratory organs.

The air, thoroughly charged with Hyomei, is inhaled through the Pocket Inhaler at the mouth, and, after permeating the minutest air cells, is slowly exhaled through the nose. It is aromatic, delightful to inhale, and gives immediate relief. It stops all spasmodic coughing instantly, clears the voice, expands the lungs, and increases the breathing capacity.

BOOTH'S

Pocket Inhaler Outfit, Complete, by Mail, $1.00, consisting of pocket inhaler (made of deodorized hard rubber, beautifully polished), a bottle of Hyomei, a dropper, and full directions for using. If you are still skeptical, send me your address, and my pamphlet shall prove that Hyomei does cure. Consultation and trial treatment free at my office.

Hyomei Balm.—An antiseptic skin food for weak chests, burns, scalds, chapped lips, rough hands, frost bites, eczema, etc. Nothing has been discovered so effective for the purposes named. Price by mail, 50 cents.

R. T. BOOTH, 18 East 20th St., New York.

Well dressed men wear shirts made of Pride of the West muslin.

SUBSCRIBERS' WANTS

Want advertisements of thirty words or less will be published under this heading at one dollar a week. Four cents a week is charged for each word in excess of thirty.

MRS. S. wishes to obtain a position as managing housekeeper, or housekeeper and companion, in a moderate-sized family, city or country, for a lady she has known many years and whom she can highly recommend. Will be disengaged May 1st. Address by letter Miss B., 229 Madison Avenue, New York.

LAKE GEORGE.—Cottage to let at Bolton; completely furnished; ice-house; boating and bathing privileges; fine lawn; desirably located near steamboat landing, post-office, etc.; rent reasonable. For further particulars address "THE MAPLES," 114 Macon St. Brooklyn, N. Y.

WANTED—A situation as Governess or Traveling Companion by a refined Swiss lady, experienced in foreign travel. Speaks Italian, French, German, and English fluently, and teaches the same successfully. Excellent references. Address Mlle. M., 2324 Union Street, Toledo, Ohio.

A REFINED, intelligent woman of lifelong experience with children, in home and schoolroom, wishes a position having entire charge of one or more motherless children. East preferred. References exchanged. Address No. 272, care The Outlook.

EXPERIENCED WOMAN, capable, reliable, willing; has been housekeeper, companion, manager, governess, nurse; valuable and ready anywhere; "taketh hold with her hands." Address PASTOR, Salisbury, Conn.

I SHOULD LIKE TO RECOMMEND a young Norwegian girl who has served me faithfully. She is an invaluable companion, and can make herself useful in almost any capacity. Address 71 West 47th Street, City.

TWO AMERICAN LADIES, sailing in April for PARIS, will receive in their home a limited number of ladies, directing either their studies or sight-seeing. Address WIDDICOMB, Fulton St., Grand Rapids, Mich.

FOR SALE OR LEASE (furnished) for term of years, comfortable home near Brick Church Station, East Orange, New Jersey. Ten rooms; all improvements. Price moderate. Address No. 304, care of The Outlook.

TO RENT, furnished, at Cornwall-on-Hudson, a cottage for the summer. Terms reasonable. References required. Address L. A., No. 302, Outlook Office.

THE

HANDY BINDER

for The Outlook, made to hold compactly and conveniently twenty-six numbers, will be sent by mail on receipt of sixty cents.

THE OUTLOOK CO. - NEW YORK

Great Britain, the United States, and Venezuela

Translation of a letter from M. J. BERNAY, Professor of International Law at the University of Lausanne, and Secretary of the Institute of International Law.

After a preliminary consideration of the questions upon which you desire to receive a juridical opinion, and which have reference to the legitimacy of the intervention of the United States in the dispute between England and Venezuela, I have the honor to communicate to you my mode of looking at this problem of international law; reserving to myself the right of modifying my opinion after obtaining fuller information.

1. It appears evident to me that the United States cannot justify their intervention in a dispute as to the frontier of two adjoining States by the so-called "Monroe Doctrine," inasmuch as the declaration of President Monroe had reference to questions of quite a different nature—that is to say, to the intervention of European States made for the purpose of reducing under dependence upon them certain colonies which had emancipated themselves and had become independent States recognized by the United States. Now, England does not in any way claim to interfere with the independence of Venezuela, or to exercise any control over its administration.

2. Moreover, the Monroe Doctrine and its development, with the object of excluding European States from the exercise of any influence on the American continent, forms no part of international law. The Monroe Doctrine and the extension which it has received have never been recognized by States generally as a principle of public international law. It is a rule of political conduct of the United States Government which is legitimate only in so far as it is not in contradiction with the rules of international law.

3. It is not admissible to regard (as Mr. Olney's note does) the refusal of England to agree to submit to arbitration the whole of the territory claimed by Venezuela as tantamount to an invasion or conquest of Venezuela territory by England. No one can be compelled to consent to an arbitration, and England's refusal does not prove that the claims of Venezuela have a legal foundation.

4. Generally speaking, the claims contained in Mr. Olney's note appear from every point of view to be ill founded; and they are not presented in a correct form—that is to say, are not in accordance with the rules of international courtesy such as should mark the relations of two States which are at peace with each other.

5. On the other hand, the purport of this note, i. e., the request that England should state whether she will consent to submit to arbitration her whole dispute with Venezuela, and the notice that, in the opinion of the President of the United States, a refusal on the part of England would tend to disturb the future relations of the two countries, cannot be regarded as an act which constitutes an intervention or an ultimatum in violation of law.

This proceeding, which is so ill-conceived from some points of view, and reprehensible from the point of view of international courtesy, does not tend to compel England to resort to arbitration. It is simply a notification to England that the United States would regard her refusal as an injury done to her interests, and would take measures to protect them. It does not constitute precisely a menace of war, but, at the most, is a menace of breaking off diplomatic relations—an action which any State may resort to, without violation of international law, whenever it considers, rightly or wrongly, that another State has injured its interests.

6. Moreover, the message of President Cleveland does not conform in its terms to the usages of international courtesy. Yet it does not constitute a manifest infraction of international law.

7. To nominate a Commission charged with the study of the grounds upon which Venezuela and England base their respective claims, and with the duty of making a report to the United States Government, is certainly an unusual proceeding. Nevertheless, this does not appear to constitute an infraction of international law. Any Government may, without going beyond its rights, seek for information respecting the respective rights and claims of other States, whenever it considers that the dispute is one in which its own interests are involved. It is certain, however, that this American Commission cannot exercise any authority, and that its opinion can have no decisive value.

8. Any effective intervention hereafter on the part of the United States, with the view of supporting the rights of Venezuela—if they consider that these latter are injured by England—as a consequence of the Report, cannot be legitimately based on the Monroe Doctrine. In principle, a State has no right to intervene effectively in a dispute between two other States. Nevertheless, there are some exceptions to this rule. Notably, when the conflict is the result of a violation of the essential precepts of international law (respect of territory) committed by a State (which is powerful) to the injury of another State (which is weaker), a third State is, I consider, justified in intervening when it thinks its interests are injured by this violation of public law.

In order that this intervention, however, may be legitimate, the violation of international law by one State to the detriment of another must be manifest.

When does such a case arise? It is impossible to decide this by general rules. It is a question for decision in any given case—one which cannot be pronounced until after the dispute has been investigated.

In the particular case before us it appears to me to be very difficult to admit that in this dispute about frontiers on which the United States ground their intervention, there is a manifest violation of Venezuela territory by England. The greater part of the country to which Venezuela lays claim has been occupied for many years by British subjects.

The rights upon which Venezuela mainly grounds her claim had their origin at a period anterior to the conquest of Guiana by Holland, a conquest recognized later on by Spain—from which England appears to derive her rights.

Lastly, England consents to cede by arrangement some part of the territories which are unoccupied, and which she claims as hers.

Under such circumstances it appears impossible to affirm, or even to discover, any manifest violation, open and direct, of Venezuela territory—the only hypothesis which would justify, in some degree, if it actually occurred, an effective intervention on the part of the United States.

Such are the main points which I think should form the subject of investigation for the purpose of a juridical report on the difference between England and the United States.

I am afraid that this mode of considering the subject may not meet the objects which the International Arbitration and Peace Association has in view; or may not contain a precise reply to the questions respecting which they desire a juridical opinion. Should such be the case, I should be greatly obliged by your frankly telling me so. If, on the other hand, you consider that a report drawn up from the point of view which I have had the honor to indicate ould be useful, I am at your service.

J. BERNAY, Professor.

To Hodgson Pratt, Chairman of the International Arbitration and Peace Association.

you do the mending

Not the Merchant.

He wants to make as much as he can by selling you inferior bindings which he claims are "just as good" as S. H. & M. But you do the mending. Insist on having

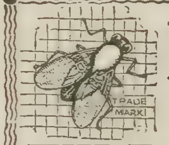
TRADE - S·H·&M· - MARK

Bias Velveteen Skirt Binding and you save the mending.

If your dealer will not supply you we will.

Send for samples, showing labels and materials, to the S. H. & M. Co., P. O. Box 699. New York City.



No Flies

IN A HOUSE WITH OUR

WIRE SCREENS

SPECIALTY:

SCREENING HOUSES TO ORDER

WE PAY FREIGHT. | WRITE FOR CATALOGUE.

LARGEST FACTORIES IN THE WORLD.

THE E. T. BURROWES CO.

PORTLAND, MAINE.

OFFICES IN ALL LARGE CITIES.

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY Pittsburgh.
BEYMER-BAUMAN Pittsburgh.
DAVIS-CHAMBERS Pittsburgh.
FAHNESTOCK Pittsburgh.
ANCHOR, ECKSTEIN } Cincinnati.
ATLANTIC, BRADLEY, BROOKLYN, JEWETT, ULSTER, UNION } New York
SOUTHERN, SHIPMAN } Chicago.
COLLIER, MISSOURI, RED SEAL, SOUTHERN } St. Louis.
JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS.CO Philadelphia.
MORLEY Cleveland.
SALEM Salem, Mass.
CORNELL Buffalo.
KENTUCKY Louisville.

THE KIND THAT PAYS, the kind that lasts. In painting, labor is three-fourths the cost; and with Pure White Lead and Tinting Colors more work can be done in a given time than with inferior materials. It makes — with Pure Linseed Oil — the best paint and the kind that lasts. To be sure of getting examine the brand (see list genuine brands). Any shade or color desired can be easily obtained by using NATIONAL LEAD CO.'s brands of Pure White Lead and Tinting Colors.

Pure White Lead

Pamphlet giving valuable information and card showing samples of colors free; also cards showing pictures of twelve houses of different designs painted in various styles or combinations of shades forwarded upon application to those intending to paint.

NATIONAL LEAD CO.,
1 Broadway, New York.

For 40c. a Gallon

you can buy some of the most beautiful "weatherbeaten brown" shades of others at 60 and 75c. Good paint costs $1.25, and the best paint is not fit for shingles—it seals the pores, and the inner moisture rots the wood. Creosote tans the albuminous part of the wood and makes it everlasting.

Cabot's Creosote Shingle Stains,

Send for Samples of 22 Shades on Wood and Colored Sketches of Houses.

SAMUEL CABOT, Sole Manufacturer, 81 Kilby Street, Boston, Mass.
Agents at all Central Points

1851 FORTY-FIFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT 1896

OF THE

Phoenix

Mutual Life Insurance Company

OF HARTFORD, CONN.

JANUARY 1, 1896

ASSETS :

Loans on First Mortgages of Real Estate,		$5,978,010.92
Premium Notes and Loans on Policies in force,		706,192.09
Loans on Collateral,		5,600.00
Cost Value of Real Estate owned by the Company,		858,950.29
City and Municipal and Railroad Bonds and Stocks,		2,185,435.63
Bank Stocks,		178,981.00
Cash in Office,		269.58
Cash Deposited in Banks,		202,997.30
Add :		$10,116,436.81
Market Value of Stocks and Bonds over cost,	$41,205.31
Interest accrued and due,	146,502.32
Net Deferred and Outstanding Premiums,	151,393.68	$339,101.31
Gross Assets January 1, 1896,		$10,455,538.12

LIABILITIES :

Reserve on Policies in force at 4 per cent. interest (Conn. and N. Y. Standard),	$9,487,291.00
Claims by death outstanding,	54,430.00
Premiums paid in advance,	7,710.00
Special Policy and Investment Reserves,	327,550.00	$9,876,981.00
Surplus at 4 per cent.,		$578,557.12

	1893	1894	1895
Policies issued,	4,769	5,428	6,203
Insurance written,	$8,835,062	$9,960,858	$11,237,658
New Premiums received,	225,960	290,939	307,719
Total Premiums received,	1,027,092	1,198,561	1,330,804
Policies in force,	21,420	22,797	24,999
Insurance in force,	33,681,523	36,381,049	40,460,331

This Company has paid since organization for DEATH LOSSES, MATURED ENDOWMENTS, DIVIDENDS TO POLICY-HOLDERS, and SURRENDERED POLICIES, more than $35,000,000.00.

JONATHAN B. BUNCE, President. CHARLES H. LAWRENCE, Secretary.
JOHN M. HOLCOMBE, Vice-President. ARCHIBALD A. WELCH, Actuary.
WILLIAM D. MORGAN, M.D., Medical Director.
GEORGE S. MILLER, Supt. of Agencies.

EDUCATIONAL

New York City

SCHERMERHORN'S TEACHERS' AGENCY
Oldest and best known in U. S.
Established 1855. 3 East 14th St., N. Y.

The Misses Ely's School for Girls
RIVERSIDE DRIVE
85th and 86th Streets, New York

TEACHERS COLLEGE Morningside Heights, New York (120th St., West).—Professional training for general teachers and specialists: Manual training, science, kindergarten, English, form, drawing and color, history of art, domestic science, general pedagogy. Degrees given by Columbia College to both sexes. Circulars of Information. "Teachers College Bulletin." WALTER L. HERVEY, President.

Miss Peebles and Miss Thompson's Boarding and Day School for Girls
30, 32, and 34 East 57th St., New York
Special students admitted.

California

POMONA COLLEGE, Claremont, Cal.—Full College courses leading to degrees of B.A., B.L., B.S. Degrees recognized by University of California and other similar graduate schools. Thirty-five miles from Los Angeles. An Academic course. Preparatory school preparing for all institutions connected with the College. Address C. G. BALDWIN, President.

Connecticut

DARIEN, CONN.—PRIVATE HOME AND School for Feeble-Minded Youth offers every facility for care, education, and training, with the advantages of a pleasant country home.
J. J. KINDRED, M.D., Med. Supt., formerly Clinical Ass't Darenth School for Feeble-Minded, London, Eng.
M. LILA KINDRED, Principal.

WOODSIDE SEMINARY
Terms, $500 to $700. City advantages for culture and study. Rural surroundings.
Miss SARA J. SMITH, Principal, Hartford, Conn.

Massachusetts

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN
TEACHERS' BUREAU
3 Park St., Boston
Native language teachers a specialty.

New York

RIVERVIEW ACADEMY
60th year. Prepares thoroughly for College, the Government Academies, and Business. U. S. Army officer detailed at Riverview by Secretary of War.
JOSEPH B. BISBEE, A.M., Principal, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

Mount Pleasant Military Academy
A College-Fitting and Character-Building School for Boys. 76th year. Library of 12,000 volumes. Summer Session. Reference, Hon. JOSEPH H. CHOATE. Send for catalogue.
CHARLES F. BRUSIE, A.M., ARTHUR T. EMORY, A.B., Principals. SING SING-ON-HUDSON, N. Y.

The Wheel That Leads

The Liberty is made right—It is the wheel you are sure of.

The Liberty Cycle Company
4 Warren Street, New York, N. Y.

Arnold
Constable & Co.

SPRING IMPORTATIONS

Paris Lingerie

Peignoirs,
Matinées,
Jupons,
Chemises de Nuit.

Fancy Trimmed Waists

Organdie, Batiste, and Linon.

Silk Petticoats

Silk Waists.

Children's Wear

Hand-made Guimpes,
School Frocks,
Fancy Lawn Dresses,
Piqué Coats,
French Caps.

Broadway & 19th st.
NEW YORK

Pennsylvania

Miss Gordon's French and English Boarding and Day School for Young Ladies and Little Girls
4110 and 4112 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Travel in Europe

If you are thinking of a trip to Europe this summer, the Recreation Department will be glad to help you. It can furnish all information as to routes and sailings. It can give you the circulars or information of the hotels or pensions at the points you desire to visit. We shall be glad to help, if you write the

Recreation Department
The Outlook

13 ASTOR PLACE, NEW YORK

Personally Conducted Excursions to California

In addition to its regular daily tourist sleeping-car service to California, the Chicago, Union Pacific, and North-Western Line is now running personally conducted excursions, leaving Chicago every Thursday, after arrival of through trains from the East. These excursions are accompanied through to San Francisco and Los Angeles by experienced conductors; and low rates, picturesque route, quickest time, and the best of attention are among the advantages which they offer. Ask your nearest ticket agent for full particulars, or write to W. B. Kniskern, G.P. & T.A., Chicago and North-Western Railway, Chicago, Ill.

Noon Train Between Boston and New York via Springfield Line

The Boston and Albany Railroad has in service a 12 o'clock, noon, train between New York and Boston. This train leaves either city at 12 o'clock, noon, and arrives at its destination at 5:30 P.M., thus making the trip in five and one-half hours. Station, Kneeland St., Boston. Fare, $4.98; Parlor-car seat, $1. A. S. Hanson, G.P.A.

TRAVELERS' R. R. GUIDE Formerly Appletons'.
R. R. Maps and Time-Tables. Conveniently Indexed. Monthly—25 cents. 24 Park Place, N. Y.

TOURS AND TRAVEL

ALL WINTER RESORTS IN

FLORIDA, CUBA, and WEST INDIES

can be reached direct by the

RAILWAY AND STEAMSHIP LINES OF

THE PLANT SYSTEM

and its connections from the North, East, and West.

Four magnificent hotels on the West Coast of Florida, owned and operated by the Plant System, under the management of Mr. D. P. HATHAWAY.

TAMPA BAY, Tampa, Fla.
SEMINOLE, Winter Park, Fla.
THE INN, Port Tampa, Fla.
OCALA HOUSE, Ocala, Fla.

Semi-weekly service, via Plant Steamship Line, from Port Tampa, to Key West and Havana; also to all fishing and hunting resorts of the Gulf Coast.

Six special excursions to Jamaica, leaving Port Tampa, Fla., Feb. 28th, March 13th and 27th, by United States Mail Steamships of the Plant S.S. Line.

☞ Secure tickets reading via the lines of the PLANT SYSTEM and CONNECTIONS.

Three daily trains with through Pullman Sleeping-Cars from the North and East, via Pennsylvania R. R. and Atlantic Coast Line; also via Steamship Lines from Boston, New York, and Baltimore to Savannah, connecting with Plant System.

Literature on Florida and Cuba mailed on application.

B. W. WRENN, P.T.M., Savannah, Ga.
J. J. FARNSWORTH, E.P.A., 261 Broadway, New York.
A. P. LANE, N.E.P.A., 207 Wash'n St., Boston, Mass.

WHERE? Write Gaze where and when you wish to Travel, and they will inform How and the Cost. Escorted Parties for Winter, Spring or Summer. Tickets issued for Independent Travel Everywhere. Choice Berths on all Steamships—no extra cost. See Tourist Gazette (by mail 10 cts.), and Save Money. State your wishes carefully; full information Free. Address HENRY GAZE & SONS, Ltd., Universal Tourist Agents, 113 Broadway, N.Y.; 201 Washington St., Boston; 220 S. Clark St., Chicago, Ill.; 135 S. Fifth St., Philadelphia. WHEN?

DR. CHENEY'S PARTY TO EUROPE. (9th season.) Personally conducted by O. D. Cheney, M.D., and wife, of Haverhill, Mass. Limited to 25. 78 days. Cunard steamer, June 27.

Tours and Travel

"SEA ROUTE TO SAN FRANCISCO"

COLUMBIAN LINE
PANAMA RAILROAD CO.

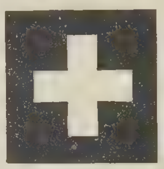
A Trip for HEALTH, REST, and PLEASURE passing within view of Cuba, crossing the historic Isthmus of Panama, and calling at ten Pacific ports of Central America and Mexico, with opportunity to visit these Spanish-American Countries. The educational advantages of this trip, in addition to the pleasures of the journey, render it peculiarly attractive, so much so that tourists repeat the voyage year after year. THIRTY-DAY TRIP FOR $120. EXCURSION, $216. All expenses included. Steamers have superior accommodations and leave New York every ten days. For full particulars apply at Company's Office, 29 Broadway.

JOHN MUIR, Traffic Manager.
Steamers sail from Pier foot West 27th St., N. Y.

De POTTER'S TOURS

17 years of uninterrupted success. Select Parties to Central Europe (via Genoa), Northern Europe (Norway, North Cape, Russia, etc.), Central Europe, British Isles, etc., sail in May, June, July. Superior escort. Superior arrangements. Old World Tourist Guide, illustrated, with Programs, free. Also Fall and Winter Tours. Independent Steamship and Circular Railway Tickets.

A. De POTTER,
1466 Broadway (cor. 42d Street), N. Y.



(SWITZERLAND)

The FRAZAR TOURS TO EUROPE
Tenth Season

Eight Comprehensive Tours, sailing May 9, June 6, 20, 24, and 27, July 4. Including British Isles, Holland, Belgium, Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Italy, and France. Send for itineraries and references to

Mrs. M. D. FRAZAR & CO.
Managers of Foreign Tours,
74 Globe Building, - Boston.

Bicycle Tour Abroad

Party of 6 gentlemen, to sail June 24th for 3 months' absence; route to include England, Normandy and Brittany, Valleys of Moselle and Rhine, Holland, and Belgium. Price, $550.00. Address CHANNING ELLERY, 228 W. 38th St., New York City.

MALLORY STEAMSHIP LINES
Delightful Ocean Trips to the Ports of Texas, Georgia, Florida.

Tourists' Tickets to all Winter Resorts in Texas, Colorado, California, Mexico, Georgia, Florida, &c. Our 64-page "Satchel Handbook" mailed free. C. H. MALLORY & CO., Pier 20, E. R., N. Y.

BAKER'S EUROPEAN TOURS All-of-Europe Tours, $380 to $395, embracing England, France, Germany, the Rhine, Austria, Switzerland, Italy, etc. All expenses paid. Swiss Tour, $255 Short Tour, $185. Send for program. FRANK BAKER, 93 Nassau St., New York.

EUROPEAN TOURS

Limited party, personally conducted by Dr. and Mrs. Paine, now forming. Unequaled arrangements. Terms reasonable. Address H. S. PAINE, M.D., Glens Falls, N. Y.

TOURS to EUROPE FROM $185 to $585

All expenses; Itineraries of Edwin Jones, 462 Putnam Av., Brooklyn, N. Y. Fall Tour to Palestine, $650. Tour Round the World, $1,650.

Land of the Midnight Sun Two Select Parties:

June 18th, for North Cape, Norwegian Fjords, St. Petersburg, Berlin, etc.; July 2d, Gt. Britain, Holland, Germany, Italy, etc. Accommodations strictly first-class. Mrs. M. A. CROSLEY, 97 Rodney St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

EUROPE Ideal Tour. 250 miles of coaching. The most complete at moderate cost. SCOTLAND to SWITZERLAND. Also ITALY
Rev. H. A. TODD, A.M., Corona (L.I.), N.Y.

A. —EUROPE.—THIRTY EXCURSIONS.— Popular prices. $200 and up. Ocean tickets by all lines. Parties to Holy Land, March 21, Sept. 6.
F. C. CLARK, 111 Broadway, New York.

FOREIGN HOTELS

Austria

European Winter Resort
Innsbruck, Tyrol, Austria

1,900 feet above the sea, with dry, bracing climate; center for sleighing excursions; fine university, hospital, &c.

HOTEL TIROL (Open all the year.) Large, airy, sunny rooms, well furnished; superior cuisine; modern conveniences. Best references. Reduced rates in winter. Illustrated pamphlets on application. CARL LANDSEE, Prop'r.

Bahamas

ROYAL VICTORIA HOTEL
NASSAU, BAHAMA ISLANDS
NOW OPEN
A LAND OF PERPETUAL SUMMER
S. S. MORTON, Proprietor and Manager

Steamer Northumberland leaves Palm Beach, Florida, 3 times a week. 15 hours' sail.
The Outlook will furnish full information.
Cable address, Morton, Nassau, N. P.

Germany

LADIES wishing to spend some time in GERMANY would find a delightful home in Plön, Holstein. Please address E. I. VAN ZELLER, 1129 Spruce St., Philadelphia, Pa.

HOTELS AND RESORTS

California

HOTEL GREEN PASADENA, CAL. Accommodation for 400 guests. Occupies an entire block. Souvenir mailed.
G. G. GREEN, Owner. J. H. HOLMES, Mgr.

Colorado

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colo.: The Antlers

Illustrated book, describing Colorado Springs, sent on request by E. BARNETT, Proprietor.

Connecticut

CREST VIEW SANITARIUM GREENWICH, CT.
Especially adapted for mild nervous diseases; home attractions. H. M. HITCHCOCK, M.D.

District of Columbia

EBBITT HOUSE
WASHINGTON, D. C.

H. C. BURCH, Manager.—Popular prices. Regular rate, $4 per day up; 50 rooms on sixth floor, steam heat, electric light, reduced to $2.50 and $3 per day; 50 rooms on other floors, reduced from $4 to $3.50 per day; parlors and alcove parlors at equally low rates.
Special rates for Army and Navy Officers and Clergy.

Florida

"Untouched by the Frost"
TROPICAL FLORIDA AT
PUNTA GORDA

THE PUNTA GORDA

On Charlotte Harbor. Accommodates 300. Now open. Tarpon fishing, shooting, boating, driving; 400 feet of veranda. Plenty of fruit. Special rates for the season For pamphlet address F. H. ABBOTT, Prop.

THE PLAZA ROCKLEDGE, FLORIDA
Located on highest ledge on Indian River; amidst 30 acres of orange grove. New and elegant. Send for booklet. S. H. PECK, Owner-Proprietor.

Florida

NEW ROCKLEDGE HOTEL ON INDIAN RIVER Rockledge, Fla.

Homelike and attractive. Northern help. Orange groves in bearing near by. Send for Illustrated Circular.

H. P. SHARES, Prop'r, New Haven, Conn.
H. E. BEMIS, Mgr., Mohonk Lake, N. Y.

Illinois

Chicago Beach Hotel 51st St. & Lake Shore
CHICAGO, ILL. HARVEY S. DENISON, Mgr.
Demonstrated the most delightful and comfortable abiding-place throughout the year in Chicago.

New Jersey

TRAINS FOR LAKEWOOD leave New York, via Central Railroad of New Jersey, foot of Liberty Street, North River, at 4:30, 8:15 A.M.; 1:45, 3:40, 4:40 P.M.

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

THE SHELBURNE

On the Ocean Beach

Open throughout the year. Every convenience, including hot and cold sea-water baths, passenger elevator, etc. J. D. SOUTHWICK, Manager.

Galen Hall—A Sanatorium

With all the conveniences of a first-class, quiet hotel. Elevator, steam heat, open-grate fires. Massage, electricity, baths, etc. Table unexcelled. Open all the year. Address Dr. WM. H. H. BULL, Atlantic City, N. J.

THE CHALFONTE

OCEAN FRONT. ATLANTIC CITY, N. J. Sea-water baths in house. Elevator and every modern convenience. Send for illustrated booklet. E. ROBERTS' SONS.

SEASIDE HOUSE

Directly on the ocean front. ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

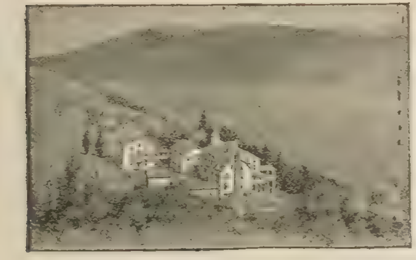
Enlarged and notably improved, is now one of the most complete resort houses on the Coast, having hydraulic elevator, hot and cold sea-water baths in house, sun parlors, and heated by steam and open grate fires. CHAS. EVANS.

New York

Gleason Sanitarium

ELMIRA, N. Y.

1852 (Formerly Elmira Water Cure) 1896



A comfortable winter home for invalids of both sexes. All modern improvements. All forms of aths, massage, electricity, etc.; pure spring-water; under care of regular medical graduates of long experience. Send for illustrated booklet.

Dr. Strong's Sanitarium

Saratoga Springs, N. Y.

For health or pleasure. The appointments of a first-class Hotel. Elevator, electric bells, steam, sun-parlor, and promenade on the roof. Suites of rooms with baths. Massage, Electricity, all baths and health appliances. New Turkish, Russian, and Natural Sulphur-Water baths. Dry tonic air, Saratoga water, and winter sports. Open all the year. Send for illustrated circular.

New York City

NEW YORK CITY

THE GRISWOLD 55 West 42d St.

Opposite Bryant Park; five minutes from Grand Central Depot; convenient to elevated and surface cars, hotels, theaters, and shopping district. Comfortable accommodations for permanent or transient guests at reasonable rates. Special attention to strangers and ladies visiting the city unattended. Correspondence solicited.

H. F. GRISWOLD, Manager,
Late of Hotel Childwold, Adirondacks;
Magnolia Springs Hotel, Florida.

The GLEN SPRINGS

WATKINS GLEN, N.Y.

A Resort for those Seeking Health, Rest, or Pleasure

Open all the year. Under the medical management of experienced physicians. Equipped with all the most approved therapeutic appliances, including Turkish, Russian, and Electric Baths. Massage, Swedish Movements, and all forms of Electricity. Five Valuable Mineral Springs—Muriated, Alkaline, Chalybeate, Iodo-Bromated, and Brine.

ALL FORMS OF MINERAL AND BRINE BATHS

Climate mild, dry, and equable. No malaria. Surrounded by pine forests. Half-mile of broad board-walk. Beautiful views overlooking thirty miles of Seneca Lake. Picturesque walks and drives. All modern improvements. Bowling Alleys. Glass Solarium 250 feet long. Cuisine unsurpassed. Consumptives, Epileptics, and persons suffering from any form of Insanity are not received. No contagious or offensive forms of disease admitted. Send for illustrated pamphlet.

WM. E. LEFFINGWELL, Manager.

A TALLY=HO COACH

Coaching in England by the Halford L. Mills Co.

or any other carriage can be had for any drive

in Britain

at a fixed price for any period.

AGENTS
THOS. COOK & SON
at all their offices in England and America.

LONDON

New York City

Westminster Hotel

Irving Place and 16th Street, New York

A quiet hotel of established reputation, with a cuisine of noted excellence. Conducted on the American plan at rates from $3.50 per day upward.

E. N. ANABLE, Proprietor.

"A little book about a big city" mailed free.

North Carolina

ASHEVILLE, N. C. THE SWANNANOA
First-class; central; family and transient hotel; $2 to $3 per day. R. R. RAWLS, Owner and Prop.

Hotel Berkeley ASHEVILLE, N. C.—Centrally located; handsomely furnished steam heat; electric lights throughout; every modern comfort; rates, $12.50 to $17.50 per week.
P. H. BRANCH, Mgr. FRANK LOUGHRAN, Prop.

"Hickory Inn" HICKORY, N. C.—An all-the-year-round resort; altitude 1,400 feet; hotel fire-proof; lighted by gas and electricity; quail-shooting; rates, $12.50 to $17.50 per week.
FRANK LOUGHRAN, Owner and Proprietor.

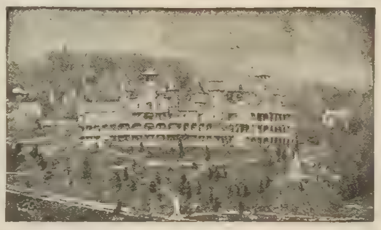
Pennsylvania

Grand View Sanitarium

WERNERSVILLE, PA.

One of the oldest and best located Sanitariums in the country. On a slope of the South Mountain. In Winter we are warmer than the valley and remarkably exempt from the extremes of cold and severe storms. Pure water. Many new improvements. Write for illustrated pamphlet and further information. WENRICH & DEPPEN.

Pennsylvania



WALTER'S SANITARIUM

Walter's Park, Wernersville, Pa.

In Southern Penna., has all the elements of a great WINTER RESORT. Steam heat and open grates, sun-parlor, electric light, hydraulic elevator; baths, massage, Swedish movements, electricity. Address for circulars as above, always using the name WALTER'S.

South Carolina

"THERE is no place like Charleston."—THE CHARLESTON HOTEL, Charleston, S. C. This historic Hotel has had One Hundred Thousand Dollars ($100,000.00) expended on its renovation, rearrangement, decoration, and improvement. Completely equipped with all modern appointments. Best sanitary arrangements. Cuisine and service unexcelled. For rates, pamphlets, and further particulars address CART & DAVIDS.

PEBBLE LEDGE AIKEN, S. C.—New house; modern conveniences. May be rented furnished for winter season; or select boarders taken. Address P. O. Box 176.

Virginia

HYGEIA HOTEL

Old Point Comfort, Va.

Unrivaled as a health and pleasure resort. Air balmy and full of life-giving ozone. New sanitary plumbing and all the comforts of the modern home. Castalia Spring Water supplied to guests without charge. Circulars may be had at the OUTLOOK, 13 Astor Place, N. Y. F. N. PIKE.

BOARD IN VIRGINIA Those wishing quiet home life or a change from town can find it at Lego, 2½ miles from station on a through line South. Bath-rooms with hot and cold water. No children. Terms, $6 and $8 per week. Apply to Mrs. WM. L. RANDOLPH, Charlottesville, Virginia.

Sozodont
PURE AND FRAGRANT.

is fortunate in being able to present here the portrait of a well-known lady, and a few lines in her own handwriting.

She is noted for her bright smiles and good teeth. The camera shows her pleasure at the result of using Liquid Sozodont every day, the Powder twice a week. The Powder costs nothing extra, a box accompanying every bottle, together with a sample cake of Sozoderma Soap.

Messrs. Hall & Ruckel, Wholesale Druggists, New York, are the Proprietors of Sozodont, and will send a small Free Sample of liquid Sozodont if you mention this magazine.

I am proud of my teeth and the public know it
Guess who I am and buy Sozodont
I recommend it to every body —
Miss ——
New York
Jan 18/96

X
THE MOST POWERFUL LIGHT
Cannot detect the slightest discoloration or decay upon teeth cleaned with Sozodont
PURE AND FRAGRANT.

To Readers of The Outlook: SOZODONT has the honor to present here the portrait of a very beautiful and well-known woman, who has fine teeth. Recently she said of SOZODONT: "It makes pretty teeth, as I can most heartily testify."

What SOZODONT has done for her—and hosts of others—it will do for you!

(READ WHAT FOLLOWS)

We are indebted to Grecian genius for most of those types of beautiful women and magnificent men with which classic art has graced the richest galleries of the world. It seems fitting, therefore, that a preparation destined to enhance the beauty of even the most handsome among the multitude of people who were to use it should have owed the origin of its name to the Greek language. SOZODONT is derived from "sozo," to preserve, and "odontes," the teeth. For half a century this significant word has been familiar to the world, and to-day the delightfully fragrant and refreshing dentifrice of that name honors the derivation. Do you ask WHY? Try it, and see! Use liquid Sozodont daily, the Powder (in same package) twice a week. Sample of the liquid by mail if YOU SEND THREE CENTS FOR POSTAGE and mention THE OUTLOOK. Address the Proprietors of SOZODONT.

Sozodont
PURE AND FRAGRANT.

HALL & RUCKEL
WHOLESALE DRUGGISTS NEW YORK CITY

Sozodont
PURE AND FRAGRANT.

For Quality

and Quantity

of Good Work

There's no Typewriter that can Equal

The CALIGRAPH

Our handsome Booklet will set you thinking. Send for it. . .

AMERICAN WRITING MACHINE CO.
237 Broadway, New York

See How Flexible

New style, No. 224, at $1.00, extra long waist. For young girls' needs—for study, gymnastics, for everyday wear—there is no Waist so yielding, so free from undue pressure and restraint, affording such support to the figure and imparting such grace of contour as the Ferris' Good Sense Corset Waist for Misses.

FERRIS' GOOD SENSE

CORSET WAIST

Made in all sizes for Women and Children also. Long or short waist, high or low bust. Children's 25c. to 50c. Misses' 50c. to $1. Ladies' $1 to $2. For sale by all retailers.

Linen Department.

Saxony Hemstitched Linen Sheets, 90x96 inches, at $4.25, $4.90, and $6.25 per pair.

Irish Hemstitched Linen Pillow Cases, 22½x36 inches, at 85 cents and $1.00 per pair.

Damask Table Cloths, with Napkins to match:

2x2	yards, at	$1.65 each.
2x2½	" "	$2.00 "
2x3	" "	$3.00 "
5-8 Napkins,		$1.75 per dozen.
3-4 "		$2.50 " "

James McCreery & Co.

Broadway and 11th St.,
Twenty-third Street,
New York.

A Corset

that adapts itself at once to each particular curve of the figure, though it be but a dollar corset, will wear you twice as long as the high-price bodice. All grades of the "R & G" do this.

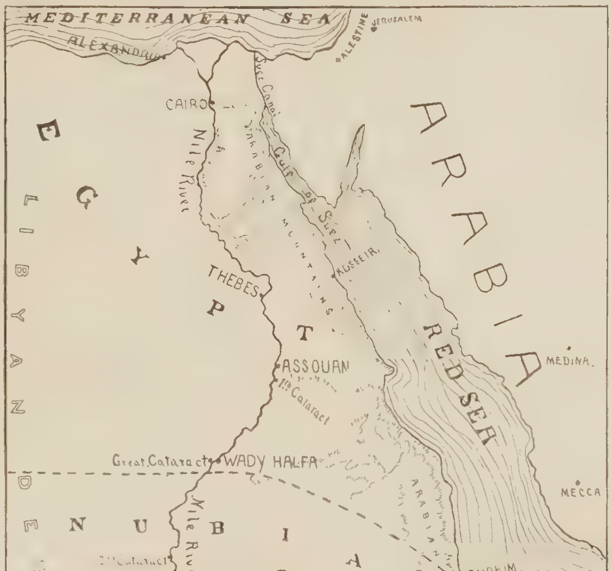
If your dealer does not carry it in stock, write R. & G. Mfg. Co., 361 Broadway, New York.

The Outlook

A·Family·Paper

Volume 53 Saturday, 28 March, 1896 Number 13

THE determination of the English Government to send an army to Upper Egypt was the occasion of a flurry in diplomatic circles. The Egyptian fund has a surplus of £2,500,000. The English Ministry proposed to draw upon this surplus for £500,000, on the ground that the expedition against the dervishes will protect, as it unquestionably will, Egypt from invasion, and, therefore, the holders of Egyptian bonds from depression and loss. To this all the Governments interested have acceded except Russia, which remains passive, and France, which has refused its consent. It is not easy to gather from the conflicting dispatches precisely what action France took, but a remonstrance in some form appears to have been forwarded to the English Government. The French, who are desirous that England shall evacuate Egypt, are naturally unwilling that she should take any step which should either prolong her stay or give it the appearance of greater permanency. As unanimous consent of all the Powers interested would have been necessary for a direct gift of £500,000, the English Government will not receive that aid from the reserve fund, but a majority is sufficient to authorize the temporary use of this amount, and the English will probably borrow from the fund to this extent. The bankers in all the capitals are naturally with the English Ministry in this matter. They are looking rather to the money market than to the political side of the question. The suspicion prevails in some quarters that the Ministry has not revealed its entire purpose, and that it has ulterior designs which will be developed only by events in the Soudan itself. Meanwhile, there is no doubt that the proposed expedition, by creating a diversion by supporting Italy and thus indirectly the Triple Alliance, has much relieved the tension between Germany and England, has awakened Italian enthusiasm, and has given a new direction to diplomatic interest in Europe.



Egypt and the Soudan

◆

Whether the object of the Anglo-Egyptian advance be to create a diversion in favor of the Italians at Kassala, to meet a threatened incursion northwest of the Mahdists, or to begin a new attempt to occupy the Soudan, is not quite certain. Probably the two first-mentioned objects are both in mind. The report of this week that Kassala had been abandoned by the Italian forces has been promptly contradicted and was improbable on its face. Kassala is well situated for defense, and will not be given up without a struggle. It is near the borders of Abyssinia, and before the rise of the Mahdists was an important commercial center. Within the last ten years it has dwindled in population from 15,000 to 3,000. England has strong reasons for aiding Italy to maintain this post, which threatens the flank of the Soudanese should they move toward Egypt. There is good reason to suppose that such a movement has been apprehended for at least a year, and that preparations have long been under way to meet it. Large bodies of Mahdists are known to be concentrated about Dongola, and last week a report was published that a holy war against Egypt had been proclaimed, and that the dervishes were using every device of fanaticism to urge their followers to enter into an aggressive campaign. The English officials speak of the proposed advance as being directed only to a town in the direction of Dongola, but there is little doubt that Dongola itself is the ultimate object, and if that place is occupied operations may be begun against Berber. The advance will be up the Nile. Of the army of 15,000 men only one-eighth will be British soldiers, and although much is expected of the improved morale of the Egyptian troops under their long British drill, pessimists point to the failure of General Wolseley's attempt to relieve Gordon with a larger force as evidence that the present army is not adequate to defeat the fierce Soudanese. It is probable that a force from India will be landed at Suakim to co-operate with General Kitchener's command. The expedition will move from Wady Halfa in midsummer. New Dongola is some 250 miles up the Nile from Wady Halfa, now the Egyptian outpost, and Old Dongola is some seventy miles further upstream on the opposite or eastern bank. General Wolseley's advance in 1884 was by this same route—Wady Halfa, Old Dongola, New Dongola, and thence to Korti, from which place he sent out his forces toward Khartoum with only the most disastrous and futile results. The denials of the British authorities that a new attempt to gain Khartoum is now planned are supported by the fact that the expedition is in strength quite inadequate for that purpose. To gain and hold Dongola and to there make a stand against the Mahdist forces would in itself be a sufficient object. Dongola is the center of a fertile district, and has long been a center of supplies for the followers of the dervishes.

❀

Austria, which for four years has been borrowing gold in order to resume specie payments in that metal, last week betrayed the first sign of hesitancy in pushing forward its costly experiment. The Reichsrath on Monday adopted a resolution to the effect that the Government lend active support to efforts which may be initiated by other governments with the object of fixing the value of gold and silver by international agreement. The day following, the English House of Commons discussed the same question, but here the outcome was distinctly disappointing to bimetallists. The resolution adopted by the House merely expressed the opinion that the instability of the relative value of gold and silver since 1873 had proven injurious to the best interests of the country, and urged the Government to do everything possible to secure by international agreement a stable monetary power of exchange between gold and silver. The point touched upon in this "bimetallist" resolution was the most trivial one in the entire discussion. Fixity of value for silver affects only a few dealers in exports and imports. The great economic and moral evil coming from the demonetization of silver—the gradual doubling in the value of money—was not referred to. This fault of omission, however, was not the real disappointment contained in the action of the House. This was found in the declaration of Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the Government was "willing to enter into negotiations with the Powers for a conference, but on the understanding that it was not prepared to abandon the gold standard in the United Kingdom." "Some of his colleagues," the cablegram reports him as saying, "were pronounced bimetallists, but all agreed in thinking that they would not be justified in departing from a gold standard in the United Kingdom. There was no doubt, if the Powers could agree regarding the use of silver, that the Indian Government would reconsider the question of reopening its mints." The administration would, however, go no further. "All the leading English monetary experts held that the wealth of the country had been built up on a gold standard, and that its permanence and prosperity were dependent on the existing system. In view of that opinion, no responsible government would propose to change the present conditions."

❀

If the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been accurately reported, his speech must have been a profound disappointment to the manufacturers in the North of England who left the Liberal party because its financial policy was controlled by the classes which have been enriched by the fall in prices, instead of by the business men and farmers who have been injured and sometimes bankrupted by these changes. The declaration that "all the monetary experts" hold that the wealth of the country has been built on a gold standard seems equivalent to a declaration that the most disinterested students of the question are not to be classed as "experts." Nearly every professor of political economy in the United Kingdom, as we have before shown, favors bimetallism. The only respect in which these men would admit that the gold standard is at all essential to the prosperity of England consists in the fact that a small class of Englishmen have immense sums invested in foreign bonds and mortgages. The total amount of these investments is approximately six billion dollars. Through the fall in prices during the last five or six years these six billions will now purchase as much property as would seven billions before the recent change in the value of gold. In this way foreign property worth as much as all the real estate in Virginia, the Carolinas, Georgia, and Florida has been added to the wealth of Englishmen. It is perhaps too much to expect that the English nation will join in changing a system which transfers the property of foreign borrowers to some of her own citizens, even though the great mass of her citizens—manufacturers, merchants, and workmen—have suffered as much as foreign nations from the increased weight of public and private indebtedness. Nevertheless it has been so confidently predicted by trustworthy men that the administration to which Mr. Balfour belongs would support an international agreement restoring silver to the currency of the world that disappointment among bimetallists is naturally the result of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's declaration last week.

❀

The movement for a permanent tribunal for the settlement of all questions between England and America is evidently gaining strength on both sides of the Atlantic. At the recent demonstration in Queen's Hall, London, in favor of this principle, a memorial was adopted from which we quote the following paragraph:

> "Without expressing any opinion upon pending controversies, we would earnestly press the advisability of promptly concluding some treaty arrangement by which all disputes between Great Britain and the United States could be referred for adjudication to some permanent tribunal representing both nations and uniting them in the common interest of justice and peace."

In acknowledging the receipt of this memorial, Lord Salisbury declares that "proposals in the direction indicated by the memorial are now before the Government of the United States." It would, therefore, appear that the responsibility for accelerating or delaying this movement now rests primarily upon the people of the United States. It is fortunate, therefore, that a call has been issued for a National conference to be attended by delegates appointed from different parts of the country, to be held in the city of Washington on Wednesday and Thursday, April 22 and 23, to consider this subject, and to urge the establishment between these two countries of a permanent system of arbitration. Since there is a good deal of ignorance and some deliberate misrepresentation, it is proper to reaffirm that the question raised is not at all what either England or this country ought to do representing the Venezuelan problem; nor whether the two countries should from time to time arbitrate difficulties which may arise between them. The proposition is the establishment of a permanent tribunal to which, as a matter of course, all issues arising between the two countries, or possibly all issues with certain well-defined exceptions, should be referred for settlement, exactly as questions arising between the States in this Union are referred to the Supreme Court. It is proposed at first to make this tribunal simply an Anglo-American one, but the promoters of this movement hope that the time will come when other nations will enter into such fraternal relations with England and America that the tribunal will grow to be one of Christendom. The present time is seized to press this movement upon the people and upon the Government because recent events have forced upon the attention of both the perils which come from even rumors of war. Correspondence may be addressed to the Hon. C. P. Daly, care American Geographical Society, 11 West Twenty-ninth Street, New York City.

◆

The Cuban insurrection is illustrating theoretically and practically not a few important principles of international law. When, for instance, one read last week that the vessel Bermuda sailed from New York with a cargo of arms intended for the insurgents, and that the United States authorities offered no opposition, and when it was also remembered that a week ago or more this same ship was seized by the United States for attempting to carry arms and men to the aid of the Cubans, there was an evident necessity of finding a principle to account for the two apparently inconsistent acts. The principle is really simple. It is perfectly lawful in times of peace to send or carry arms or ammunition anywhere, and it is likewise lawful for unarmed men to embark for any country. What is unlawful is to fit out or convey a military expedition aimed against a country with which the United States is at peace. This principle was settled some years ago in the case of the Itata, when an opinion of the United States Attorney-General was given that "no law or regulation forbids any person or government from purchasing arms from the citizens of the United States and shipping them at the risk of the purchaser." In the case of the Horsa, whose officers have just been convicted in Philadelphia, the charge was that a military expedition was being conveyed to Spain. The debate on the Cuban question has continued in the Senate in a desultory way; on Monday of this week Senator Sherman moved to send the whole subject back again to a conference committee of the two Houses, and that action was taken. The supposed object is to eliminate the third of the original House resolutions which were agreed upon by the former conference—namely, the resolution threatening intervention.

◆

The Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections—Senators Chandler and Gray alone dissenting—has reported favorably on the proposed Constitutional amendment providing for the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people. The Committee naturally defends the present representative character of the Senate, but recognizes and urges that the growing disposition to deny the body this character would be greatly lessened if the Senators were elected by the voters instead of the legislators. The Committee realizes that it is an anomaly for Senators still to be chosen by the legislators when all the Governors and the President are now chosen by the people; and it believes that conformity with the democratic principle will not only be far more satisfactory to the voters, but add to the authority of the Senate. It does not review the legislative scandals that have been the outcome of the purchase of Senatorships, nor does it intimate that the prestige of legislatures has suffered since the adoption of the Constitution, but it shows clearly how much the business of electing Senators interferes with the regular work of legislative assemblies. In this connection it refers to the recent protracted contests in Delaware, Oregon, Washington, Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, and Kentucky. It also calls attention to the difficulties occasioned in the selection of State legislators through the frequent necessity of dismissing every consideration except that of how the candidate will vote on the question of the Senatorship. "The candidate's qualifications for the business of general legislation, or the views he entertains with reference to the great material interests of the State, are lost sight of." To our minds, this last reason for the proposed change is perhaps the most important of all.

◆

We have already expressed the opinion that Mr. Bayard committed a serious mistake in attacking before an English audience the policy of protection, believed in and defended by a large portion of the American people. The Ambassador of a country is the representative of the country, not of the party which happens to be in power, and it is a diplomatic blunder for him to criticise before a foreign audience the policy of the party to which he does not belong. But, for a similar reason, it was inexpedient and undiplomatic for the House of Representatives to pass a resolution censuring him for his utterance. In its dealings with other nationalities America should be one. Within its own boundaries criticism may be freely indulged in, so long as it is just and not venomous. It is, for example, perfectly legitimate for the press to criticise the President's Venezuelan message and the action of Congress thereon: but it would be quite a different matter for any American, and still more for one acting in a representative capacity, to criticise that action in a speech to an English audience; and it is for the same reason malapropos for the country to issue a public criticism upon the action of its Ambassador abroad—a criticism which, though not in form, is in effect addressed to, or at least uttered in the hearing of, that country. If we may be allowed a familiar illustration borrowed from the household, no lady will criticise her servants before her guests. If Congressmen thought, as we think, that the utterance of Mr. Bayard was malapropos, their proper course would have been to urge their views privately upon the Secretary of State, and urge him quietly to counsel the Ambassador to refrain from such utterances in the future. Our domestic differences ought not to be projected into the horizon of other nationalities.

◆

On April 21 Louisiana will hold its quadrennial State election, and the campaign now going on is a most exciting one. In its strange confusion of issues it is typical of the political situation throughout the country. Three-fourths or perhaps five-sixths of the Democrats of Louisiana are reported to be in favor of the free coinage of silver. In the Fourth Congressional District, where a direct vote on this question was taken at the Democratic primaries, the majority in favor of free silver stood ten to one. Only the city of New Orleans and the French parishes are indifferent or hostile to silver. Nevertheless Governor Foster, who, as an opponent of the Lottery, was elected to his office by the votes of the free-coinage parishes, is himself a resident of one of the French parishes and opposes free coinage. His administration has been so satisfactory that a renomination could not be refused him. Thus it has come about that the free-coinage Democratic party has an anti-silver candidate. The Republican party, on the other hand, has been hostile to free coinage, but this year the white Republicans, including the great sugar-planters who left the Democratic party on the tariff issue, have formed an alliance with the Populists. They have nominated for Governor a prominent Prohibitionist who is an ardent advocate of the free coinage of silver. Some of the Populists, however, have refused to support the fusion ticket and have nominated a straight ticket of their own. The negro Republicans may support the fusion ticket, and may not. The white Republicans, especially the aristocratic element composed of the sugar-planters, are as disdainful of the negroes as are the Democrats. Captain Pharr, the fusion candidate for Governor, has recently denounced in public a most influential manager of the old negro Republican machine, and it is believed that the machine will retaliate. The Democrats, feeling that the election is in danger, have in one parish after another thrown overboard the constitutional amendment proposed by their Legislature disfranchising illiterates who do not pay taxes on three hundred dollars' worth of property. In the last Congressional election in North Louisiana, it was chiefly through negro votes that the Populist candidate was defeated. This year it is believed that negro votes throughout the State will be relied upon to secure the same result.

⁂

The friends of school reform in the State of New York were greatly encouraged by the message of Governor Morton to the Senate, on March 20, urging the passage of the compromise bill for the reform of the school administration in the city of New York. This bill is the culmination of years of effort to eliminate politics from the public schools of the city, and the reconstruction of the school system along the lines of educational progress. The need of reform in the school system is conceded even by the opponents of the bill. The radical feature of the bill, as already reported in these columns, is the abolition of the trustee system, and the appointment of a superintendent and assistant superintendents, who are to have entire charge of the teachers and of the system of studies. That is, the measure provides that the system of education in the city of New York shall be in charge of a board of paid experts. The construction and care of the buildings are also to be under the care of a recognized expert and assistants. The bill provides for the division of the city into fifteen districts, "as nearly as may be of equal population." In each of these districts five inspectors are to be appointed by the Mayor. These inspectors, who serve without pay, are to examine into the record of attendance of teachers and pupils, the cleanliness and safety of the buildings, the studies and progress and discipline of the pupils, the fidelity and competence of the teachers. The bill protects the teachers fully. No teacher can be discharged without a majority vote of the board of superintendents and of the school inspectors of the district in which the teacher is serving. The Board of Education is appointed, as at present, by the Mayor. It is in this bill given absolute control over the school property, and the right of selection of site and decision on construction and alteration of buildings, and is authorized to employ an expert and such assistants as are necessary. The bill gives authority to the Board to redistrict the city when the change in population demands it; and authorizes the appointment by the Mayor of the inspectors in such new districts. The superintendents of schools serve for six years; inspectors for five years. Politics has such a hold on the public-school system of New York City that this measure aroused the petty politicians to a state of rage that manifested itself at the hearings of the bill. The independence of Governor Morton in sending a message to the Senate urging the passage of the bill has aroused the admiration and gratitude of the friends of reform.

⁂

For some time there has been a systematic attempt on the part of some of the less reputable New York newspapers to induce the belief that crime has been on the increase in this city under the present police administration. This has been done by sensational treatment of the crimes which have actually taken place, by innuendo, and by direct assertion. In point of fact, the records show that while under the old administration (from December 1, 1894, to January 20, 1895) there were 1,083 felonies committed and 732 arrests made, under the present administration (December 1, 1895, to January 20, 1896) there were only 911 felonies reported and 847 arrests were made. These facts—which amount to a decrease of 16 per cent. in serious crimes and an increase of 15 per cent. in arrests—are pointed out by President Theodore Roosevelt, of the Police Commissioners, in an open letter. So long as only general assertions were made, the false and slanderous imputation could be met only by appealing to the recorded facts; but Mr. Roosevelt has found in the columns of the New York "World" attempts to sustain the slander with proof, and he has thought it worth while to call the attention of the public to the way in which these "catalogues of crime" have been manufactured. Taking up one by one forty-five cases which had been put forward as proving the prevalence of unpunished crime, Mr. Roosevelt shows that exactly four were genuine—"a little less than nine per cent. of truth." Even this percentage of truth, however, is large compared with that of another sensational article in the same paper which gave an account of "twenty-six great criminals now at large in this city." Of these Mr. Roosevelt tells us eight were dead, one was dying, seven were in jail in Europe, three had reformed and were leading reputable lives, and of the remaining seven not a single one, so far as could be found out, was in New York. It is not surprising that the Police Commissioners say, "We shall not hereafter take the trouble to deny any unsupported statement whatever that may appear in the 'World.'" In thus calling attention to these disgraceful and mendacious newspaper methods Mr. Roosevelt has performed a public service of importance.

⁂

In "Tom Brown at Rugby" there is a beautiful description of the feeling of Tom when the news of the death of Dr. Arnold reached him in Scotland. Some such feeling came to thousands of men when they read the announcement on Monday of this week that Thomas Hughes, the author of "Tom Brown," had gone to his rest. The vitality and manliness of that book made its author seem perpetually young in the thought of those who loved it, but he had reached, after a very busy and useful life, the ripe age of seventy-three. Entering Rugby in 1833, under Dr. Arnold, he took his degree of B.A. at Oriel College, Oxford, in 1845. Three years later he was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn. In 1865 he entered Parliament. He was appointed Queen's Counsel in 1869, and in 1882 Judge of one of the County Courts, a position which he held at the time of his death. His interest in the welfare of the working classes, his strong advocacy of co-operation, his attempt to realize a better order of things in the Rugby Colony, are all well known. To the English working people he was a consistent and life-long friend; for this country also his friendship had been persistent and hearty. During the days of the Civil War he did much to enlighten England as to the real significance of that great struggle and to change English opinion. He had a thorough knowledge of American literature, and was especially a lover of Lowell, whose "Bigelow Papers" he knew by heart. It is, however, as the author of "Tom Brown at Rugby" and "Tom Brown at Oxford" that Mr. Hughes will be long remembered. These books belong to the classics of young manhood; they combine in the most healthful way the manliness of youth with its idealism and its aspiration, and they will preserve to future generations the charm of one of the most famous schools of the world under its most famous teacher, and of student life in one of the most delightful and beautiful of university towns.

Hints to Some Contributors

To those who are just setting out on the difficult career of writing as a profession, a few suggestions, born of some knowledge of existing conditions and some experience with literary aspirants, may be of practical value. There are, for new contributors to magazines and newspapers especially, a few basal inferences or assumptions which are stepping-stones to immediate success and to future eminence. In the first place, every such person ought to firmly lay hold of the elementary truth that good writing comes by nature and not by practice. In order to make shoes that have shape and will hold together, or chairs that will stand alone, one must go through an apprenticeship; but in order to write "Hamlet," "The Elegy in a Country Churchyard," "Vanity Fair," "The Scarlet Letter," or "In Memoriam," one has only to feel the impulse and to purchase the necessary ink and paper; nature will do the rest. When Flaubert put four hundred hours of work on a short story, he showed how ignorant he was of the principles of art. Nothing is easier than writing; it is only putting words together, and "the Sweet Singer of Michigan," speaking in familiar language about familiar things, can do that quite as well as Tennyson, who is believed to have spent much time in reflecting on the selection and arrangement of words, not only with reference to clear expression of meaning, but with reference to such silly matters as the sequence of vowel sounds, the nice adjustment of quantities, the mysteries of assonance, and other like foolishness. Dante thought so long and profoundly about his famous poem that it made him lean for many a year; George Eliot declared that the writing of "Romola" made her old; several well-known writers are reported to have recast and rewritten several times works which have become famous. This fastidiousness is greatly to be regretted; it stands in the way of that continuous and exuberant productiveness which keeps the presses going and makes reading cheap in every sense of the word. It is well at the start, therefore, to rid one's self of the idea that one must work, observe, think, practice, live, before one can write with ease, clearness, and power. Trust to nature; do not waste time on construction, grammar, or style; say what you have to say in the first words that occur to you; believe implicitly in yourself; and if your manuscript comes back to you, assume at once that your failure is due to lack of personal influence, to the jealousy of the literary coterie, and to the ignorance and indifference of editors.

The latter suggestion brings into view with great clearness another article in the creed which a newcomer in the field of letters ought to hold: Believe firmly that editors care only for names and not at all for the intrinsic interest of the articles submitted to them, that they never read manuscripts which come from new writers, that they detest unknown names, and are entirely under the control of an organized, powerful, and unscrupulous ring of persons who have, by various devices, gotten access to the periodical literature of the country. Editors dislike nothing so much as a fresh note, a new talent, a novel force; they love to read and print the same things again and again. They are eager to avoid the attention which a touch of genius always attracts; they shrink from the discovery of new talent. Freshness, variety, and force they study to exclude from their columns. Ignorant readers of The Outlook may imagine that Mr. Burroughs, Dr. Hale, and Ian Maclaren, to take the first names that come to hand, are frequent contributors to its columns because the editors think they have something to say and know how to say it; but better-informed readers know that these gentlemen are invited to write simply because they are widely known. It is a great sorrow to a publisher to discover a Kipling, a Crawford, or a Wilkins; it is a great sorrow to an editor to come upon a new and thrilling note in the mass of manuscript through which he wades, not "knee-deep in June," alas! but knee-deep in crudity and commonplace.

Do not take the trouble, therefore, to lay little snares for the editor, such as pasting pages together and scattering marks through your manuscript; quietly assume that if your name is unknown your article will not be read. Do not permit yourself to think for a moment, if these various detective devices tell a sad story of neglect, that the reading of a few pages of your manuscript may have supplied the editor with all the information he needed in order to form a judgment. When the introductory sentence of an unpublished story reads after this fashion, it is evidently impossible for the editor to form an impression of the writer's quality until he has finished the last page:

> The rolling orbs of heaven, awesomely aflame or sullenly smoldering in the passionate fires of fading desire, blazed over the sultry night. The hot earth panted and sobbed, and its tears dropped on sodden leaf and insensate stone. Darkness hung thick, black, multitudinous in streets that moaned in the low, long-drawn wails of the wind of the night, the awful symbol of the nowhere from which we come and the nothing to which we go. A bank of noisome fog sprang at the moon and swallowed it, and the sweat of fear came out on the faces of the planets. Despair seemed to issue from the invisible fissures of the universe. At this moment, a door opened on a porch hung with vines that were somber and smitten in the dim obscurity, and a beautiful woman, her head bent, her hands clasped, her eyes closed, her figure tense, sprang wildly into the universal blackness.

One other article of faith ought to be held by the new aspirant for literary success: All the successful writers are secretly banded together to keep the field to themselves. There is a clandestine agreement among them to bar the way against all newcomers. This will surprise those who are not well informed. It is known, for instance, that Mr. Warner, Mr. Stedman, Mr. Howells, Miss Jewett, Miss Wilkins, Mr. Page, Mr. Hutton, and other well-known writers are constantly appealed to by unknown men and women for criticism, suggestion, introduction, and general help. It is also well known that, although these gentlemen and gentlewomen are often at their wits' ends for time and strength in which to do their own work, they cheerfully write hundreds of letters, examine countless manuscripts, interview publishers, and perform many similar services on behalf of these unknown and untried fellow-workers. Indeed, some of these distinguished men of letters have practically become literary agents for and advisers of young and unknown writers, always without salary and sometimes without thanks. This has given some people the idea that Mr. Howells, Mr. Stedman, Mr. Warner, and their compeers are an exceptionally generous and helpful group of persons, anxious to open to talent, industry, and character the field in which they have succeeded. But the public must not be misled by acts of kindness and deeds of brotherliness; this is the fine hypocrisy of a powerful secret organization, an unscrupulous literary trust which exists for the sole purpose of keeping the doors of access to popular favor closed and barred.

To sum up these practical suggestions: Assume that you have genius and do not need practice of any sort; that the return of any manuscript always means editorial ignorance and depravity; that your failure to secure a hearing in magazines and newspapers is due solely to the jealousy of those who are already in the field. Under such circumstances your obvious duty is to comment widely on the fact that genius is always neglected, and that literary cliques are in possession of the field; never, under any circumstances, ask whether anything is amiss with your own work.

The Truth in Agnosticism

The intellectual religious issue of our day is between agnosticism and Christian faith. Agnosticism declares that the spiritual truths on which Christian faith rests cannot be demonstrated. We can hope, but we cannot know. Christian philosophy has attempted to meet this declaration by offering scientific demonstration of the reality and trustworthiness of its convictions. It is a question whether there is not a fundamental truth underlying agnosticism—whether Christian philosophy has not erred whenever it has attempted to afford a scientific demonstration of spiritual faith.

Science has to do with that which is. Religion has to do with that which is to be. The function of science is to analyze and test that which is, and which therefore can be examined. The function of religion is to lead us on from that which has been to that which cannot be scientifically examined, because it lies in the future. It is not the chief, certainly not the sole, function of religion to teach us how we are to live with one another. That is the function of ethics. Nor does religion merely present ideals. The presentation of ideals is poetry or prophecy. It is the function of religion to realize ideals, to take that which imagination or faith presents to us and convert it into actuality. Religion always, therefore, marches with its face towards the future. Whatever calls itself religion and is facing the other way is not religion. It is not the function of religion to keep things as they are, but always to make the world or the individual better, to lead us from what has been to what is to be. By its very nature, therefore, religion deals with the unknown, or, to be more accurate, with the undemonstrated.

When a great structure like the Brooklyn Bridge is built, there must be architects to devise it. But it cannot be tested while it is only a plan in the architect's brain. Only when the structure becomes a reality can it be put to the test to see if it will fulfill the purpose for which it was conceived. Imagination—or faith, which is spiritual imagination—presents the ideals of life; will converts the ideals into realities; not till the realities are presented can science test them. When the scientist proposes to test our religious ideals, we legitimately reply, You cannot test what does not exist. Our ideals lie in the future; when they are accomplished they can be tested; but what is not now, but only is to be, cannot be tested. It must be accepted as an ideal or not accepted at all.

To illustrate:

Religion may be regarded as a matter of personal salvation. What does that mean? The man is emerging from the animal condition. He is the bird pecking his way out of the egg. He is the butterfly disentangling himself from the chrysalis. Salvation is emancipation. It is deliverance from the bonds of the animal condition. Now, while that process is going on, we can measure scientifically only so much as has been achieved in the process. The plant cannot comprehend the animal; nor the lower animal the higher animal; nor the higher animal the man; nor the lower man the higher man. The little child cannot comprehend father or mother. He is not satisfied always to be a boy—he desires to be a man. He is not content to drive a goat—he wishes to drive a horse; nor she to play with paper dolls—she wishes a child of her own to mother one of these days. Nevertheless, the child does not know what life has in store for him, and cannot know. He is always misled by his own aspirations. To-day he means to be a preacher; to-morrow to be a stage-driver; and he will be neither preacher nor stage-driver. He does not know, he cannot know, the experiences of the man. He must press forward to the unknown or remain a child.

But man is not only emerging from a lower condition. He has fallen. He has gone back—back into the egg from which he had partially emerged; back into the chrysalis from which he was partially emancipated. And the higher experiences which lie before him when he is emancipated from the self-imposed bonds, he cannot know except as he enters into those experiences. They summon him, he hears their call, he follows on to know them, but he cannot know them until they are his own experiences. Religion is penitence and faith. What are they? Penitence is dissatisfaction with the present and the past; faith is reaching out towards something higher and better, as yet unknown. They are summed up in Tennyson's prayer, "O for a man to arise in me, that the man that I am may cease to be!" We know the man that we are, but the man that is to arise in us we do not know, and cannot know, until he has arisen. John B. Gough, the drunken actor, cannot know what will be the experience of John B. Gough, the orator, fêted, caressed, honored on two continents. He can know that he is ashamed of this degradation in which he is living, he can know that there is something that calls him higher, but that is all he can know. He is saved by hope, but hope that is seen is not hope. He presses forward to an unknown life, and he presses forward because it is unknown.

Or, again, let us say that religion is knowing God. The agnostic assures us that we cannot know God. And what the agnostic means is true. God is always in the present tense, but he is, also, always in the future tense, and the future tense of God we cannot conjugate. God always lies beyond our knowing. We do not know one another. The child is always surprising the mother. He is a succession of surprises. God unknowable! Every man is unknowable. Christ is unknowable. There are as many lives of Christ as there are writers, because each man sees one glimpse of Christ and tells what he has seen. Strauss tells us a little, Renan a little more, Edersheim and Geikie and Farrar more, Brooks and Beecher and Bushnell still more. And yet the life of Christ is not written. However numerous are the lives, there is always something beyond. If this be true of God come down to the earth for the very purpose of making himself known to us, how much more of the Infinite and Eternal! We know just so much of God as we have experience of him. So much we can demonstrate to ourselves; what lies beyond our experience we cannot demonstrate, because to us it is not, it only is to be. To Professor Clifford and Haeckel and Frederic Harrison, Great Pan is dead. They may take counsel of their aspirations and seek to enter the life of other men, but till they do enter that life, to them God cannot be demonstrated. Herbert Spencer makes reverent study of the universe, and discovers in it a perpetual Presence, "an Infinite and Eternal Energy from which all things proceed." Matthew Arnold makes reverent study of history and literature, and discovers in them the evidence of "a Power not ourselves that makes for righteousness." Tennyson looks into his own soul, and finds there

One—"closer is He than breathing, nearer than hands or feet." But Tennyson cannot demonstrate his vision to Matthew Arnold, nor Arnold his to Herbert Spencer, nor Spencer his to Frederic Harrison. Neither can test what he has not. In each successive stage of life the soul has advanced into what is still an unknown land to those he has left behind him.

Immortality cannot be demonstrated—cannot be, because it is future, and science can test only the present. If immortality means only that there are unseen existences surrounding us, that as a present fact might be demonstrated by rappings, and table-tippings, and materialized ghosts, and slate messages. But if immortality means that there is on the other side of the grave a larger, nobler, diviner life than any we have experienced here—that cannot be demonstrated. It lies beyond our experience, and science can test only what lies within our experience. He who asks that immortality shall be demonstrated asks the impossible. He asks that a future experience shall be made a present experience. Then it would no longer be future, it would be present. Hope that is seen is not hope.

So with the processes of social development. Practical men, so called, ask the prophet to demonstrate the practicability of his ideals. But this the prophet cannot do. Ideals cannot be demonstrated. When they are realized, then they can be tested—but not till then. The disciples of Christ had no conception of what the Christianity of the nineteenth century would be. They were saved by hope, pressed forward toward a world they did not know, followed a pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night toward a promised land, the boundaries of which they could not comprehend. Luther did not know what the Reformation meant. Cromwell did not know what Puritanism meant. Washington and Jefferson and Hamilton did not know what free America meant. They were saved by hope, by believing in an undemonstrated ideal, and pressing forward to convert their vision into a reality. This is still true. The prophets believe what they cannot demonstrate. So long as there is unrest in human lives because injustice in human society, so long the prophets will trust the hopes of a better order which do not permit them to be at peace till the highest ideals of human society are realized in a Brotherhood of man without a social schism, a Republic of God without a disloyal subject.

Is no faith to be put in the witness of prophets who have seen what we have not seen, and have reached experiences not yet reached by us? Shall the child not trust the testimony of his father? Must he wait until he has a man's experience before he can know what manhood is? Or may he have faith in his own aspirations, verified by the witness of a soul more fully grown, more richly endowed? Shall he whose heart does not respond to music think that there is no beauty in it, and he whose soul does not answer to art believe that art is not? We accept the testimony of a Spencer, a Huxley, a Tyndall—men who have studied the visible world and told us what it is; shall we not also accept the testimony of a Tennyson, a Browning, a Whittier, of a Maurice, a Bushnell, a Beecher, a Brooks?—men who have seen resplendent ideals and lived in the invisible, and have then turned back and beckoned to us, saying, "Come, see what we have discovered." "What?" "That we cannot tell, for eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, it hath not entered into the heart of man to conceive what the Father hath prepared for those who love him; but it is here." We are saved by hope. But hope that is seen is not hope. For what we see, why do we yet hope for? But if we hope for it, then with patience—patience with our doubts, our fears, our infirmities, our narrow vision, and patience with the doubts, the infirmities, the fears, the narrow vision of others—we wait to receive it.

Call Out the Reserves

One of our Senators at Albany, in a recent conversation with Dr. Parkhurst, said that whenever a Senator is considering a bill, the first question that he asks himself is, How will my attitude toward this bill affect my political prospects? He said that this was his habit, and he believed it was the habit of his senatorial colleagues. The new thing about this is the audacious challenge which so open and shameless an avowal of a disgraceful fact, hitherto decorously concealed, gives to whatever moral sense is yet alive in the community. A public servant is neither ashamed nor afraid to tell the people that his first concern in public business is not the public interest, but his own. The unblushing, hard effrontery of it brings to mind robber Tweed's impudent question, "What are you going to do about it?"

Both press and pulpit, so far as our observation goes, remain silent. One might well be struck dumb for a while by this portentous revelation of rottenness in the highest functions of the State. Can it be that the dumbness is that of moral insensibility, the result of a century of dishonor under the spoils system in politics? The seriousness of the case is not that the Senator defies public sentiment, but that he assumes that there is no public sentiment to be defied by his naïve confession of immorality. In 1780 a man of the Senator's way of thinking went up the North River to a post of great honor and trust at West Point—Albany then offering nothing so good. Being a patriot of the kind who considers, first, what he can make out of his country, he bargained away his fortress to the enemy for a sum of money and a generalship, though he was prevented from delivering the goods. The Senator may not yet be a traitor, but he is ruled by the very spirit that made Benedict Arnold a name of infamy—the subordination of a public trust to a private interest.

Bad as this is, a much worse thing is the moral apathy in the community which ignores or condones it. This is the real danger-signal, as heart disease is more alarming than a boil. If religious men are disposed to tolerate such Senators, they need the revival preaching which Isaiah addressed to the religionists of Jerusalem:

"How is the faithful city become an harlot! Thy princes are rebellious, and companions of thieves; every one loveth gifts, and followeth after rewards."

Among the signs of the overthrow of republicanism by Cæsarism—of which bossism is the incipient form—the Roman poet mentioned as most ominous, Venalis curia patrum—"venal is the venerable Senate." We have gone far that way when a Senator thinks it safe for himself and his confederates in the abuse of trust to avow the fact of venality, disdaining even by decorous hypocrisy to pay the formal homage of vice to virtue. Between the venal fellow who sells his vote at the polls and the venal Senator whose attitude to a bill is determined by a view to his political prospects the only real difference is in their profits.

It now urgently concerns the churches, and whatever successors of the prophets or the Apostles are with us still, to call out all the slumbering moral reserves, to be instant for a revival of social righteousness, to rouse the public conscience to insist on that political morality without which no patriotism worth professing, and no religion worthy of the name, can long survive.

"Soft words, smooth prophecies, are doubtless well;
But to rebuke the age's popular crime
We need the hearts of fire, the souls of that old time."

The Spectator in New Orleans

There are born Spectators and Spectators who are made; those who have a genius for seeing things and those who train themselves to see things. Now, a born Spectator feels things quite as definitely as he sees them; and to feel a thing one must put himself in sympathy with it. One must forsake the traditional attitude of the looker-on, and enter into the life which he observes; for no one ever sees anything who simply observes it. These reflections came to the Spectator with fresh meaning one bright morning, not many weeks ago, when he found himself standing in front of the Cathedral of St. Louis at New Orleans. The sky had the softness of May, the air had the mellowness of October. The myrtle, the oleander, the magnolia, the palm, were in full leaf; the sward was green; the rosebuds were showing delicate tinges of color. There was enchantment in the atmosphere, if one chose to feel it. If the Spectator had simply looked at things with the cool, frigid glance of the indifferent mind, he would have seen dirty streets, dilapidated buildings, open sewers, and a general air of careless neglect of sanitation and order. But the Spectator, while not oblivious of these details, which make up the whole picture for so many travelers, felt the charm of one of the most picturesque cities on the continent by putting himself into its atmosphere; and atmosphere is the subtle quality which a place exhales, and which is, in a deep sense, an expression of its soul. It is true the Spectator had been in a measure educated to feel this atmosphere by reading Miss Grace King's charming book—a book in which one finds the soul of the city—but he hopes that he has also a little of that grace of nature which is an open sesame to all that is richest and best in the lives of one's neighbors; that brotherliness which makes one at home at the ends of the earth.

* * *

The two cities which preserve the charm of France in this country are curiously alike, and as curiously different: alike in early tradition and race-feeling, different in historic and climatic conditions. Quebec lies gray and walled in the far north; a fortress, not only against the attacks of possible enemies, but against the assaults of a rigorous climate. It is France in the far north, subdued in tone by cold skies, and hushed by the repression of stone houses and the constant struggle with the elements. New Orleans is France in the far south; the gayety of the French nature evoked by genial conditions and by out-of-doors living. In the old quarter of New Orleans one feels this kindly, friendly, neighborly French cameraderie; the fellowship of a people whose social quality has been highly developed. The balconies which overhang the narrow streets suggest leisure, talk, gayety, relaxation. Looking down these streets one feels a warmth of tone which seems to be an exhalation of this genial community temper. The old buildings are not isolated in a kind of prim, cold detachment, as in most American towns; they run together, so to speak; they harmonize with each other; they are parts of a whole, and it is the whole, not the parts, which one always sees. The dull reds and greens of old walls; the faded tracery of balconies, often of delicate design and molding; the glimpses of interior courts set round with palm and cactus; the universal mellowness of time and use—these give the Spectator in New Orleans constant delight. Here is a place that has been lived in, and life has left its touch on the homes that have protected it and the streets which have been its thoroughfares.

OLD SPANISH HOUSE, BATTLE-FIELD

* * *

It was Sunday morning, and the Spectator went into the Cathedral, the tumultuous music of whose bells seemed to set the whole air in vibration. The creole face, seen in a crowd, is singularly delicate and sensitive; a face full of mobility, and yet with a suggestion of substantial character beneath the play of expression. The faces of the women are naturally more attractive than those of the men; but they are also expressive of superiority of type and quality. Their delicacy and charm are moral as well as physical. They are full of vitality; a vitality which preserves their grace of manner long after youth, and which gives them variety and freshness in the closest companionship. The great altar is blazing with candles, the church is full of worshipers, and the chancel is filled with priests and acolytes. But here, as elsewhere, that which impresses the Spectator most pleasantly is the air of sociability. There is no irreverence; everybody is quiet, attentive, devout; but there is no stiffness or formality. It is more like family worship than the worship of a great congregation; and the Spectator is glad to find himself as worshipful in mood and spirit as his fellow-worshipers of another race, language, and religion. There is constant movement in the chancel and in the aisles of the church. In the space between the pews and the steps of the chancel there is a throng of children, with candles in their hands which the Archbishop will presently bless. They are standing in easy, unconscious attitudes, without any thought, apparently, of the congregation behind them; intent on the service. Their faces are full of interest; they are evidently as much at home as if they were in their own houses; their worship is as natural as that of their seniors. In the aisles, along the nave, at the chancel steps, men and women are kneeling, as if all places were equally homelike and familiar. This sense of home assails the Spectator through all his Protestant traditions, and gives him a glimpse of that beautiful, reverential fellowship which will come when we are as much at home in the house of God as in those lesser houses which we call our homes.

GATE, SPANISH FORT

A PLANTATION RESIDENCE

This atmosphere of friendliness, the pervasive influence of which the visitor feels the moment he arrives, was doubtless French in its origin, but it has invaded the American quarter of New Orleans, and makes the city the most charming place, socially, in the country. Comparisons of this sort are likely to be odious, but no one who knows New Orleans will deny her this pre-eminence. There are far handsomer, cleaner, richer, and more intellectual cities, but there is none which has so thoroughly developed the resources of social life and so intelligently fostered the social atmosphere. There is no trace of the sepulchral stiffness and formality which makes most cities of the English-speaking races seem so cold and hard. There is none of that elaboration of the mere mechanism of living which fatally chills the social instinct in so many of our rich modern communities. In New Orleans the social traditions are so well established that they are taken for granted and dismissed from attention. Strangers are not kept in social quarantine until their good standing is credibly established. On the contrary, they are received with a hearty cordiality which implies that the host is so well established socially that he trusts his own judgment in such matters, and treats himself as an authority on questions of gentle breeding. The result is that New Orleans is the best-mannered town in the country. It has its faults, and the world has heard much of them; but its courtesy, hospitality, and friendliness would be a revelation to many Northern communities. It cares chiefly, apparently, for gentle breeding, for conversational interest, for courage and simplicity; it is delightfully indifferent to wealth, furniture, and all the other trappings with which the newly rich community so often smothers itself.

* * *

The test of good manners is not the bearing and breeding of the few, but the habit of the many. There are hosts of well-bred individuals in countries which are, as a whole, ill-mannered. A well-bred community is one in which good manners are a common possession. In New Orleans one is as courteously treated in street-cars as in private houses. The conductors do not shout to ladies, "Come now, hurry up;" they do not thrust them violently into cars already overcrowded; they do not take them by the shoulders, seize them by the waist, or do any of those other rough and underbred things which make Spectators with the instincts of gentlemen dread the necessity of using the street-cars. In New Orleans, if you ask the location of a street, you are not only courteously answered, but the offer is often made to show you the way. One is conscious of the absence of haste, and haste is a deadly foe of good manners. An excellent definition of the charm of the old régime is to be found in the statement that the gentleman of the old order was "never afraid and never in haste." He had the independence and spirit born of courage, and he had the finish and delicacy of manner which come from repose. Both these qualities are characteristic of the best type of Southern men and women. The charm of hospitality in those ample, rambling plantation homes, with their spacious piazzas and easy habits of living, lies in the sense of leisure which one feels in the air. There is time for talk, for lounging, for those sweets of human intercourse which are of slow growth and need delicate fostering. The social instinct gets recognition and training; the family, rather than the individual, becomes the unit; the guest is a member of the family. Whatever faults the Southern character has—and, like all other types, it is irregular in its development—it is free from the coldness and indifference which are often accepted in this country and in England as evidences of superior breeding, but which are, in fact, evidences of insular feeling and of a defective sense of courtesy. The essence of good manners is constant and delicate recognition of the men and women with whom one is brought into contact. Our attitude towards them does not involve the question of their standing; it involves the question of our good breeding; for manners are an expression of our own spirit and training.

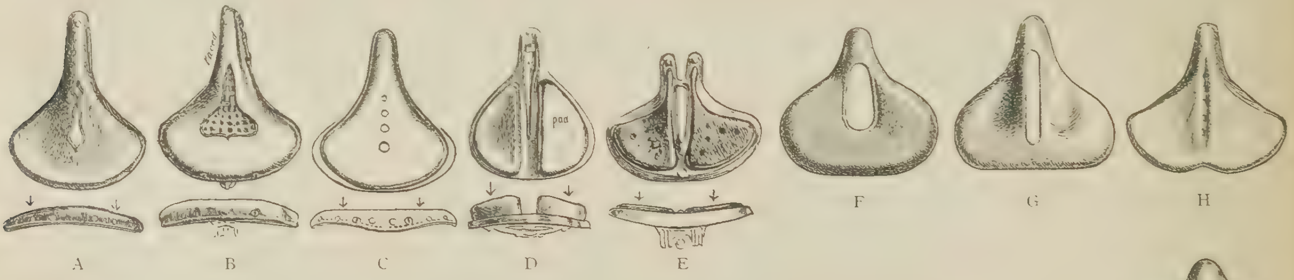
SIDE VAULTS, GIROD CEMETERY

Bicycling for Women

Some Hygienic Aspects of Wheeling

By Robert L. Dickinson, M.D.

A LARGE part of the injury to women with which the bicycle is charged arises directly from defective teaching and imperfect knowledge, because balance on the wheel, with mounting and dismounting, comprises the sum of the usual training. One needs but to stand at the Park entrance on a fair day to appreciate this. Of ten women who pass, one rides rightly—rarely two. Of the ten objections to wheeling for women eight are based on abuse and not on right use of the wheel. Its advocates acknowledge that bicycling is not a complete means of attaining all-round development, and do not deny that to those who believe that the Creator never intended the hampered sex to enjoy this freedom, this freedom is objectionable. But that it is more alluring, more beneficial, and more general in its action than any single outdoor exercise for women the specialists in her diseases testify, with few dissenting voices. That there are certain abuses against which a warning is necessary they also agree; and the chief of these abuses are ill-adapted saddles, bad postures, and faulty dress, as well as excess with exhaustion from heart-strain or nerve-tension.



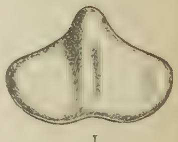


FIG. I. SERIES OF SADDLES ON SAME SCALE FOR COMPARISON

A, Common form of man's saddle of good make, 1-10 life size: beneath, the back view of it, showing vicious downward bend of outer edges of cantle. B, Well-formed saddle of wickerwork, felt, and leather; good opening. This shape suits some women better than the woman's form, which is 1½ inches wider. Mesinger. Beneath it is seen the back view. C, Shorter saddles; women's form, well shaped; Garford inside, Hunt outside. Beneath it the well-formed level back. D, Saddle with two pads, and deep groove between, seen from above and from behind; the Christy. E, Broad saddle with good concave top, but rather broad pommel; Hollenbeck. F, Saddle cast from mold; composite from 12 persons. G, Individual saddle from mold to compare with F; Ray. H, Reform Wheeler. I, Saddle with very short pommel.

Tension and excess are common to all sports, and to this indictment bicycling pleads guilty, because the motion is so easy and the effort required so slight that there is a strong temptation to overdo. Women, lacking athletic experience, have had fewer lessons in muscular strain than men. We all need to remember that panting and palpitation mean that one of the two chambers making up the main pumping power of the heart—namely, that one which has to do with driving the blood through the lungs, and which is robust only in laborers and athletes—is fighting hard under a load which may cause all degrees of overstretching or acute dilatation, from the most momentary embarrassment to a permanently crippled condition. It may be said that the pulse should not range above 100 after a rest, but rules are hard to make. Tire is the test, and reaction. Again and again we see a rider go away from home to the point where tire begins to suggest that he face about, forgetting that he must retrace his steps, and retrace them against increasing fatigue. The dash of it leads us to dare narrow paths, or difficult riding, or some feat for which we are not ready, and the unnoticed tension tells later on the nerves. The woman unused to active exercise must take care not to travel on her excitement. She is to rest often. She will be wise to lie down after a ride of any length. The taking of simple nourishment, such as milk, chocolate, or beef-tea, during a ride is important as a means of recuperation, whether there be hunger or not, while food preceding an early ride is most important. Moreover, before and after a hearty meal a half-hour's rest is desirable. It is highly important, too, that the length of the trip and the difficulties of the effort should be gradually increased. Moderate muscular aching, after the first few attempts, need not prevent one from resuming wheeling at once, but after-pallor and sense of exhaustion are to be carefully heeded, and, if they are produced by moderate effort, call for a medical opinion as to the advisability of further trials.

A common fault of the beginner is irregularity of effort. In the same class as spurting belongs the fitful pace of the early days, which is replaced later by the steady, unremitting swing that keeps up nearly the same amount of effort on levels and on grades. Another kind of spasmodic action is the application of pressure on the down-sweep of the pedal only, in lieu of sustained use of power throughout the revolution. Too high a gear may call for excessive exertion also.

All these points have been insisted on again and again. But the saddle, the position on the wheel, and the question of dress will bear threshing over.

Saddles. Except for the saddle the bicycle may be said to be a perfect machine. Happily, many attempts are being made to answer this burning question. A good saddle embodies anatomical modeling; selection to fit the individual form; stanch construction, that it may not alter in shape with use; and adaptability, that it may be set at any angle, moved forward and back, and made more or less tense. The anatomy of woman is such that her saddle must differ distinctly from the man's. She is also more susceptible to injury than is the man, and it is more difficult to fit her saddle. Although the conformation differs as much in different individuals as the shape of the hand, it still is an absurdly common belief that a single perfect saddle can be constructed to suit all needs. Manifestly, each woman must seek out what is adapted to herself, and, starting with a few general principles, work out her own problem.

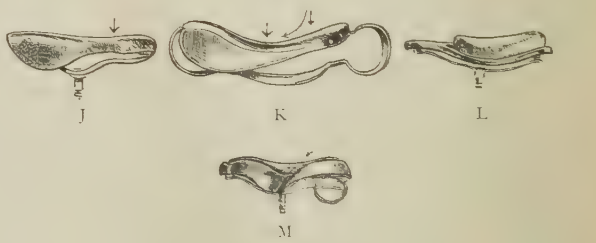

FIG. 2. SADDLES IN PROFILE

J, Good form of short, strong-springed, level saddle; Hunt. K, Older form, with large spring, seen from the side. The weight should be chiefly carried where the smaller arrow points, but often follows the curved arrow's course down to the larger arrow; Kirkpatrick. L, Side of Christy saddle. M, Saddle cut away for thigh.

Some of the characters in saddles that are to be noted and avoided are these: First, a center ridge. This may occur from mistaken construction or from stretching of the leather. Occasionally it may be due to the bending downward of the outer ends of the cantle or transverse rear iron of the saddle (Fig. 1, A). Secondly, high

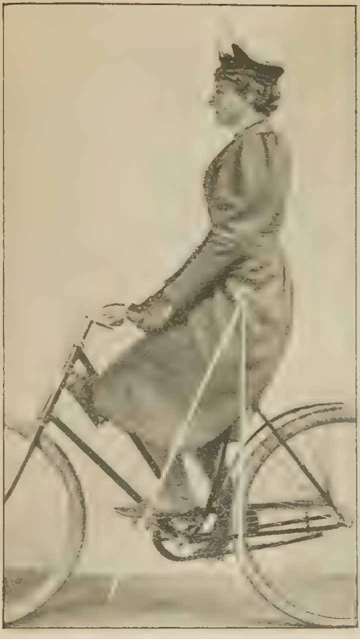

FIG. 3

The rider well over her work, the foot forward at the point where most of the power is applied, showing how short a distance from the perpendicular the pedal sweeps forward. Illustrating a low position of the handle-bars, with an arm that is too straight.

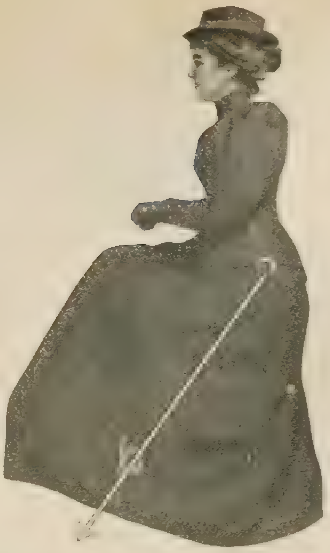

FIG. 4

On the side-saddle the habit masks the striking contortion of the figure. The stirrup is far forward of the hip-joint. Compare with Fig. 3.

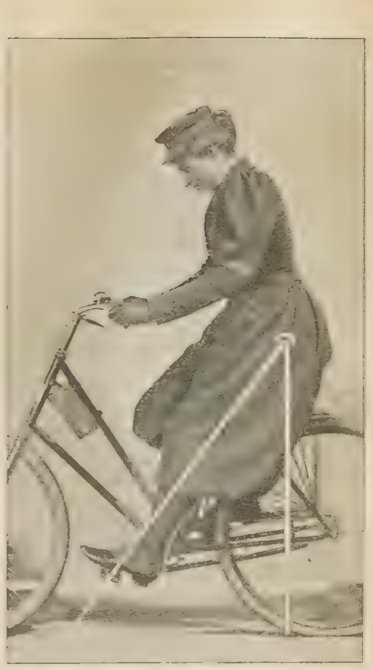

FIG. 5

The commonest fault of position among women. The saddle is too low and too far back. Compare the distance between the pedal and the perpendicular in this and Fig. 3. Allowable only for beginners, to give them ease in mounting, and the sense that the ground is within easy reach.

pommels are objectionable. Saddles are occasionally constructed with a distinct downward sweep in the center. A weak spring will cause this sagging (Fig. 2, K), and many saddles, though level at first, will be found to have a hammock shape after much use, from stretching of the leather. Complex springs were once much used under saddles, but the tendency is away from coil springs toward a stiff flat spring which will prevent the formation of the deep concavity. A set screw, to be found in every good saddle, will allow the slack in the leather to be taken out. Any repairer will correct worse degrees of stretching after fixing the spring in a vise.

Again, narrowness is objectionable, because the greater width of the pelvic bones in woman permits the wide arch to slip down astride a ridge-pole saddle, as it may not happen in the case of man. Lastly, a vicious tilt, such as an elevated front peak or a lowered front pommel, is to be condemned, and merely calls for mention here because some women do not appreciate that a very slight alteration in angle will make a large difference in comfort and in safety.

Of the various available types of saddle we may make a rough classification. There is the most commonly used and most useful of all—the modified man's saddle of the short, broad, flat form, supplied with most wheels on request; it should not be less than eight inches across at the back. As examples are the Mesinger (Fig. 1, B), Garford (Fig. 1, C), Hunt (Fig. 1, C), and the Reform Wheeler (Fig. 1, H). There is the saddle built with a pad on each side to carry the weight, a groove in the center, and without front pommel. Of these the Christy and the Hollenbeck are those most used. They give comfort to many, but the beak and the edge hurt a few people.

Lastly, the very broad saddle with a short, blunt pom-

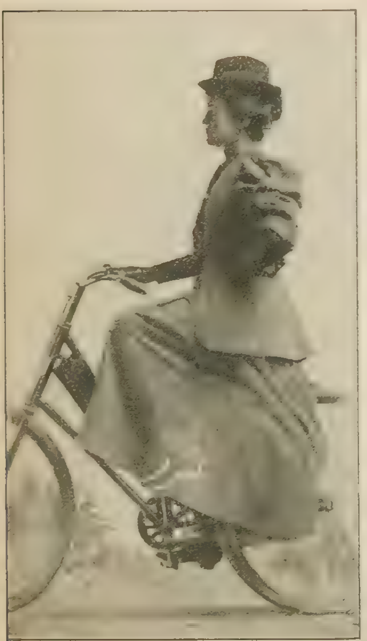

FIG. 6

The "walking-beam action" of the knee, due to faulty ankle-action, or to a saddle too low. The near heel is not held down as it should be, and the far heel is not high enough. The drag on the skirt is also demonstrated.

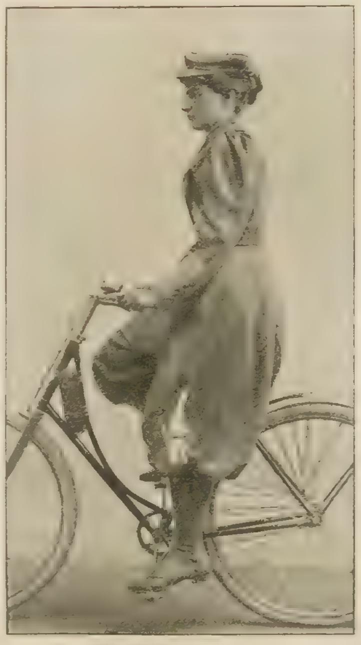

FIG. 7

Correct posture. With the foot at the lowest point, the knee is slightly bent, as shown by the bones of the joint, while the ankle is somewhat straightened, and the elbow and the wrist are both bent. The thigh-bone of the further leg is at a strong slant, whereas in Fig. 6 the raised thigh is nearly level.

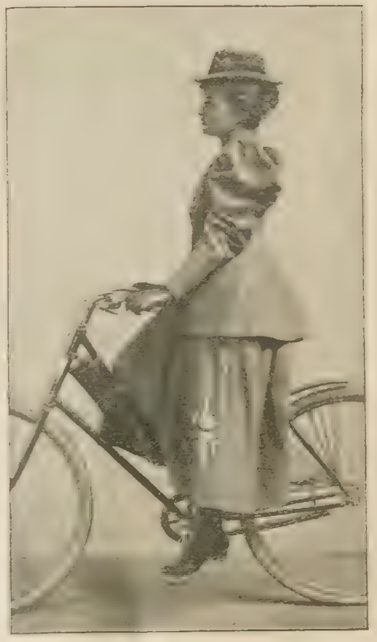

FIG. 8

Over-stretched leg, both at the knee and ankle, with the saddle too high. The outline of the knee-joint may be compared with that in Fig. 7.

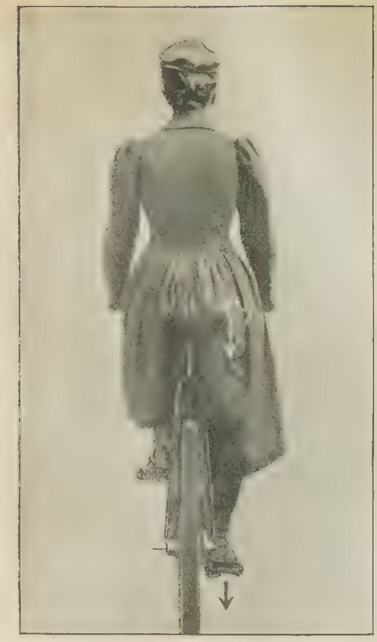

Fig. 9

Rear view, showing that a plumb-line dropped from the hip-socket will strike the center of the pedal.

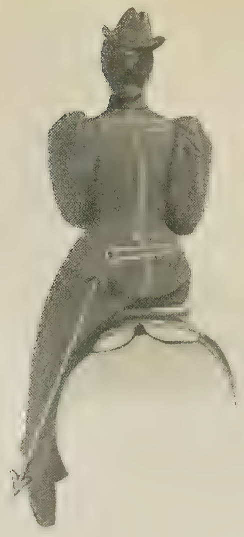

Fig. 10

Horseback posture from the rear. To demonstrate the distance out from beneath the body the foot-support is placed, as compared with the bicyclist's position, in Fig. 9. The outline of the spine, and bars at the level of the shoulders and the hips, give an idea of the twisted spinal column.

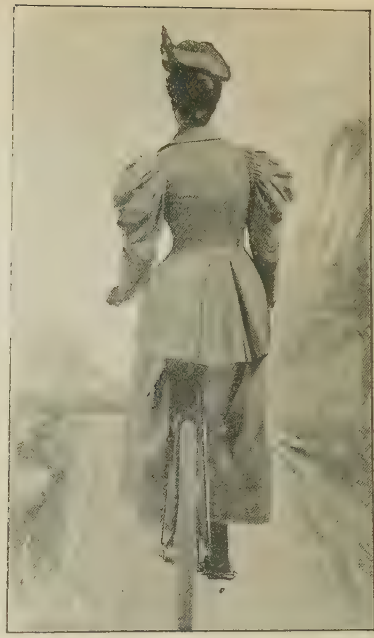

Fig. 11

Rocking or tilting of the hips in straining up hill, or with a saddle too high.

mel in front is coming into use, and is suited to many women. Among these may be mentioned the Empress, 11 inches wide (which has a flat wooden cantle that prevents any bending downward of the sides), the Duplex, and the Common Sense. The last, however, has a well-rounded metal strip running from front pommel out to outer end of the cantle, which is not comfortable to all people. We cannot dispense altogether with the anterior projection of the saddle, for it gives lateral steadiness.

The fault of most pneumatic saddles is that pressure on the rear part forces the air forward, thus raising an objectionable ridge in front. The Sager Pneumatic avoids this difficulty by two separate inflatable cushions, and its lacings permit one to make certain changes in its conformation. The Cutting, with the short peak, works well in many instances. Mr. Ray, of the Rambler Agency in New York City, is doing what we had all hoped to see done, in fitting the saddle to the individual. He allows the customer to sit in a tray of modeling clay fastened on a bicycle like a seat, in such fashion that the wheelman propels the wheel as if he were actually on the road. Following the lines of this result, an aluminum saddle is made, which is covered with felt and leather. A very considerable variation in individuals is noted by him (Fig. 1, F and G).

The directions that physicians should give to intending riders are these: That each woman must be carefully trained by competent instructors as to right posture, right methods of pedaling, correct height of saddle, correct position of saddle over pedals, and, finally, should be told to insist that the man who sells her a wheel must let her make trial until she is suited with a saddle. By testing the machine of one's friends, not for a half-hour but for a considerable ride, and by experimenting with saddles at different heights, positions, angles, and tension, one can arrive at a comfortable result.

Correct Posture. The whole attitude is erect; the weight is so placed that if a perpendicular be dropped from the middle of the hip-socket, it would clear the rear limit of the sweep described by the pedal; the peak of the long saddle is nearly over the crank-hanger. The right height is tested by finding that the heel placed on the pedal can follow it around. At the lowest point in the sweep the knee should be a little bent and the ankle slightly straightened. The elbow, also, should be a little flexed, while the wrist is bent somewhat backward. In this position it will be seen that the rider is almost over her work (Fig. 7). Look at the rider on the wheel, seen from the rear (Fig. 9). A plumb-line dropped from the hip-socket strikes the center of the pedal, and even, easy balance of action on the part of the inner and outer leg muscles is the result—a result strikingly in contrast to the exaggerated work of the inner thigh muscles on horseback (Fig. 10). As seen from the side (Fig. 3), it is noteworthy that the furthest sweep of the center of the pedal away from this plumb-line goes only about 12½ inches. In the horseback posture the distance is 17 inches, and again we see that the foot support is far removed from beneath the weight of the body, and that the position is a strained one during effort or in any emergency or accident.

Faulty Postures. Most of the awkwardness and most of the strain of wasteful effort encountered among women awheel are due to faulty posture. Taken singly, the commonest faults may be given as follows, premising that they are frequently combined:

A very common ungainliness, and an example of waste of effort, is seen when the saddle is placed too far back and too low (Fig. 6). In hill-climbing all the bad points of this attitude show clearest—the exaggerated excursion of the knee, the awkward drag on the handles, the strained expression. The mechanical disadvantage under which the rider labors is graphically shown by comparing the distance between the perpendicular dropped from the hip-socket and the pedal at its forward position in this posture and the same line in the normal attitude. The increase is over five inches, and in some cases is more than this. The cyclist is doing hard muscle work instead of the seven-pound push that is the effort said to be required on the level, and which represents only part of the weight of the leg.

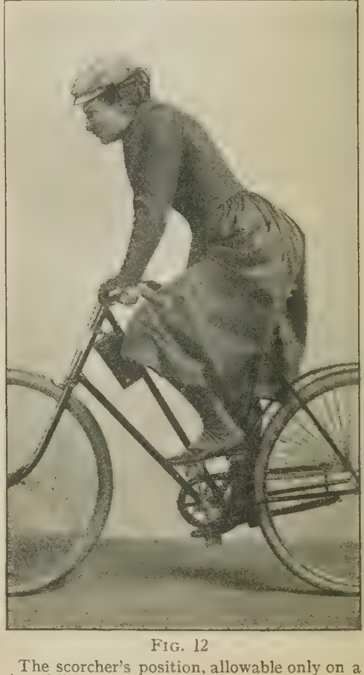

Fig. 12

The scorcher's position, allowable only on a short hill or in a gust of wind.

The opposite fault, the saddle at too great a height, is less easily recognized, because less awkward (Fig. 8). It is fatiguing to the rider, and is harmful in two other ways. The knee is overextended, with strain on its posterior ligaments, as the skeleton knee demonstrates. Then, in the attempt to reach the pedal the hips are likely to be rocked, tilting downward on the side on which the pedal is low, as shown in Fig. 11.

The rocking pelvis is also seen with the right position of the saddle, in riders spurting or urging a wheel up-hill. The reason of the ugliness of the motion is not always apparent, but if a skeleton is photographed in this attitude (as was done with each posture), the extent of the twist of the hip and spine becomes evident.

Concerning stooping postures we need say little. Few women bend forward far, in this country. Any woman may do it momentarily with advantage in order to breast a gust of wind or on a longish hill, but the position is more injurious to women than to men.

Not only should the handles be the width of the shoulders apart, but one must see that a handle-bar be not too high, as it often is placed, from the laudable desire to oblige one's self to sit upright. At the right height the elbow should have a slight bend, to save rigidity and the transmission of vibration to the head, but at a higher level one loses steadiness and balance, and that traction on the handle which helps in mounting a grade or in the dash past an obstruction. Then, too, it is a relief to occasionally rest the weight on all fours.

Howells bases an æsthetic objection to wheeling, for the graceful sex, on what he aptly dubs the walking-beam action of the knee (Fig. 6). Much of this, the most lumbering and conspicuous of the errors of the novice, may be done away with, because it is due either to defective ankle action or to a gearing and length of crank out of all proportion to the height or length of leg. One who has not learned to depress the heel at the top of the stroke, and to bring the toe lower than the heel at the lowest part of the sweep, imparts to her knee an excursion in an up and down direction that amounts to three or four inches more than is necessary, a motion fully emphasized by the drawn folds of the skirt (Fig. 6). A thin woman of five feet eight inches swings a 6½-inch crank with grace, while a short girl on the same machine is a guy. Put the little woman on a 26-inch wheel, with lower gear and shorter crank, which is entirely suited to level roads, and the objectionable pumping motion is gone. What women need is the appearance of less motion on the wheel. Beauty must approach to repose. As in dancing, restraint and apparent ease belong to grace, while excess suggests gymnastic straining.

In a future number the dress question will be taken up.

❧

Loaning Pictures

By Mary S. Cutler

Friends enjoy loaning each other books. Neither the cheapness of the modern book, nor the advent of the public library, nor the occasional untrustworthiness of friends has spoiled this immemorial privilege. We obey the instinct of sharing pleasure with those that are dear to us, and at the same time enrich our lives by variety and fullness not otherwise possible. We like variety in our books, and gain most by suiting the volume not only to the need, but even to the caprice of a passing mood.

Only the friends who really belong to us stand the test of constant association. One would not think of reading over every day for years the same chapters from his favorite authors, expecting to find continual inspiration and suggestion. And yet this is what is demanded of pictures. We pay the penalty of this lack of discrimination, for even our choicest pictures pall upon us. Our gaze rests upon them, but the spiritual meaning ceases to appeal to us.

The Japanese, with their innate sense of simplicity and harmony, recognize this principle and carry it out to its logical conclusion. Mr. E. S. Morse in "Japanese Homes" says: "A Japanese may have a famous collection of pictures, yet these are stowed away, with the exception of the one exposed in the tokonoma." The tokonoma is a recess planned to show the single picture in its proper light from any point in the room. "If he is a man of taste, he changes the picture from time to time according to the season, the character of his guests, or for special occasions." Instead of stowing our pictures away like the Japanese, why should we not form the habit of loaning them to our friends?

What would be easier, after an evening visit from a friend, than to lend him a picture that pleases him, scarce heavier than the volumes which he is wont to carry home, its place to be filled by a simple readjustment or an exchange? When we go to call on a sick friend, why not carry with us, not only flowers and a cheerful face, but one of the pictures from our wall which we are sure the friend likes? We will hang it for him within easy sight of the bed or the couch, and see if it does not bring fresh thoughts, joy, and relief.

The new thought of philanthropy is the extension of one's circle of friends to include those who have had fewer opportunities for development than ourselves. Suppose we try the experiment of sharing our pictures with these friends, not by giving them the mean and unworthy ones of which we may have become the unwilling owners, but by loaning those which are choice and dear to us, and which for some reason appeal especially to them. To illustrate by an actual case, I number among such friends an Englishwoman, poor and old, and too feeble to leave the house. For years a Sunday afternoon call has been a delight to both of us. A colored photograph of Salisbury Cathedral in a tasteful frame, loaned for a few weeks, proved a real joy and refreshment to the old lady.

This work may be taken up in the same spirit by institutions.

Hull House, one of the most successful social settlements in this country, loans small framed pictures to the people in the neighborhood, and counts the plan one of its most fruitful efforts. The Friendly Aid House, lately opened at 248 East Thirty-fourth Street, New York, began this work January 10, 1896.

A loan exhibition of pictures has long been a feature of settlement, club, and church work. Would not the same exhibit be of more positive service if scattered over the entire year by showing a few pictures at a time?

The Children's Neighborhood Library, a part of the philanthropic work of the Troy (N. Y.) Unitarian church, displays a selection of about twenty pictures from the Century Portfolio (secured through The Outlook offer), one at a time, on the walls of its cheerful little reading-room, the pictures being changed in the same frame once in two weeks. (Any picture-dealer can make a frame which will allow of the change in a few seconds) Another choice picture is borrowed for a month from some friend of the library. The children are interested in the pictures and watch eagerly for the new ones.

This little library, containing only 676 books, circulated them 7,366 times in 1895 among 1,196 children. One can imagine the homes from which most of these children come, and the need in their lives of the beauty which the pictures suggest.

This idea of loaning pictures, if it approve itself to the judgment of the thoughtful, will admit of an almost infinite variety of application.

❧

We are not to carry others' burdens that they can carry as well as ourselves. True helpfulness consists in giving comfort; and comfort means giving strength to those who are weary by inspiring them when they hesitate or fail.—David O. Mears, D.D.

The essence of true nobility is neglect of self. Let the thought of self pass on, and the beauty of a great action is gone, like the bloom from a soiled flower.—Froude.

The poor are our friends, and, according to the Spanish proverb, "When a friend asketh, there is no to-morrow."—Lady Lindsay.

The Higher Life of Boston[1]

By Edward E. Hale

IT may be merely a fancy of mine that the destinies of Boston have been largely affected by the establishment here in 1635 of what they called a "Grammar School," and by the loyalty and pride by which that School has always been maintained. But I think this fancy will bear examination. There was then no grammar but Latin grammar, or Greek or Hebrew. So the establishment of a free Grammar School in the little village meant that from that time forward there was a school where every boy might study the Latin and Greek languages.

In another century other schools were added, in which, perhaps for an hour a day, a Boston boy might study some writing and some arithmetic. But practically from 1635 until after the Revolution every well-to-do boy in Boston, as long as he went to any school, was studying Latin and Greek. Not a tenth part of them ever went to the University, or entered what were called the learned professions. But all of them had so much initiation into the career of liberal study, as those two centuries understood it.

From this original arrangement, I suppose, there sprang a certain connection between the men of business, or the men of the mercantile class, and the college-bred men, as the men of law, of medicine, or of theology, such as I have never known in any other city of which I have read.

BOYLSTON ARCH

I have never known any city in which college-bred men went so much as a matter of course into practical business on a large scale; nor, on the other hand, have I ever known any other city where every man of affairs, who holds any position of importance, interests himself as a matter of course in what may be called the Higher Life of the town.

For a good instance, the town of Boston gave birth or education to five signers of the Declaration of Independence. Two of them were lawyers; one of them was a bookseller, one of them was a large importing merchant, and one of them, Ben Franklin, was a printer. All of them had been sent to the Latin Grammar School; four of them had graduated at Harvard College, but of these four, two, Sam Adams and John Hancock, went at once into business life in Boston; Hancock into his uncle's counting-room, and Sam Adams into his father's. I do not believe you will find anything like this, say, in the relations of London to the British Empire.

Or take this for a pretty instance. When the Commercial Club of Boston invited the Commercial Club of Chicago to a banquet where they wanted to provide everything conceivable for the satisfaction of their guests, the first thing they arranged was that the poet Longfellow should sit at their table as the most prominent of their guests. It was a matter of instinct with them that this would interest such guests as nothing else they could arrange could do.

He never spoke on such occasions. He did not speak then. But it was a matter of course that they should ask him, for they were his friends. It was a matter of course that he should accept, for he was theirs. It would not have happened in London, say, that Mr. Samuel Rogers or Mr. Wordsworth should be thought of as the guest who would give most attraction to a merchants' dinner in Guildhall.

I believe that this suggestion is not out of place in a study of the Higher Life of Boston. The enterprises or endeavors which I try to describe in this paper are kept alive by what I may call the loyalty or pride of the Boston man for Boston, quite like that which in Athens maintained the tragic theater, or the other great functions of religion and education.

What we call the Lowell Institute is a system of public lectures open to every one. What our English friends call the "foundation" was a sum of nearly three hundred thousand dollars set aside for this purpose by Mr. John Lowell, Jr. This gentleman was one of a distinguished family, to which Massachusetts, not to say the country, owes much. He had no children, and he left his fortune in trust for the maintenance of courses of lectures in Boston.

The custom, under the will, has been that one trustee should administer the income of this munificent gift, and this trustee has been always a near relative of this Mr. Lowell. His cousin, Mr. John A. Lowell, and this gentleman's son,

Robert Treat Paine
President Associated Charities

Gen. Charles G. Loring
Director Museum of Fine Arts

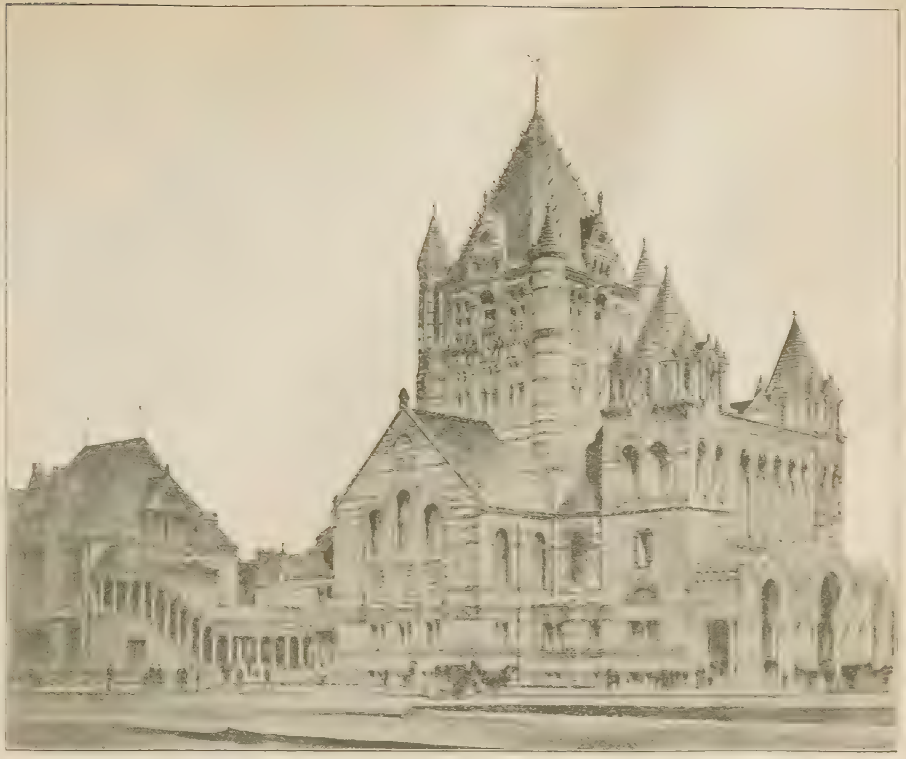
Prof. William T. Sedgwick
Professor of Biology, Massachusetts Institute of Technology

Edwin D. Mead
Editor of the "New England Magazine"

Hon. Francis A. Walker
resident Massachusetts Institute of Technology

---

[1] Previous articles in this series have been: "The Higher Life of American Cities" (introductory), by Mr. Theodore Roosevelt (The Outlook for December 21, 1895); "The Higher Life of New York City," by Albert Shaw (The Outlook for January 25, 1896); and "The Higher Life of Chicago," by Melville E. Stone (The Outlook for February 22, 1896). Other articles will be on New Orleans, by Miss Grace King: on Philadelphia, by Mr. Talcott Williams; on St. Louis, by the Rev. John Snyder; and on Buffalo, by the Rev. William Burnet Wright, D.D.



TRINITY CHURCH

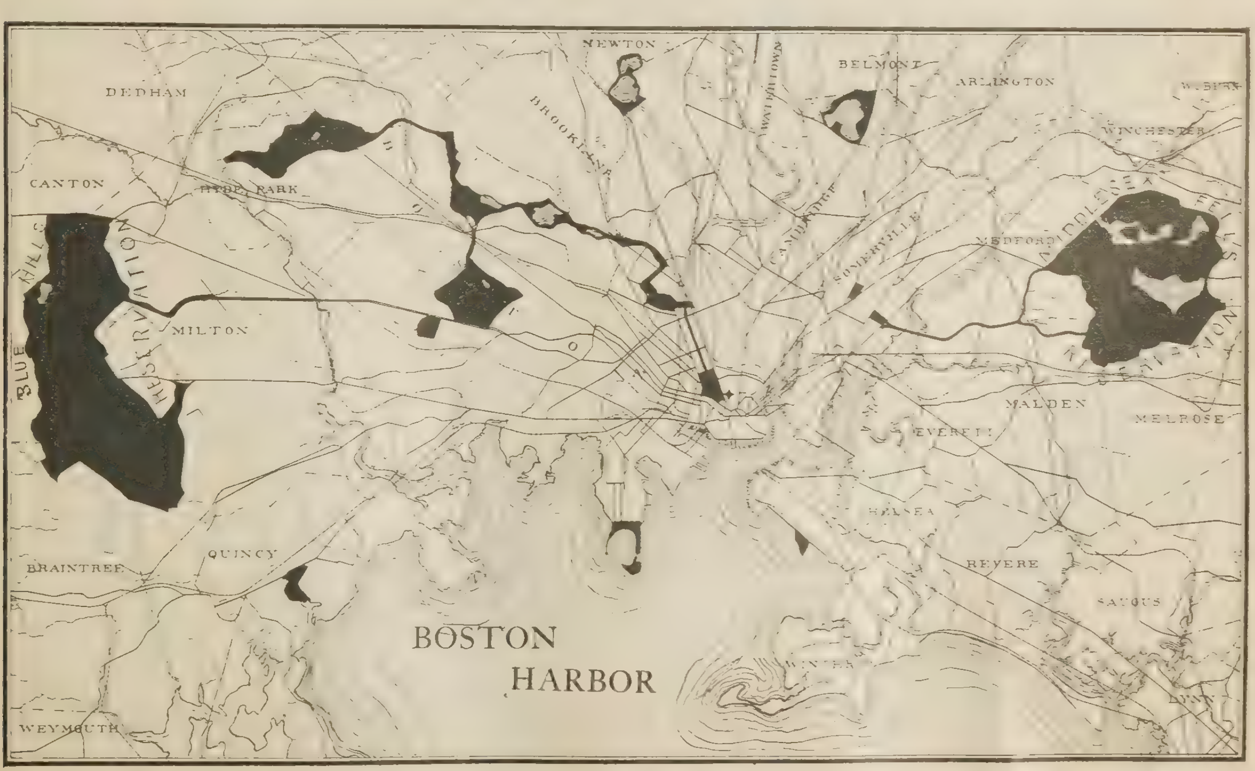
Mr. Augustus Lowell, have directed the annual lectures since 1840, when the first course was delivered. Each, in turn, has thus been president, trustee, and overseer of what is a university for the city of Boston—a university free to all comers. I am not aware that any estimate has recently been made of the annual attendance. But some estimate can be made when we remember that from October to May five lectures at least are delivered every week in a hall which seats eight hundred persons, which is almost always full.

Besides these lectures, open to all men and women, the Lowell Institute maintains special lectures to experts in various lines of study, and classes, which become schools, indeed, in some departments. Of these the most important, probably, is the School of Design.

The lectures have been so administered as to raise the standard of such instruction through the whole country. A "popular lecture" in England means a lecture in words of three letters delivered to people who have hardly heard of Noak's ark and never heard of Julius Cæsar. A "popular lecture" in America may be a lecture by Tyndall or Huxley on the most delicate detail of science.

Mr. John A. Lowell began the courses of lectures by engaging some of the college professors of most distinction in that time. Before many years he showed the world what he was about when he "imported Agassiz."[1] The importation of such a man as Agassiz showed to all America that nothing second-rate was to be entertained or tolerated here. The names of the lecturers since show how the reputation has been sustained which was then won. Among them have been Benjamin Silliman, Asa Gray, Louis and Alexander Agassiz, Lyell, Carpenter, Langley, James Walker, James Bryce, O. W. Holmes, and James Russell Lowell, to pick out a few names from many hundreds. And no one who loves the Institute forgets its two curators, Jeffries Wyman and Benjamin E. Cotting. In many notable instances the lecturers have, in these lectures, given the first public announcement of new observations or discoveries.

I do not know whether to call it an advantage, but practically the admirable administration of the "Lowell Lectures" has nearly put an end to almost all other courses



THE PARK SPACES NEAR BOSTON
(The black spots represent the Parks)

---

[1] The phrase is Mr. James Russell Lowell's. When he said that Harvard College had trained no truly great educator, he added, "For we imported Agassiz."

BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY

of lectures in Boston. The average Bostonian does not like to pay for a lecture. He does not like it any more than a New Yorker would like to be stopped by a toll-gate on Broadway. "Why should I pay for a lecture ticket? The Lowell lectures are free, and they are the best of their kind."

The Symphony Concerts furnish through the winter two admirable performances every week of the best music. A first-rate orchestra is maintained for the rendering of the most of this music, but from time to time soloists take a part in these concerts, if they have obtained sufficient distinction in the musical world. The expense and oversight of these Symphony Concerts, as they are called, is not assumed by a society, as in most such cases in our larger towns. It is assumed by one public-spirited citizen. This is Colonel Henry L. Higginson, a distinguished cavalry officer in the war. He is the same who gave the great athletic field to Harvard College. People buy tickets to the concerts, but no one supposes that the cost of the tickets ever pays the expenses. That is assumed by Colonel Higginson, and he never troubles mankind with his balance-sheet.

ONE OF THE HOMES WHERE HOME LIBRARIES ARE PLACED

Side by side with lectures, if you really mean study and the Higher Life, come libraries. Boston has and uses the library of Harvard College, the city Public Library, of which the motto is, "Open to all," and the library of the Athenæum, besides many smaller libraries.

The Public Library is one of the large libraries of the world. At the first the library had exactly the fate of such institutions generally. Some contributions of public documents, however valuable in the long run, were not attractive to Tom, Dick, and Harry, who wanted to read. But so soon as Mr. Edward Everett, Mr. George Ticknor, Mr. John Bigelow, were put upon the board, the passion which each of these gentlemen had for public education displayed itself in the measures which they took, which have insured the success of the Public Library. They were fortunate in having the co-operation of Charles Coffin Jewett, to whom the science of library management in this country owes a great deal. Early in the business, a position on the board of trustees came to be considered as an honorable post, and this board has now the services of many competent scholars.

Of all which the result is that the library is thoroughly popular. City governments may cut down other expenses, but they waver a little before they cut down the appropriation here. A few years ago the trustees determined on building the magnificent palace in which the library is now housed, and last February it was opened to the public.

One of the prettiest sights in Boston is the children's reading-room. Here, in one of the finest halls in the building, are seats for one hundred and seventy-five children; and the children's books are arranged round the room in cases, where they themselves can take them from the shelves. They may sit and read them there, from early morning till nine in the evening. Every boy or girl in Boston who is over twelve may have a card by which to take out a book; any boy or girl in the world may go into this children's reading-room and read. A good popular arrangement for the distributing of books to each of the sixty grammar-schools in Boston is now working its way into practice.

In the general reading-room there are seats and tables for four hundred readers. Here also a large miscellaneous library is literally at the hand of every one who wants, so arranged as to be almost its own catalogue. Nineteen out of twenty of the books which the reader of this article would want in the course of a year are on these shelves. He has simply to walk into the building, hang up his hat, and go to the bookcase and take down the book that he needs. If he needs the twentieth book, he writes his name upon a slip, and this is carried off by the mysterious little carts, which travel off fifty rods to the other end of the stack perhaps, and, after due conjurations there on the part of a boy or girl in attendance, the book comes back, it does not know why or how. Here also the service is absolutely free to any member of the human family.

A "HOME LIBRARY" GROUP

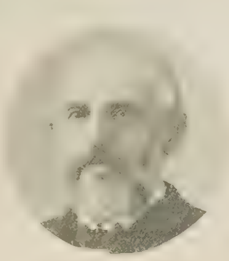
When a lecturer comes to the Lowell Institute, the leading books, even to the number of several hundred, which will illustrate his subject are laid out together, in a special room, for the use of readers. For instance, at the moment when I write, Dr. Weir's lectures on fine art have suggested the arrangement of such books, some of them of great curiosity and value, in a room large enough for the accommodation of the people who wish to follow his references.

I once had a class of a dozen or more bright young women who were reading Shakespeare with me. I made arrangements for one of the private reading-rooms, and they met me twice a week there. Each girl had her own play to work up, and as the winter went by each girl presented her results. It was not till the winter was ended, and the class, that I found that most of those young women had the impression that any bright girl in America, wherever she lived, could handle a copy of the original quarto or could compare the readings of the first folios. These things had been displayed to them so simply and easily that they did not understand that they had enjoyed the privilege which "kings and prophets waited for and died without the sight."



William H. Baldwin
President Boston Young Men's Christian Union

Rev. R. Kidner
St. Andrew's Church

Rev. William T. Warren, D.D.
President Boston University

Rev. F. B. Allen
Episcopal City Mission

The Boston Athenæum maintains a good miscellaneous library and a convenient reading-room. It was established early in the century, by a vigorous effort among the literary men who worked on the "Monthly Anthology" and "North American Review." Mr. Lothrop Motley once said to me that he thought the curious opportunity given to young men in Boston by the Historical Society's library, the Athenæum, and the Ebeling Collection in Cambridge, did much to make what one may almost call the Boston school of historians. It directed the early reading of Sparks, Bancroft, Palfrey, Prescott, Parkman, Motley himself, and now Winsor and Channing and Adams and Fiske.

The Historical Society was founded more than a hundred years ago. Under its new President, Charles Francis Adams, it has a larger career before it than ever. Its elegant Dowse Library is one of the most interesting lions of Boston, and is open to any well-introduced person. The New England Historic-Genealogical Society, much larger in numbers than the older society, maintains an admirable working library of local and family history. This is open as a prairie is, to the millions of people who want to be Colonial Dames or Sons of the Revolution. The staff give the most careful attention to every comer. And any one of higher make-up than a chimpanzee, if, as Dr. Palfrey says, "he be of Anglo-Saxon lineage," can come away, after a morning's lounge there, certain that "the blood of King Egbert runs in his veins."

CHARLESBANK—CHILDREN'S PLAYGROUND IN FOREGROUND

Now we will turn from these mammoth libraries, for people who love books already, to one of the Boston institutions which teaches children to love them. This is the "Home Library."

A Home Library is a set of fifteen good books for children, with a selection of children's magazines, all put up in a neat bookcase. This library is taken to the home of Max Schwartz or Celia Kelley, and Celia or Max becomes librarian, while the neighbor children, to the number of ten, are the patrons. All books are approved by a competent committee, and in each set there are stories of home life, stories of travel or adventure, something for the youngest and something to encourage the older ones toward the reading of grown-ups. Each group of children is placed under the care of some person of sense, who meets them once a week, and spends an hour or two in talk about the books, in playing games, or, in whatever way, in widening the range of life for these children of the tenements. Eighty such libraries are now in use; and when, after two or three months, a set of books has been thoroughly read, they are passed on to another home, and replaced by a set which has been doing duty elsewhere.

Now we must pass from lectures and libraries to schools or colleges where men and women are entered as students, and work daily and regularly. The "Tech," as we call the Institute of Technology, the Boston University, Boston College, the Normal School of Art, the Museum Art School and the private Cowles School, the New England Conservatory of Music and one or two smaller conservatories, are the principal schools which may be called the professional schools of Boston.

The public-school system embraces also six high schools, three Latin schools. There is also an evening high school, to which any person more than sixteen years old may go. It has pupils of all ages—many men and women. The number in all the classes is nearly three thousand. The school building of the High and Latin Schools—also occupied by the Evening High School—is one of the finest school buildings in the country. The library of the Latin School is one of the choicest, and least visited, of the city "lions."

The Massachusetts Institute of Technology was opened in 1865. It owes its foundation largely to the earnest purpose of Dr. William Barton Rogers, its first President. It unites schools of chemistry, architecture, civil engineering, steam engineering, topographical engineering, and electrical engineering. It prides itself on its laboratory work.

H. E. Scudder
Editor "Atlantic Monthly."

Rev. Timothy Brosnahan
President Boston College

Rev. James De Normandie
Trustee Public Library

Samuel F. Hubbard
North End Union

Mr. Edwin Ginn
President People's Building Association

Its school of biology, at the head of which is Sedgwick, is easily granted to be the first in America. The "Tech." is the largest scientific and technical school in the United States, and one of the largest in the world. Last year's catalogue showed 137 teachers, and 1,183 pupils, from 37 States and 19 foreign countries. Its characteristics, as stated by its own staff, are: (1) The variety of its courses; (2) the unusually large amount of laboratory work; (3) its high standard of scholarship; (4) the requisition of a large amount of general, or what the world calls liberal, studies; (5) the high grade of its thesis work. It occupies six large buildings near Copley Square. In the very heart of the finest part of Boston, it bears daily testimony to the spirit which made Boston. As you meet the crowds of students, with note-books and portfolios, you remember the Latin Quarter of Paris.

GRACE BEFORE MEAT—KINDERGARTEN FOR THE BLIND

Close at hand, fronting Copley Square, is the Art Museum. It occupies three sides of a hollow square, of which the fourth side, completing the Museum, is yet to be built. The collection of casts and statues is excellent, and one is glad always to see students at work there. The collection of pictures is large, and is frequently reinforced by the loan of pictures or collections offered by private owners.

The Museum Art School is maintained in the basement of the same building, and the pupils have all the advantages of study which such a collection can give. The regular course of study covers three years, and the work of the students, as it is occasionally exhibited, is enough to show how high is the standard of the school.

Not far away is the State Normal Art School, founded to prepare teachers who are to take charge of drawing classes in the public schools. More than a thousand pupils have taken the certificates or diplomas here in the last twenty years. Cowles's Art School, a private school, has maintained a high reputation in the eagerness for instruction in fine art which has revealed itself in late years.

By far the largest school of musical instruction is the New England Conservatory of Music. It was founded by the energy and devotion of the late Dr. Eben Tourgée, who died in 1891. It is now conducted by a Board of Trustees, of which Mr. Richard H. Dana is the head. The extent of its work appears from the treasurer's report, which shows an expense of a quarter of a million dollars annually. In its most prosperous year it received 2,271 pupils. Last year, in the extreme depression of business, it received only 1,500. But this falling off is not due to any lowering of the standard or weakening of the staff. It has the confidence and help of the leaders of the musical resources of Boston. Its full course covers four years.

Besides these great colleges of technology, fine arts, and music, there are the colleges or universities of liberal arts—

Herbert Putnam
Librarian Boston Public Library

Samuel B. Capen
President Municipal League

Richard H. Dana
President of Trustees, New England Conservatory of Music

Dr. B. E. Cotting
Curator Lowell Institute

Hon. Charles Francis Adams.
President Massachusetts Historical Society

BOSTON COMMON—THE FROG POND

Harvard University, the Boston University, and Boston College. But we must ask The Outlook to give us a separate article for them and their five thousand scholars.

Harvard University is technically spoken of as "at Cambridge." And we old purists, under the lead of Edward Everett when he was President of the University, made a fight to call it by the name "University at Cambridge," by which it is known in the State Constitution. But the young set, which is now growing old, were too much for us. Our name was thrown out of the window, and "Harvard University" is the name by which it wins its well-deserved laurels. This is no matter. For Cambridge proper is but half a mile from Boston proper, and is quite within the larger Boston. Indeed, four of the sixteen schools of the University are in the territorial limits of the municipality of Boston, if any one cares what they are. These four are the Boylston Medical School, the Bussey Institute of Agriculture, the School of Dentistry, and the Veterinary School. The University also maintains an observatory in the Andes. Every year shows some new building, or gateway, or other improvement, in the grounds—only too small—at Cambridge. Within a few years the noble Soldiers' Field for athletes has been added to the University domain, on the Brighton side of Charles River. The Arnold Arboretum of the University makes one of the finest points in the system of Boston parks.

The Boston University has no dormitories for students; its students, men and women, live where they will. Its principal buildings are near the State House, on the highest ground in Boston. It maintains a Department of Liberal Arts (with 353 students), of which the standard is as high as that of any American college. It has also departments of agriculture, of theology, of law, and of medicine. Its medical school was the first in America to require a four years' course of study for a degree. It receives both sexes to each of its schools. Its students last year came from thirty-six American States and twenty-one foreign countries; in all the branches there are 1,252.

Boston College has a fine building near the New England Conservatory. Its President now is the Rev. Timothy Brosnahan, of the Society of Jesus, and the College is under the system of that Society. The pupils are mostly of the Church of Rome. But no student is refused participation in the privileges, honors, or degrees of the College on account of his religious opinions.

With such scanty notice we must pass, for the present, the three colleges which have much to do with our Higher Life.

On a rough estimate, made from this year's catalogues, there are more than nine thousand young men and women, who have come from places outside of Boston for study, in higher grades of study than those of ordinary schools. Of these nine thousand persons, more than two-thirds are men. The Conservatory and art schools have a majority of women. But the three colleges and the Technology have many more men than women. Now probably there belong in Boston twenty-five thousand young men between sixteen and twenty-one years of age. The Young Men's Christian Union alone enrolls in its classes, clubs, and gymnasium five thousand members; the Christian Association more than half as many. To their number is added, every winter, this group of six thousand or more who are engaged in study of some or what we call the higher branches of human interest. When you meet in the street a man of about this age, the chances are one to three that he belongs to the class which once had the "benefit of clergy." They used to say that every eighth man in Rome was a priest. These figures seem to show that every fourth young man in Boston in winter is a student.

Such a condition affects social intercourse, in a certain way. It affects life, as I see it, in the details of the interests of a church. I found, one evening, a little group of three young people talking together in the parlor of our church. One of these was from Oregon, one from South Carolina, and one from New Jersey. Nor was this in the least exceptional. These young people rove from point to point in Boston for their amusement and for their improvement. They know just what is going on. They understand the machinery of the Public Library much better than we old residents do. And they can tell you, by some divine gift of prophecy, whether it is worth your while or not to attend on the proposals of some side-show. In a word, Boston is a university city. But old Boston hardly knows this itself.

JOHNSTON GATEWAY TO THE QUADRANGLE
(Harvard University)

Within twenty years past the necessity of providing air, sunshine, and the enjoyment of nature for all has compelled the establishment of public parks for the people of Boston.

There are now two well equipped and endowed commissions appointed to meet this necessity. The Boston Park Commission has opened to the public a belt of park-spaces which circle the city, centering in Franklin Park, an area of several hundred acres, fortunately situated. This has been rather over-improved, with its curbstones, asphalt, and macadam, and other insults to nature. But time and good sense will correct the work of such audacity; and We the People gain playgrounds, bicycle-grounds, a good chance for driving, and pretty walks, within reach of a five-cent fare.

Seaward, the Commission has succeeded in rescuing a beautiful island, the "Castle Island" of the fathers. This gives to the people a charming summer resort where winds are cool and the ocean beats the shores. The bathing-places make part of the equipment.

It is said that east of the Worcester County hills there is no land in Massachusetts worth a cent an acre for cultivation, except that which can be used for vegetable gardens. However this may be, we have all the better chance for public parks, and our admirable General Park Act has stimulated public action that way. A Metropolitan Park Commission was formed three years ago, which has already, at the public charge, bought the Blue Hills, the Middlesex Fells, and two small reservations of fine scenery, all within ten miles of Boston. These make in all nearly seven thousand acres open to every one. Revere Beach, a beautiful sea-reach on the Atlantic, has been brought under the same admirable dominion.

Please remember that, in Algonkin, Mattachusett means "Great Hill," and that the highest Blue Hill, which thus becomes the property of the State, gives the State its name. One of the smaller holdings, purchased by a gift from Mr. and Mrs. Atkins, gives the State the Waverley Oaks, the "finest clump of oaks in New England."

MUSEUM OF FINE ARTS

Of all the parks, that which gives the most pleasure and life to the square inch is Charlesbank—right on the edge of the most crowded streets or alleys of Boston. No five-cent fares here between you and God's handiwork! Just the two feet under you which "God and nature" put into the control of most of us. To see the mothers sitting on the benches, while the boys and girls are climbing in the gymnasium, or the babies playing in the sand-gardens—this is what the prophet calls "joy unalloyed."

For the benefit of other people, who have to control public breathing-places, I reveal a great discovery.

Call the place a Forest from the first, and not a Park. If it is a Park, it has to have curbstones and levels. The checkerberry-patches have to be raised eleven inches and a quarter, or lowered nine feet and a half. And the "improvement" of the park costs you a hundred thousand dollars an acre. On the other hand, if you call it a Forest, and talk glibly about the New Forest and Epping Forest, then you can improve it enough for only a thousand dollars an acre, and you will be confirmed in the opinion that the good God is the best of landscape gardeners.

All these enterprises, so far as they succeed, are tokens of good government, from the time when Winthrop and the rest founded the Free Grammar School in 1635. All of them rest on the public spirit of the community and the support it gives to law.

As to the detail of administration, our new Mayor, Josiah Quincy, says that in the improvements made in our city charter in the last quarter-century, it has been made to conform more closely to the standards of the most judicious students of municipal constitutions than that of any other American city.

But forms are nothing without public spirit. Let us say it reverently, this public spirit must be a Holy Spirit, or The Holy Spirit. And while no club, coterie, or society affects to have this Spirit shut up in a casket, as, in the Arabian Nights, Solomon's spirit was locked up, there are many organizations, large or small, public or private, which exist simply to give to It encouragement and to quicken Its growth. Every large church, I think—certainly all in the Protestant communions—regards the good government of the city as a special business of its church clubs. The subjects for discussion at the monthly public meetings of the Baptist and Congregational Unions, of the Episcopal Club and Unitarian Club, often look this way. At my own church the Christian Citizenship Class, of fifty or more members, meets every Sunday noon.

The city owes much in this direction to Samuel B. Capen, President of the Municipal League, and to Edwin D. Mead, President of the Twentieth Century Club, and to these clubs. Mr. Capen had done essential service in the presidency of the School Committee, and Mr. Mead in charge of the Old South Historical Work.

The Municipal League is made up of members chosen from all the societies—religious, mercantile, or literary—which claim as part of their work the good government of Boston. It may not engage in the National Government or its politics, but it does study, and acts upon, the legislation and the elections which bear on the city government or its details. The Twentieth Century Club embodies three hundred members, men and women, for conference, social or public, and interests itself in any themes of moral, spiritual, or social improvement. The membership brings together a large number of the leaders of opinion. It maintains a club-room, and has begun to form a library. The Good Citizenship Society provides lectures and circulates reports bearing on the duties of citizens in whatever relations. The Lyceum League is an alliance of Debating Societies of young men, and young women if they choose, who discuss and study similar questions. The Old South Work, with the Old South Meeting-House as its center, arranges courses of lectures, provides for historical study, and issues the Old South Leaflets, now generally known among political students. Another aid to good government is found in the "better dwellings" societies, which, under the lead of Mr. Paine, Mr. Ginn, and other gentlemen, are doing what can be done to break up the overcrowding of the tenement districts, and to place families in homes outside the city.

The North End Union, under the oversight of Samuel F. Hubbard, maintains a Children's House. The city has established one of the public kindergartens there which meets in the morning, and there is a general good time in the afternoon. The children absolutely flock to the house, and it is curious to note the sort of freemasonry developed among them as "Union" boys and girls. Here is a social home for young men, where care is used in selecting the best reading for them; lectures on the topics of the day are given by the brightest speakers of the city. The more active boys have gymnastics, a drum corps, and a drill club, while the girls have clubs, classes, and gymnasitcs. A public bath is now open for a small fee.

This is one of various enterprises, large and small, which attempt to keep boys and girls off the streets, away from vicious amusements, and to prepare them for life. St. Andrew's, Barnard Memorial, the Institute of Industry, are others.

In such endeavors the "Settlements," so called, furnish ready workmen. Harvard College and the Boston University enroll many students who take classes in these working schools. The South End House (formerly Andover House), Trinity House, Hale House, Lincoln House, the Every-Day House, Denison House, Dorothea House, the Epworth League House, the new Kindergarten House, St. Stephen's, St. Andrew's, are perhaps the best known of these settlements. But all of them have a proper reserve about publishing their plans or their successes.

A Visit to Penzance

By Arthur Reed Kimball

A CORNISH FISHWIFE

Comparatively few Americans when in England visit the Penzance district. The principal reason is not that its rare picturesqueness is disputed, but because, as the phrase goes, "there are so many other places better worth the seeing." A trip abroad is an event for the great majority of Americans. In deciding on their itinerary they are guided by a travel-conscience, a sense of responsibility for the disposition of their time. It is much the same feeling that one had in visiting the Chicago World's Fair—the feeling that one was in duty bound to see all that there was to see "of importance," because the chance to see it again would never come. In foreign travel this phrase "of importance" covers any historic spot, or famous view, or "preserved ruin" within reaching distance. To break off, then, from the accustomed route of travel for the sake of a remote corner of Cornwall—a district popularly known by name on this side the water through the pirates of Gilbert's opera—seems an almost wicked waste of precious opportunity.

In personal palliation for violating this excellent principle may be pleaded the need of rest after the actual physical weariness of conscientious travel, a desire to see a characteristic bit of England visited only by the occasional American, and a curiosity to discover the peculiar charm of the region for that now famous group of artists known as "the Newlyn School."

Taking up the last first, Newlyn is as much a part of the view, when facing the beautiful Penzance Bay, as St. Michael's Mount itself—a rocky, castle-crowned islet standing out a silent sentinel on the extreme left. On the extreme right is the fishing village of Newlyn, a cluster of small white houses clinging to the hillside, steep of path to reach, set closely together purposely, one imagines, to bolster each other up when the waves leap up from below or the winds sweep down from above. The narrowest of narrow lanes, as crooked as they are narrow, thread the spaces between these crowded houses, as completely walling the visitor in as at Tangiers itself. "Picturesque but stifling" is the visitor's first comment, marveling at the choice of Newlyn by artists, who seem most of all to need roominess. It is in striking contrast with any preconceived idea of an art settlement that an American may bring with him from Mr. Chase's art colony at Shinnecock, where the long stretches of the open reach far out over the dunes. Indeed, this first "shut-in" effect of Newlyn is much the same as that of Barbizon, the home of Millet and Rousseau, on the edge of the forest of Fontainebleau. It is only by entering a Newlyn house and seeing the view from a second-story window that its possibilities can be appreciated.

The contrast between Newlyn and Shinnecock does not stop with first impressions. There is no "Newlyn school," properly speaking. Only a very few pupils, of a single artist, go there at all, and those few receive their instruction in Penzance. Still further, of the score of artists who live in Newlyn, no two are working on exactly the same lines. The fact that most, if not all, of them received their early art-training in Paris is almost the sole ground for classing them, as is popularly done, as a group of "transplanted impressionists." A typical instance of the independence of their work is Frank Bramley, the distinguished Newlynite, who is to-day tending toward sympathy with the Glasgow school, and the stress it lays on a proper attention to values. Stanhope Forbes, the discoverer of Newlyn, put it patly when he said, in repudiating the "school" idea, "We are simply a lot of jolly good fellows, and we live at Newlyn."

Stranger yet to those who think of art settlements

LAND'S END, LOOKING [illegible]

as summer colonies, summer is the time when most of the Newlyn artists take their vacations. They go up to London to see where their pictures have been hung at the Academy (not from any special respect for Academy judgments, but from a despised commercial necessity), and they run over to Paris and the Continent. This is because, for the most part, the Newlyn artists are figure-painters. Their perch on the hillside affords excellent light for their studios (some of them made of glass) in the short days of fall, winter, and spring; the fisher-folk, especially the fishwives, are the best of models, close at hand and reasonable in price; and living is good and cheap. But for these reasons the Newlyn artists might as advantageously do their work in London.

A STREET IN PENZANCE

On the other hand, Newlyn, in addition to its beautiful outlook and its climate, sought by invalids even in winter, offers opportunity for a pleasant and stimulating social intimacy among people of congenial tastes and similar circumstances—an intimacy hardly possible in a large city or a metropolis. "Newlyn evenings" are highly prized by those privileged to be the guests of the artists. These evenings are marked by a truly Bohemian informality. For example, men can attend them in any clothes they care to wear, from conventional evening dress to tennis flannels. Whether the attraction of a given evening be a dance, or a play—Newlyn artists are greatly given to acting—or music, or cards, or simply conversation, matters little. There is always spirit and go and comradeship—the ozone of the atmosphere in which thrives a genuine social life.

Speaking of their fondness for acting recalls a humorous experience at the expense of these Newlyn artist-actors. Some years ago they offered to give a play for the benefit of the hospital in Penzance. Unluckily, no profits resulted for anybody, but instead there was a considerable deficit. Every winter since, the expecting but disappointed donors have felt obliged to give at least one play in an attempt to make that deficit good.

The visitor knows that he is in Newlyn as soon as he has crossed the bridge at the end of the Penzance esplanade. This is told to him by a little art building, not yet entirely finished. It is the gift of Mr. Passmore Edwards, a kind of English Andrew Carnegie, who has given some twenty buildings in all, mostly public libraries, to various places. There is a suggestion of conventionality, and therefore of incongruity, in an art building for Newlyn. It seems unsuited to the simplicity and individuality of its art life. But this is perhaps an ungracious comment better left unmade. No doubt in time the new art building will come to fill a valuable place.

One is tempted to linger unduly on the Newlyn side of Penzance, as if interest clustered in it chiefly because a group of artists have chosen it for a home, have sealed it with the distinction of their æsthetic approval. But Penzance needs no patronage even from an art colony of distinction. It is its own attraction. To the English visitor, indeed, Penzance, the town, is only one of the smaller, quieter summer resorts. This would hardly be a reason for an American to visit it, when Brighton gives so much better chance to see English watering-place life. Rather, to the American, the charm of Penzance is that it is small and quiet—"off the beat" of the American tourist. It affords an unusual opportunity to get close to what is quaint and primitive in a genuine way. There is an entire absence of any suggestion of possible preparation for sightseers—as of posing for tableaux—which is sometimes offensively conspicuous. There is no disillusion in a visit to Penzance. In its simplicity, smacking of the sea, it recalls Nantucket to the American, especially as it too has its town-crier, an active old man of eighty, spry of foot, vigorous of lungs, and equally vigorous in the way he rings his bell.

Indeed, so old-fashioned is Penzance in all its ways that it was almost a shock when attending service at St. Mary's on a Sunday morning to hear the vicar preach a sermon in favor of free pews and on the duty of "reaching the masses." One did not suppose that "the masses" existed in that out-of-the-way corner of Cornwall. Similarly, it was a surprise to find that Mr. George Gould was a much more popular person in Penzance than the Prince of Wales, because he had given £25 to the Penzance yachting regatta, while H. R. H. refused even the use of his name as patron, although he is Duke of Cornwall. It was only human nature, under the circumstances, for the people of Penzance to cheer the Vigilant rather than the Britannia. But it was a disappointment to find simple Cornish loyalty thus corrupted by a sordid worldliness.

Much more in keeping was it with what one naturally expected, and wanted to expect, on driving to Gurnard's Head—one of the wildest sea-views in Penwith—to have for a guide an old woman who had never seen an American before. To find one's self actually a curiosity, instead of a commonplace, was as novel as it was refreshing. When asked whether she had ever been in Devonshire (the next county), she replied slowly: "Once, when I was a little girl. But Devonshire is a long ways off, and [reflectively] America is ever so much farther off than Devonshire!" That old woman of Gurnard's Head is a type. Again and again in driving out from Penzance one sees villages and people such as Mrs. Humphry Ward might sketch in a companion-piece to "Bessie Costrell." Reading that little book at home here in America one can scarcely believe that such villages and people are possible in nineteenth-century England.

One great charm of the Penzance country is its possible variety of scenery in the course of a single drive. For example, in driving from Penzance to St. Ives by way of Gurnard's Head, and home by the direct route, one sees the rich garden greenness of rural England; the bleakness of treeless stretches, accentuated by the smokeless chimneys of abandoned tin-mines; the fierce ruggedness of bluffs rising sheer out of the sea, with here and there among the rocks the house of the coast guard to suggest the nearness of shipwreck and death; the beautiful fishing village of St. Ives, the home of not a few artists, its bay a Mediterranean blue under the summer sun; and, finally, another succession of tree-shaded lanes and verdure-clad fields. As everywhere else in England, there is always present that sense of a historic past so precious to the American—a rock-pile relic of the Cornish kings, an effigy of a Crusader in the churchyard, some reminder of the Spanish torch in the days of the Armada, or the spot where Wesley preached to the throngs of Cornish miners.

ST. MICHAEL'S MOUNT IN PENZANCE BAY

Of many noteworthy spots near Penzance, Land's End comes first in interest. The very familiarity of its name piques curiosity. Yet a search of the visitors' register for more than a year back yielded but a beggarly few American names. It may be truthfully said of Land's End that it is satisfying, that it fills the full measure of anticipation as a picture of the final meeting and parting of land and sea. It is a scene eloquently expressive of constant war matched by constant defiance, of encroachment and resistance—great waves forever throwing themselves in vain against a headland of seamed granite. It is no wonder that Wesley, standing on the rock ledge bridging the cavernous chasm where meet the waters of St. George's and the English Channels, was moved to write his solemn hymn,

> Lo! on a narrow neck of land.
> 'Twixt two unbounded seas I stand.

Even the most frivolous, standing where Wesley stood, must feel a thrill of the solemnity he felt.

The Longships Lighthouse—its dangerous ledge of rocks barely to be seen above the waves, although apparently a stone's throw or so from shore—adds a typical touch of loneliness to a scene of which, as one looks seaward, the only sign of life is the gull or cormorant. The guide-book tells how "four of its keepers have been washed off the rocks and drowned, one committed suicide, one went mad, and one died in the lighthouse"—an accumulation of horrors easy of belief when the story is read on the spot. The last horror, however, is the only one of which there seemed to be any local knowledge. It had always been the custom, so the sea-folk said, for two keepers to be assigned together to the lighthouse. During a great storm one of these keepers was taken sick and died. It was days before the survivor could signal the shore, or a boat could be sent to him. Meanwhile he was imprisoned in that little sentry-box with the body of his companion, the waves, as they broke over the lighthouse, completely engulfing it. For minutes at a time it was as entirely shut out from view on shore as if it had been washed away. After this ghastly experience three men have been assigned together to Longships Lighthouse, a fourth on shore relieving one of them once a fortnight, and then staying a term of six weeks at the lighthouse.

To such men it is given to understand, perhaps even better than to sailors on a ship, what the fury and turmoil of the sea is after a long-continued storm, as Ruskin describes it, when "there is indeed no distinction left between the sea and air—no object, nor horizon, nor any landmark or natural evidence of position is left—the heaven is all spray and the ocean all cloud, and you can see no farther in any direction than you could see through a cataract."

That must have been the awe-inspiring spectacle of the infuriated ocean as it looked to that lone watcher beside his companion's body in the Longships Lighthouse.

*

Realism

By Priscilla Leonard

The poets reach a deeper life
Than microscope or surgeon's knife.
Groping for facts, we lose the real;
Truth, to be true, must be ideal,
Serenely showing sun and star
To be as real as maggots are.

Martin Luther, the Prophet of the Reformation

Prophets of the Christian Faith Series—VI.[1]

By Adolf Harnack

MARTINVS LVTHER DOCTOR ÆTATIS SVÆ LXIII

LUTHER AT SIXTY-THREE
An old Woodcut of the Cranach school

He came in the fullness of time—when the rule of the Roman Church, which had hitherto educated the peoples, had become a tyranny, when States and nations were beginning to throw off an ecclesiastical yoke and independently to organize themselves in accordance with their own laws.

He came in the fullness of time—when the economic conditions of Europe, both through inner developments and through the discovery of distant lands, had become completely changed, and the method of administration of their estates by the Roman priests and monks was no longer tenable.

He came in the fullness of time—when mediæval churchly science had outlived its usefulness and when the tree of knowledge was producing young, fresh shoots.

He came in the fullness of time—when the classes and castes of the Middle Ages were disintegrating, and when everywhere the individual, supported by the new culture of the Renaissance, was striving to struggle up to independence. He came when the monastic idea of life had run through all phases of its development, and when man was beginning to esteem an active not less than an ascetic life.

He came in the fullness of time—when laymen were no longer satisfied with priest and sacrament, but were seeking God himself, and were feeling the personal responsibility of their own souls. He came as man was recognizing the precepts of the Church to be but arbitrary laws, and her traditions as only innovations and forgeries.

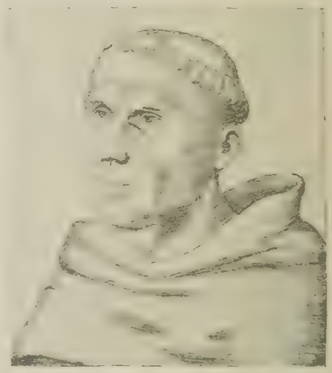
He was no universal genius, no Plato, no Leibnitz. He did not grasp all the conditions of his time; nay, he did not even know them all. His education was mediocre. He was no sharp and refined thinker, he was no humanist, he was no critic; his vocation was not to rectify theoretical errors just because they were errors. The sphere of science was not his sphere; indeed, he had an instinctive and never entirely conquered suspicion of "reason."

He was no saint, no Francis, who, through the glow of feeling, through the sweetness of his spirit or the power of his sacrifice, swept every one along with him. He was also no agitator, no orator, who, like Savonarola, could move and inflame the masses.

Luther was no cosmopolitan, but a German with the marked characteristics of his nation, a German as monk, as professor, and as reformer. His personality has never been understood by the Romanic races; it has never impressed them; his thoughts alone have been able to take root among them.

How was this man, then, able to become the reformer of the Western Church? How was it that this professor in a little German university, in the midst of an uncultivated environment, could unfetter the great movement by which the new epoch in the history of the world began? How did it happen that, through him, "the time was fulfilled"?

ARMS OF THE LUTHER FAMILY



LUTHER WHEN A MONK
(Cranach, 1520)

He was in only one thing great and mighty, overwhelmingly and irresistibly the master of his time, victoriously overcoming the history of a thousand years in order to force his age into new channels. He was great only in the rediscovered knowledge of God in the Gospels. What it means to have a God, what this God is, how he grasps us, and how we can apprehend and hold him—all that he experienced and that he proclaimed. In the midst of the night of his conventual life, as he strove to work out his salvation in fear and trembling, it dawned upon him like the sun: "The just shall live by faith." In the midst of the complex system of what was called "religion," in the midst of unsatisfying consolations and of incomplete penances, he lived religion itself, and he led it out into freedom. The living God—not a philosophical or mystic abstraction—the manifest and gracious God, was a God to be reached by every Christian. Unchangeable reliance of the heart upon God, personal confidence of belief in Him who said, "I am thy salvation," that was to Luther the whole sum of religion. Beyond all care and trouble, beyond all arts of the ascetic, beyond all theological precepts, he dared to grasp God himself, and in this deed of faith his whole life won its independent sturdiness. "Mit unser Macht ist Nichts gethan"

Wittenberg an der Elbe die Hauptstatt in ChurSachsen.1546.
Elb Fluss

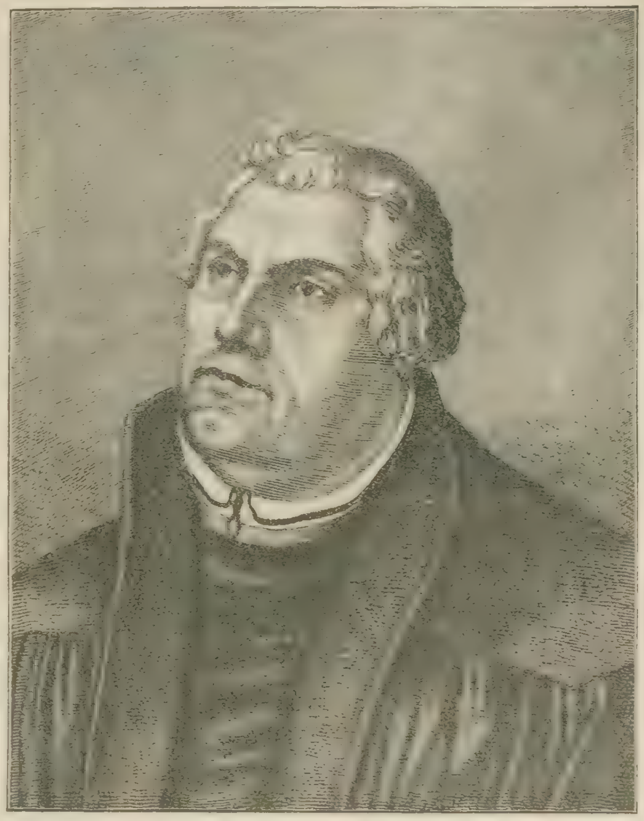
WITTENBERG
(From an old Copperplate)

---

[1] Previous articles in this series have been: "What is a Prophet?" by Lyman Abbott (The Outlook for December 14, 1895); "The Apostle Paul," by the Rev. George Matheson, D.D. (December 21, 1895); "Clement of Alexandria," by the Rev. Marcus Dods, D.D. (January 4, 1896); "St. Augustine," by the Rev. A. C. McGiffert, D.D. (February 8); and "Wycliffe," by Dean Fremantle (March 14). Following articles in the series will be by Dean Farrar, Principal Fairbairn, the Rev. A. V. G. Allen, D.D., and the Rev. T. T. Munger, D.D.

("With our might is nothing done"). He knew the might which gives to our lives both firmness and freedom; he knew that might, and he called it by its name, Belief. To him that meant no longer an obedient acceptance of ecclesiastical dogmas, it meant no knowledge, no deed, but simply the personal and continual giving of the heart to God, a daily regeneration of man. That was his confession of faith, a living, busy, active thing, a sure trust, making one joyful and eager in the sight of God and man, something which makes us always ready to serve or to suffer. Despite all evil, yes, despite our sin and guilt, our life is hid in God, when we trust him as children trust their father. That was the vital thought and the vital power of Luther's life.

With equal certainty he perceived and experienced the other idea, the idea of "the freedom of a Christian." This freedom was to him no empty emancipation or the license for every whim. Freedom meant to Luther the liberation from every external or human authority in matters of belief and conscience. Christian freedom was to him the feeling of surety that, united with God, he was raised above the world, sin, death, and the devil. "If God be for us, who can be against us?" Every soul that has found God, and in him has recognized its refuge, is free—so proclaimed Luther.



MARTIN LUTHER

After Cranach's Portrait (1532) in the Dresden Gallery

Ein' feste Burg ist unser Gott,
Ein' gute Wehr und waffen.

(A mighty fortress is our God,
A bulwark never failing.)

Let it be here remarked that, in the same hymn, Luther asks:

Fragst du, wer er ist?
Er heisset Jesus Christ.
Der Herr Zebaoth.
Und ist kein and'rer Gott.

(Dost ask who that may be?
Christ Jesus, it is he.
His name. Lord Sabaoth:
Nor is there other God.)

In Jesus Christ alone Luther recognized God. Outside of Christ he saw only a dark, frightful, and enigmatical Force. In Christ alone he saw the gracious God. Luther was no philosopher who would recognize God in the construction of the world; he was no mystic, who could raise God out of his own soul's secret depths. He was a faithful son of the Christian Church, convinced that she was in the right with her commission from Jesus Christ. He was a faithful disciple of Paul, and had learned from him that all knowledge of God lies locked up in the sentence, "God is the father of our Lord Jesus Christ." He was a faithful disciple of Christ himself, who said, "No man knoweth the Father save only the Son, and him to whom the Son will reveal Him."

Not only did Luther win God-knowledge in Jesus Christ, "the mirror of God's paternal heart," but also the fact that Jesus is the Redeemer, who through death has freed us from sin and blame. Paul's Gospel is also Luther's. Before the latter, no one in the Church really understood the Epistles to the Romans and to the Galatians. Just because he was convinced that he was putting the old, dimmed Gospel again in the light, he was far from the thought of adding anything to it. Never had he another plan than that of restoring the old belief; never did he think to fight against the Church, but always for the Church against a false and soul-dangerous practice: never did he dream that the Gospel had been really lost—no, but it was to be freed from a captivity into which the Pope, the priests, and the theologians had led it.

Great, lasting reformations are made only by conservative men: not those who "destroy," but those who "fulfill," bring about a new era. Luther—at the bottom of his heart the most conservative of men—has broken the mediæval Catholic system in pieces for millions of souls, and thus freed the history of progressive humanity from the shackles of that system. In that he vindicated the new and yet old Gospel, in that he freed the conscience of the individual from priest and statute, he struck deadly blows against the Church of the Middle Ages. For, (1) he overturned her teaching as to salvation—salvation not being a thing brought about by donations and merits, but the free grace of God, which gives us the conviction that we are his children. (2) He overturned the teaching as to Christian perfection—true Christian life does not consist in monasticism, but in an active life of fidelity to a calling, in humility, patience, and the service of love to our neighbor. (3) He overturned the teachings as regards the sacrament—God does not give us individual and different fragments of grace, but he gives us the forgiveness of sins and with it all grace, yes, he gives us himself as the Bread of our lives. (4) He overturned the priestly Church-system—God wills that all his children shall be priests, and he has instituted but one office, the office of proclaiming the Gospel and of distributing forgiveness. (5) Luther overturned the mediæval church services—God will not be honored by means of ceremonies, masses, oblations, etc., but only through praise and thanksgiving, pleading and prayer. Every church service must be spiritual, and at the same time innately bound with service to one's neighbor. (6) He overturned the false authorities of Roman Catholicism. Not the Pope, nor the Councils, not even the letter of the Bible (yet here, in regard to the Bible, Luther was himself not completely clear), has unerring authority, but only the Gospel, the power and truth of which the soul inwardly knows.

[illegible]

THE WARTBURG CASTLE

All these points have to do with religion alone. Luther determined to purify religion and to free it from every strange thing which does not belong to it. Besides this he never had another independent interest; he did not care about bettering the world, or the State, or science, for themselves alone. Yet right here is revealed the truth of the saying: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." In that Luther thought out the Gospel in all its parts, proclaimed and applied it, all else fell into his lap; in that he liberated religion from mixture with that which is foreign to it, he also liberated the natural life and the natural order of things. He put everything in its right place, and gave everything freedom and room for development. Everywhere he broke apart unnatural ties, he loosed old chains, he gave air and light.

Theology through him is henceforth to be nothing else than the exposition of the Gospel, of how it has founded the Christian community and still keeps it together. The proof of theology is no longer derived from external authority or strange philosophical speculations, but by the simple fact of Christ's appearance, and by our inward experience.

Philosophy is no longer a feared servant or a seductive mistress of theology, but her independent sister. Languages and history are studied conscientiously and faithfully, in order to ascertain the right meaning of every word.

The State is no longer regarded as a half-sinful product of compulsion and need, and the creature of the Church, but as the God-willed, independent order of public social life.

Vnd alle die dran gleuben mit lust vnd liebe
Amen.

Mart Luther D

1542.

FACSIMILE OF LUTHER'S WRITING (1542)

Law does not longer pass as a dangerous middle course, something between the might of the stronger and the virtue of the Christian, but as the independent, God-given rule of intercourse, always maintained by the "powers that be."

Marriage is no longer thought of as a divine concession towards the weak, but as a free bond between the sexes, a bond instituted by God, and free from tutelage on the part of the Church, and as the school of the highest morality.

General benefactions, such as the care of the poor, are not now so much pursued because of any desire to assure one's own salvation; they have become a free service to one's neighbor, the final scope and only reward of which is effective relief.

Above all things, however, in civil (as opposed to ecclesiastical) callings, activity in house and farm, in trade and official position, is no longer looked upon suspiciously as if it led away from our spiritual vocation. Men now know that the one who guides a household well, educates children patiently and faithfully, fulfills the duties of a calling—even though that one be but a poor boy or a lowly maid—stands in the rightful spiritual place and is higher than all monks and nuns.

Over the great period which we call the Middle Ages, over the chaos of non-independent and intricate forms, there soared the spirit of belief, which had recognized its own nature and therefore had also recognized its limits. Under its sway, all things that had a right to free existence now strove towards independent development. Before Luther, no one had ever separated so clearly and distinguishingly the great departments of life, and given to each its own right. Wonderful! this man would not teach the world other than what the being, the power, and the comfort of the Christian religion is; but in that he recognized this most important department in its own individuality, all other departments came to their own. Luther preached that the just man lives by faith, and that a child of God is a free master over all things. In that he so taught he indeed freed men and things, and thus showed that "the time was fulfilled," for he was called that the time should be fulfilled.

LUTHER AND KATHARINE BORA
(Cranach, 1525)

He became the reformer. Beside him Zwingli and Calvin can claim but second places; they are dependent on him. Yes, we can even say: He was the Reformation. He had experienced the Reformation in his own soul, when he struggled in the cloister with the creed of his Church. Everything which he afterwards said, wrote, and did, in Wittenberg, in Worms, and in Coburg, was only the natural consequence of that experience. Out of his breast, from the bottom of his heart, the Reformation streamed as a brook out of hidden springs in the rock. In one sense he did not give power and endurance to the Reformation: he did not set its bounds and aim, but the Reformation gushed from his spirit like a fruitful stream. "Here I stand; I can do no other," said he, before Emperor and Empire. When the lonely man thus spoke, it was decided that he, through his faith, like Abraham, should become the father of many thousands; it was decided that a great epoch in the history of mankind had finished its course, and a new was advancing.

But we must not forget that it was four hundred years ago that Luther taught. The convenient belief that he thought out everything for us, and that we can rest on his teaching, is a foolish one. The greatest hero is always only a finisher for the past; as regards the future he is but a beginner. He who does not understand Luther so that he learns from him the spirit with which to solve new problems and lessons, and so that he endeavors to continue the Reformer's work, understands him falsely. The prophets have been given to us, not that we should build their graves, but that we should inflame our hearts through their faith and their courage.

Martin Luther's Life

By the Rev. James M. Whiton, Ph.D.

Martin Luther, the Saxon miner's son, the charity scholar, Bible student, monk, preacher, reformer, church father, theologian, the Elijah of Germany, the Achilles of Protestantism, accomplished far less than he hoped, yet all that was then possible for any one man. His life of sixty-three years moved through three stadia. In the first we see the devout and conscientious son of the Church; in the second, the high-spirited leader and fearless reformer of the Church; in the third, the strenuous but saddened struggler toward a deferred and failing hope.

1. A century before Luther's birth, in 1483, Wyclif had died, "the morning star of the Reformation." In 1415, Hus, Wyclif's disciple, had been burned. Luther early became "a Hussite without knowing it," while supposing himself an obedient son of the Roman Church. Destined by his father for the law, an inward religious crisis determined him to become a monk in the year when he took his master's degree, at the age of twenty-two. In the Augustinian monastery at Erfurt he subjected himself to austere discipline, choosing in humility to take upon him the most menial services. His teachers were the Bible and St. Augustine, and his resort in perplexity was to Tauler and the theology of the fourteenth-century mystics, whose cardinal doctrine was the personal relation of the soul to Christ. Made a university professor in Wittenberg at the age of twenty-five, his lectures on the Bible drew his colleagues to be his hearers, and crowds attended his preaching. His favorite subjects were in the Psalms, Romans, and Galatians, the latter of which he humorously styled his "wife." Three years later, while as yet his conscience had not found unclouded peace in God, he visited Rome. Shocked by the contrast between the profligacy of the papal court and the purity of the evangelical ideal, he came to a clear intuition of the truth which thenceforward inspired his life and embodied itself in the Reformation: "The just shall live by faith." The next year he took his degree as Doctor of Divinity. Presently made district-vicar of his order, when the plague fell upon the city he flinched not from his work; he published editions of the "Theologia Germanica," the mystics' text-book; he was at one with their teaching, that repentance begins in the love of God and his righteousness.

LUTHER'S DOUBLE RING

Gottes wort bleibt ewig.

Biblia/das iſt/ die
gantze Heilige Schrifft
Deudſch.
Mart. Luth.
Wittemberg.
Begnadet mit Kürfurſtlicher zu Sachſen freiheit.
Gedruckt durch Hans Lufft.

M. D. XXXIIII.

FACSIMILE OF THE TITLE OF LUTHER'S COMPLETE BIBLE
(Wittenberg, 1534)

2. Into this well-seeded field came the enemy sowing tares. The Dominican monk Tetzel, seller of papal indulgences, went flagrantly beyond the Catholic canonists in making the buying of indulgence equivalent to the remission of sin. Luther confronted him with the famous Ninety-five Theses, which he nailed on his church door October 31, 1517, and read from the pulpit next day. The gist of them was that God only can pardon sin, and his pardon depends on the sinner's change of heart. Thus the Reformation began in interest for an ethical theology.

The printing-press, then recently invented, became its serviceable and indispensable handmaid. The theses spread everywhere, awakening discussion and attracting support. There was a general meeting of the Augustinian Order next year at Heidelberg, with a public disputation. Germany was in a ferment. A loud call arose for a general council for the reformation of the Church. Pope Leo X., who at first had belittled the trouble as a quarrel of two monks, now bestirred himself. Luther was cited to Rome, but Augsburg was substituted for Rome at the solicitation of his protector, Frederic, Elector of Saxony. There the Papal representatives effected nothing, except that Luther was induced to write apologetically to the Pope, acknowledging the authority of the Church as supreme, but with the qualifying truth that Christ is Lord of all.

In 1519 Charles V. became Emperor of Germany. The Pope and he at once leagued against Luther, and in 1520 the bull of excommunication, which no man till then had ever successfully defied, was issued. Luther published his defiance in two pamphlets, an "Address to the Nobility of the German Nation" and "The Babylonish Captivity of the Church." Warlike documents were these. Luther told the German people that the civil power, not the spiritual, was supreme; the Pope was a usurper; they must curb him; stop tribute to Rome; there must be fewer pilgrimages, fewer convents; the priests should marry; if Hus was right, join him in resisting Rome. Luther never minced matters. His "words were battles."

LUTHER IN LATER LIFE
(After Cranach's Portrait in Berlin)

Meanwhile the bull arrived in Germany. The Elector Frederic was called on to surrender Luther. He consulted with Erasmus. Said Erasmus, "Luther has committed two crimes: he has hit the Pope on the crown and the monks on the belly." But he advised that Luther should have a fair hearing, and that he should be urged to greater moderation. This was December 5, 1520. Five days later Luther publicly burned the bull at Wittenberg. He had not then the burly look we are used to in his portraits, but was worn quite thin by his close studies.

It was now the Emperor's turn. The Pope called on him to crush the daring heretic. But for this the consent of the German Electors was necessary, and these had many grievances with Rome. The Emperor, therefore, was obliged to grant Luther a hearing, and a safe-conduct to and from. He obeyed the summons, though believing that the safe-conduct would not secure him from death, any more than Hus. So bent, however, was he to make no truce that he left for publication in his absence "a good book for the laity," pictorial illustrations of "the Contrast between Christ and the Pope," ending with the Ascension of the former and the descent of the latter to hell. On his journey he even contravened the conditions of his safe-conduct by preaching. Expecting martyrdom, he faced the Diet at Worms April 17 and 18, 1521, a solitary, steadfast Protestant for the sovereign right of a Bible-taught conscience to judge in matters of religion.

Condemned, of course, his safe-conduct was respected, the princes insisting on it. But to save his life his friend, the Elector Frederic, thought best to conceal him a while in Wartburg Castle. Here, in the dress of a knight, and under the name of "Junker George," he devoted himself for ten months to the translation of the New Testament into German. But he broke away from this safe "Patmos" to save the imperiled cause at Wittenberg. Iconoclastic puritanism would have swept out of the Church all that the Scripture did not enjoin. Luther would retain all that it did not forbid. The so-called Anabaptists, faulty but overmaligned predecessors of modern Congregationalists, were pushing Luther's logic to lengths from which he shrank. To settle things conservatively he redoubled his efforts. In 1522 he published 130 treatises, and 83 in the year after. In 1522 his German New Testament appeared; in 1524 his hymn-book; then his prayer-book, his catechisms for young and old, and his summary of doctrine for the common people. He was also strenuously urging the foundation of schools, primary and secondary. It required longer time to "make the Hebrew prophets speak German." His translated Bible was delayed till 1534.

3. In 1520 he had said, "Let priests marry." In 1525, not having fallen in love, but, as he said, "to please his father, tease the pope, and vex the devil," he wedded Katharine Bora, formerly a nun, and eighteen years his junior. Thus he secured in a genial home the only earthly happiness now possible to him, in a life which events saddened henceforth to the end. His insistence on religious freedom had kindled the passion of cruelly oppressed peasants for the social justice which Christ enjoined, and 100,000 of them perished in the vain struggle to extort it. Luther even felt obliged to urge the authorities to sanguinary measures, lest the Reformation should be fatally compromised as anarchical revolution. For all that, the social disorders caused an anti-Protestant reaction. The Reformation had reached its limit. The only question was, Could it sustain itself there?

At the second Diet of Spires, in 1529, the Emperor felt strong enough to demand that all further toleration should cease; and the Diet so decreed. The Lutheran princes received the name of "Protestants," from their signed protest against this. Luther struck up a pæan in his martial hymn, "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott." But an invasion by the Turks averted the danger. Next year, at Augsburg, the first Protestant statement of doctrine, "the Augsburg Confession," Luther's own, but drafted by Melanchthon, was presented to the Diet, and the League of Schmalkald formed for its military defense, in disregard of Luther's wish; but hostilities were again prevented by a Turkish invasion. Melanchthon employed the respite with vain endeavors to reconcile the rival theologies. Nor was the effort of 1529 more successful to unite the Swiss and the German Reformers. Different interpretations of the Eucharist sundered Luther and Zwingli, and Luther refused to Zwingli's conscience what he demanded for his own.

Foreboding the civil war which broke out at his death, distressed by the troubles of the time and the wickedness of the world, in which even Wittenberg became to him a "Sodom," the brave but discouraged spirit of Luther found welcome release in the death which came to him in 1546, while on an errand to heal a quarrel. His grave was made in front of the pulpit in the Castle Church of Wittenberg. He says of himself that he was "rough, boisterous, and stormy, born to fight devils and monsters." He showed himself also fond of children, flowers, music, and mirth. His faults were superficial, his virtues central; he abode in God, and God in him.

Adolf Harnack: A Sketch

By Elbert F. Baldwin

It is seven o'clock in the morning in the city of Berlin. For a couple of hours there have been street-sweepers, hucksters, market-women, and early shopkeepers about, but now the early sightseer will observe a few unmistakable students; unmistakable because, even if their eyeglasses and rather intellectual air did not give one the impression that they were students, the little skull-caps and broad sashes of many would remove all doubt. The sightseer may be curious enough to walk behind some of these students toward the great University on the Unter den Linden. He will find, however, that some of the students are not entering the huge main structure, but are going around it to a smaller building in the rear, on Dorotheen Strasse. Into the courtyard of a rather ordinary-looking house the students are entering, and we enter with them. We pass into the corridor of the house, and into a long, low room filled with rows upon rows of benches placed on platforms which rise gradually, thus giving every man a good seat. Many of the men have already taken their seats, and others are coming. At exactly quarter past seven there is a shuffling and stamping of feet—the German greeting to the Professor. The youthful appearance of the Professor is emphasized by his extreme agility. He has taken his seat and has begun to talk—in fact, he began to talk before he took his seat, as soon as he entered the room, so as to lose no time—but after a moment or two of sitting down he jumps up, and, with his hands in his pockets or behind his back, walks up and down, talking earnestly the while, and evidently weighing every word, although for a German his utterance is wonderfully rapid. He warms to his subject and seemingly quite forgets himself, rubbing his hand through his hair, shaking his head vigorously, and now he climbs to his favorite position, which he keeps for the rest of the lecture. We behold him sitting on the top of his desk, dangling his legs, and, with hands clasped over one knee, swaying a bit back and forth as if to give a sort of rhythm to his utterances. The utterances become more and more vivid, epigrammatic, impressive, and we find ourselves listening to Adolf Harnack as we have never listened to any other German. The lecture is finished by eight o'clock, and then, at a quarter past eight, another lecture begins, characterized by the same proceeding as above. If there were a hundred students at the first lecture, there must be three or four hundred at this. At nine o'clock the professor finishes and goes home, his day's work done. His work is done, however, only so far as actual lecturing at the University is concerned; it is only begun so far as his real labors go.

Dr. Harnack is above everything a student. His is the true German professorial idea, as opposed to that so often evident in England and in this country, where a man is simply a teacher. In Germany he is also an investigator; indeed, of the two, the Germans deem the investigating more important than the teaching. Professor Harnack is an investigator in Church History and in the History of Dogma. The results of this investigation are seen in his lectures, which are not mere summaries of other men's views, but his own personal, distinct, original impressions of what he himself has deduced from his severe and far-reaching studies among first-hand documents, and, in a less degree, more modern books of theological science. He who would see these two sides of the German professorial character at their best should attend, not only a public lecture at the University, but also a private seminar. It is here, in the intimacy of a smaller number than those who have heard the public lectures, that one sees how a man like Adolf Harnack can be both an original thinker and investigator, and at the same time a splendid summarizer and teacher. There is apparently a double-quick action of thought in the seminar experiences, which is as opposed to the ordinary cut-and-dried method of teaching as can well be imagined.

PROFESSOR ADOLF HARNACK

As to Dr. Harnack's special work, it may be said that, more than any other living man, he has popularized Church History. His lectures are given in the early morning, at an hour inconvenient to many; yet his hearers are not only students of theology, but also students of law, medicine, philosophy, fine arts, and many other branches of learning; one may see not only Berliners themselves, but also those who live many miles out in the country. That Adolf Harnack, wishing to give his day's first attention to the duty of teaching, and insisting on beginning that day at a very early hour, should be able to command and keep such audiences as hear him, is indeed a tribute to the man's energizing vitality, originality, and power.

From Atlanta to the Sea

III.—Charleston

By Willis John Abbot

ST. PHILIP'S CHURCH

Time has stood still in Charleston since the days when Sumter fell and the blockading ships of the United States navy tossing on the billows outside the harbor's mouth closed the port more effectually than could any line of submarine torpedoes. In some respects the city to-day is the most antiquated of American towns. Certainly it is the most characteristic. If a man having acquired wealth in Charleston determines to build himself a new house, he builds it in all architectual essentials exactly like the house which the oldest banker then in the city built some one hundred and fifty years ago. In New Orleans—to take a Southern city by way of comparison—the nouveau riche would try to build his house as like one in New York or Chicago as might be consistent with necessary concessions to the extremity of the Louisiana climate. But in Charleston the fortunate possessor of new-found wealth makes his house as like those stately structures, each of three stories and two feathery balconies, standing a century and more in Meeting or Legare Street, as may be compatible with luxurious modern notions concerning steam-heat and running water. This loyalty of the Charlestonian of to-day to the Charleston of yesterday gives to the city a certain homogeneousness, a kind of self-content, not to be found in any other historic American city. Boston has its "Back Bay" and its suburbs, New York and Philadelphia have concealed from the eye of the visitor their historic quality under an overwhelming veil of modernity, New Orleans even has let its modern and garish American quarter outgrow and overshadow "Frenchtown." Charleston alone models that which is new in it upon that which is oldest. Nor are the Charlestonians therefore to be accused of lack of progressiveness. So far as domestic architecture is concerned—and there is little architecture in Charleston except domestic and ecclesiastic—the type of domicile in favor a hundred years ago, three-storied and peaked-roofed, the gable end to the street, the rooms of ceremony on the second floor, with a balcony overhanging a garden walled in from the rough publicity of the street—such a type is the fittest for Charleston to-day, and is not without its merit for more northerly cities. It may be doubted, indeed, whether in any town of thrice its size the visitor driving through the residence quarters will be so much impressed with the dignity and the attractiveness of the homes lining the thoroughfares as in Charleston.

Some sixty-five thousand people inhabit the Charleston of to-day—a very slender gain over its ante-war-time population. But to the stranger within its gates the city seems larger. Its topography is not unlike that of New York, filling as it does a long narrow peninsula formed by the confluence of the Ashley and Cooper Rivers. The check thus put on the lateral growth of the city has resulted in making it unusually compact for a Southern city. There are few, if any, spacious gardens about the residences, as in Atlanta, though every house has its narrow garden-plot; the streets are narrow; parks worthy of the name are few. From the point where stands the castellated structure of the Citadel, now occupied as a State military school with discipline rivaling that of West Point, to the water-front at East Battery, a mile and a half away, the houses stand in unbroken rows, each with its little garden and broad balconies on the side that catches the cooling breezes from the ocean. The Charlestonians have been more far-sighted than most American city-builders. They have not turned over the water-front of their city to railways and wharves, but at the lower end of their peninsula have laid out a broad drive, a narrow park, and a sea-wall and esplanade bordering upon the Bay. Here, on the East and South Battery, the most stately mansions of the city are reared, and from their windows one looks out across the placid waters of the Bay to where Fort Sumter, squat and ruinous, rears its head a little above the tide, or to where the clump of white buildings with a distinctively summer-resort air mark the site of Fort Moultrie. The spreading trees which line the East Battery have in their time seen much history made for these United States. British tea was steeped in the waters of Charleston Harbor within a few months after a similar infusion was brewed for an international tea-party in Boston. In Charleston Harbor, too, Sergeant Jasper rescued the colors of Fort Sullivan, carried away by a British shot, and won the undying admiration of American youth, to say nothing of a statue in Battery Park and another in Savannah. When war has come, Charleston has been in the thick of it. Few Southern cities suffered more during the War for the Union. Siege, bombardment, and fire all united to make the stately city feel the weight of calamity which war can bring. In view of the many disasters which it has had to recoup, remembering the expenditure of energy necessary to repair losses from battle, from fire, from flood, and from earthquake shock, the visitor to the city to-day will not deny to the Charlestonians possession of the highest qualities of pluck and perseverance. One has to search minutely to discover now any sign of that great earthquake of 1886, the most destructive ever known in America; yet by that convulsion of nature fully 2,000 buildings were seriously damaged, losses aggregating between five and six millions of dollars sustained, and over one hundred lives sacrificed. The pluck that could so quickly efface the traces of such a disaster is not a quality possessed by people destitute of enterprise.

THE GERMAN CONSULATE

THE BRITISH CONSULATE

Yet the Charlestonian shows on every side that the sort of enterprise which manifests itself in “sky-scrapers,” the trolley, and a feverish desire for change has little part in his constitution. Talking one night to a gentleman of wide influence in the city, I commented on the fact that Charleston, alone among the considerable towns of the United States, clings to the antiquated horse-car, bob-tailed and conductorless at that. Eager to confer a benefit on a city which had singularly attracted me, I assured him that it would be the easiest of tasks to enlist the interest of eminent Northern capitalists who would not neglect the opportunity to provide a city of 65,000 people with electric lines, besides possibly instructing the benighted citizens in the mysterious art of managing the Common Council and watering the stock of the company. The suggestion met with scant favor.

“You see, we regard these things from our own standpoint,” my host responded, in all seriousness. “We get a good deal of useful service from our cars which you Northerners miss with your cables and trolleys. For example, suppose, just before I start home in the evening, my wife telephones me to stop and fetch a parcel from a store on the way. When the car gets to the store, I speak to the driver, he pulls up, and the car waits until I can get my bundle and get aboard. That is a vast convenience to me, and only delays the other passengers a minute or two. Of course, with your slapdash trolleys and things, you can't enjoy such accommodation.”

I looked rather expectantly for a twinkle in his eye, but there was no sign that he discerned anything humorous in his picture of the advantage of the bobtailed horse-car. Indeed, later in the evening I enjoyed demonstration of the merits of the system, for, boarding a car which was standing in the middle of a block, I sat two or three minutes waiting for the vehicle to proceed. At last two young men came leisurely from a neighboring drug-store, climbed aboard, and, with a warning clang of the bell, the equipage started, at about the speed of Mark Twain's celebrated glacier. “Hope we didn't delay you, sir,” remarked one of the newcomers courteously to me. “There wasn't anybody aboard, and we asked the driver to wait while we bought some cigars.”

The number, the beauty, and the antiquity of Charleston's churches are features of the city which immediately engage the attention of the visitor. St. Michael's is the one most widely known, partly because of its place in picturesque history, partly because the youth of the land have long been regaled, in school readers of every grade, with the ballad of how a slave saved St. Michael's by climbing its tapering spire to pluck thence a burning brand. The story is true, though the poet erred in his stage setting, for the sanctuary saved by the slave was not St. Michael's, but the other English church, St. Philip's. Yet the former has no need to purloin the laurels of its neighbor. About its quiet churchyard and its dignified interior cling memories eloquent enough and sufficiently romantic to inspire the whole choir of poets. The ancient sexton shows the visitor the old-fashioned square pew which from the earliest days of the church has been the property of one family, and, with reverent air, informs you that there General Washington often sat, and in later years General Lee. He shows, too, dents in the marble pavement made by a British cannon-ball, and then draws from a neighboring hiding-place a ponderous piece of rusty iron, the fragment of a shell which fell in the church during the more destructive bombardment of Civil War times. Yet, if war has been harsh to St. Michael's, nature has dealt even more unkindly with the dignified old edifice. Hope for its preservation was abandoned after the earthquake of 1886. In the side-walls were great fissures, one of them big enough for a man to crawl through. The marble flooring was racked and broken by the earth-wave, which was estimated to have been at least two feet high. Though the towering steeple was not injured in its structural parts, it sunk eight inches in the heaving ground. To-day no sign of the damage remains, nor any memorial in the church of the dire calamity, beyond a tablet in the vestibule commemorative of the fact that, by the votive offerings of Episcopalians in all parts of the Union, historic St. Michael's was made sound and habitable again. Many are the curious incidents in the history of this place of worship. The year after its completion, in 1762, public-spirited citizens, in and out of the congregation, raised by subscription a fund to purchase a peal of bells for the spacious belfry. The bells came in due time, ordered, of course, from English makers, and were hung in the steeple; but when the British evacuated the city in 1782 they declared the bells lawful spoil and took them back to England—a curious bit of piracy, reminiscent of the Napoleonic device for decorating the French capital. In London they were found by a speculative Charlestonian, who bought and shipped them back to the Carolina city. Their arrival was hailed by the people with public rejoicing, and they were speedily restored to their original post, though two, having suffered in the long voyage, had to be returned to England for recasting. Reunited at last, the eight called the righteous to church and saluted the setting sun with strains of sacred music as long as peace abode with the Charlestonians. But in 1862, alarmed lest the enemy of that day, if successful in taking the city, should, like the British, seize the bells, the citizens shipped them away to Columbia, the State capital. No more unfortunate action could have been taken, for in the disastrous conflagration which attended General Sherman's occupation of the South Carolina capital the bells of old St. Michael's suffered sorely. Their misshapen fragments, rescued from the ruins, were sent again to England to be recast in molds made from the original patterns. This done, and the wanderers returned and lying at the wharf, the Charlestonians discovered that only the payment of $2,200 to a National Government charitably disposed to protect its own bell-makers would give them right of entrance. In that day $2,200 was no meager sum for the people of battle-scarred Charleston to raise for a public purpose, but in the end it was subscribed, and the bells hang again in old St. Michael's, after triumphing over foreign and domestic foes, the forces of nature, and even the custom-house.

ST. MICHAEL'S CHURCH

The temptation is strong upon any one who visits Charleston, particularly upon one who comes from the more modern, pushing, "hustling" cities of the North, to lay stress upon the town's historic quality, its picturesqueness, its placidity. Such a one finds St. Michael's the most interesting feature of the city, and prowls about its churchyard scanning the quaint gravestones with their quainter epitaphs, and finding his chief entertainment in the curious spectacle of the headboard of an old mahogany bed set up as a headstone for a citizen who departed this life in 1770. The guide invites you to marvel that the board lasted so long exposed to the weather, and, indeed, it does speak well for the equability of the Charleston climate; but most visitors will wonder most at the mind which conceived the notion of thus utilizing a homely bit of household furniture as an enduring monument. Again, the visitor who wants to see the picturesque side only of Charleston will find gratification in the sight of an ancient brick building, of one story, with a peaked roof covered with red tiles, standing back from the street and surrounded by newer edifices, and known as the Powder Magazine. Even in Charleston, where the memory of man runneth back further than in most towns, its date is unknown. But in the local archives is treasured a map, dated 1739, which marks its location and describes it even at that early day as the "old powder magazine." Here is a genuine American antiquity, one worthy the attention of the National society lately organized to protect such from the vandal hand of the progressive person who admires a "sky-scraper" more than a real colonial mansion.

THREE CHARLESTON HOUSES OF TO-DAY

A RELIC OF THE OLDEN TIME

The searcher after the picturesque and the historic in Charleston will not miss the Huguenot Church, which has a triple claim to attention in the fact that it is beautiful, antique—being founded in 1681, though the present edifice is of comparatively recent origin—and unique in being the only Huguenot church in America. Its liturgy as followed to-day is that published in Neufchatel in 1737. Nor will the sightseeing visitor miss St. Philip's, a stately church whose spire, all but destroyed by the earthquake, now rises impressively over the picturesque city. Indeed, the churches of Charleston and the schools, notably the State Military Academy and the Porter Military Academy, are dominant features of the city.

THE SOUTH BATTERY

Yet in dwelling on the æsthetic qualities of Charleston we must not forget its commercial advantages. Its harbor is spacious and safe, and, since the United States Government completed the jetties at the harbor's mouth, there is thirty-three feet of water over the bar. In the country behind the town, whence must be drawn the support of the latter, are cotton, garden-truck, rice, lumber, and, above all, phosphates. The trade in the latter staple is the nucleus of Charleston's commercial greatness, and its development affords curious illustration of the compensation which nature brings for man's failure or man's injustice. Ruined by the war, with all the ante-bellum industries wrecked, Charleston found in the unsuspected deposits of bones of antediluvian animals a new source of wealth. The phosphate mines of South Carolina are now her chiefest source of wealth. With them, with rice-fields, and with cotton-fields in her back yard, Charleston will ever stand in the forefront of the exporting cities of the United States. Perhaps a little Western insistence or Northern push might not be amiss in this most picturesque of American cities. But in all essentials Charleston is a city in which the beauties of yesterday mingle with the possibilities of to-day.

A Prayer

By Mary F. Butts

Thou who see'st the tender shoot
  From the plant that seemeth dead,
Thou who nourishest the root
  Pining and uncomforted,
Brightening every dreary place
With the shining of Thy face,

O forbid that we should doubt
  Spirits that seem dead in sin,
Shutting the sweet sunshine out
  From the hearts that love might win.
False to love, we cannot be Followers, dear Lord, of Thee.

KATE CARNEGIE[1]

By Ian Maclaren

Author of "Beside the Bonnie Brier-Bush," "The Days of Auld Lang Syne," etc., etc.

CHAPTER VII.—A WOMAN OF THE NEW DISPENSATION

Carmichael's aunt, who equipped his house, was determined on one point, and would not hear of a clerical housekeeper for her laddie. Margaret Meiklewham—a woman of a severe countenance, and filled with the spirit of the Disruption—who had governed the minister of Pitscowrie till his decease, and had been the terror of callow young probationers, offered herself, and gave instances of her capability.

"Gin ye leave yir nephew in my hands, ye needna hae ony mair concern. A'll manage him fine, an' haud him on the richt road. Ye may lippen tae't, a' wesna five and thirty year wi' Maister MacWheep for naethin'.

"He wes a wee fractious and self-willed at the off-go, an' wud be wantin' this an' that for his denner, but he sune learned tae tak' what wes pit afore him; an' as for gaein' oot withoot tellin' me, he wud as sune hae thocht o' fleein'; when he cam' in he keepit naethin' back at his tea.

"Preachin' wes kittle wark in Pitscoorie, for the fouk were awfu' creetics, though they didna maybe think sae muckle o' themselves as Drumtochty. A' aye githered their jidgment through the week, an' gin he had made a slip meddling wi' warks or sic-like in his sermon, it wes pit richt next Sabbath, and sovereignty whuppit in at the feenish.

"Ye ken the Auld Kirk hes tae be watchit like a cat wi' a moose, an', though a' say it as sudna, Maister MacWheep wud hae made a puir job o' the business himsel'. The pairish meenister wes terrible plausible, an' askit oor man tae denner afore he wes settled in his poopit, an' he wes that simple, he wud hae gaen," and Margaret indicated by an uplifting of her eyebrows the pitiable innocence of MacWheep.

"Ye guidit him, nae doot?" inquired Carmichael's aunt, with interest.

"'Maister MacWheep,' says I," and Miss Meiklewham's lips were very firm, "'a'll no deny that the Auld Kirk is Christian, an' a've never said that a Moderate cudna be savit, but the less trokin' (trafficking) ye hae wi' them the better. There's maybe naethin' wrang wi' a denner, but the next thing 'ill be an exchange o' poopits, and the day ye dae that ye may close the Free Kirk.'

"And the weemen"—here the housekeeper paused as one still lost in amazement at the audacity with which they had waylaid the helpless MacWheep—"there wes ae madam in Muirtown that hed the face tae invite hersel' oot tae tea wi' three dochters, an' the way they wud flatter him on his sermons wes shamefu'.

"If they didna begin askin' him tae stay wi' them on Presbytery days, and Mrs. MacOmish hed the face tae peety him wi' naebody but a hoosekeeper. He lat oot that the potatoes were as hard as a stone at denner, an' that he hed juist ae blanket on his bed, which wesna great management for four weemen."

As Carmichael's aunt seemed to be more and more impressed, Margaret moistened her lips and rose higher.

"So the next time ma lady comes oot tae see the spring flowers," she said, "a' explained that the minister wes sae delicate that a' didna coont it richt for him tae change his bed, and a' thocht it wud be mair comfortable for him tae come hame on the Presbytery nichts, an' safer.

"What said she? No a word," and Miss Meiklewham recalled the ancient victory with relish. "She lookit at me, and a' lookit at her, an' naething passed; but that wes the laist time a' saw her at the manse. A've hed experience, and a'm no feared tae tak' chairge o' yir nephew."

Carmichael's aunt was very deferential, complimenting the eminent woman on her gifts and achievements, and indicating that it would be hard for a young Free Kirk minister to obtain a better guardian; but she had already made arrangements with a woman from the south, and could not change.

Drumtochty was amazed at her self-will, and declared by the mouth of Kirsty Stewart that Carmichael's aunt had flown in the face of Providence. Below her gentle simplicity she was indeed a shrewd woman, and was quite determined that her nephew should not be handed over to the tender mercies of a clerical housekeeper, which are said to be a heavier yoke than the Confession of Faith, for there be clever ways of escape from confessions, but none from Margaret Meiklewham; and while all the churches are busy every year in explaining that their Articles do not mean what they say, Miss Meiklewham had a snort which was beyond all she said, and that was not by any means restricted.

"John," said Carmichael's aunt, one day after they had been buying carpets, "I've got a housekeeper for you that will keep you comfortable and can hold her tongue," but neither then nor afterward, neither to her nephew nor to Drumtochty, did Carmichael's aunt tell where she secured Sarah.

"That's my secret, John," she used to say, with much roguishness, "an' ye maun confess that there's ae thing ye dinna ken. Ye 'ill hae the best-kept manse in the Presbytery, an' ye 'ill hae nae concern, sae be content."

Which he was, and asked no questions, so that he knew no more of Sarah the day she left than the night she arrived; and now he sometimes speculates about her history, but he has no clue.

She was an event in the life of the parish, and there are those who speak of her unto this day with exasperation. The new housekeeper was a subject of legitimate though ostentatiously veiled curiosity, and it was expected that a full biography by Elspeth Macfadyen would be at the disposal of the kirkyaird, as well as the Free Kirk gate, within ten days of her arrival; it might even be on the following Sabbath, although it was felt that this was asking too much of Elspeth.

It was on the Friday evening Mrs. Macfadyen called, with gifts of butter and cream for the minister, and was received with grave, silent courtesy. While they played with the weather, the visitor made a swift examination, and she gave the results on Sabbath for what they were worth.

"A tall, black wumman, spare an' erect, no ill-faured nor ill-made; na, na, a'll alloo that; a trig, handy cummer, wi' an eye like a hawk an' a voice like pussy; nane o' yir gossipin', haverin', stravaigin' kind. He 'ill be clever 'at gets onything out o' her or maks much o' a bargain wi' her.

"Sall, she's a madam an' nae mistak'. If that waefu', cunnin', tramping wratch Clockie didna come tae the door, where I was sittin', an' askit for the new minister. Ye ken he used tae come an' hear Maister Cunningham on the principles o' the Disruption for an 'oor, givin' oot that he wes comin' roond tae the Free Kirk view; then he got his denner an' a suit o' claithes."

"A' mind o' Clockie gettin' five shillin's ae day," remarked Jamie Soutar, who was at the Free Kirk that morning; "he hed started Dr. Chalmers wi' the minister; Dr. Guthrie he coontit to be worth aboot half a croon; but he aince hed three shillin's oot o' the Cardross case. He wes graund on the doctrine o' speeritual independence, and terrible drouthy; but a'm interruptin' ye, Elspeth."

"'The minister is at dinner,' says she, 'and can't be disturbed; he sees no one at the door.'

"'It's reeligion a'm come aboot,' says Clockie, stickin' in his foot tae keep the door open, 'an' a'll juist wait at the fire.'

"'It's more likely to be whisky from your breath, and you will find a public-house in the village; we give nothing to vagrants here.' Then she closed the door on his foot, and the language he used in the yard wesna connectit wi' reeligion."

---

[1] Copyright, 1896, by John Watson.

Drumtochty admitted that this showed a woman of vigor—although our conventions did not allow us to treat Clockie or any known wastrel so masterfully—and there was an evident anxiety to hear more.

"Her dress wes black an' fittit like a glove, an' wes set aff wi' a collar an' cuffs, an' a' saw she hedna come frae the country, so that wes ae thing settled; yon's either a toon dress or maybe her ain makin' frae patterns.

"It micht be Edinburgh or Glesgie, but a' began tae jalouse England aifter hearin' her hannel Clockie, sae a' watchit for a word tae try her tongue."

"Wurk is a gude handy test," suggested Jamie; "the English hae barely ae r, and the Scotch hae aboot sax in't."

"She wudna say't, Jamie, though a' gied her a chance, speakin' aboot ae wumman daein' a'thing in the manse, sae a' fell back on church, an' that brocht oot the truth. She didna say 'chich,' so she's no English born, and she didna say 'churrrch,' so she's been oot o' Scotland. It wes half and between, and so a' said it wud be pleasant for her tae be in her ain country again, aifter livin' in the sooth."

Her hearers indicated that Elspeth had not fallen beneath herself, and began to wonder how a London woman would fit into Drumtochty.

"What div ye think she said tae me?" Then Drumtochty understood that there had been an incident, and that Elspeth as a conversationalist, if not as a raconteur, had found her equal.

"'You are very kind to think of my movements, but'" —and here Mrs. Macfadyen spoke very slowly—"'I'm afraid they don't teach home geography at your school. Paisley is not out of Scotland.'"

"Ye've met yir match, Elspeth," said Jamie, with a hoarse chuckle, and the situation was apparent to all. It was evident that the new housekeeper was minded to hide her past, and the choice of her last residence was a stroke of diabolical genius. Paisley is an ancient town inhabited by a virtuous and industrious people, who used to make shawls and now spin thread, and the atmosphere is so literary that it is believed every tenth man is a poet. Yet no one boasts of having been born there, and natives will pretend they came from Greenock. No one can mention Paisley without a smile, and yet no one can say what amused him. Certain names are the source of perennial laughter, in which their inhabitants join doubtfully, as persons not sure whether to be proud or angry. They generally end in an apology, while the public, grasping vaguely at the purpose of such a place, settle on it every good tale that is going about the world unprovided for and fatherless. So a name comes to be bathed in the ridiculous, and a mere reference to it passes for a stroke of supreme felicity.

"Paisley"—Jamie again tasted the idea—"she 'ill be an acqueesition tae the Glen."

It was Sarah's first stroke of character to arrive without notice—having utterly baffled Peter at the Junction—and to be in complete possession of the manse on the return of Carmichael and his aunt from pastoral visits.

"Sarah," cried the old lady in amazement at the sight of the housekeeper in full uniform, calm and self-possessed, as one having been years in this place, "when did ye come?"

"Two hours ago, ma'am, and I think I understand the house. Shall I bring tea into the dining-room, or would you rather have it in the study?" But she did not once glance past his aunt to Carmichael, who was gazing in silence at this composed young woman in the doorway.

"This is Sarah, John, who hes come to keep yir house," and his aunt stepped back. "Sarah, this is my dear laddie, the minister."

Perhaps because her eyes were of a flashing black that pierced one like a steel blade, Sarah usually looked down in speaking to you, but now she gave Carmichael one swift, comprehensive look that judged him soul and body, then her eyes fell, and her face, always too hard and keen, softened.

"I will try, sir, to make you comfortable, and you will tell me anything that is wrong."

"You took us by surprise, Sarah," and Carmichael, after his hearty fashion, seized his housekeeper's hand; "let me bid you welcome to the manse. I hope you will be happy here, and not feel lonely."

But the housekeeper only bowed, and turned to his aunt.

"Dinner at six? As you were not in, and it did not seem any use consulting the woman that was here, I am preparing for that hour."

"Well, ye see, Sarah, we have just been taking tea, with something to it, but if—"

"Gentlemen prefer evening dinner, ma'am."

"Quite right, Sarah," burst in Carmichael in great glee; "tea-dinner is the most loathsome meal ever invented, and we 'ill never have it in the Free manse."

"That is an admirable woman, auntie," as Sarah disappeared, "with sound views on important subjects. I'll never ask again where she came from; she is her own testimonial."

"You maunna be extravagant, John; Sarah hes never seen a manse before, and I must tell her not to—"

"Ruin me, do you mean, by ten courses every evening, like the dinners West-end philanthropists used to give our men to show them how to behave at table? We 'ill be very economical, only having meat twice a week—salt fish the other days—but it will always be dinner."

"What ails you at tea-dinner, John? it's very tasty and homely."

"It's wicked, auntie, and has done more injury to religion than drinking. No, I'm not joking—that is a childish habit—but giving utterance to profound truth, which ought to be proclaimed on the housetops, or perhaps in the kitchens.

"Let me explain, and I'll make it as plain as day: All heresy is just bad thinking, and that comes from bad health, and the foundation of health is food. A certain number of tea-dinners would make a man into a Plymouth Brother. It's a mere question of time.

"You see, if a man's digestion is good he takes a cheerful view of things; but if he is full of bile, then he is sure that everybody is going to be lost except himself and his little set, and that's heresy. Apologetics is just dietetics; now there's an epigram made for you on the spot, and you don't know what it means, so we 'ill have a walk instead."

His aunt knew what was coming, but was too late to resist, so she was twice taken round the room for exercise till she cried for mercy and was left to rest, while Carmichael went out to get an appetite for that dinner.

Nothing was said during its progress, but when Sarah had finally departed after her first triumph, won under every adverse circumstance of strangeness and limited resources, Carmichael took his aunt's hand and kissed it.

"It is an illuminated address you deserve, auntie, for such a paragon; as it is, I shall be the benefactor of a Presbytery, asking the men up by turns on fast-days, and sending them home speechless with satisfaction."

"Sarah was always a clever woman; if she had only—" But Carmichael heard not, in his boyish excitement of householding.

"Clever is a cold word for such genius. Mark my words, there is not a manse in Perthshire that shall not sound with the praise of Sarah. I vow perpetual celibacy on the spot. No man would dream of marrying that had the privilege of such a housekeeper."

"Ye're a silly laddie, John; but some day a fair face will change a' yir life, an' if she be a good wumman like your mother, I'll thank God."

"No woman can be compared with her," and the minister sobered. "You and she have spoiled me for other women, and now you have placed me beyond temptation with such a cook."

So it came to pass that Carmichael, who knew nothing about fine cooking till Sarah formed his palate with her cunning sauces, and, after all, cared as little what he ate as any other healthy young man, boasted of his housekeeper continually by skillful allusions, till the honest wives of his fathers and brethren were outraged and grew feline, as any natural woman will if a servant is flung in her face in this aggravating fashion.

"I'm glad to hear you're so well pleased, Mr. Carmichael," Mrs. MacGuffie would say, who was full of advice, and fed visitors on the produce of her garden, "but no man knows comfort till he marries. It's a chop one day and a steak the next all the year round—nothing tasty or appetizing; and as for his shirts, most bachelors have to sew on their own buttons. Ah, you all pretend to be comfortable, but I know better, for Mr. MacGuffie has often told me what he suffered."

Whereat Carmichael would rage furiously, and then, catching sight of MacGuffie, would bethink him of a Christian revenge. MacGuffie is invited up to a day of humiliation—Sarah receiving for once carte blanche—and after he has powerfully exhorted the people from the words, "I am become like a bottle in the smoke," he was conducted to the manse in an appropriately mournful condition, and set down at the table. He was inclined to dwell on the decadence of Disruption principles during soup, but as the dinner advanced grew wonderfully cheerful, and, being installed in an armchair with a cup of decent coffee beside him, sighed peacefully, and said, "Mr. Carmichael, you have much cause for thankfulness." Mr. MacGuffie had not come to the age of sixty, however, without learning something, and he only gave his curious spouse to understand that Carmichael had done all in his power to make his guest comfortable, and was not responsible for his servant's defects.

Ladies coming with their husbands to visit the manse conceived a prejudice against Sarah on the general ground of dislike to all housekeepers as a class of servants outside of any mistress's control, and therefore apt to give themselves airs, and especially because this one had a subtle suggestion of independent personality that was all the more irritating because it could not be made plain to the dull male intelligence, which was sadly deceived.

"What a lucky man Carmichael is on his first venture!" Even Dr. Dowbiggin, of St. Columba's, Muirtown, grew enthusiastic to his wife in the privacy of their bedchamber on a sacramental visit, and every one knows that the Doctor was a responsible man, ministering to four Bailies and making "overtures" to the Assembly, beginning with "Whereas" and ending with "Venerable House." "I am extremely pleased to see . . . everything so nice."

"You mean, James, that you have had a good dinner, far too ambitious for a young minister's table. Did you ever see an entrée on a Disruption table, or dessert with finger-glasses? I call it sinful—for the minister of Drumtochty, at least; and I don't believe he was ever accustomed to such ways. If she attended to his clothes, it would set her better than cooking French dishes. Did you see the coat he was wearing at the station?—just like a gamekeeper. But it is easy for a woman to satisfy a man; give him something nice to eat, and he 'ill ask no more."

"So far as my recollection serves me, Maria"—the Doctor was ruffled, and fell into his public style—"I made no reference to food, cooked or uncooked, and perhaps I may be allowed to say that it is not a subject one thinks of . . . at such seasons. What gave me much satisfaction was to see one of our manses so presentable; as regards the housekeeper, so far as I had an opportunity of observing, she seemed a very capable woman indeed," and the Doctor gave one of his coughs, which were found most conclusive in debate.

"It's easy to be a man's servant," retorted Mrs. Dowbiggin, removing a vase of flowers from the dressing-table with contempt, "for they never look below the surface. Did you notice her hands, as white and smooth as a lady's? You may be sure there's little scrubbing and brushing goes on in this manse."

"How do you know, Maria?"—the Doctor was weakening. "You have never been in the house before."

"We 'ill soon see that, James, though I daresay it would never occur to a man to do such a thing. Did you ever look below the bed?"

"Never," replied the Doctor, promptly, who was not constructed to stoop, "and I am not going to begin after that . . . ah . . . this evening, with work before me to-morrow. But I would be glad to see you.

"I have done so every night of my life for fear of robbers, and the dust I've seen in strange houses—it's there you can tell a good servant," and Mrs. Dowbiggin nodded with an air of great sagacity.

"Well," demanded the Doctor, anxiously watching the operation, "guilty or not guilty?"

"She knew what I would do. I hate those sharp women;" and then the Doctor grew so eloquent over uncharitable judgments and unreasonable prejudices that his wife denounced Sarah bitterly as a "cunning woman who got on the blind side of gentlemen."

Her popularity with Carmichael's friends was beyond question, for though she was a reserved woman, with no voluntary conversation, they all sent messages to her, inquired for her well-being at Fast-days, and brought her gifts of handkerchiefs, gloves, and such like. When they met at Theologicals and Synods they used to talk of Sarah with unction—till married men were green with envy—being simple fellows and helpless in the hands of elderly females of the Meiklewham genus. For there are various arts by which a woman in Sarah's place wins a man's gratitude, and it may be admitted that one is skillful cooking. Sensible and book-reading men do not hunger for six courses, but they are critical about their toast and . . . nothing more, for that is the pulse. Then a man also hates to have any fixed hour for breakfast—never thinking of houses where they have prayers at 7:50 without a shudder—but a man hates to be kept waiting five minutes for dinner. If a woman will find his belongings, which he has scattered over three rooms and the hall, he invests her with many virtues; and if she packs his portmanteau, he will associate her with St. Theresa. But if his hostess be inclined to discuss problems with him, he will receive her name with marked coldness; and if she follow up this trial with evil food, he will conceive a rooted dislike for her, and will flee her house. So simple is a man.

When Sarah proposed to Carmichael that she should prepare breakfast when he rung for his hot water, and when he never caught a hint of reproach on her face though he sat up to three and came down at eleven, he was lifted, hardly believing that such humanity could be found among women, who always seemed to have a time-table they were carrying out the livelong day.

"The millennium is near at hand," said MacQueen, when the morning arrangements of the Free Kirk manse of Drumtochty were made known to him—MacQueen, who used to arrive without so much as a nightshirt, having left a trail of luggage behind him at various junctions, and has written books so learned that no one dares to say that he has not read them. Then he placed an ounce of shag handy, and Carmichael stoked the fire, and they sat down, with Beaton, who could refer to the Summa of St. Thomas Aquinas from beginning to end, and they discussed the Doctrine of Scripture in the Fathers, and the formation of the Canon, and the authorship of the Pentateuch till two in the study. Afterward they went to MacQueen's room to hear him on the Talmud, and next adjourned to Beaton's room, who offered a series of twelve preliminary observations on the Theology of Rupert of Deutz, whereupon his host promptly put out his candle, leaving that man of supernatural memory to go to bed in the dark; and as Carmichael pulled up the blind in his own room, the day was breaking and a blackbird had begun to sing. Next afternoon Beaton had resumed his observations on Rupert, but now they were lying among the heather on the side of Glen Urtach, and Carmichael was asleep, while MacQueen was thinking that they would have a good appetite for dinner that evening.

Sarah had only one fault to find with her master, and that was his Bohemian dress; but since it pleased him to go one button less through studied carelessness, she let him have his way; and as for everything else, she kept her word to his aunt, and saw that he wanted for nothing, serving him with perpetual thoughtfulness and swift capacity.

Little passed between them except a good-natured word or two from him and her courteous answer, but she could read him as a book, and when he came home that day from Muirtowm she saw he was changed. He was slightly flushed, and he could not sit still, wandering in and out his study till dinner-time. He allowed the soup to cool, and when she came in with sweets he had barely touched his cutlet.

"It is the sauce you like, sir," with some reproach in her voice.

"So it is, Sarah—and first rate." Then he added, suddenly, "Can you put a button on this coat to-night, and give it a good brush?"

In the evening Sarah went down to post a letter, and heard the talk, how Miss Carnegie had come home with the General, and was worthy of her house; how the minister also had driven up with her from Muirtown; and on her return she did her best by the coat, handling it very kindly, and singing softly to herself "Robin Adair."

Next morning he came down in his blacks—the worst-made suit ever seen on a man, ordered to help a village tailor at his home—and announced his intention of starting after lunch for Saunderson's manse, beyond Tochty woods, where he would stay all night.

"He will call on the way down, and, if he can, coming back," Sarah said to herself, as she watched him go, "but it's a pity he should go in such a coat; it might have been put together with a pitchfork. It only makes the difference greater, and 'tis wider than he knows already. And yet a woman can marry beneath her without loss; but for a man it is ruin."

She went up to his room and made it neat, which was ever in disorder on his leaving, and then she went to a western window and looked into the far distance.

CHAPTER VIII.—A WOMAN OF THE FORMER DISPENSATION

Every Sabbath at eleven o'clock, or as soon thereafter as the people were seated—consideration was always shown to distant figures coming down from the high glen—Carmichael held what might be called High Mass in the Free Kirk. Nothing was used in praise but the Psalms of David, with an occasional Paraphrase sanctioned by usage and sound teaching. The prayers were expected to be elaborate in expression and careful in statement, and it was then that they prayed for the Queen and Houses of Parliament. And the sermon was the event to which the efforts of the minister and the thoughts of the people had been moving for the whole week. No person was absent except through sore sickness or urgent farm duty; nor did rain or snow reduce the congregation by more than ten people, very old or very young. Carmichael is now minister of a West End kirk, and, it is freely rumored in Drumtochty, has preached before Lords of Session; but he has never been more nervous than facing that handful of quiet, impenetrable, critical faces in his first kirk. When the service was over, the people broke into little bands that disappeared along the west road, and over the moor, and across the Tochty. Carmichael knew each one was reviewing his sermon head by head, and, pacing his garden, he remembered the missing points with dismay.

It was the custom of the Free Kirk minister to go far afield of a summer evening, and to hold informal services in distant parts of the parish. This was the joy of the day to him, who was really very young and hated all conventionalities even unto affectation. He was never weary of complaining that he had to wear a gown, which was continually falling back and being hitched over with impatient motions, and the bands, which he could never tie, and were, he explained to a horrified beadle in Muirtown, an invention of Satan to disturb the preacher's soul before his work. Once, indeed, he dared to appear without his trappings, on the plea of heat, but the visible dismay and sorrow of the people was so great—some failing to find the Psalm till the first verse had been sung—that he perspired freely and forgot the middle head of his discourse.

"It's a mercy," remarked Mrs. Macfadyen to Burnbrae afterward, "that he didna play that trick when there wes a bairn tae be baptized. It wudna hae been lichtsome for its fouk; a'body wants a properly ordained minister. Ye 'ill gie him a hint, Burnbrae, for he's young and fordersome (rash), but gude stuff for a' his pliskies (frolics)."

No one would have liked to see the sacred robes in the places of evening worship, and Carmichael threw all forms to the winds—only drawing the line, with great regret and some searchings of heart, at his tweed jacket. His address for these summer evening gatherings he studied as he went through the fragrant pine woods or over the moor by springy paths that twisted through the heather, or along near cuts that meant leaping little burns and climbing of dykes whose top stones were apt to follow your heels with embarrassing attachment. Here and there the minister would stop as a trout leapt in a pool, or a flock of wild duck crossed the sky to Loch Sheuchie, or the cattle thrust inquisitive noses through some hedge, as a student snatches a mouthful from some book in passing. For these walks were his best study; when thinking of his people in their goodness and simplicity, and touched by nature at her gentlest, he was freed from many vain ideas of the schools and from artificial learning, and heard the Galilean speak as He used to do among the fields of corn. He came on people going in the same direction, but they only saluted, refraining even from the weather, since the minister's thoughts must not be disturbed, and they were amazed to notice that he stooped to pluck a violet in the wood. His host would come a little way to meet him and explain the arrangements that had been made for a kirk. Sometimes the meeting-place was the granary of the farm, with floor swept clean and the wooden shutters opened for light, where the minister preached against a mixed background of fanners, corn measures, piles of sacks, and spare implements of the finer sort; and the congregation, who had come up a ladder cautiously, like hens going to roost—being severally warned about the second highest step—sat on bags stuffed with straw, boards resting on upturned pails, while a few older folk were accommodated with chairs, and some youngsters disdained not the floor. It was pleasanter in the barn, a cool, lofty, not unimpressive place of worship, with its mass of golden straw and its open door through which various kindly sounds of farm life came in and strange visitors entered. The collies, most sociable of animals, would saunter in and make friendly advances to Carmichael reading a chapter; then, catching their master's eye and detecting no encouragement, would suddenly realize that they were at kirk, and compose themselves to sleep—"juist like ony Christian," as Hillocks once remarked with envy, his own plank allowing no liberties—and never taking any part except in a hymn like

See the mighty host advancing,
Satan leading on, which they regarded as recreation rather than worship.

It was also recalled for years that a pet lamb came into Donald Menzies' barn and wandered about for a while, and Carmichael told that pretty legend of St. Francis, how he saw a white lamb among the kids, and burst into tears at the sight, because it reminded him of Jesus among the sinners. Indeed, these services were very extemporaneous, with hymns instead of psalms, and sermons without divisions. Carmichael also allowed himself illustrations from the life around, and even an anecdote at a time, which was all the more keenly relished that it would have been considered a confession of weakness in a regular sermon. He has been heard to say that he came nearer the heart of things once or twice in the barns than he has ever done since, not even excepting that famous course of sermons every one talked about last year, "The Analysis of Doubt," which almost converted two professors to Christianity, and were heard by the editor of the "Caledonian" in the disguise of a street preacher. It was also pleasantly remembered for long in the parish that Dr. Davidson appeared one evening in Donald Menzies' barn and joined affably in the "Sweet Bye and Bye." Afterward, being supplied with a large armchair, he heard the address with much attention—nodding approval four times, if not five—and pronouncing the benediction with such impressiveness that Donald felt some hesitation in threshing his last stack in the place next day. The Doctor followed up this visit with an exhortation from the pulpit on the following Sabbath, in which he carefully distinguished such services by an ordained minister, although held in a barn, from unlicensed Plymouthistic gatherings held in corn-rooms—this at Milton's amateur efforts—and advised his people in each district to avail themselves of "my friend Mr. Carmichael's excellent ministrations," which Papal Bull, being distributed to the farthest corner of the parish before nightfall, greatly lifted the Free Kirk and sweetened the blood of the Glen for years. It seemed to me, watching things in Drumtochty during those days with an impartial mind, that the Doctor, with his care for the poor, his sympathy for the oppressed, his interest in everything human, his shrewd practical wisdom, and his wide toleration, was the very ideal of the parish clergyman. He showed me much courtesy while I lived in the Cottage, although I did not belong to his communion, and as my imagination reconstructs the old parish of a winter night by the fire, I miss him as he used to be on the road, in the people's homes, in his pulpit, among his books, and ever an honorable and kind-hearted gentleman.

One evening a woman came into Donald Menzies' barn just before the hour of service, elderly, most careful in her widow's dress, somewhat austere in expression, but very courteous in her manner. No one recognized her at the time, but she was suspected to be the forerunner of the Carnegie household, and Donald offered her a front seat. She thanked him for his good will, but asked for a lower place, greatly delighting him by a reference to the parable wherein the Master rebuked the ambitious Pharisees who scrambled for chief seats. Their accent showed of what blood they both were, and that their Gaelic had still been mercifully left them, but they did not use it because of their perfect breeding, which taught them not to speak a foreign tongue in this place. So the people saw Donald offer her a hymn-book and heard her reply:

"It iss not a book that I will be using, and it will be a peety to take it from other people;" nor would she stand at the singing, but sat very rigid and with closed lips. When Carmichael, who had a pleasant tenor voice and a good ear, sang a solo, then much tasted in such meetings, she arose and left the place, and the minister thought he had never seen anything more uncompromising than her pale set face.

It was evident that she was Free Kirk and of the Highland persuasion, which was once over-praised and then has been over-blamed, but is never understood by the Lowland mind; and as Carmichael found that she had come to live in the cottage at the entrance to the Lodge, he looked in on his way home. She was sitting at a table reading the Bible, and her face was more hostile than in the meeting; but she received him with much politeness, dusting a chair and praying him to be seated.

"You have just come to the district to reside, I think? I hope you will like our glen."

"It wass here that I lived long ago, but I hef been married and away with my mistress many years, and there are not many that will know me."

"But you are not of Drumtochty blood?" inquired the minister.

"There iss not one drop of Sassenach blood in my veins"—this with a sudden flash. "I am a Macpherson and my husband wass a Macpherson; but we hef served the house of Carnegie for three generations."

"You are a widow, I think, Mrs. Macpherson?" and Carmichael's voice took a tone of sympathy. "Have you any children?"

"My husband iss dead, and I had one son, and he iss dead also; that iss all, and I am alone;" but in her voice there was no weakening.

"Will you let me say how sorry I am?" pleaded Carmichael; "this is a great grief, but I hope you have consolations."

"Yes, I will be having many consolations; they both died like brave men, with their face to the enemy. There were six that did not feel fery well before Ian fell; he could do good work with the sword as well as the bayonet, and he wass not bad with the dirk at a time."

Neither this woman nor her house were like anything in Drumtochty, for in it there was a buffet for dishes, and a carved chest and a large chair, all of old black oak; and above the mantelpiece two broadswords were crossed, with a circle of war medals beneath on a velvet ground, flanked by two old pistols.

"I suppose those arms have belonged to your people, Mrs. Macpherson; may I look at them?"

"They are not anything to be admiring, and it wass not manners that I should hef been boasting of my men. It iss a pleasant evening and good for walking."

"You were at the meeting, I think?" and Carmichael tried to get nearer this iron woman. "We were sorry you had to go out before the end. Did you not feel at home?"

"I will not be accustomed to the theater, and I am not liking it instead of the church."

"But surely there was nothing worse in my singing alone than praying alone?" and Carmichael began to argue like a Scotchman, who always fancies that people can be convinced by logic, and forgets that many people, Celts in especial, are ruled by their heart and not by their head; "do you see anything wrong in one praising God aloud in a hymn, as the Virgin Mary did?"

"It iss the Virgin Mary you will be coming to next, no doubt, and the Cross and the Mass, like the Catholics, although I am not saying anything against them, for my mother's cousins four times removed were Catholics, and fery good people. But I am a Presbyterian, and do not want the Virgin Mary."

Carmichael learned at that moment what it was to argue with a woman, and he was to make more discoveries in that department before he came to terms with the sex, and would have left in despair had it not been for an inspiration of his good angel.

"Well, Mrs. Macpherson, I didn't come to argue about hymns, but to bid you welcome to the Glen and to ask for a glass of water, for preaching is thirsty work."

"It iss black shame I am crying on myself for sitting here and offering you neither meat nor drink," and she was stung with regret in an instant. "It iss a little spirits you will be tasting, and this iss Talisker which I will be keeping for a friend, for whisky iss not for women."

She was full of attention, but when Carmichael took milk instead of whisky her suspicions revived, and she eyed him again.

"You are not one of those new people I am hearing of in the Lowlands that are wiser than the fery Apostles?"

"What people?" and Carmichael trembled for his new position.

"'Total abstainers' they will call themselves," and the contempt in her accent was wonderful.

"No, I am not," Carmichael hastened to reassure his hostess; "but there are worse people than abstainers in the world. I will stick to the milk, if you please."

"You will take what you please," and she was again mollified; "but the great ministers always had their tasting after preaching; and I hef heard one of them say that it wass a sin to despise the Lord's mercies. You will be taking another glass of milk and resting a little."

"This hospitality reminds me of my mother, Mrs. Macpherson." Carmichael was still inspired, and was, indeed, now in full sail. "She was a Highland woman, and had the Gaelic. She sometimes called me Ian instead of John."

"When you wass preaching about the shepherd finding the sheep, I wass wondering how you had the way to the heart, and I might have been thinking, oh yes, I might have known"—all the time Janet was ever bringing something new out of the cupboard, though Carmichael only sipped the milk. "And what wass your mother's name?"

"Farquharson; her people came from Braemar; but they are all dead now, and I am the last of the race."

"A good clan," cried Janet, in great spirits, "and a loyal; they were out with the Macphersons in the '45.

Will you happen to know whether your ancestor suffered?"

"That he did, for he shot an English officer dead on his doorstep, and had to flee the country; it was not a pretty deed."

"Had the officer broken bread with him?" inquired Janet, anxiously,

"No, he had come to quarter himself and his men on him, and said something rude about the Prince."

"Your ancestor gave him back his word like a gentleman; but he would maybe hef to stay away for a while. Wass he of the chief's blood?"

"Oh no, just a little laird, and he lost his bit of land, and we never saw the place again."

"He would be a Dunniewassal, and proud it iss I am to see you in my house; and the Gaelic, will you hef some words?"

"Just the sound of it, Mrs. Macpherson," and he repeated his three sentences, all that he had learned of his mother, who had become a Scotchwoman in her speech.

"Call me Janet, my dear; and it iss the good Gaelic your mother must have had, and it makes my heart glad to think my minister iss a Farquharson, by the mother's side."

"We sing nothing but Psalms at church, Mrs. . . . Janet, so you will be pleased, and we stand to pray and sit to sing."

"Tuts, tuts, I am not minding about a bit hymn at a time from a friend, but it iss those Lowlanders meddling with everything I do not like, and I am hoping to hear you sing again, for it wass a fery pretty tune;" and the smith, passing along the road when Carmichael left that evening, heard Janet call him "my dear," and invoke a thousand blessings on his head.

When he called again in the end of the week to cement the alliance and secure her presence on Sabbath, Janet was polishing the swords, and was willing enough to give their history.

"This wass my great-grandfather's, and these two nicks in the blade were made on the dragoons at Prestonpans; and this wass my husband's sword, for he wass sergeant-major before he died, a fery brave man, good at the fighting, and the praying too.

"Maybe I am wrong, and I do not know what you may be thinking, but things come into my mind when I am reading the Bible, and I will be considering that it wass maybe not so good that the Apostles were fishing people."

"What ails you at fishermen, Janet?"

"Nothing at all but one thing; they are clever at their nets and at religion, but I am not hearing that they can play with the sword or the dirk.

"It wass fery good intention that Peter had that night, no doubt, and I will be liking him for it when he took his sword to the policeman, but it wass a mighty poor blow. If Ian or his father had got as near as that, it would not have been an ear that would have been missing."

"Perhaps his head," suggested Carmichael.

"He would not have been putting his nose into honest people's business again, at any rate," and Janet nodded her head as one who could see a downright blow that left no regrets; "it hass always made me ashamed to read about that ear.

"It wass not possible, and it iss maybe no good speaking about it now"—Janet felt she had a minister now she could open her mind to—"but it would hef been better if our Lord could hef had twelve Macphersons for his Apostles."

"You mean they would have been more brave and faithful?"

"There wass a price of six thousand pounds, or it might be four, put on Cluny's head after Culloden, and the English soldiers were all up and down the country, but I am not hearing that any clansman betrayed his chief.

"Thirty pieces of silver wass a fery small reward for such a dirty deed, and him one of the Chief's tail, too; it wass a mistake to be trusting to fisher folk instead of Glen's men.

"There iss something I hef wished," concluded Janet, who seemed to have given her mind to the whole incident—"that Peter or some other man had drawn his skean-dhu and slippit it quietly into Judas. We would hef been respecting him fery much to-day, and it would hef been a good lesson—oh yes, a fery good lesson—to all traitors."

As they got more confidential, Janet began to speak of signs and dreams, and Carmichael asked her if she had the second sight.

"No; it iss not a lie I will be telling you, my dear, nor will I be boasting. I have not got it, nor had my mother, but she heard sounds, oh yes, and knew what wass coming to pass.

"'Janet,' she would say, 'I have heard the knock three times at the head of the bed; it will be your Uncle Alister, and I must go to see him before he dies.'"

"And was she—"

"Oh, yes, she wass in time, and he wass expecting her; and once she saw the shroud begin to rise on her sister, but no more; it never covered the face before her eyes; but the knock, oh yes, many times."

"Have you known any one that could tell what was happening at a distance and gave warning of danger?" for the latent Celt was awakening in Carmichael, with his love of mystery and his sense of the unseen.

"Listen, my dear"—Janet lowered her voice as one speaking of sacred things—"and I will tell you of Ina Macpherson, who lived to a hundred and two, and had the vision clear and sure.

"In the great war with Russia I wass staying in the clachan of my people, and then seven lads of our blood were with the Black Watch, and every Sabbath the minister would pray for them and the rest of the lads from Badenoch that were away at the fighting.

"One day Ina came into my sister's house, and she said, 'It is danger that I am seeing,' and my heart stood still in my bosom for fear that it wass my own man Hamish.

"'No,' and she looked at me, 'not yet, and not to-day,' but more she would not say about him. 'Is it my son Ronald?' my sister cried, and Ina only looked before her. 'It's a sore travail, and round a few black tartans I see many men in gray, pressing them hard; ochone, ochone!'

"'It's time to pray,' I said, and there wass a man in the clachan that wass mighty in prayer, and we gathered into his kitchen, four and twenty women and four men, and every one had a kinsman in the field.

"It iss this minute that I hear Dugald crying to the Almighty, 'Remember our lads, and be their help in the day of battle, and give them the necks of their enemies,' and he might be wrestling for half an hour, when Ina rose from her knees and said, 'The prayer is answered, for the tartans have the field, and I see blood on Ronald, but it is not his own.'"

"And did you ever hear—"

"Wait, my dear, and I will tell you, for the letter came from my nephew, and this is what he wrote:

"'It wass three to one, and the gloom came on me, for I thought that I would never see Glenfeshie again, nor the water of the loch, nor the deer on the side of the hill. Then I wass suddenly strengthened with all might in the inner man, and it iss five Russians that I hef killed to my own hands.'

"And so it wass, and a letter came from his captain, who wass of Cluny's blood, and it will be read in church, and a fery proud woman wass my sister."

These were the stories that Janet told to her minister in the days before the Carnegies came home, as well as afterward, and so she prepared him to be an easier prey to a soldier's daughter.

◆

The way of life is by no means smooth, but let us not make it rougher than it is. The world is not all we could wish; but, if it goes wrong, let us not spend ourselves trying to make it go worse. Rather, let us make it a little smoother and a little pleasanter by our disposition, manners, and deeds. If men in general are out of sorts, there is the more need of our being in sorts.—John Learned.

For the Little People

The Doll's Washing

By Mary F. Butts

Earth-fairies bring the water
From pond and marshy dell—
Drop by drop, all day, all night,
And fill the deep, deep well.

Down goes the graceful well-sweep
Along the mossy sides.
Brimful of sparkling water,
Up the bucket rides.

The blazing fire is ready
To help the work along;
The steam goes puffing, puffing
In a soft and cozy song.

Now comes the washerwoman,
Her dimpled arms are bare;

A cap of snowy muslin
Holds all her curly hair.

Ah, see the suds a-foaming!
And—what a pretty sight!—
A rainbow in a bubble
For a little girl's delight!

Into the tub she plunges—
Rub-a-dub! swish-swash!
Soon upon the clothes-line
Will hang the dolly's wash.

Blankets for Baby Leaves

By Mary Mann Miller

Did you ever wonder what is packed away inside the buds you see on most trees and shrubs in winter? And did you ever try to find out? There are two ways of finding out. The first is the easier, but the second is the more interesting. You can open the bud carefully and take out what you find inside—you'll probably need a magnifying-glass to make out what they are; or you can put the twig in water and keep it there till the buds open of their own accord. On the whole, I advise you to try both ways. A small magnifying-glass does not cost much. You can get one for about fifty cents, I think. The folding linen-glasses are good, for they show just how far the object must be from the lens.

I am going to tell you about some tulip-tree buds I found one day, besides showing you some pictures of what was in them. You can see the same sort of thing in any winter bud; and sometimes you will find other things—I won't tell you all of them. Some buds are very gummy—so sticky! Then others are all woolly inside. If you think hard, I am sure you can discover the use of this wool and gum. Then if you take a branch a foot long you can find out how old it is, and which years were best for growth! You hardly believe me? Well, look at the branch very sharply, beginning at the bud end, and see if you can't find out. If you don't succeed, perhaps I will tell you next week. I advise you to take a maple branch, for the tulip-tree might puzzle you at first, but the maple has it all written out plainly.

But about the tulip buds. Last spring, when I was walking in the woods one day, I found some nice large brownish-green buds that looked very promising. They were rounded and blunt at the end, instead of pointed as so many are. Fig. 1 shows how the buds looked. I did not know what the tree was, but I expected to find out when I opened the buds. How? Why, I expected to find the baby leaves for the early spring growth, that had been packed away snug and warm all winter in the buds. There were just two outside scales (as they are called), and they were almost grown together. No cold winds could get in there, I can tell you! When I had taken off the first pair very carefully, I found—nothing but another pair just like the first, only greener. But when these were opened I saw what you see at A in Fig. 2—a tiny, dainty fairy leaf doubled together along its midrib and then bent downward at the top of its long stem. I knew at once from its shape that it was the tulip leaf. It was the most beautiful delicate pea-green color. I took it off carefully and laid it on white paper while I removed the next pair of scales. There were six or seven leaves in all, with a pair of scales outside each one and an extra pair for the outside. Isn't it wonderful to think that these delicate leaves had been packed away all winter waiting for the warm sunshine of spring to make them grow? Now you see why it is that spring comes with such a burst.

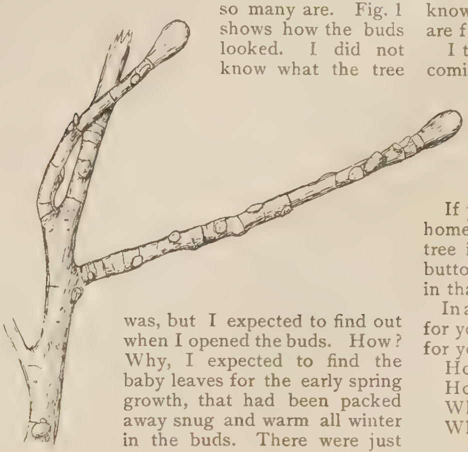

Fig. 1

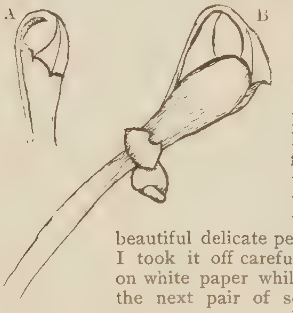

Fig. 2

I took a twig six or eight inches long, and put it in water in my room. I thought I should like to have a little spring of my own before the real spring outside had begun. I had to be patient, for the buds did not open right away. In Fig. 2 B you can see what first happened. The outside scales, you see, turned back and curled up. Then the second pair parted, and the leaf began to straighten out its stem. Two or three had come out before any of them opened the flat part of the leaf or blade. After a few days these opened, and the buds looked as in Fig. 3. The stem had grown ever so much, you see, as well as the whole leaf. They were much slower about it, however, than they are out-of-doors when they once begin. There you hardly know the buds are opening before the leaves are full-grown.

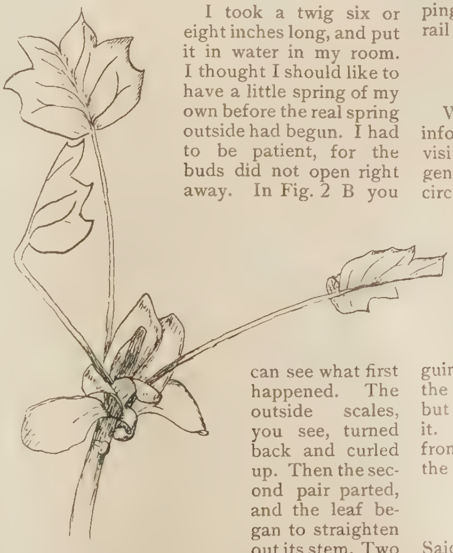

Fig. 3

I tried my best to catch a leaf just as it was coming out, but I never could. Once I almost did. I had been looking and looking at the bud for ever so long, and at last I turned away for just a minute, and when I turned back—there it was! It almost seemed as if it had tried to elude me.

If you can find a tulip-tree, do take a branch home to watch. A branch of apple or cherry tree is interesting, too, and so is one from the buttonball-tree. I won't tell what you will find in that.

In another article I will answer these questions for you, if you haven't already answered them for yourselves—which I should like better:

How old is your branch?
How do you know?
Which was the best year?
What is the use of the wool and gum?

A Happy Family

Doubtless you have heard of the "Happy Family" at the cat show recently held in New York. Tom was the head of the family. Tom is a big tabby cat. He is handsome, but looks sleepy. When the other members of his family ran to him for protection, or to caress him, he was so indifferent to them that you wondered why they were so devoted to him. The family live in a wire cage about five feet square. There are Tom, six guinea-pigs, two white mice, three white rats, ring-doves, Australian paroquets, indigo-birds, Java sparrows, six German canaries, and one English canary in the family. There are perches, drinking and feeding cups, and all possible provision for the comfort of this strange family. A gentleman dropped his cane. It struck against the cage, and at once every animal in the cage ran to Tom as if to protect him. The mice really kissed Tom. It was quite pretty to see how affectionate they were. The birds feed at Tom's feet. When I first saw the family Tom was dozing, with three canaries hopping on his side, as if it were a fur rug. The pigs and the mice did not seem at all intimate, but the birds were intimate with all. There were some performing cats at the show. One cat walked on a narrow rail carrying two mice on her back, and stepping over about a dozen white mice on the rail about four inches apart.

The Informal Reception

Would it not be delightful to visit the circus informally? That is, see the animals at home, visit them in their schools? Some New York gentlemen last week visited the animals of the circus in their winter home at Bridgeport, Conn. The schoolmaster had some of the animals recite their lessons; he called it performing. He sat on a white horse on a platform, and made the horses, all gayly dressed, gallop in the ring in four circles, moving first in one and then in the other direction. Each horse answered to his name. The elephants showed great fear of rats and guinea-pigs that were put in their house. When the lions were fed, they tore the meat to pieces, but the tigers licked the meat before they ate it. Johanna, the chimpanzee, drank cocoa from a bowl, and wrote her autograph for the visitors.

How it Strikes a Boy

Said little Johnny Green,
This is the funniest world I ever seen;
A fellow is sent off to bed
When he hain't got a bit of sleep in his head,
And he's hustled out of it, don't you see,
When he's just as sleepy as he can be!

—Boston Transcript.

The Religious World

The American University

The American University is a new institution which has been founded in the city of Washington. Its chief patrons belong to the Methodist Episcopal Church, and its chief promoter is Bishop John F. Hurst. The object is to establish in that city a post-graduate institution of the highest grade, and Washington has been selected as the best location because of its incomparable advantages for scientific and literary investigation in the collections and institutions of the general Government. These have cost about $35,000,000, and about $3,500,000 are expended on them annually. They would all be open to students. An effort has been undertaken to raise $10,000,000 for this new University, and towards this something over $1,000,000 has already been given or pledged. The ground for the College of History in connection with this University was broken on March 9. Representatives of various churches and institutions took part in the services. Bishop Hurst stated that six denominations are represented in the gifts thus far received. The Hall of History is to be 176 feet long, 70 feet wide, two and one-half stories high, and will be of marble, in Doric style. When the various plans of the National Government and of religious denominations for educational institutions in Washington are completed, that city will perhaps be the educational center, as it is already the political center, of the United States.

The Young Women's Christian Association

A large audience was gathered in Carnegie Hall, New York, on the evening of March 9, in the interests of the Young Women's Christian Association, which then celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary. The weather was bad, but that did not serve to dampen the enthusiasm. Mr. Hamilton W. Mabie presided, and in his opening address traced the growth of the Association to its present position of power and influence, and its many and various forms of Christian service. The other speakers were the Rev. Dr. Burrill, of the Collegiate Church; the Rev. Dr. John Hall, whose topic was "The Relation of the Association to the Church;" General Wager Swayne, who spoke of the "Self-Respect of the Self-Supporting Woman;" the Rev. Dr. Greer, who spoke of "The Amusements of the Association," and Colonel Waring, who made a fine address on "The Association in its Relation to Health." After the addresses Mr. Mabie made an earnest appeal in behalf of the $250,000 which the Association desires to raise in commemoration of its twenty-fifth anniversary. The occasion was one of much interest, and promises well for the future of the Association, which has already proved its usefulness in the community.

A Fitting Appointment

We are informed through the daily press that the Rev. B. W. Bacon, D.D., of Oswego, N. Y., has been appointed instructor in New Testament Exegesis in the Theological Department of Yale University. The late occupant of that chair, Professor George B. Stevens, has been made Professor of Systematic Theology. The appointment of Dr. Bacon, which means, we doubt not, his succession in due time to the full professorship, is peculiarly fitting. He is one of the finest Biblical scholars in the United States, and by his work has already proved himself worthy of the position. He has had experience as a pastor, and will therefore know how to adjust his attainments as a scholar to the needs of those preparing for the ministry. Dr. Bacon is a grandson of Leonard Bacon, who served fifty years as pastor of the Center Church of New Haven, and whose long association with Yale is a part of the traditions of that University. We believe that no better appointment could have been made.

United Work in New York

The Federation of Christian Workers in New York City is a movement worthy of attention and commendation. It is the longest step in the direction of the real unity of the Church which has ever been taken in New York. It is a sad commentary on the Christian character of the ministers and the vitality of the churches that in all the history of this great city there has never been one gathering which has been thoroughly representative for consideration of the interests common to all the denominations. There have been hints of such gatherings, but only hints. Never have Episcopalians and Roman Catholics, Congregationalists and Methodists, Baptists and Presbyterians, Universalists and Unitarians, without regard to name or creed, united in one body for the consideration of the work common to all. This Federation of Churches is not ideal; it is only the beginning of what we hope will sometime be a real federation of all the Churches. Surely there is work enough in common for all to lay aside their differences while they strive to bring to the people moral ideals and help them to realize a better social and religious life. In this Federation the unit of membership is the individual Church. At present it numbers over one hundred churches and twelve societies for Christian work. There are about three hundred representatives of churches and societies in the Federation, and about thirty-six different denominations and societies are represented. We may best state what it will try to do in the words of its Constitution: "The object of the Federation is to bring the organized intelligence and love of our churches to bear upon the material, social, economic, civic, and spiritual interests of the family life of our city, and, through interdenominational conference and co-operation, to meet its every religious and moral need." That object ought to command the allegiance of all the Christian people in this great city, and this organization should make itself felt in many and most vital ways in the advancement of civic righteousness and individual morality.

A Woman's Meeting

The women of the Congregational churches of New York and vicinity have organized a prayer-meeting in the interests of Congregational missions, home and foreign. It is held every Friday morning from eleven to twelve o'clock in the manager's room of the Bible House, New York City. Similar meetings are held in other cities, and other denominations have held similar meetings in New York. The plan is to have the meetings for home and foreign missions alternate. There are many strong and efficient workers among the women of the Congregational churches of New York and vicinity. They have made their influence felt in the various Boards of the churches in the past, and no doubt this meeting will be the beginning of a more positive influence in the missionary cause in the vicinity of New York. All women interested in the home and foreign work of the Congregational churches are cordially invited to attend.

Building Up a Down-Town Church

The Central Metropolitan Temple at Seventh Avenue and Fourteenth Street, this city, has recently been reopened after extensive enlargement and renovation. It has a seating capacity of 1,300, and during the past ten months has built up a large congregation and has added 500 members to its roll. The services of the church cover 365 days a year, and a large corps of assistants, under the direction of the pastor, the Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, is continually at work. There are lectures on history, literature, and travel every Tuesday, a free concert every Saturday, and a sociological and ethical discussion on Fridays, in addition to the regular religious meetings of the church. The character of the work is generic and broad, though the church is not an institutional one. In one room may be seen a bevy of girls discussing "In Memoriam;" in another a cadet corps drilling; in a third a lady of social and intellectual position conducting a conference on some spiritual theme. The church maintains a labor and a musical bureau, a large Sunday afternoon Bible-class, many circles of King's Daughters, and a Ladies' Aid Society holding all-day sessions. The building is a striking one, and in the evening is brilliantly illuminated. The success of Mr. Cadman in this work, in which he has in a year built up a down-town church which was formerly practically deserted, shows that it is possible for a Protestant church to lead a growing and broadening life south of Fourteenth Street, notwithstanding the popular notion to the contrary.

Governors and Religion

One of our daily papers has recently taken the pains to make inquiry concerning the religious affiliations of the forty-four State Governors of the American Union. The result showed that thirty-nine are avowed believers in religion and twenty-nine are professed Christians, and most of them are regular attendants at some place of worship. In response to the inquiries sent out, forty-three State Governors and three Territorial Governors returned answer. The Governor of Texas declined to state his position, while the Governor of South Carolina did not respond. A study of the returns shows that ten of the number are Presbyterians, five Congregationalists, five Unitarians, one Baptist, one Christian, and sixteen are unconnected with church organizations. Several of those who made answer are regarded as conspicuous enough to be possible candidates for the Presidency in the ensuing election. Little can be determined by a simple profession of religion, but this census shows at least that many of the ablest and most practical men of our time are Christians and interested in a Christian administration of public affairs.

The Men's Club

The Men's Club is becoming almost as prominent an agent of aggressive Christianity as the Christian Endeavor Society and the institutional church. If we remember correctly, it owes its origin to the Rev. John Faville, of Appleton, Wis. It is a simple association, with a single aim—to increase the interest and effectiveness of the Sunday evening service. The methods are to enlist all men in the community who are not identified with other churches and who are willing to help in making the Sunday evening service one which will be useful and helpful to the people. The club in Appleton, Wis., is perhaps the most successful of any in the country, and has an enrolled membership of 560. It has extended its activity to other departments of work—maintaining a lecture course and assisting in various charitable and philanthropic enterprises. A programme of the fourth anniversary of the club in Appleton indicates a vigorous and vital activity on the part of its members. The order of service under the auspices of the club is made up of music, both vocal and orchestral, of responsive readings, and altogether indicates a work which is "brief, bright, and brotherly." In some respects this movement resembles the "Pleasant Sunday Afternoons" so common in the churches of England.

Princely Knights of Character Castle

One of the most perplexing questions for the Church to answer is, How can we help the boys? Many efforts have been made toward this end within recent years, and while many of our young people's societies have been wonderfully successful, the fact remains that we lose a large percentage of our boys between Sunday-school and church. In order to meet this difficulty, and, if possible, redeem the boys, morally, socially, and spiritually, the Rev. Messrs. D. R. Lucas, A. W. and S. M. Conner, and the Hon. W. D. Owen, all prominent members of the Church of the Disciples of Christ in Indianapolis, have instituted a new order known as Princely Knights of Character Castle. Its purpose is to provide pleasing and profitable instruction for boys between the ages of twelve and eighteen, by which they will be helped to form good habits; to provide reading and meeting rooms, courses of reading and lectures, and means of entertainment suited to this end; to assist those who need it to secure employment; and in every possible and lawful way to be a boys' friend, and to co-operate with parents and guardians in the work of forming a good character in the boys. The plan of work is to associate the boys with men of good character, who, by means of the ritual and courses of reading, lectures, and entertainments, will be enabled, it is hoped, to win the boys' attention and keep them under good influence in Castle (or Lodge) work until good habits are formed in them. The unique feature about it is its secret character, and it is perhaps the first to enter this field of work—a secret order for the moral and spiritual culture of boys. The founders of the order claim that it is so conducted as to appeal to the boy's desire to learn secrets and for entertainment, and to his love of banners and regalia. By these he is held and taught the great lessons of heroism, endurance, purity, patriotism, and love. It is claimed that the rites of initiation are administered in a manner that will forever fasten their lessons upon the minds and hearts of the boys. There are seven degrees in the order, one for each year of the boy's age from twelve to eighteen. The last degree is that of "The Princely Knight," and all who take it become the friends and helpers of the younger boys.

Reform of the Sunday-School

A recent series of articles in the "Christian World," of London, by Professor W. F. Adeney, on "The Reform of the Sunday-School," has attracted wide attention, and been made the subject of a symposium in that journal. It should be remembered that the Sunday-school in England hardly occupies the place that it does in America. More attention is given there to the religious training of the children in the homes of the well-to-do, and the Sunday-school is more largely devoted to those without such training among the poorer classes. This, however, is only relative. Among the suggestions which have been elicited by Professor Adeney's articles are the following: Dr. John Clifford, the most eminent Baptist of London, reports that he notices an increasing reticence on the part of the teachers. They are more content than formerly to say that they do not know. "They are not positive where Jesus is silent." The suggestion had been made that the teaching in the Sunday-school is antiquated, but Dr. Clifford says that, so far as he can hear, it "is not the school but the pulpit which is the lazy or timid patron of traditionalism." It should be said that knowledge of the Bible is more common in England than in this country, and also that it has there been studied more critically. Dr. Clifford's testimony is that in the schools with which he is acquainted the teaching is encouraging to those who desire thorough work. Dr. George S. Barrett, an eminent Congregationalist of Norwich, England, does not agree with Professor Adeney that large classes are most desirable. The distinctive characteristic of his paper, however, is what he says concerning the service, which he thinks should be a liturgical one composed of praise and prayer in which the whole school takes part. He would have "free prayer" offered at the beginning of the school and a responsive service at the end, with special attention given to music. The Rev. Alfred Rowland, London, advocates a training-class for teachers to be held on Sunday, and that especial care should be taken to secure for its teacher a broad-minded and experienced man. In regard to the subjects studied he uses these words: "By all means let us add to Bible study more attention to the biographies of typical Christian men and women, especially with a view to expounding the history of missions—which is essentially the Acts of the Apostles brought up to date." Dr. Goodrich, of Manchester, rejoices that the emphasis is no longer on the period of the Exodus, but rather on the teaching of Christ. He says: "In the syllabus of a senior class I find such subjects as 'The Book of Job,' 'Citizenship,' 'Foreign Missions Policy,' 'Sesame and Lilies,' etc.; and from a school of about nine hundred and fifty, I find in one year thirty-two became members of the church." He thinks that our greatest wants are a thoroughly valuable course of lessons on the life of Jesus Christ, and more teachers of ability, scholarship, and experience. Other contributors to this symposium are the Revs. J. M. Gibbon, Joseph Halsey, Silvester Horne, and H. W. Horwill, all of whom write intelligently on the subject. The articles by Professor Adeney and the symposium on them cannot fail to do great good.

The Subject in This Country

Nearly if not quite everything which we have mentioned as spoken of in the symposium applies equally to our own country. Far too much attention, relatively, has been given to sermonettes to the children and far too little to an intelligent and discriminating study of the Bible itself. Our systems of lessons have often been compiled on the homiletic plan. In many localities, doubtless, that is best, but we record our conviction that the first duty of the Sunday-school, as such, is not the conversion of the child but his instruction in the things of the spirit. We do not mean that the decision for Christ should be overlooked, but that, as society is now constituted, very little systematic teaching is done in the home, and if children are ever trained in a knowledge of the Bible it must be in the Sunday-school. The majority of people are lamentably ignorant of what the Bible contains. The first duty, therefore, is careful training in a knowledge of its contents; and the second the application of its teachings to the life of the pupil. In that others besides teachers will have a part; the pastor, the Christian Endeavor Society, and individual Christians inevitably will influence the children toward individual consecration to the Master. We join our English friends in pleading for a more intelligent study of the Word of God in the light of the most recent and reliable science.

The Gambling Habit in Great Britain

An appeal to the English nation against the growing and most pernicious habit of betting and gambling has been issued by representatives of various Christian bodies in that country. We make a few extracts. The manifesto says: "We believe that the public morals are being seriously affected in every class of society, while the national sports, especially horse-racing, are degraded by the development of betting and book-making, which are steadily increasing. The increase to a great extent is to be traced to the trade of the professional betting man. . . . To the enforcement of the law must be added strenuous efforts in every direction to influence public opinion by that moral suasion which alone can be used in dealing with individuals and their action." The appeal is temperate and strong, and is signed by such men as the Bishops of London and Durham, the Rev. J. Morlais Jones, Chairman of the Congregational Union, the Rev. Richard Leitch, Moderator of the Presbyterian Church of England, the Chairmen of the Baptist and Methodist Churches, Mr. Thomas Hughes, J. P., and other men equally prominent. One of the most encouraging things about this appeal is that it indicates a realization of responsibility on the part of those prominent in the Church, not only for the welfare of the Church as an institution, but also for the morals of the community. It is only another sign that the Church is every day coming to realize more keenly its power as a social and political force.

Brief Mention

The Council of Congregational Churches which has been examining the charges made against the Rev. Charles O. Brown, pastor of the First Congregational Church of San Francisco, has found him guiltless.

The Rev. W. Hay Aitkin attracted large congregations last week at a noonday service in old Trinity Church, New York. The weather was unpropitious, but the crowds in attendance proved that the men of Wall Street are interested in something besides the acquisition of wealth. This is the second or third time that Mr. Aitkin has conducted these services.

As there is a Students' Volunteer Movement in behalf of foreign missions among non-Episcopal churches, so there is a Church Students' Missionary Association for the promotion of similar objects among Episcopalians. Its affairs are in the hands of a committee consisting of five bishops, five presbyters, and fifteen laymen, ten of whom are students preparing for ordination.

The Rev. George A. Gordon, D.D., of the Old South Church, Boston, has been invited by Principal Fairbairn to preach and lecture before Mansfield College, Oxford, during the month of May. He has accepted the invitation. Other Americans who have been previously invited by Principal Fairbairn to occupy the pulpit of Mansfield College Chapel are the Rev. Charles Ray Palmer, D.D., who was present at the opening of the institution; the Rev. A. H. Bradford, D.D., who was invited to preach in the Commencement week of 1891; and the Rev. Washington Gladden, D.D., who occupied the pulpit during the summer meetings two years ago. Dr. Gordon has once before been the preacher in the chapel.

Books and Authors

A Prince of the Church[1]

Cardinal Manning was the greatest ecclesiastical statesman that England has seen since Cardinal Wolsey. Other Englishmen have doubtless had his ability, but none of them his opportunity. This came to him unsought, through his conscientious secession from the Church of England, in which the highest place might have been his, to the Church of Rome, in which he chanced upon a time peculiarly favorable for the free play of his remarkable powers. To him, called by his opponents in the Vatican Council Diabolus Concilii, its adoption of the dogma of papal infallibility was mainly due.

Whatever fault be found with Mr. Purcell's exhibition of the great Cardinal on the score of unnecessary candor, it is probably as truthful as the delineation of so complicated a life can be. Manning himself intended it so to be. For this he put into his chosen biographer's hands all his diaries, journals, correspondence, and autobiographical notes. For this the two spent many hours in personal conversation. For this the biographer declares he has supremely endeavored—to manifest Manning's heart and soul and character "in the fullness and simplicity of truth." Another biography may be written with intent on more prudent reserve or the suppression of unedifying material, but Mr. Purcell's work will have the advantage of Manning's virtual imprimatur.

Manning and his great contemporary, Cardinal Newman, were the most notable individual products of the religious revival in the Church of England known as the "Oxford Movement," dating from 1833, when the first of its ninety "Tracts for the Times" appeared, and aiming, under the influence of the priestly rather than the prophetic spirit, to restore the ante-papal Catholicism. Manning, cut off from his hope of a Parliamentary career by the ruin of his father's fortune, had come under evangelical influences, became thoroughly religious, and took holy orders in 1832. While faithful and laborious in his rural charge, his genius for administration so displayed itself in wider interests that only eight years later he became Archdeacon of Chichester. Meanwhile he had early gone over from the Evangelical to the High Church party, and his parish at Lavington, says his biographer, became his "half-way house to Rome." From the time of her separation from the Church of Rome two principles, as variant as Rebecca's struggling twins, have contended within the Church of England—the principle of authority, appealing to the traditions of the Fathers and the corporate voice of the Church in the dogmas of councils, and the principle of liberty, appealing to the unchartered freedom of the days of the Son of man, and the testimony of the Spirit in the Scriptures to the Christian consciousness. Manning, by nature despotic and intolerant of doubt, was wholly in affinity with the principle of authority. The first question in his mind on beginning work as a parish priest was, "By what authority do you lift the latch of a poor man's door . . . and begin to instruct or correct him?" His first sermon before the clergy of the diocese, two years later, maintained the thesis, "Our commission to witness for Christ hangs on this question, Are the bishops of our Church the successors in lineal descent of the Lord's apostles?" For a few years he was satisfied of the validity of "the title-deeds of the Church of England." But in 1836 the "Tracts for the Times" were taking hold of him. In 1839, when he began to receive auricular confession, he was already puzzled how to satisfy his penitents, while keeping them from going over to Rome. For the next twelve years he was in a state of continual and increasing disquiet, until in 1851 he found rest to his soul in the Papal Church.

But of this inward turmoil, abundantly evinced by his letters and diaries, no outward sign appeared. It is, as his biographer says, "a curious difficulty, almost startling at first," to find "Manning speaking concurrently for years with a double voice," publicly proclaiming an unqualified Protestantism, but privately confessing the weakness of his position. Manning's diary records against the years 1843–1846, "Declension—three and a half years—secularity, vanity, and anger." There is no need, says Mr. Purcell, to suppress or to gloss it over; "it was followed by repentance and change of heart."

We hesitate, however, to agree with Mr. Purcell that Manning's difficulty was "not intellectual but moral," in an opposition of his will to reasoned conclusions. Only a year before his submission to Rome he writes that, while logically convinced, he fears to "rest on intellectual convictions alone;" while the argument may be logical, "the premises may be disputable." Easy as it is to censure Manning for hypocrisy, repugnant to a candid mind as his inconsistency appears at this remove from that time of party passion, a just judgment of his case is not an easy problem. Allowance must be made for a man in a position of public trust, whose decision is to affect many others besides himself, who is involved in a question that admits of no neutrality—a question, however, of an intellectual rather than a moral kind, concerning a historical claim to authority—if, being also a man naturally dogmatic and tenacious of prejudice, he stubbornly resists the adverse probabilities which he frankly recognizes, and surrenders only when all is lost. To such considerations, rather than to subsequent "repentance," Manning's biographer might justly have pointed. But he is so anxious to be impartial as to seem now and then inadequately fair.

As early as 1839 Newman had written to Manning: "Nothing but patience and dutifulness can keep us in the Church of England—and remaining in it is a test whether we have these graces." After this Newman held out about six years, and Manning about twelve. The Gorham Judgment in 1850, interpreting the Royal Supremacy as covering matters of doctrine, a claim which Manning had steadfastly resisted throughout his Anglican ministry, cut his last standing-ground from under him. Unable to evoke any effective protest against this subordination of spiritual to civil power, he abandoned all that he held most dear, feeling that now he should "sink to the bottom and disappear."

But the closed way speedily became an open way. Such a man, abounding in energy, fertile in resource, tactful, conciliatory, persevering, intimate with chief men, a born diplomatist, Pius IX. soon recognized at his full worth for the promotion of Catholic interests in England. Twelve years later, on the death of Cardinal Wiseman, he made Manning Archbishop of Westminster. Ten years subsequently, in recognition of his supreme efficiency in the Vatican Council, he made him Cardinal. This crowning honor was not given to Newman till four years later, in 1879, after the accession of Leo XIII. But Newman was the lonely thinker, Manning the privileged counselor of Piux IX., with whose decease Manning's influence at the Vatican largely disappeared.

That Newman was until then under a cloud at Rome was due to Manning. It was misliked by most Catholics in England. It is misliked by his biographer, who does not gloss over what he deems discreditable. In 1867 their correspondence came practically to an end, each professing inability to understand the other. In Newman's "Apologia pro Vita Sua" Manning's name alone is unmentioned of all the friends of his Anglican or Catholic days. Yet Manning's address in 1890, at the time of Newman's death, speaks of him as "my brother and friend of more than sixty years." This Mr. Purcell characterizes as a "falsification of history," due to the illusion of overwrought feeling in fond regret for what might have been.

Whether this frank judgment is too severe it is not easy to pronounce with certainty. Manning was a thorough ultramontane, standing for the infallibility and temporal power of the Holy See as vital to the welfare of the Church. In this Newman disagreed with him. Manning's correspondence with his intimate at Rome, Monsignor Talbot, the Pope's chamberlain, censures Newman's opinions as "anti-Roman and anti-Papal," tending to minimize Catholic doctrine and hinder its spread in England. But it is not expected of statesmen to consult the interests of the party in opposition; nor that the confidant of a jealous pontiff will compromise himself by an intimacy that might expose him to suspicion. Whether Manning's natural intolerance and reluctance to brook any competitor co-operated with his views of public interest no one can say. He himself discountenances the idea in an autobiographical note dated in 1887. None the less, this suppressed "friendship" is one of the painful and unlovely passages of his life.

Until the accession of the Oxford converts English Catholics had dwelt among their countrymen as a peculiar people, in a social isolation resulting from the old penal laws. Newman, Manning, and their followers put new life into the atrophied limb, and made it once more an active member of the social body. It was Manning, however, true Englishman as well as Catholic, who, with his active interest in public concerns, successfully broke down the barriers which had long separated Catholics from the social movement of England. It is for this, and for his zeal and public spirit in philanthropy and social reform, that the present generation chiefly remembers him.

His first care on becoming Archbishop was to postpone, in spite of much resentment, the building of a cathedral in memory of Cardinal Wiseman, that the children of poor Catholics might first be provided with schools, orphanages, and reformatories. From 1871, when the victims of the Paris Commune appealed for relief, he represented his Church in all the co-operative undertakings of philanthropy, and was in constant demand for public platforms, where his ready and impressive eloquence gained popular esteem. He was especially efficient in temperance work, even taking the pledge himself, against medical advice, to promote the cause among the Irish poor. The motley crowd o agitators, hobbyists, and faddists who resorted to his house to gain his sympathy gave grief to those who were jealous for his reputation. His greatest success was the settlement of the Dockers' Strike in 1889, when the Anglican Bishop of London had given it up in despair. In recent politics he was for Home Rule in Ireland, that "martyr nation," as he called it, in a renewed cordiality with Mr. Gladstone, his friend in his Anglican days. Singularly, it was he, of all men, who had carried the infallibility dogma through the Vatican Council, who now pointed out its limits, and declared it inapplicable to Leo XIII.'s decree condemning the Irish "Plan of Campaign" against the landlords.

---

[1] Life of Cardinal Manning, Archbishop of Westminster. By Edmund Sheridan Purcell. Macmillan & Co., New York. 2 Vols. $6.

But Manning said of himself, "From the beginning I was a priest, and a priest only." He was also a great preacher. In the confessional, at the altar, in the pulpit, he found his most congenial work, and endeared himself to a multitude as their spiritual father. If, as his biographer says, he had "somewhat unscrupulous methods of attack," the inconsistency of these with the introspective and sensitive conscience to which his diaries bear witness may in charity be imputed to the false dogmatic system in which he was involved. While religion was to him much more than politics, churchmanship was quite too near it, with a moral obliquity which could even attribute the results of intrigue and wirepulling to the inspiration of the Holy Ghost. Charitable judgment is conciliated by the manifest candor in which the great Cardinal and his biographer are at one in opening to the world the very thoughts of his heart—though this has not been without inexcusable neglect of the rights of still living men to the veil of privacy. But whatever favorable impression this ingenuous exhibition may produce must be offset in many minds by a fresh and deep aversion to the evil genius of sacerdotalism, which history shows, in all ages and every form of religion, invariably inimical to the soundness of ethical life.

* * *

An admirable book is Mr. Karl Károly's A Guide to the Paintings of Venice. (Macmillan & Co., New York.) We have here a historical and critical account of all the pictures in Venice, quotations of criticism from the best authorities, and short lives of the Venetian masters. The author of this little book is already favorably known through his "Raphael's Madonnas" and "A Guide to the Paintings of Florence." Undoubtedly the deserved success of the latter volume induced him to prepare this on Venice. We predict for it an equal popularity. The volume's delightful size—it is the most admirable of pocket companions—its flexible cover, thin but good paper, clear type, and memory-awakening photographic reproductions are excellent features, but its greatest value lies in the practical information so concisely and yet so adequately told. In the Academy there are about seven hundred pictures; these are described in alphabetical order; in the churches there are about five hundred "chief" paintings; these are treated in the order in which they are hung. Prefacing the actual matter in hand, Mr. Károly gives us a short history of Venice, followed by essays on Venetian painting, its characteristics and manner, on the schools of North Italy, on oil painting and tempera painting, on glazing, scumbling, and impasting, and on art terms. Then come the pictures—first those of the Academy, of course, then the frescoes in the Doge's Palace, then those in the Scuola di San Rocco, then the collections of the Cower Museum, the Seminario Patriarchale, the Royal Palace and Library, the Layard Collection, the Giovanelli Palace, and finally the pictures in the churches. Part II. is taken up with a narration of the lives of the principal painters of North Italy, and of the chief events in the reigns of the Doges. An ample index is added.

Dr. James Baldwin has published through the Werner Company (Chicago) A Guide to Systematic Readings in the Encyclopædia Britannica. This is a valuable book to any possessor of that Encyclopædia, for without it the full value of the Encyclopædia can hardly be recognized. The Britannica is not only a repository of general information, it is also an educational agent. In consulting it one is constantly drawn from point to point, finding something new and suggestive about the subject in which one is especially interested. If this is true in the hints which are thrown out in the Encyclopædia itself, how much more is it in a book specially prepared for that purpose. Three classes of people are addressed by Dr. Baldwin: first, boys and girls; second, students; third, the busy world. Boys and girls are told about home readings and history, biography, science, games, sports, and pastimes. For instance, they may supplement the school history of early America with readings from articles in the Britannica. Three courses of reading in history and five in the history of literature are indicated to the student. There are also indications how to read about philology and the history of language, astronomy, zoölogy, botany, geography, mathematics, the study of man, philosophy, the Bible, mythology, and the study of the supernatural.

We infer that the Rev. A. H. Hore means by the term "Catholic Church" the Church of England; for his History of the Church Catholic gives a detailed account of the Apostolic and sub-Apostolic times of the Christian Church. The account then proceeds to the great schism, and then the Eastern portion of Christendom is dismissed almost entirely from any mention. What follows is an account of Latin Christianity up to what he describes as the "Three Reformations," the Protestant, the Roman Catholic, and the Catholic (the English Reformation). After the separation of the English Church from the Roman obedience, the author confines his narrative strictly to the Church of England. This is nothing more than the narrowest kind of insularity, and seriously impairs the usefulness of the book. (E. P. Dutton & Co., New York.)

Mr. Noah Brooks has published through Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons (New York) The Mediterranean Trip: A Short Guide to the Principal Points on the Shores of the Western Mediterranean and the Levant. We have short, too short, descriptions of the Azores, Madeira, Gibraltar, Tangier, Algiers, Genoa, Nice, Monte Carlo, Malta, Messina, Palermo, Naples, Alexandria, Cairo, Jaffa, Jerusalem, Smyrna, Constantinople, and Athens. The little volume contains a number of fairly good maps and illustrations, but the text is very incomplete.

Literary Notes

—Mme. Octave Feuillet has written a continuation of her "Quelques Années de Ma Vie," with the title of "Souvenirs et Correspondances."

—Recent reports from Bombay contradict the rumors of Mr Clemens's (Mark Twain's) dangerous illness, and say that he is about to resume his lecture tour.

—Houghton, Mifflin & Co. will publish next fall a new edition in sixteen volumes of the works of Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, with notes and bibliographical introductions and portraits.

—It is proposed to restore the stone that marks the grave of Dr. Samuel Johnson in Westminster Abbey. The surface of the present stone is so decayed that the inscription is half obliterated.

—It is somewhat remarkable, says the "Bookman," that Mrs. Oliphant invented the name "Thrums" and used it in one of her early novels. Mr. Barrie reinvented it in total ignorance of his predecessor's book. His first choice of a fictitious name for Kirriemuir was "Whins."

—Sir E. Maunde Thompson has prepared some interesting statistics of the library of the British Museum. The number of volumes which it contains is, he says, 1,750,000, not counting single sheets or parts of works that are accumulating. The shelving of the library exceeds thirty-nine miles in length.

—The splendid Semitic library of the late Professor Christian Dillman, of the University of Berlin, which was given to Johns Hopkins University, will soon be put in place in a special room in the University library provided for it.

—The London "Athenæum" tells us that the late Mr. Murray had for many years collected materials for a complete edition of Byron's works in prose and verse. Mr. Murray had in his possession a considerable number of letters to various persons, including those to his father, some of which were not shown to Moore, as well as many documents and papers of interest. He had also acquired Lord Byron's own continuation of "Don Juan" and several other unpublished poems and fragments. With the aid of these materials it is hoped that a final edition of Byron's works may be given to the world at no very distant date.

—A dispatch from Athens to the London "Times" tells of the recent unveiling by the King of Greece of the statue to Byron executed by the French sculptors Chapu and Falguière at the expense of the late M. Demetrius Skylitsis, of London. The Minister of the Interior accepted the statue on behalf of the Government, and uttered an enthusiastic eulogy of Byron's talents and the sacrifices which he made for Greece. The statue, which is of Carrara marble, represents Greece crowning Byron with a laurel branch, while a young Greek below stretches his arms in newly found liberty. On the pedestal is the inscription, "Hellas to Byron."

—Among letters of Thomas Carlyle sold at an autograph auction in London lately is one in which he talks wisely of high-priced books. The London "Chronicle" quotes and comments as follows:

> "One title-page," he says, with much sound wisdom, "read well is worth many volumes carelessly run over." The average bibliographer, indeed, does not pretend to read farther than the title-page of the book. Carlyle was not a bibliographer, scarcely perhaps a bibliophile, and his books he regarded rather as necessary tools than as intellectual companions. "My reverence for books," he says, "does not increase with my years," a sweeping assertion which may have been written under the influence of dyspepsia. Although Carlyle reverenced books less and less as he grew older, his "reverence for earnest reflection and meditation . . . does go on increasing," and he ascribes "clearness of vision" as the great source of "honest, manful conduct."

—An exceedingly choice and beautiful example of the art of typography is shown in the specimen pages and circular announcement of "The Altar Book" (containing the order of the Holy Eucharist according to the use of the American Church, with collects, epistles, gospels, etc.). The publisher, Mr. D. P. Updike, has been over two years engaged in the preparation, and the result is not only sumptuous but fit and consistent in purpose and effect. The type was specially designed and has been set at the Merrymount Press of Boston, while the presswork is done by DeVinne, of New York. The full-page illustrations are by Mr. Robert A. Bell; Mr. B. G. Goodhue furnishes elaborate borders and initials. The music in the book was arranged by Sir John Stainer, who has edited Merbecke's adaptation of the ancient English plain-song; an interesting sentence quoted from an address by Sir John Stainer recalls the fact that the plain-song as sung in St. Paul's to-day is note for note the music that was heard in Salisbury Cathedral eight hundred years ago. The edition of the Altar Book is limited to three hundred and fifty copies, to be sold at $75 each.

[For list of Books Received see Table of Contents]

[PUBLISHER'S DEPARTMENT]

THE SILVER QUESTION

A trifle trite, does the reader think, and prepare to turn the leaf? Wait a moment. We are not going to talk about "free coinage," "16 to 1," or "Coin's School." Almost every one who has any opinion on that phase of the silver question knows all about it, and is not looking for new light. But perhaps we can supply the reader of inquiring mind with some new information on another aspect of the silver question. We propose to give some facts about the use of this precious metal in the arts, past and present, the means of judging as to the fineness of silver in England and America, etc., etc., and shall try to make this worth any one's reading and remembering.

"The white metal" has been a favorite with the artist metal-workers and jewelers of all ages. The skilled artificers of Phœnicia and Palestine, equally with those of India and Assyria, were called upon for "vessels of silver" for the use of the wealthy, and particularly for ecclesiastical purposes. In the Old Testament we read of the "offerings of the princes" at the dedication of the tabernacle by Moses (see Numbers vii., 19), when "Nethaneel the son of Zuar, prince of Issachar, did offer one silver charger, the weight whereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering;" of Joseph commanding his steward to "put my cup, my silver cup, in the sack's mouth," and how, when the cup was found in the sack of Benjamin, the brethren "rent their clothes," well knowing the value of such an article when belonging to a great personage. In more modern times, the costliest church ever erected in Christendom, the "Sancta Sophia" of Constantinople, built in 532–8 by Justinian, at an estimated cost of sixty-four millions of dollars, was distinguished for the splendor of its silver decorations. Not only were there priceless vessels and candelabra of solid silver, but the "canopy over the altar was vaulted with sheets of" that metal, and "rested on four silver columns." The splendor of silver work in later times is sufficiently set forth in the following condensed passage from Chaffers, descriptive of some of the silverware of Louis XIV.:

"On each side of the royal buffet was elevated on a portico, 10 feet high, a grand silver guéridon bearing a silver girandole, which lighted the buffet, accompanied by numerous large silver vases; on the table and steps of this buffet, which reached the altitude of not less than 25 feet, were shown, beautifully arranged, twenty-four massive bowls of marvelous workmanship; these were separated by as many large vases, cassolettes, and girandoles of equal beauty. On the table of the buffet were the gold Nef and the silver gilt vessels for the King's use; these shone forth from among twenty-four large silver jardinières full of flowers; in front of the table was a grand silver cistern shaped like a shell; at the two extremities were four guéridons, six feet high, surmounted by silver girandoles. . . . All this chased and modeled silver work was of the estimated weight of more than 100,000 marcs of metal (800,000 ounces)."

Silver has thus been a favorite material for art workers, from Demetrius to Cellini, not only because of its beauty, its value, and its susceptibility of high finish, but because of its ductility, rendering it easy to cast and shape, and its durability when properly treated. In order to give it strength and hardness, it is necessary, however, to mix it with some one of the so-called baser metals, both in its use as coin and for decorative and practical purposes. "Debasing the coinage" was for many centuries a favorite device of unscrupulous rulers; by mixing the precious metal with an undue quantity of cheaper alloy they were enabled to issue larger quantities of coin and thus "scale their debts." In our own times this action on the part of Governments is almost unknown; and "debasing the coinage" by private individuals is called by the disagreeable term "counterfeiting," and is severely punished when detected. In the province of manufacture, also, there has always existed, among dishonest workers, this practice of deceiving the public by decreasing the quantity of silver and increasing that of the baser metal used for alloy. From time to time great abuses have crept into the business in this respect. The evil is an old one. We read that in the seventeenth century in England "divers small wares, both of gold and silver, are frequently wrought and put to sale by divers goldsmiths and others, worse than standard, to the great abuse of his Majesty's good subjects, and great discredit of that manufacture, and reproach in foreign parts to the English goldsmiths."

In England, however, there has been devised and perfected an effectual guarantee that the silversmith's product shall be of a certain grade of fineness. This is known as the system of hall-marks (from the Hall of the Goldsmiths' Company or guild). All silverware is tested and then stamped by guild assayers with certain characters which are everywhere recognized as a guarantee of quality. The London Goldsmiths' Company, for instance, have adopted a method, which has been in vogue for centuries, of stamping silver so that not only can the fineness be known, but the date of manufacture as well. Its hall-mark consists of a leopard's head (denoting the assay), a lion passant (denoting the standard), a letter (showing the date), the maker's mark, and the head of the sovereign (indicating payment of duty). Every twentieth year is signalized by a new alphabetical cycle. Thus all silverware made in the year of Queen Victoria's coronation is stamped with the letter A, in the style known as black letter. In the next year, 1838, a B is used. This continues till twenty letters of the alphabet (omitting J) have been used, when a new series, with a different style of letter, begins. The unusually long reign of Victoria is now bringing the third alphabetical cycle to a close with the use of the heavy Roman letter U, and next year may see the unprecedented introduction of a fourth cycle of date-letters for a single reign. Similar systems of hall-marks are also in vogue in the cities of Great Britain and on the Continent.

By the various systems of hall-marks, therefore, English buyers are rendered absolutely secure, in their purchase of silverware, that they are getting sterling silver, sterling silver consisting of 925 parts of pure silver to 75 of alloy—generally copper. There is therefore no "silver question," in this sense, in the land which gives us the word sterling. How about the question in America?

In America there is probably a larger use of and demand for articles of silver than in any other country of the world. Silverware is no longer restricted to the use of the very wealthy. In ancient and mediæval times the use of silverware was thus restricted, either by reason of the great cost of the metal or by sumptuary laws which were designed to prevent the withdrawal of silver from its use for coinage. But in this age and land of the democracy of wealth and luxury, the families are few which do not possess some articles at least of table silverware. The humble housewife's heart is gladdened, as she goes about her daily duties, by the sight of the shining spoon or fork or sugar-bowl marked "sterling," and this she fondly believes to be equivalent to a "hall-mark." Alas for the trustful housewife! The recent developments in regard to the sale of silver in some of the dry-goods stores in New York have served to throw suspicion on most of the articles thus labeled.

The majority of the reputable manufacturers of silverware in the United States have refused to use the dry-goods stores as a medium for introducing their goods to the public, recognizing the fact that silverware, which is peculiarly an art product, ought not to be subjected to the demoralizing methods and representations of the "bargain counter." The fact, however, that silverware has been procured by these houses and advertised at prices less than those current in the market for the bullion alone of which they were supposed to be composed, led to an investigation, not long since, on the part of leading jewelers and silversmiths. The investigation was initiated by the Connecticut Jewelers' Association, and resulted in an astonishing discovery. Out of thirty-two articles purchased at random in New York dry-goods stores, and purporting to be of "sterling" or "coin" silver ("coin" silver is 900–1,000 fine), only one was genuine, actually what was represented, as proved at the United States Assay Office. The others were "brummagem"—mere shells, in most instances, of silver, the only "solid" metal being the base of solder or pewter.

This deplorable condition of things in the silverware trade has come about in direct contravention of law. While there is no general statute in the United States for the protection of purchasers of silverware, there is such a law on the statute-books of the State of New York, which is in part as follows:

"Section I. A person who makes or sells, or offers to sell or dispose of, or has in his possession with intent to sell or dispose of, any article of merchandise marked, stamped, or branded with the words "sterling" or "sterling silver," or incased or inclosed in any box, package cover or wrapper, or other thing in or by which the said article is packed, inclosed, or otherwise prepared for sale or disposition, having thereupon any engraving or printed label, stamp, imprint, mark, or trade-mark, indicating or denoting by such marking, stamping, branding, engraving, or printing that such article is silver, sterling silver, or solid silver, unless $\frac{925}{1000}$ of the component parts of the metal of which the said article is manufactured is pure silver, is guilty of a misdemeanor."

Notwithstanding this statute, the market has been full of these fraudulent "sterling" goods. The sellers of "dry-goods" silver, as it is termed, when brought to book, blamed the manufacturers for the deception; the manufacturers asserted that they made the goods to order, and stamped them "sterling" to order; and so the merry war of crimination and recrimination, charge and counter-charge, goes on; the only certain result so far being that the purchaser of "dry-goods silver" has paid an excessive price for a comparatively valueless article.

What now is the moral? It seems sufficiently obvious. In a sentence, it is: Put your money into silver that has a "hall-mark" on it—in other words, an indubitable guarantee of genuineness. Is there any firm of silversmiths in America whose guarantee is the equivalent of an English "hall-mark"? There is such a firm. It is the Gorham Mfg. Co., and this is its "hall-mark": Any reputable smelter will inform the person who needs further assurance on this point that a piece of silver which bears the device of the Lion, the Anchor, and the letter 𝕲 is of genuine sterling quality, $\frac{925}{1000}$ fine, and that its bullion value is in strict accordance with its net weight and the current price of silver bullion.

How has the stamp of the Gorham Manufacturing Company obtained this reputation as a "hall-mark"? By reason of the Company's long and honorable record, from the small beginnings of a little workroom over sixty years ago to the present great business, probably the largest of its kind in the world. Starting in a most modest way in a little town in Rhode Island, in the year 1831, the Gorham Manufacturing Company has steadily built up its business and its reputation until now its workrooms occupy a floor-space of over six acres, and it is known, and honorably known, throughout the world. In no one particular in the work of its great establishment is more care exercised than in the methodical maintenance of its "sterling" standard. Competent assayers are employed in every process and department to test the metal that goes into the hundreds of thousands of useful and elegant articles that every year go forth from the Gorham establishment. Large capital and intelligent organization have combined to insure the maintenance of an unvarying standard in the quality of its "sterling" goods.

As to the art quality of Gorham work, it is sufficiently known to connoisseurs. To others it will be advisable to call attention to the fact that many of the first designers and executants known to the profession are included in the Gorham Manufacturing Company's staff. The Company's interest in stimulating the artistic activity of its corps of workers is shown in the rare and costly library and museum which are provided for their study and inspiration. And the fertility of its designers is shown, not only in the multiplicity of designs which come pouring forth from its establishment—embracing an endless variety of articles for household, personal, ecclesiastical, and decorative use, from a butterfly pin to a statue of Columbus—but in the steadily growing popularity of Gorham work among the people of the most cultivated taste. But the best way of informing one's self, after all, of the artistic quality of Gorham ware is to see it. And this, fortunately, one can do by calling on almost any reputable jeweler or silversmith throughout the country, as well as at the principal salesroom in New York.

Who does not admire and covet beautiful silverware? It forms at once the most prized, the handsomest, and the most permanent of articles of luxury combined with utility. As to the durability of silver that has been skillfully wrought and properly cared for, take the following striking instance from Mons. Burty's work on the Industrial Arts:

"We have seen on the neck and arms of a young girl who had been educated in India silver necklaces and bracelets that were actually as fine and supple as a thread of silk; yet not a single one of these threads, in themselves so fine as hardly to be discernible to the naked eye, had given way in the twenty years that she had had them in her possession."

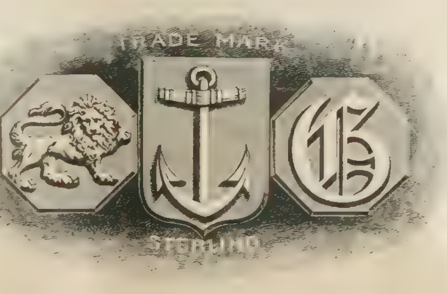
It is true that we do not now, as in the times of Byzantine glory described by Gibbon—when "every wealthy man possessed a semicircular table of massive silver, such as two men could scarcely lift"—use silver merely as a means of locking up wealth or of gratifying vanity by pompous show; nevertheless the "family heirlooms" that are most prized are the articles of silver that have been in daily use for generations. But even if one is content to leave future generations to care for themselves, one needs these beautiful art-objects about him for his own satisfaction and delight. And no small part of the satisfaction comes from the consideration that there is no doubt as to the character of his possession.

The "silver question," then, resolves itself into this, it being presumed that the purchase of silverware is contemplated:

(1) Where can absolutely reliable sterling silverware, of the highest artistic character, be bought, and (2) how can it be known as such?

The answer:

(1) At Broadway and 19th St., New York, or of first-class jewelers throughout the country, upon request that Gorham Sterling Silverware be shown. (2) By the presence of the following stamp:



Reed & Barton
Silversmiths
Trade Mark
Sterling
Salesrooms
37 Union Square and
13 Maiden Lane N.Y.
34 Washington St. Chicago
Factory and Offices
Taunton Mass
Our goods are for sale by all the leading Jewelers

Notes and Queries

1. If you have read "Ideal Suggestion through Mental Photography," by Henry Wood, of Boston, what do you think of views therein expressed? 2. What books besides "Science and Health," by Mrs. Eddy, are considered authorities on Christian Science? 3. What is known as the "Western School of Christian Science"?
SUBSCRIBER.

1. We have not read it; but general knowledge of Mr. Wood's position enables us to say that it is based upon a valid principle. To what extent his deductions are valid is now the subject of discussion. 2. We are reliably informed that there is no book of equal authority among Christian Scientists with Mrs. Eddy's work. It is read in their churches side by side with the Bible. Other works, well esteemed by persons who are mistakenly classed with Christian Scientists, are: "The Way, the Truth, and the Life," by Dr. Dewey; "The Mental Cure," by Dr. Evans; "Practical Metaphysics," by Mrs. Barnet, a book for beginners; "What Shall Make Us Whole?" by Mrs. Merriam; "The Gospel of Healing," by Dr. Simpson. 3. We are not able to say. There are several societies of some prominence in different parts of the West, but they are described to us as "much broader" than what is strictly called Christian Science.

1. What is the best comprehensive discussion of the single and double monetary standard—a book for a candid, intelligent inquirer? 2. Also, will you give me some information concerning the Brotherhood of Andrew and Stephen?
S. G.

1. The best comprehensive discussion of the single and double standard to which we can refer you is the report of the Brussels Conference. You can probably secure a copy on application to your Congressman. Professor F. W. Taussig's "Silver Situation in the United States," published by the Putnams, presents the monometallist's side of the question, and Mr. Charles A. Towne's recent speech in Congress presents compactly the free-coinage side of the question. Mr. Towne's speech can doubtless be had on application. 2. The headquarters of the Brotherhood of Andrew and Stephen is in the Church House, corner of Fourth Avenue and Twenty-second Street, this city. At least that is where the "St. Andrew's Cross" is published.

1. Please give me reliable and recent books of reference concerning the folk-lore of the Bible. 2. Is Fredenburgh's method of seeing in most of the Old Testament stories of the J and E writers a sun myth approved of by scholars? 3. Please name any works treating of prophecy of the Old Testament, also any work treating the Old Testament simply as a literary product. 4. Could you suggest any broad line of treatment or underlying unification for a paper in which folk-lore, prophecy, and the Talmud had to be taken up together?
M. O.

1. We refer this to any specialist in that line among our readers. 2. The sun-myth hypothesis is discredited. 3. Moulton's "Literary Study of the Bible" (D. C. Heath & Co., Boston), and "The Bible as Literature" (in press by T. Y. Crowell & Co., New York). 4. We cannot.

I am very much in need of a book of organ voluntaries from composers like Beethoven, Rossini, Mendelssohn, Weber, Handel, and others. Please tell me of a book full of short selections, also its price, and where it may be purchased.
E. B. G.

For cabinet or church organ, Shelley's "Gems for the Organ," $2, retail; for church organ only, Shelley's "The Modern Organist," $2.50, retail; more difficult, "A Collection of Organ Arrangements," H. W. Parker, $2; "The Junior Church Organist," Charles H. Morse. These books may be ordered direct from the John Church Company, Cincinnati, O., or from G. Schirmer, 35 Union Square, New York City.

Kindly inform me: (1) Whether there are apocryphal books of the New as well as of the Old Testament, and where they can be obtained. (2) What is the best history of the Council of Nice?
W. L. W.

1. A translation of Tischendorf's edition of the New Testament Apocrypha, reprinted from Clark's (Edinburgh) Ante-Nicene Library, and edited by Professor Riddle, is published by the Christian Literature Company, New York. 2. What you will find in Stanley's "History of the Eastern Church" is as good as any.

Please tell me if the terms King of Israel and Judah are used interchangeably, or rather if Israel is ever used (after the division of the kingdom) as applying to either kingdom. Otherwise I cannot understand why, in 2 Chron. xxviii., 19, Ahaz is called King of Israel, and again, in 2 Chron. xxi., 2, Jehoshaphat is mentioned as King of Israel?
M. E. J.

The distinction between Israel and Judah is made even before the permanent division of the kingdoms. See 2 Sam. ii., 9, 10. The terms you quote are, as a rule, not used interchangeably, but the texts you refer to show that this rule, like others, has its exceptions.

H. E. B.—The title of the poem by Dr. J. Addison Alexander is "The Doomed Man." The sixth verse of this awful hymn was suppressed by the author, as an old friend who originally inserted it in the "Sunday-School Journal" of April 5, 1837, thought it was "too horrible;" it runs thus:

"But angels know the fatal sign,
And tremble at the sight;
And devils trace each livid line
With desperate delight."

C. K. J.

The title of the poem asked for by "H. E. B.," in The Outlook of March 14, is "The Spirit Quenched," by the Rev. James Alexander. The verse quoted is the first of ten verses.
M. D. E.

R. G.—The lines asked for in The Outlook of March 14,

"Sing to my soul the sweet song that thou livest, Read me the poem that never was penned," etc.,

are part of a poem by Mary H. C. Booth, beginning:

"There are poems unwritten and songs unsung Sweeter than any that ever were heard."

It may be found in the book called "Sunshine in Life: Poems for King's Daughters," published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.
E. G. T.

Can any one supply the two words missing from the following verse which appeared in one of the monthlies of some three or four summers ago:

"He smote his brother, and slew him;
He scorned his wife, and she died;
And then — — threw him
Over the sea-cliff's side."

I would like also to know the author's name.
F. F.

J. S. B.—In the "Kindergarten News" of February, 1896, published by Milton Bradley, Springfield, Mass. (single copy of magazine 5 cents), "J. S. B." will find on page 54 a poem, "Kind Acts," by Cyrus J. Cole, which may be what she desires, though the lines are slightly different from her verse.
V. E. G.

Can some one give name of Building Association organized on the plan of life insurance, making the value of property purchased the policy of insurance, so that at death or on making a certain number of payments, the purchaser or policy-holder shall become entitled to a deed?
F. H.

The author of quotation asked for by "H. C. P." is James Jeffrey Roche, and it is from a poem printed in "Scribner's" some years ago. The title is "Sir Hugo's Choice." I can furnish your correspondent with a copy if desired.
J. E. S.

Margaret Sangster is the author of "The Sin of Omission," in regard to which "J. S. B." inquires. My copy of the poem, which is clipped from a newspaper, is entitled "Left Undone."
L. P. Y.

Correspondence

"Ought All to be Paid Alike?"

To the Editors of The Outlook:

"M. B.," in your March 7 number, is easily answered, on the foundation of natural—therefore inevitable—law. Things are of value, that is priceable, in proportion to their rarity. Muscle-pay must always be inferior to brain-pay, because brawn is more plentiful than brain. There is no help for it. Custom did not make it so, nor could Socialism or any other ism unmake it. "M. B." himself shapes himself by it, as he will see if he narrowly scrutinize his estimates and practices.

WM. CURTIS TAYLOR.

Canon Gore and George Romanes

To the Editors of The Outlook:

Those of your readers who have known George Romanes, the English biologist, through his books will be interested in the accompanying letters from Canon Gore, of Westminster Abbey. It may not be generally known that early in life Romanes published a book in which he stated that, as the result of scientific study, he was constrained by loyalty to truth, although it cost him keen suffering to do so, to affirm his belief that all the phenomena of nature could be adequately accounted for without assuming the existence of a personal God. Towards the close of his life his views were completely changed, and he was preparing for publication a treatise in which he appears as a sincere supporter of Christianity, when he sickened and died. The notes for this work which he left were carefully edited by Canon Gore and published in 1895, together with extracts from his earlier writings, under the title of "Thoughts on Religion."[1] The volume is extremely valuable as a contribution to Christian apologetics. But its influence for good has been qualified by the statement made in high scientific circles in this country that none of Romanes's later works were worthy of confidence because during his later years he suffered from softening of the brain. I wrote to Canon Gore inquiring concerning this statement, and I have received the following letter in reply:

4 Little Cloisters, Westminster, S. W.
March 7, 1896.

My Dear Sir:

The report you refer to is a malignant slander. The best refutation of it is to be found in the statement made by Dr. Burdon Saunderson, who is an acknowledged authority of the first class on biological subjects, made before the British Association the year before last, shortly after George Romanes's death, that he had retained his intellectual energies up to the last unimpaired. This is fully and absolutely true. I will see to Dr. Burdon Saunderson's statement being published.

Yours sincerely,
CHARLES GORE.

Canon Gore also writes in a letter just received:

I send you the following passage from an obituary notice of George Romanes by Dr. Burdon Saunderson which appears in the "Proceedings of the Royal Society," Vol. LVII., page 8: "Up to the end he preserved not only his mental vigor, but the keenest interest in his scientific pursuits." No one could possibly speak with greater impartiality or more scientific authority than he. I should be very grateful if you would give it circulation on your side of the Atlantic.

Yours truly, GEORGE S. PAYSON.
New York.

Immigrants and Immigrants

To the Editors of The Outlook:

In an article on "Crime in the United States" printed in The Outlook lately there are some conclusions which seem to me not sufficiently well considered. The fact commonly enough stated by penologists, that our foreign population furnishes a proportion of crime largely in excess of their numbers, ought to be more carefully analyzed. The facts will be found, I think, to be differentiated by race, by occupation, and by environment. It is a loose form of statement to say that our people of foreign birth are predisposed to crime when among the various elements of that population a very wide difference may be noted. The term foreign is too general, and there must be a study of the Irish, German, Italian, and Scandinavian to procure valuable results. Again, it will be found that the bulk of crime in this country is among urban populations. Now, while it is true that our great cities are largely made up of foreigners, is the crime due to the foreign parentage or to the urban life? A marked difference between city and rural population in this particular must be noted. Then how much crime is individual and how much is social must be weighed in connection with the notorious misgovernment of our cities. Municipal misrule is conspicuously and unfortunately American. What is the relation of the gambling-house, the saloon, the brothel, and political corruption to criminal statistics?

The same scrutiny is obviously necessary with reference to the statistics of pauperism. The paupers of the country are largely foreign-born, but they are largely found in cities, and if the paupers are foreign-born, it will be found that the people who pay the taxes for their support are largely foreign-born also.

Again, it must be noted that we need an instrument a little more delicate than any statistical inquiry yet instituted to judge with entire accuracy the facts with reference to the prevalence of crime. Unfortunately, we are compelled to build upon the number of persons convicted of crime rather than the number of persons who commit crime. Other things being equal, the more rigid the administration of law, the worse the statistics. As a very pointed example of the value of these suggestions, it may be said that while the blacks of the South undoubtedly commit more than their proportion of crime, no intelligent person believes the convictions secured in Southern States indicate the real relation between the white and the black races with respect to crime. A careful scrutiny of police administration is evidently necessary in comparing the criminal statistics of various cities and communities. Yours truly,

SAMUEL G. SMITH,
Lecturer on Sociology, University of Minnesota.

We concur with most of these criticisms, but would recall the fact that our contributor could present only the main outlines of the subject within the space-limits assigned him. We dissent, however, from our correspondent's declaration that "municipal misrule is conspicuously and unfortunately American." It would be nearer the truth to say that municipal misrule varies directly with the proportion of immigrant citizens. The rule is that wherever a majority of the population is of native white parentage "the gambling-house, the saloon, and the brothel" are suppressed in a way not even attempted on the Continent of Europe.—THE EDITORS.

A Critic Criticised

To the Editors of The Outlook:

The reviewer of Dr. Tiffany's "History of the Episcopal Church" has been less careful in his statement of a fact than the historian reviewed. The reviewer states: "The effort made by Dr. Coke in behalf of the Methodists, and also the advances made by the Lutherans to receive Holy Orders from the bishops of the Episcopal Church, are mentioned." I am quite sure that the reader of the above sentence would be led to believe that the prime motive of certain Lutherans in making their overture was the securing of Episcopal ordination. On the other hand, no reader of Dr. Tiffany's reference would be led to such a conclusion. The careful author of the history thus states it: "There was a movement of the Lutherans in the State of New York to join the Episcopal Church in 1797; but the convention to which the proposition was referred was unfortunately delayed by prevalence of the yellow fever, and would not meet until 1801. After Bishop Moore was consecrated, Zion Church, the first English Lutheran Church in New York City, became (rector, officers, and congregation) Episcopal, having previously sent out an offshoot in St. Stephen's Church to the same communion. Such movements were, however, due more to the attractiveness of the Church, as possessed of an English liturgy, than to the solicitation or interest of the members of the Episcopal communion." There was no hankering on the part of these churches after "Holy Orders," but an out-and-out joining of the Episcopal Church by reason of its attractive English liturgy. The two communions were on the most friendly terms. The Ministerium of New York resolved to "never acknowledge a newly erected Lutheran church in places where members may partake of the services of the said English Episcopal Church." Negotiations were actually in progress for a union of the two Churches, with a perfect willingness to receive ordination from the hands of an English Bishop. But this was due more to the prevalent rationalism in many churches, and to an unwillingness to build up English-speaking Lutheran churches, than to any desire for "Holy Orders." Dr. Jacobs, in the same series of Church Histories, makes this whole matter quite clear. The truth of the matter is that, in the search for "Holy Orders," the Episcopal Church in America made overtures to the Danish Government for this much-disputed distinction. (See Penna. Archives, 1783-1786, Vol. X., p. 433.) If the Lutheran Church in America shall ever feel the necessity for such ordination, she will look to the Swedish "succession" rather than to the Anglican. Good Bishop White, referring to certain Americans in England seeking ordination, who were doubtful of securing it until they learned of John Adams that it could be had from "the Danish Church, by signing the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England with the exception of the political parts of them," adds: "This conduct is here all the more cheerfully mentioned to the honor of the Danish Church, as it is reasonable to presume that there would have been an equal readiness to the consecration of bishops had necessity required recourse to any other source than English Episcopacy, under which the American churches had been planted."

EDWIN HEYL DELK.
Hagerstown, Md.

The Purest and the Strongest

Highest of all in leavening strength.
Latest U. S. Government Food Report.

You Can't Do Without Soap! Why Not Get The Best?

Sunlight Soap

Has no equal—
For purity................
For cleansing power..
For taking out dirt...
For dissolving grease.
For saving clothes.....
For preserving hands.

These are some of the reasons why "SUNLIGHT" Soap has the largest sale in the world, and has been awarded TWENTY-SEVEN GOLD MEDALS and other honors.

Lever Bros., Ltd., Hudson & Harrison Sts., New York.

SUNLIGHT SOAP.

---

[1] Open Court Publishing Company, Chicago.

[PUBLISHER'S DEPARTMENT]

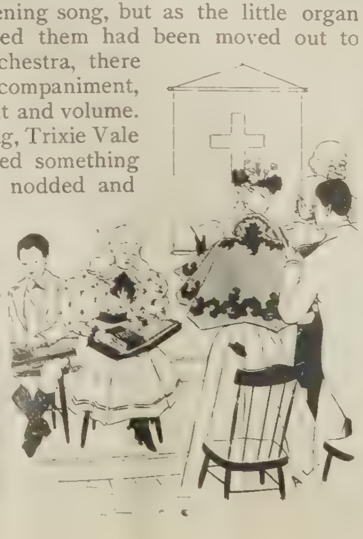
Easter at " Crossby's Corners "

The Sunday-school at " Crossby's Corners " had experienced a great many ups and downs in its long but attenuated existence; a comparison, however, would have shown a most decided majority on the downs side. But, after many struggles and discouragements, within the last few months signs of improvement began to appear, and things seemed to brighten up with the " Salem School," as it was sometimes called, and the red-letter day of its existence came when the record showed a total attendance—teachers, scholars, and visitors—of fifty-three. When the school reached this unprecedented stage of prosperity it was decided that there must be some kind of demonstration made to celebrate its flourishing condition; so it was determined to have a grand Easter celebration. It was to consist of recitations by the scholars, addresses by the teachers and friends of the school, and, above all, music—music was to make itself heard and felt all through the day; for if there was one thing that the " Salem School " did pride itself upon, it was its singing; so music was to occupy a very prominent place on the programme for this particular Easter Sunday. And, to make it still more prominent, an orchestra of five pieces—two violins, a violoncello, a double bass, and a cornet—had been engaged to come from the city to accompany all the singing and add to its tone and volume.

Among the active and interested members of the school were Trixie Vale and her brother Ned. Both were very much interested, especially in the music, for both had a decided fondness for it.

Easter would come unusually early that year, before the last of March, and some of the members of the school felt a little despondent when it began to snow very hard about five o'clock in the afternoon of Saturday, the day before Easter; all night long the snow fell and the March wind blew, but Sunday morning it cleared off beautifully, and while the temperature was pretty low, still the sleighing was good, and long before ten o'clock the sleigh-bells began to jingle toward Crossby's Corners. At ten o'clock the superintendent began to have a slightly troubled look on his face, and glanced very often through the window in the direction of the railroad station where the train from the city was expected to deposit the members of the much-talked-of orchestra in time for them to reach the school-house before ten o'clock. Ten-fifteen came, but the orchestra did not, and things began to look serious. Just then a man drove up in a sleigh from the direction of the station; he came in, made his way to the superintendent and said a few words to him; the latter turned with a dejected countenance to the roomful of people and told them that not one train had been able to get through the snowdrifts that morning, and the eagerly-hoped-for orchestra could not possibly get there. Of course everybody was disappointed, and some feared the Salem School might lose its reputation as a musical success; they tried the opening song, but as the little organ that usually accompanied them had been moved out to make room for the orchestra, there was no instrumental accompaniment, and the song lacked spirit and volume.

While it was being sung, Trixie Vale went over and whispered something to her brother Ned: he nodded and smiled, pulled on his overcoat and went out, and the jingle of his sleigh-bells was soon heard as he drove off toward home. While Ned was gone, the superintendent made a short address in which he urged them all not to feel too much disappointment on account of the failure of the music, but to remember that the biggest and finest Sunday-school in the world could not regulate the weather. Just as he finished, Ned Vale's sleigh-bells were heard coming back, and in a minute he walked into the room with two flat, queer-shaped boxes under his arm. Trixie met him, took one of the boxes, and together they walked up to the platform, opened the boxes, and took out two beautiful Autoharps. All the people were intensely interested in watching Trixie and Ned; many of them had never seen an Autoharp before, but some had and smiled at each other in happy anticipation of what they knew would follow.



The next song was announced, and Trixie and Ned, in perfect unison, struck full, strong chords that brought every one to his feet and inspired every singing soul in the crowded room with a new musical fire. The song sounded as it never had before, and above all the voices could be heard the clear notes of the Autoharps leading and controlling all. Never had the Salem School sung as it did that day, and the last hymn seemed to express the sentiment of all present—

O for a thousand tongues to sing
My great Redeemer's praise!

THE NATION'S FAVORITE MUSICAL INSTRUMENT

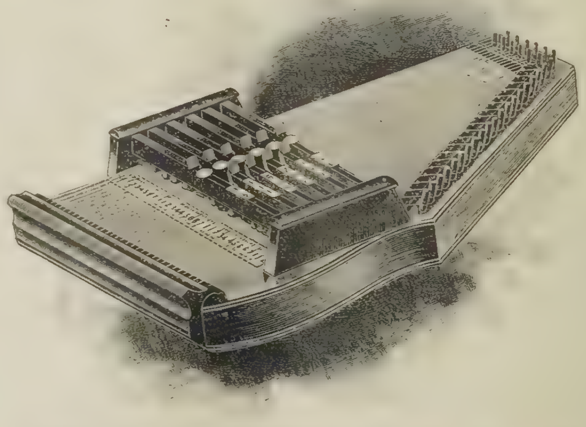
The Autoharp

is a musical instrument which, artistically speaking, is musical in its entire range of style, from the $5 instrument to that costing $150.

Style No. 4
$15

Autoharp, Style No. 4, produces eleven chords and gives a considerable range of music. Price, $15.

Style No. 6
$25



Autoharp, Style No. 6, is capable of sixteen chords and permits of a wide range of the best music to be executed upon it. Price, $25.

ALL MUSIC DEALERS sell the styles of Autoharps here advertised, or we will send them anywhere in the United States, express prepaid, on receipt of price. Full satisfaction guaranteed. Have you read our handsomely illustrated story, " How the Autoharp Captured the Family "? Yours for the asking.

ALFRED DOLGE & SON
Dept. P, Dolge Bldg., 110 E. 13th St., New York
Studio and Salesroom, 28 E. 23d Street

What Rudyard Kipling Thinks of the Pocket Kodak

"I can only say that I am amazed at the excellence of the little Kodak's work."

Rudyard Kipling

Booklet free, tells all about it.

Pocket Kodak loaded for 12 pictures, 1½ x 2 in. $5.00.

EASTMAN KODAK CO.
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

An

American Express Co. "Travelers Cheque"

is practically a certified cheque made payable to one's order, for a fixed amount named on its face, in the currency of the country, at 20,000 places throughout the world, by an extensive list of Bankers and Hotels.

More available, economical, and secure than Letters of Credit, Circular Notes, or other forms of Travelers' credit.

Cheques, rates, and further information may be obtained at any Agency of

THE AMERICAN EXPRESS CO.

or at the principal offices of the Company,

65 Broadway, NEW YORK
78 Monroe St., CHICAGO
45 Franklin St., BOSTON

"A thousand wheels, but only one shoe."

"BALL=BEARING" Shoes

An Innovation in Footwear. PRICE: Black, $3.00; Tan, $3.50.

Insist on getting "Ball-Bearing" Shoes. If your dealer hasn't them, we will send you a pair, prepaid, on receipt of price. Handsome Booklet of 117 Styles, FREE.

C. H. FARGO & CO., Makers, Chicago.

Chosen by the Government

The War Department proposes to test the bicycle thoroughly for army use, and recently advertised for proposals for furnishing five bicycles for the purpose. Result: Bids from $50 to $85 each for other machines: our bid of $100 each for Columbias, their invariable price. And the Government selected

Columbia

Standard of the World Bicycles

The experts who made the choice decided that Columbias were worth every dollar of the $100 asked for them. If YOU are willing to pay $100 for a bicycle, why be content with anything but a Columbia?

Handsome Art Catalogue of Columbia and Hartford Bicycles free from any Columbia agent; by mail for two 2-cent stamps.

Pope Manufacturing Co., Hartford, Conn.

Branch Houses and Agencies in almost every city and town. If Columbias are not properly represented in your vicinity, write.

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS' NEW BOOKS

MRS. BURNETT'S NEW NOVEL. JUST PUBLISHED.

A LADY OF QUALITY. Being a Most Curious, hitherto Unknown History, related by Mr. Isaac Bickerstaff, but not presented to the World of Fashion through the pages of The Tatler, and now for the first time written down by FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT. 12mo, $1.50.

"It is a book that will be talked about all the year. It will be read by everybody who reads fiction of the higher class, and probably by many others. In short, it will be a 'book of the year.' Clorinda Wildairs is one of the most piquant, irresistible, and audacious characters in modern fiction. Neither Hardy nor Meredith has imagined a more remarkable woman. She is always splendidly human."—N. Y. Times.

COMEDIES OF COURTSHIP. By ANTHONY HOPE. 12mo, uniform with Robert Grant's "The Bachelor's Christmas." $1.50.

"They have the same elements of lightness and delicacy which are so characteristic of Mr. Hope's work, while as regards dialogue there are certain qualities that would indicate the author of the 'Dolly Dialogues' even were the name of Anthony Hope not imprinted on the title-page. They are all bright, all clever, and all clean."—Boston Advertiser.

CINDERELLA, AND OTHER STORIES. By RICHARD HARDING DAVIS. 12mo, $1.00.

Mr. Davis's new volume contains five stories, one of which, readers will be pleased to find, is a new Van Bibber story. The volume also includes "Miss Delamar's Understudy," which has aroused such interest, while the other stories are characteristic of the author and in his best vein.

LITTLE RIVERS. By HENRY VAN DYKE. Fourth Edition. Fully Illustrated. 12mo, $2.00.

"What makes his book so dear to its reader? What makes it awaken the best we contain? Its naturalness; its truthfulness; its union of soul and body with nature and her freely offered gifts."—New York Times.

IN PREPARATION: The Walton Edition of "Little Rivers," limited to 150 copies, printed by De Vinne, on hand-made paper, with a photogravure portrait and extra illustrations on Japan paper, and a new preface; each copy signed by the author. $10.00, net.

SUNRISE STORIES. A Glance at the Literature of Japan. By ROGER RIORDAN and TOZO TAKAYANAGI. 12mo, $1.50.

"A volume of rare interest, written by scholars who have long made this literature a study. A charming book from beginning to end. The stories, embodying in some cases translations, in others new versions, are delightful."—Boston Advertiser.

LECTURES ON THE COUNCIL OF TRENT. By JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE. 8vo, $2.00.

These lectures formed the first of three courses delivered by Mr. Froude during his Regius Professorship of Modern History at Oxford, the other two courses, on Erasmus and on the English Seamen of the Sixteenth Century, having been published.

"These lectures are marked by the same fluency of style and delightful English which always appear in this scholar's writings. Nothing, of course, need be said of the historical value of the work. It is from the pen of Froude; that connotes its merit."—Boston Journal.

POEMS AND BALLADS. By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. 12mo, $1.50.

The Poems of Mr. Stevenson are here for the first time presented in one volume. It comprises all the poems contained in "A Child's Garden of Verses," "Ballads," "Underwoods," and in addition over forty pieces of verse written since the publication of those volumes.

A CHILD'S GARDEN OF VERSES. By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. New Edition. Profusely and beautifully illustrated by CHARLES ROBINSON. 12mo, $1.50.

"An edition to be recommended in every way. An artist possessing a graceful fancy and a sure decorative sense has supplied a profusion of illustrations. The letterpress is beautiful."—N. Y. Evening Post.

MADAME ROLAND. By IDA M. TARBELL. With 12 Illustrations. 12mo, $1.50.

Much new material hitherto inaccessible to biographers of Madame Roland has been obtained by Miss Tarbell, whose work in consequence is an historical study of unusual importance. Madame Roland is portrayed for the first time with accuracy and completeness, the book also presentinga vigorous and vivid picture of the Revolutionary era in France. Reproductions of portraits and places illustrate the text amply and appropriately.

THE JEWISH SCRIPTURES. The Books of the Old Testament in the Light of their Origin and History. By AMOS K. FISKE. 12mo, $1.50.

A distinctly popular account of the books of the Old Testament considered as history and literature. The standpoint of the writer is radical and in accord with what has been called the higher criticism. The book summarizes in terse and luminous style the results of the study of Hebrew scholars, and the general reader has in it a thoughtful, complete, and interesting handbook on the subject.

TWO NEW BOOKS BY EUGENE FIELD

The House. An Episode in the lives of Reuben Baker, Astronomer, and of his wife Alice. 12mo, $1.25.

The Love Affairs of a Bibliomaniac. With an introduction by ROSWELL MARTIN FIELD. 12mo, $1.25.

THE IVORY SERIES

Fiction by Popular Authors issued in dainty, uniform style. Each 16mo, 75 cents.

A Master Spirit. By HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD. A strongly poetic musical story.

Irralie's Bushranger. A Story of Australian Adventure. By E. W. HORNUNG.

Ia. A Love Story. By "Q" (ARTHUR T. QUILLER-COUCH).

Amos Judd. A Novel. By J. A. MITCHELL, Editor of Life. Fourth Edition.

The Suicide Club. By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

Madame Delphine. By GEORGE W. CABLE.

NEW NOVELS AND SHORT STORIES

Doctor Congalton's Legacy. A Chronicle of North Country By-ways. By HENRY JOHNSTON. 12mo, $1.25.

The Amazing Marriage. By GEORGE MEREDITH. 2 vols. 12mo, $2.50.

Wandering Heath. Stories, Studies, and Sketches. By "Q." 12mo, $1.25.

A Fool of Nature. By JULIAN HAWTHORNE. The Herald $10,000 Prize Story. 12mo, $1.25.

Your Money or Your Life. By EDITH CARPENTER. A Herald Prize Story. 12mo, $1.25.

The Bachelor's Christmas, and Other Stories. By ROBERT GRANT. Illustrated by C. D. GIBSON, IRVING R. WILES, A. B. WENZELL, and C. CARLETON. 12mo, $1.50.

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, 153-157 Fifth Ave., New York

Important Religious Books

George A. Gordon

The Christ of To-Day. Fourth Edition. 12mo, $1.50.

"He discusses the profoundest truths and mysteries of nature and religion with a breadth and force of grasp, a just discrimination, and also a tender appreciation of actual human needs which few, even among modern leaders of thought, have exhibited in an equal degree. Henceforth he must be conceded a high place among them."—The Congregationalist.

The Witness to Immortality in Literature, Philosophy, and Life. 12mo, gilt top, $1.50.

"The book is a most interesting study of one of the deepest problems of existence."—New York Observer.

George Harris

Moral Evolution. Crown 8vo, $2.00.

"The general result to which Dr. Harris conducts us is the reassuring conviction that in the moral and religious history of the world the tide bears on to the realization of the divine and human ideals in an advance on the lines of Christian ethics and toward the realization of Christian ideals of faith, life, and duty."—The Independent, New York.

John H. Denison

Christ's Idea of the Supernatural. Crown 8vo, $2.00.

"A great book, a contribution of profound and inspiring thought concerning some of the most serious problems pressing upon the mind and heart of man."—Boston Transcript.

Washington Gladden

Ruling Ideas of the Present Age. 16mo, $1.25.

The Lord's Prayer. 16mo, gilt top, $1.00.

Applied Christianity. Moral Aspects of Social Questions. 16mo, gilt top, $1.25

Who Wrote the Bible? A Book for the People. 16mo, $1.25.

Tools and the Man. Property and Industry under the Christian Law. 16mo, $1.25.

"There is no religious writer of the present day who presents more original, stimulating, and refreshing thought than Dr. Gladden. The various books which he has written on theological, sociological, and kindred topics have commanded a wide reading and been productive of much positive good."—Christian Work, New York.

Lucy Larcom

The Unseen Friend. 16mo, gilt top, $1.00.

As It Is in Heaven. Thoughts on the Future Life. 16mo, gilt top, $1.00.

At the Beautiful Gate, and Other Songs of Faith. 16mo, gilt top, $1.00.

Easter Gleams. 16mo, 75 cents.

Breathings of the Better Life. New Edition. 18mo, $1.25; half calf, $2.50.

Beckonings for Every Day. A Calendar of Thought. Arranged by LUCY LARCOM. 16mo, $1.00.

"The religious sentiment of New England never had a more winning and graceful interpreter."—JOHN G. WHITTIER.

Sold by all Booksellers. Sent, postpaid, by

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., Boston

11 EAST 17TH STREET, NEW YORK

SOME TIMELY BOOKS

A NEW BOOK FOR LOVERS OF NATURE, NATURAL HISTORY CLUBS, ETC.

BY TANGLED PATHS

Stray Leaves from Nature's By-ways. By H. MEADE BRIGGS. 12mo, cloth, $1.25. (Just Ready.)

⁂ A charming little year-book of Nature's ever-changing dresses. In the Heart of Surrey—April Showers—Riverside Wanderings—A Woodland Path—A Halcyon Haunt—When Summer Pales, etc., are titles of some of the chapters.

By the Author of "THE MYSTERY OF A HANSOM CAB."

THE CARBUNCLE CLUE—A Mystery

By FERGUS HUME. 12mo, cloth, $1.25.

"It might have been written by Conan Doyle or Guy Boothby, and this is equivalent to saying that the plot is intricate and ingeniously constructed, the clues skillfully followed, and the secret well kept; . . . all who love mystery will find Fergus Hume's last story exactly to their taste."—Publishers' Circular, London.

SPORT IN ASHANTI; or, Melinda the Caboceer

A Tale of the Gold Coast in the Days of King Coffee Kalcalli. By J. A. SKERTCHLY. With four illustrations. 12mo, cloth, $1.50.

⁂ Mr. Skertchly, besides weaving a fascinating story of adventures, has incorporated into it much curious information about the natural history, game, native customs, and annals of Ashanti.

SHORT STORIES OF LANCASHIRE LIFE

LANCASHIRE IDYLLS

By J. MARSHALL MATHER. 12mo, gilt top, $1.50.

⁂ These stories introduce the reader to a comparatively unknown type of character. Narrow and puritanical, there is at the same time a rich vein of humor and poetry running through the peasant and factory life of the County Palatine.

"Perfectly charming, excellently unconventional, and delightfully quaint. Pathos and humor rub shoulders in Mr. Mather's book, as they do in life itself."—Court Journal.

A STORY OF A STRIKE

THE SHUTTLE OF FATE

A powerful story of the Lancashire Cotton Mills. By Miss C. WHITEHEAD. With full-page illustrations by Lancelot Speed. Crown 8vo, cloth, $1.25.

"Both good sense and a capital moral in the story."—N. Y. Times.

IN "THE PUBLIC MEN OF TO-DAY" SERIES

THE RIGHT HON. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN

By S. H. JEYES, Editor of the Series. 12mo, cloth, $1.25.

"So timely is this volume that it contains the Jameson-Transvaal episode."—JEANNETTE L. GILDER, in the N. Y. World.

Previously Issued:

THE GERMAN EMPEROR, WILLIAM II. By CHARLES LOWE. $1.25.

THE AMEER ABDUR RAHMAN. $1.25.

LI HUNG CHANG. $1.25.

M. STAMBULOFF. By A. HULME BEAMAN. $1.25.

⁂ Concise and popular biographies of the men who are making history.

JUST READY—THE FIFTH EDITION. (1896.)

ELECTRICITY UP TO DATE.—For Light, Power, and Traction

By JOHN B. VERITY, M. Inst. E. E. Fully illustrated. 12mo, cloth, $1.00.

⁂ This edition has been revised and enlarged, and treats of the application of Electricity in Medical Therapeutics, and its application to cooking and heating, wiring of houses, traction, etc., with English fire office rules, list of electrical terms, etc., and index.

Of all booksellers, or postpaid, on receipt of price, by

F. WARNE & COMPANY, 3 Cooper Union, New York

LOVE AND DEATH

By LYMAN ABBOTT, D.D.

An Easter Booklet. Paper, 10 cents.

THE GATE OF PARADISE

A Dream of Easter Eve. A New Edition. Square 12mo, white cloth padded, in box, $1.25.

"This little book contains an Easter story Scripturally correct and esthetically beautiful. The whole work is a gem, and the illustrations harmonize with much popular sentiment which loves flowers as symbolical of what is pure and religious on earth"—Churchman.

VESPER SONGS

Containing the Magnificat, Nunc Dimittis, and Deus Misereatur. Printed in brown, red, and gold, with illuminations in colors. White cloth padded, in box, 80 cents.

TE DEUM LAUDAMUS

Illuminated in colors. White cloth padded, in box, 80 cents.

"The demand for such publications is an evidence of the craving after the old liturgical hymns generally felt, and the skill and the taste with which they are invested with floral emblems will doubtless be attractive to many readers."—Churchman.

VIOLETS

Six cards, 6x8 inches, tied together with lavender ribbons, beautifully illustrated with violets. In box, 75 cents.

With many others at 30, 25, 20, and 15 cts. each. Full list sent on application.

THE FARMER AND THE LORD

By GEORGE H. HEPWORTH

Author of "Hiram Golf's Religion," "Herald Sermons," etc. 16mo, 242 pages, cloth, 75 cents.

Sent by mail, postpaid, on receipt of prices.

E. P. DUTTON & CO.

PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS

31 West 23d St., New York

Children are no Problems when Mothers study the Kindergarten Magazine and its Supplement

Child-Garden

These should be first assistants to every mother and teacher is a monthly budget of the freshest, most practical, most attractive kindergarten helps. A Study Course for Mothers in the current volume.

The Kindergarten Magazine

Yearly Subscription, $2.00
Specimen Number, 100 pages, 20 cts.

Child Garden of STORY, SONG, and PLAY

is the delight of the nursery, and Mother's Happy Helper. April number (10 cts.) tells how to keep children's birthdays and interpret the Easter time. Fully illustrated.

Yearly subscription, $1.00

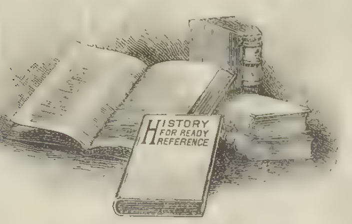
KINDERGARTEN LITERATURE CO.
166 S. Clinton St., CHICAGO

SONGS FOR SPRING TIME

HIGHEST PRAISE, FOR THE SABBATH-SCHOOL.
$30 per 100 copies.
CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR HYMNS, FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.
$30 per 100 copies.

Do not substitute inferior books because of lower price. The best are cheapest!!

THE BIGLOW & MAIN CO.
76 East 9th St., New York. 215 Wabash Ave., Chicago.



History for Ready Reference

and Topical Reading

IN FIVE IMPERIAL VOLUMES

By J. N. LARNED
Ex-Pres. Am. Library Ass'n.

☞ Giving History on All Topics in the Exact Words of the Historians Themselves

This work contains the choicest selections, upon thousands of topics, from those historians whose writings have been accorded the highest place by the common consent of mankind.

It will answer more questions in History, more authoritatively, and with greater excellence of literary expression, than any other book in the world, and that, too, with the greatest economy of time.

It is in itself a Library of History, and it represents, as does no other work in the English language, the Literature of History.

Thus it has the fascination, the interest, and, so to speak, the flavor, as possessed by the writings of the best historians, biographers, and specialists. And "what we may call the historic sense is everywhere evinced in the analysis of subjects, in the choice and arrangement of topics, and in the relative fullness of the treatment of them."

Its character and value are attested by the following from myriads of testimonials:—

"I turn to it first for an answer to any historical question, and have not yet been disappointed in my search."
Pres. DAVID T. HILL, Rochester University.

"I had decided that two encyclopædias and two dictionaries would answer my requirements for works of reference, but this work . . . occupies a field not covered by other works of reference."
Hon. W. P. WHITEHOUSE,
Maine Supreme Judicial Court.

"I bought it at sight, and now, on examination, I think it the best work of the kind in the language."
Hon. JOHN W. ROWELL,
Supreme Court of Vermont.

"There is a wise economy of time, and this is the best example of it in literary matters I have ever seen."
Ex-Judge C. R. GRANT, Akron, Ohio.

"A wonderful combination of exact historical information and delightful historical literature."
Pres. GEO. T. WINSTON,
University of North Carolina.

"Its need more than justifies its publication."
CHAS. R. BARRETT,
Supt. Chicago Athenæum.

Sent, carriage free, to responsible subscribers, on easy payments. Send for circular giving full information.

SOLICITORS EMPLOYED

THE C. A. NICHOLS CO., PUBLISHERS
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

NOW IN PRESS.

Armenia and Her People.

By Rev. GEORGE H. FILIAN, banished native pastor of the Evangelical Church at Marsovan. Endorsed by Drs. R. S. STORRS, HENRY VAN DYKE, and the clergy generally.

Historical and Physical Armenia—Causes and vivid portrayal of present massacres and atrocities. Fully Illustrated—Price $1.50, by mail postpaid. A grand seller. 3,000 Agents Wanted to sell it. Send 50 cents for outfit and mention first and second choice of territory and save time. Write for circulars and most liberal terms. Mention this paper. Address,

THE AMERICAN PUBLISHING CO.,
Hartford, Conn., Cincinnati or Boston.

A Glad Surprise for Bible Students.

Space costs too much to give particulars here—sent free on request; every Bible student is interested. JOHN B. ALDEN, Publisher, New York. Mention this paper.

"A decided advance on all other commentaries."—THE OUTLOOK.

The International Critical Commentary

On the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament

Issued under the Editorship of Prof. CHARLES A. BRIGGS, D.D., Prof. S. R. DRIVER, D.D., Oxford, and ALFRED PLUMMER, D.D., University College, Durham.

FUTURE VOLUMES BY

- Prof. T. K. CHEYNE, Oxford
- Prof. FRANCIS BROWN, Union Theol. Sem.
- Prof. A. B. DAVIDSON, Edinburgh
- Pres. W. R. HARPER, Chicago
- Prof. C. H. TOY, Harvard
- Prof. E. D. BURTON, Chicago
- Prof. MARVIN R. VINCENT, Union Theol. Sem.
- Prof. EDWARD L. CURTIS, Yale
- Prof. A. F. KIRKPATRICK, Cambridge
- Rev. JOHN P. PETERS, New York
- Prof. R. H. CHARLES, Oxford
- Prof. E. P. GOULD, Philadelphia, and numerous others

A NEW VOLUME JUST PUBLISHED

MARK. By Prof. E. P. GOULD, Divinity School, Philadelphia. 8vo, $2.50, net.

PREVIOUSLY ISSUED

DEUTERONOMY. By Prof. S. R. DRIVER, D.D., Oxford. Crown 8vo, $3.00, net.

"This I find superior to any other commentary, in any language, upon Deuteronomy."—Prof. EDWARD L. CURTIS, Yale University.

JUDGES. By Prof. GEORGE MOORE, Andover. Crown 8vo, $3.00, net.

"The typographical execution is worthy of the scholarly character of the contents—and higher praise could not be given it."—Prof. C. H. TOY, Harvard University.

ROMANS. By Prof. WILLIAM SANDAY and Rev. A. C. HEADLAM, Oxford. Crown 8vo, $3.00, net.

"We do not hesitate to commend this commentary on Romans as the best yet written in English."—Church Standard.

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, 153-157 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

CHOICE BOOKS FOR EASTER

Heaven. Six Sermons by Rev. RICHARD MONTAGUE, D.D. With Memorials by Rev. Alvah Hovey, D.D., and Rev. Geo. E. Merrill, D.D. 12mo. With portrait. Cloth, gilt top, $1.25.

Beautiful and effective sermons, touched with a prescience of near immortality. Their eloquence appeals to both mind and heart.

Through Death to Life. Ten Discourses on St. Paul's great resurrection chapter. By REUEN THOMAS, D.D. 12mo, cloth, $1.25.

"A book to be read and prized; full of the light and aroma of the most precious hopes and glorious realities."—The Advance.

Doctrine and Life. By GEORGE B. STEVENS, Ph.D., D.D., Yale University. 12mo, cloth, $1.25.

"A truly catholic contribution to the practical needs of Christian people everywhere."—Independent.

Christian Evidences. By EZEKIEL GILMAN ROBINSON, D.D., LL.D., late President of Brown University. 12mo, cloth, $1.25.

"The ripe product of years of experience and thought and discussion, by one of the keenest minds and one of the greatest teachers of our time."—PRESIDENT TAYLOR, Vassar College.

Ezekiel Gilman Robinson. An Autobiography, with a supplement by H. L. WAYLAND, D.D., and eleven critical estimates. Edited by E. H. Johnson, D.D. 8vo, cloth, 378 pp.

A book of deep interest to all who knew the great teacher; and to those who owed him strong mental or moral stimulus, a memorial of rare value.

Poems of Home and Country. By Rev. S. F. SMITH, D.D., author of "America." Royal 8vo, illustrated, cloth, gilt top, $1.50. Edition De Luxe, $7.50.

The only authorized complete edition, edited under the author's personal supervision.

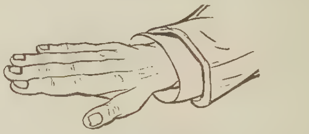
The Vacant Chair and Other Poems. By HENRY S. WASHBURN. 16mo, illustrated, cloth, gilt top, $1.25.

"Its entire contents are flushed with the true song-spirit."—The Independent.

For sale by leading booksellers, or sent, postpaid, by the publishers, on receipt of price.

SILVER, BURDETT & COMPANY
PUBLISHERS
Boston New York Chicago

AGENTS WANTED—To present to Christian people the grandest, best-selling book of the age, THE PEOPLE'S BIBLE HISTORY. Exclusive territory and attractive commissions given.
THE HENRY O. SHEPARD CO., Chicago, Ill.



PRIMARY POSITION

PIANO MARVEL

Finger and Wrist Gymnastics for all Pianists. Flexibility! Power!! Brilliancy!!! Text-Book in the New England Conservatory of Music. By mail, 40c. Circulars free. AMASA R. MOORE, Troy, N. Y.

Christian Endeavor
Official Badge, Scarf or Catch Pin. Solid gold, $1.00; silver, 25 cents. . . . . .

Topic Cards Beautiful embossed designs.
Send for samples, free. Complete price-list of all supplies sent free.

United Society of Christian Endeavor,
646 Washington St., Boston. 155 La Salle St., Chicago.

WHICH CATALOGUE SHALL I SEND YOU?

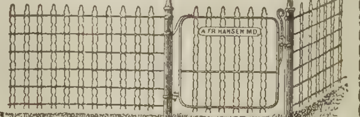
Mandolnis, Violins, Violin Music
Violin Cases Violin Bows
Banjos, Banjo Music
Guitars, Guitar Music
Flutes, Flute Music
Cornets, Cornet Music, Harmonicas.
C. C. STORY, 26 Central Street, Boston, Mass.

Christianity as Christ Preached It

Wishing to extend the faith in a simple, rational Christianity, literature will be sent free to all upon application to SEC. POST-OFFICE MISSION, 1102 Walnut St., Philadelphia.

The "HARTMAN" Steel Picket FENCE

Is intended for Lawns, Parks, Cemeteries, Churches & Schools. Stronger, handsomer and CHEAPER than either wood or iron. Does not mar but rather adds beauty to the lawn or garden. When set with our Self Anchoring Steel Posts it's a thing of beauty. Several heights, several widths of pickets. Write for circulars & prices.



A FR HANSEN MD.

HARTMAN MFG. CO., Ellwood City, Pa.
277 Broadway, New York.
1315 Manhattan Bldg, Chicago.

Readers of the Outlook should become acquainted with Mr.

F. E. Grant

who is in a position to give them special service and prices on any Book which they may desire to purchase. Send 10 cents for slips and catalogues showing how you can in buying books.

SAVE MONEY

[When calling please ask for Mr. Grant]

F. E. GRANT, 23 W. 42d St., New York

D. Appleton & Co.'s New Books

Cleg Kelly
Arab of the City
His Progress and Adventures

By S. R. Crockett, author of "The Lilac Sunbonnet," "Bog-Myrtle and Peat," etc. With 8 full-page Illustrations. 12mo. Cloth. $1.50.

It is safe to predict for the quaint and delightful figure of Cleg Kelly a notable place in the literature of the day. Mr. Crockett's signal success in his new field will enlarge the wide circle of his admirers. The lights and shadows of curious phases of Edinburgh life, and of Scotch farm and railroad life, are pictured with an intimate sympathy, richness of humor, and truthful pathos which make this new novel a genuine addition to literature. It seems safe to say that at least two characters—Cleg and Muckle Alick—are likely to lead Mr. Crockett's heroes in popular favor. The illustrations of this fascinating novel have been the result of most faithful and sympathetic study.

Voice Building and Tone Placing

By H. Holbrook Curtis, Ph.B., M.D. Showing a New Method of Relieving Injured Vocal Cords by Tone Exercises. Illustrated. 12mo. Cloth, $2.00.

Probably no laryngologist since the time of Sir Morell Mackenzie has had a better opportunity for investigating the subject of voice production and the effects upon the larynx of different methods of singing, than has the author of this book. As Dr. Curtis has dedicated his work to Jean de Reszke, and has been guided in his chapters on Voice Building by no less an authority than Madame Melba, it is safe to say that the work will have an especial interest for the musical as well as for the medical world.

Sleeping Fires

By George Gissing, author of "In the Year of Jubilee," "Eve's Ransom," etc. 16mo. Cloth, 75 cents.

In this striking story the author has treated an original motive with rare self-command and skill. His book is most interesting as a story and remarkable as a literary performance.

For sale by all booksellers; or will be sent by mail on receipt of price by the publishers,

D. APPLETON & CO.
72 Fifth Avenue, New York.

NEW BOOKS

ELEMENTS OF BOTANY. By Joseph Y. Bergen, Instructor in Biology in the English High School, Boston. 12mo. Cloth. 332 pages. Fully illustrated. $1.20.

PRINCIPLES OF PHYSICS. A Text-Book for High Schools and Colleges. By Alfred P. Gage, Instructor in Physics in the English High School, Boston. 12mo. Half leather. Illustrated. 634 pages. $1.45.

INDUCTIVE LOGIC. By William G. Ballantine, President of Oberlin College. 12mo. Cloth. 174 pages. 90 cents.

POLITICAL ECONOMY. For High Schools and Academies. By Robert E. Thompson, President of the Central High School, Philadelphia. 12mo. Cloth. 108 pages. 55 cents.

CHEMICAL EXPERIMENTS. General and Analytical. By R. P. Williams, Instructor in Chemistry, English High School, Boston. 8vo. Boards. 212 pages. Fully illustrated. 60 cents.

MONEY AND BANKING. Illustrated by American History. By Horace White. 12mo. Cloth. 488 pages. $1.50.

HOW WE ARE GOVERNED. Revised edition. By Anna Laurens Dawes. 12mo. Cloth. 423 pages. $1.15.

WHITE'S NATURAL HISTORY OF SELBORNE. Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by Edward S. Morse, Director of the Peabody Academy of Science, Salem, Mass. 12mo. Cloth. In Press.

RESPONSIVE READINGS. Selected from the Bible and Arranged under Subjects for Common Worship. By Henry Van Dyke, D.D. 12mo. Cloth. 317 pages. 85 cents.

PUBLIC SPEAKING AND DEBATE. By Geo. J. Holyoake. 12mo. Cloth. 266 pages. $1.10.

OUTLINE OF THE PHILOSOPHY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. By Greenough White, Professor in the University of the South. 12mo. Cloth. 266 pages. $1.10.

DEFOE'S HISTORY OF THE GREAT PLAGUE IN LONDON. Edited by B. S. Hurlbut, Instructor of English in Harvard University. 12mo. Cloth. 359 pages. 85 cents.

PLANE AND SOLID GEOMETRY. By W. W. Beman, Professor of Mathematics in the University of Michigan, and D. E. Smith, Professor of Mathematics in the Michigan State Normal School. 12mo. Half leather. 320 pages. $1.35.

SOUTHEY'S LIFE OF NELSON. Edited, with Notes and Introduction, by Albert F. Blaisdell. 12mo. Cloth. In Press.

The above publications may be ordered of all booksellers, or will be sent by the publishers, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of price.

GINN & COMPANY
PUBLISHERS
BOSTON NEW YORK CHICAGO

THE ONLY PERFECT Cycle Seat

Patented.

Demand this Seat. Insist upon it! Any dealer will get it for you. Can be widened to fit any rider and adjusted to any pitch.

Latest improved and only automatic seat. each side seperate; works naturally with each leg NO PRESSURE AGAINST SENSITIVE PARTS. YOUR DOCTOR WILL ENDORSE IT.

Dr. M. A. Walker, Denver, Colo.—"Received your saddle and put it on at once. Am very much pleased with it as it certainly does away with the harmful pressure exerted by other saddles." IT IS AN ESPECIALLY GOOD LADIES SADDLE. Every dealer should send for our circulars and price list. This is the coming seat. We make Cane, Wood, Leather or Padded Seat, with or without springs. Illustrated circulars explain why and how this is the only safe and perfect saddle on the markei. Write us,

AUTOMATIC CYCLE SEAT CO.,
434 Rood Block, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Books for the Country

Wild Flowers of the North-eastern States

Drawn and carefully described from life, without undue use of scientific nomenclature, by Ellen Miller and Margaret C. Whiting. With 308 Illustrations the size of life, and a Frontispiece printed in colors. Large quarto, buckram, 8½x12¼ inches. In box. Net $4.50.

Landscape Gardening

By Samuel Parsons, Jr., Superintendent of Parks, New York City. Notes and Suggestions on Lawns and Lawn-Planting, Laying Out and Arrangement of Country Places, Large and Small Plots, Cemetery Plots, and Railway Station Lawns; Deciduous and Evergreen Trees and Shrubs, the Hardy Border, Bedding Plants, Rockwork, etc., etc. Large 8vo, with nearly 200 Illustrations, $3.50.

The Trees of Northeastern America

By Chas. S. Newhall. With an Introductory Note by Nath. L. Britton. With Illustrations made from tracings of the leaves of the various trees. 8vo, $2.50.

The Shrubs of Northeastern America

By Chas. S. Newhall, author of "The Trees of Northeastern America," etc. Fully illustrated. Large 8vo, $2.50.

The Leaf-Collector's Hand-book and Herbarium

By Chas. S. Newhall. An aid in the preservation and in the classification of specimen leaves of the trees of Northeastern America. Illustrated. $2.00.

Among the Moths and Butterflies

By Julia P. Ballard, author of "Building Stories," etc. 8vo, $1.50.

The Wonders of Plant Life

By Mrs. S. B. Herrick. 16mo, beautifully illustrated, $1.50.

 A fuller Catalogue of Rural Publications, Notes on New Books, a quarterly bulletin, Prospectus of the Heroes and Story of the Nations Series, sent on application.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS
NEW YORK: 27 and 29 W. 23d St.
LONDON: 24 Bedford St., Strand

Complexion Powder

Is a necessity of the refined toilet in this climate. POZZONI'S combines every element of beauty and purity.

It is universally known, and everywhere esteemed as the only Powder that will improve the complexion, eradicate tan, freckles and skin diseases.

For Sale Everywhere.

The Business World

The State of Trade

The general survey of the condition of business given by the mercantile agency reports is not encouraging. "Bradstreet's" says that the trade for the first quarter of the year is disappointing, and notes a continued falling off in demand in the iron, steel, cotton, woolen, shoes, and clothing industries. "Dun's Review" says that improvement is still the exception. Business failures for the week are reported by Bradstreet as 300 (48 more than for the corresponding week last year), by Dun as 261 (17 less than last year). A peculiar condition in the state of trade last week was a continued advance in the price of cotton, while cotton manufactures fell in price; the supply of cotton was small, but the prospect for a large new crop is good. Speculators in cotton on the short side lost heavily last week. Of the falling off in the cotton supply the "Tribune" says:

> During the seven days of the commercial week ending Friday night the visible supply of cotton in the world decreased 115,160 bales, the total declining to 3,484,767 bales. The visible supply of American cotton lost 120,163 bales during the week, and the total visible supply of this country's product is now down to 2,981,567. The available visible supply of cotton in America, consisting of stocks at the ports and interior towns, lost 83,000 bales during the week, and the total stocks of this character are now down to 1,017,000 bales, or 281,000 less than were in sight at this time last year. These heavy losses show that there is an enormous demand for actual cotton in the world to-day. The visible supply of cotton in the world for the corresponding week last year decreased only 67,000 bales—little more than half of the withdrawals for trade purposes that took place last week.

Textile Fabrics

While France claims 40 per cent of the total silk goods export, it will surprise many to learn that, according to the statistics published in Berlin, Germany comes next, with 28½ per cent. The Fatherland sends out only 3 per cent. of linen yarn, against Austria's 14 per cent., Great Britain's 28 per cent., and Belgium's 34 per cent. Germany's export of linen and jute fabrics is so famous that one expects to find it a higher proportion than that given by the Berlin figures—14 per cent. in each case. Great Britain exports the lion's share, 61 per cent. of linens and 87 per cent. of jutes. In woolen yarn, too, Great Britain leads the way with nearly 50 per cent., as against Belgium's 21 per cent. and Germany's 17 per cent. In cotton yarn Great Britain again leads with 84 per cent., as compared with Germany's 7 per cent.; and in total exports of textile fabrics, 52 per cent. are British, 17 per cent. French, and 17 per cent. German.

Northern Pacific Reorganization

The plan for the reorganization of the Northern Pacific Railway Company made public the first of last week has received the sanction of the majority of the creditors, and now awaits the approval or disapproval of the stockholders. The plan is for an entirely independent organization of the Northern Pacific, without regard to the Great Northern system. The scheme proposed originated with the German bondholders, and is now supported by a strong combination of creditors and bankers. For two years and a half the Northern Pacific has been in a bankrupt state, and for five years its earnings have been about three millions less than its fixed charges. A radical scaling of securities was obviously necessary. We find the following summary of the plan proposed in the New York "Sun:"

> The plan accomplishes, in brief, a reduction of 44½ per cent. in the annual fixed charges of the company to $6,052,660. The amount required for dividends upon the preferred stock is increased 2⅞ per cent., making the total amount to be paid prior to dividends upon the common stock $8,952,660, a decrease, as compared with the interest and dividend charges of the present company, of 34¾ per cent. The policy of the reorganization is to reduce the classes of securities upon the entire system to four issues, two of bonds and two of stocks. This cannot be absolutely accomplished for some years to come; still, it is confidently believed that the voluntary conversion of bonds not in default will take place to an extent that will reduce fixed charges to an amount safely within the earning capacity of the rehabilitated property. The lines upon which the reorganization has been formulated may be briefly stated as follows: The abandonment of Chicago as the Eastern terminus of the system and the limitation of the railway on the East to the Mississippi River and the great lakes; the ultimate consolidation of the main line, branches, and terminal properties in a single company; the reduction of fixed charges to less than the minimum earnings under probable conditions; and, finally, ample provision for additional capital for the development of the property, and for increased facilities necessitated by the growth of the company's business. Of the amount required for this last purpose the stockholders are called upon to furnish $10,874,074. for which they will properly receive no new security. The amount of cash they are called upon to supply, if they wish to retain their interest in the property, is obviously much smaller than the sacrifices that the majority in interest of their creditors have been compelled to make.

How Sugar is Refined

The recent discussions with regard to the sugar industry have deepened a popular interest in sugar-refining. Next to flour, sugar is the most important article of food. The per capita requirement in this country is sixty-four pounds annually, and the United States consumes over one-fourth of the total supply. The first object of refining is to cleanse the sugar from dirt and from animalcules. The dark-colored raw material is emptied into a huge tank in which is turning a cylinder with long teeth, and which is filled with hot water. After the sugar is thoroughly dissolved, the liquid is pumped to another tank and tested by an instrument which shows the density of the mixture. It is generally about 55 per cent. sugar to 45 per cent. water. By means of pumps this mixture is lifted to the very top of the tall refinery and sent into great tanks heated by steam coils. The mixture is now tested for acetic acid, which, if present, is corrected by the use of lime. The mixture is then heated to about 200 degrees Fahrenheit. It is now carried to the floor below to be filtered. This floor is a series of squares about which are foot-walks. By pipes the mixture is conveyed to a cradle from which it flows through feeders into the boxes. Each of these boxes contains many double bags, and through these bags the sugar mixture filters. The cleaned solution is again tested. The mixture is now passed through charcoal which is contained in iron cylinders with double bottoms, the inner ones being perforated with small holes over which blankets are placed. As the liquid runs out of these cylinders it is again tested. The liquid is now colorless, and is allowed to run until a slight yellow tinge is apparent. The mixture is now reduced in a vacuum-pan, which is a huge iron retort like a bell-glass. As it boils it is watched through several glass bull's-eye places on the side of the pan. The air has been removed from the inside and the vapor drawn off. The sugar is heated, and will boil at 130 degrees Fahrenheit, but were it in the open air it would require 212 degrees. When the proper consistency has been reached, the sugar is ready for the centrifugal machines. These are cylinders within which there revolve copper sieves. About one barrel of sugar, or three hundred pounds, is put into the sieve, and is immediately in motion at the rate of a thousand revolutions a minute. The sugar flies to the sides, the syrup is driven through the sieve, and in five minutes, all the liquid being gone, the sugar is ready for packing.

A Canal Connecting Winnipeg with Hudson Bay

The latest deep waterway to be proposed is that which shall connect Winnipeg with Hudson Bay. The Canadian Government has taken up the project to build a railway thither, and rails have already been laid on forty miles of the Winnipeg and Hudson Bay road; but the Manitoba people are not satisfied with that alone, and have now become enthusiastic on the subject of a canal. The lakes and streams connecting Winnipeg with Hudson Bay have long been known to be navigable by light craft; indeed, the Hudson Bay Company used them for a century in transporting its furs and other goods, and it is now proposed to utilize them for the carriage of wheat and live stock. The terminus of the canal would be at Churchill Harbor on Hudson Bay, and Mr. Henry Lefroy, President of the Geographical Section of the British Association, even thinks that the harbor would become the shipping port for the agricultural products of the northern Territory, and the route by which emigrants will enter that country. The total distance from Winnipeg to Churchill by rail will be 750 miles, but by the canal about 900 miles. There will be but 43 miles of canals proper. The maze of lakes in that country between Lake Winnipeg and Hudson Bay is connected by many streams, all flowing northeasterly and all emptying into Hudson Bay. The great drawbacks, of course, are the questions of climate and the length of the seasons of navigation.

The Production of Coal

It may not be generally known that coal was first discovered in the United States in Rhode Island, but coal-mining was begun in Pennsylvania before it was tried in the first-named State. The close relation between the coal and manufacturing interests is the secret of Pennsylvania's success. We are not yet at the head of all the coal-producing countries, however; Great Britain has that position, with a yearly average of about 180,000,000 tons. Our position is second, and our yearly average is about 140,000,000 tons. The third place is occupied by Germany, with a production of 100,000,000 tons a year. France comes fourth and Russia fifth. In no country has the increase in production been more noticeable than in Russia. From 1875 to 1885 it doubled, and nearly doubled during the last decade. Great Britain is also at the head of all countries using steam power for purposes other than railway traction, and we occupy the second place; Germany, France, and Russia follow in order. One reason why there are so few manufactories in Italy and Spain is on account of the dearth of coal in those countries. Though in the latter land there is much coal, it is required for home consumption rather than for manufactures.

FINANCIAL

AMERICAN FIRE
INSURANCE COMPANY
A.D. 1810.
Office, Company's Building,
308 & 310 Walnut St.,
Philadelphia

One Door from Broadway on WEST 38th STREET is the new Uptown Office of the CONTRACT DEPARTMENT
of the Metropolitan
Telephone and Telegraph Co.

Intending customers who do not habitually go down-town will find this office (at 113 West 38th St.) conveniently located for transacting, with a minimum expenditure of time, all business relating to the supply of telephone service.

14,000 TELEPHONE STATIONS
IN NEW YORK CITY
Metallic Circuit Service
Rapid, Efficient, Permanent
From $75 a year

PROF. WM. G. SUMNER contributes the first of a series of articles on THE TREASURY AS A BANK OF ISSUE AND A SILVER WAREHOUSE.

WILLIAM RUTLEDGE GIBSON also treats of the currency question in an article entitled A GENERAL SURVEY.

PROF. ALBERT BUSHNELL HART, of Harvard University, writes on THE BOUNDARY CONTROVERSIES AND COMMISSIONS IN UNITED STATES HISTORY.

WILLIAM GRIFFITH, the eminent coal specialist, contributes part two of his series of articles on ANTHRACITE COAL, begun in February.

THE ERIE RAILROAD is treated in a historical, descriptive, and analytical manner by ERNEST S. CRONISE, of the Bond Record staff.

In the March Issue of

THE BOND RECORD

The department devoted to "Quotations and Statistics" contains comprehensive and accurate financial information.

ON ALL NEWS-STANDS AFTER MARCH 5TH. | $3.00 per year, with binder for year's numbers. 25 cents per copy.

THE BOND RECORD PUBLISHING COMPANY
20 Nassau Street, New York

NEW YORK can only spread one way—that's northward.

Our for-sale lots are in the direct line of its not-distant-future growth and development

The terms are easy enough.

Descriptive price lists are free.

Money is made in real estate by taking advantage of favorable conditions and circumstances.

Mutual Realty & Loan Corporation,
American Surety Building, Room 17. New York.

Lay by

for a Rainy Day

a few dollars a month in a Chicago lot—a Cottage in a year,—a Mansion in Ten,—a Fortune in Twenty.

Our free book will give you a hint.

CAMPBELL INVESTMENT CO.,
624 New Stock Exchange, Chicago, Ills.

A CONSERVATIVE INVESTMENT

I offer 3,200 feet—84 lots—BUFFALO inside vacant in one or more parcels. Trolley service, asphalt pavement, sewers and water. Kensington Park. Price $18.50 per foot. Terms easy. Liberal commission.

B. J. HATMAKER, Albion, N. Y.

SAFE INVESTMENTS

GOOD AS GOVERNMENT BONDS—DOUBLE THE RATE

5% 6% 7% Made in strictly first-class Real Estate Mortgages, State, County, City, and School Warrants and Bonds, with a view to absolute security and prompt interest payments. Best references Correspondence solicited.

JOHN P. DORR & CO., Investment Brokers
Seattle, Washington

WESTERN

MORTGAGES

DEFAULTED AND OTHERWISE,
Bought for Cash.

CHAS. E. GIBSON, 45 Milk St. Boston, Mass

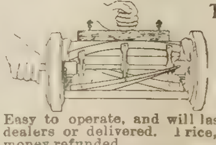
YOU SELL | WE BUY

Do you want to sell a WESTERN MORTGAGE or Western Land—avoid foreclosure costs—stop sending good money after bad—get a good 5 per cent. investment instead?

State exact location, condition of title, and your lowest price. Over $2,000,000 in Western securities successfully handled by the present management of this corporation. THE BOSTON REALTY, INDEMNITY AND TRUST CO., 33 Equitable Building, Boston. Send for our Bond List.

INCOME POLICIES
INVESTMENTS—6%
ENDOWMENTS

JAS. A. STEELE, 45 Broadway, New York



The Only
Sharpener
That Sharpens Any Lawn Mower

Easy to operate, and will last 10 years. For sale by dealers or delivered. Price, $1.00. Guaranteed, or money refunded.

HOME LAWN MOWER SHARPENER CO.
258 Canal Street, Grand Rapids, Mich.

EDUCATIONAL

New York City

SCHERMERHORN'S TEACHERS' AGENCY
Oldest and best known in U. S.
Established 1855. 3 East 14th St., N. Y.

The Misses Ely's School for Girls
RIVERSIDE DRIVE
85th and 86th Streets, New York

TEACHERS COLLEGE Morningside Heights, New York (120th St., West).—Professional training for general teachers and specialists: Manual training, science, kindergarten, English form, drawing and color, history of art domestic science, general pedagogy. Degrees given by Columbia College to both sexes. Circulars of Information. "Teachers College Bulletin." WALTER L. HERVEY, President.

Miss Peebles and Miss Thompson's Boarding and Day School for Girls
30, 32, and 34 East 57th St., New York
Special students admitted.

California

POMONA COLLEGE, Claremont, Cal.—Full College courses leading to degrees of B.A., B.L., B.S. Degrees recognized by University of California and other similar graduate schools. Thirty-five miles from Los Angeles. An Academic course. Preparatory school preparing for all institutions connected with the College. Address C. G. BALDWIN, President.

Connecticut

WOODSIDE SEMINARY
Terms, $500 to $700. City advantages for culture and study. Rural surroundings.
Miss SARA J. SMITH, Principal, Hartford, Conn.

OLD LYME, Conn. Boxwood School for Girls
Elective and college preparatory. Special advantages in Art and Music. Separate department for girls under twelve. Mrs. RICHARD SILL GRISWOLD.

FAIRFIELD ACADEMY.—HOME SCHOOL FOR BOYS. Fits for business or college. Genuine home; individual teaching; healthful; 50 miles from New York. FRANCIS H. BREWER, A.M., Prin., Fairfield, Ct.

Massachusetts

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN TEACHERS' BUREAU
3 Park St., Boston
Native language teachers a specialty

New York

THE ELMER, Cornwall-on-Hudson, N. Y.—Opens May 2d. Refers to John Clay, 90 Maiden Lane; Capt. I. C. Wicks, Continental Hotel; I. C. Hopkins, Cotton Exchange; Vreeland Tompkins, 66 Centre St.; W. H. Flagg, 11 Pine St. WM. B. ELMER.

RIVERVIEW ACADEMY
60th year. Prepares thoroughly for College, the Government Academies, and Business. U. S. Army officer detailed at Riverview by Secretary of War.
JOSEPH B. BISBEE, A.M., Principal, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

Sing-Sing-on-the-Hudson, N. Y.
OSSINING SCHOOL FOR GIRLS
Prepares for college. Advance courses in Art and Music. Albert Ross Parsons, Musical Director. One hour from New York. European party sails June 27th. 29th year begins Sept. 23d. Miss C. C. FULLER, Principal.

Pennsylvania

BRYN MAWR COLLEGE BRYN MAWR, Pa.
A college for women. Offers undergraduate and graduate instruction. Awards annually two European Fellowships (value $500), seven Graduate Scholarships (value $[illegible]), and nine Resident Graduate Fellowships (value [illegible]) in Greek, Latin, English, German, and Teutonic Philology, Romance Languages, History or Political Science, Mathematics, Chemistry, and Biology. Competition open till April 15th. Full undergraduate and graduate courses in these departments and in Philosophy and Physics. Courses in Archæology and Geology, and graduate courses in Semitic Languages. For general programme or graduate pamphlet, address as above.

PENNSYLVANIA, Bryn Mawr.
Miss Baldwin's School for Girls
Preparatory to Bryn Mawr College. Within five years more than fifty pupils have entered Bryn Mawr College from this school. Certificate admits to Smith, Vassar Wellesley. Diploma given in both General and College-Preparatory Courses. School Building especially constructed for school purposes. Tennis Courts and Gymnasium. For circulars address
Miss FLORENCE BALDWIN, Principal.

The Home Club

The Child Supreme

In spite of the constantly increasing knowledge on the subject of education, of the development of the mind, the children of the rich and poor are taught under systems that are not based on scientific knowledge. Teachers rarely, even in private schools of the best class, maintain a system in the primary department that considers the child's whole nature. Parents object to paying the amount for the education of a child at the beginning that its importance demands. Because of this false economy many proprietors of schools are forced to reduce expenses in the primary departments, and meet the deficiencies of the income of the primary departments from the profits of the higher grades. There is no economy in the end for the parent. The child who does not receive the attention his needs demand from the age of four to fourteen, costs more to educate from fourteen to twenty—more in time as well as money. The rights of children are many, and are too rarely protected. Too often they are considered pieces of private property to be administered on general principles, and not on the basis of individual rights. This habit of considering the first years of a child's school life as of comparatively little importance is responsible to a great degree for the overwork and worry that come in the last years of preparatory and of college work.

Too often teachers and parents do not stand in the dual relation on the co-operative platform. Either there is indifference, or a fear of loss on the part of the teacher if she uses her knowledge independently, if she insists on certain rules and regulations for some particular child because that child will be most and best helped by these rules. No parent calls in a physician to a sick child unless he has absolute confidence in the ability of the physician. Yet parents, in absolute ignorance of the laws of mind or development, with vague ideas of education, dare dictate to the physician and trainer of the mind. This is due in part to a misconception of a teacher's position, and the social misconception of the relation of the teacher. He is not a servant, but a trained professor. If he is not that, the parent is guilty of criminal negligence in placing his child's education in the keeping of those he thinks incompetent to fulfill the trust.

There are two inalienable rights of childhood—happiness, and freedom from worry. Not even wealth secures these for the children if their rights are not perfectly protected.

A little boy of nervous temperament is a pupil in a large and expensive school. He has suffered from a form of dyspepsia since he was born. From the moment of entering school he has been struggling for honor-marks that result in certain cards which in time bring a book. This system is no test of the intellect, because if he is absent, even because of illness, it counts against him. During his illness, which is enough to bear in itself, there was the, to him, awful anxiety of losing the prize. Multiply this boy by thousands. Is it not the perfection of cruelty to allow an honest-hearted, ambitious boy to be subjected to this at nine years of age? Who is to blame? The parents into whose keeping these immortal souls are intrusted. "A little child shall lead them" is a command. He is the important object for contemplation, and the only true guide. He is more important than any theory or system; his preservation far more desirable than the preservation of the dignity of parent, teacher, or school.

A little girl of nine was given, as work for home out of school hours, the drawing of the map of New England. She was fond of drawing; had shown gift in the use of a pencil since her babyhood. Geography she does not like. Poor baby! why should she, as it is taught in the majority of schools? This connection with geography through the medium that she loved was a happy event. Her box of crayons was brought into use. Monday morning she handed her gayly colored map to the teacher, perfectly conscious that it was a good piece of work. "You need not have done that. I only wanted it in pencil," was the comment to the radiant little artist. The child refuses to study geography. She should not, nor anything else, under that woman. Multiply this little girl by thousands and you have the number of children whose very souls are insulted by the blind ignorance and stupid arrogance of so-called teachers—teachers who are educated, and whose education seems to justify that they should be put in charge of that class of children in which there is reasonable hope for opportunities of culture. Culture begins in the cradle, it ends at the grave, if the mind is not paralyzed or dwarfed by the influences that bear upon it during the formative period. The teacher cannot say to the parent, "I have no need of thee," nor the parent to the teacher, "I have no need of thee," for between them stands a little child asking for guidance along the path they have walked.

The Schools and Libraries

In the issue of February 29 we referred to the work that has been done in some parts of the country in making a connection between the schools and the public libraries, asking that readers who had had experience in this work tell our readers of that experience. The following letter is from the School Superintendent of Dedham, Mass.:

Dear Outlook: I send with this copies of the school report of Dedham for 1895 and 1896. This will, I think, answer the questions asked in The Outlook of February 27 in regard to the distribution of library books through the schools. About two years ago the children's books then in the public library were classified according to the grade to which they were adapted. These lists were placed in the hands of teachers and children in all grades above the third. Scholars' cards were then issued to the pupils, who place the numbers of the books wanted on their cards, guided by the printed lists, lists placed on the blackboard, or by the suggestions of the teacher. The books are collected every week and carried to and from the library, at the expense of the School Department. Children over fourteen are allowed to draw books on the regular cards. Before new books are placed on the shelves a brief review of each, noting grade to which it is adapted, and containing references to history, geography, etc., is printed and sent to the schools.

I have usually reviewed the books, and the printing of the lists for the children has been done by the School Department. The circulation on scholars' cards last year was about eight thousand, or two hundred per week. The books are drawn mainly by the pupils of grades four, five, six, seven, and eight, numbering about five hundred; these figures would indicate that each pupil has read at least sixteen books in the course of the year. The following returns show in some degree the results of two years' work. Very few of the pupils in one of these rooms would have read the books if they had not been placed before them through the schools:

School.	x	y
Grade	5	6
Number present	43	45
Robinson Crusoe	20	23
Swiss Family Robinson	10	10
Arabian Nights	12	16
Uncle Tom's Cabin	11	16
Little Lord Fauntleroy	19	13
Alice in Wonderland	25	24
Through the Looking-Glass	21	12
Little Men	6	1
Little Women	5	2
One of Jules Verne's books	1	5
Tom Brown at Rugby	6	7
Story of a Bad Boy	1	1

This work is entirely outside of the course in literature. The free text-book law enables us to place in the hands of each child three or four works of some standard author every year.

The town and library committee have been more than generous.

As the greater part of the children of the third grade are now able to read, and are interested in books, we hope to extend the distribution to these.

Yours truly,
RODERICK W. HINE.

Can The Outlook tell me where Miss Wiltse's pamphlet, "A Preliminary Sketch of the History of Child Study in America," may be obtained?

M. P. S.

The pamphlet is a reprint from the "Pedagogical Seminary," and can be obtained at the publishing office, Clark University, Worcester, Mass.; price, 25 cents.

The Point of a pin doesn't polish, it scratches; so do the sharp, gritty particles of poor silver polish. There is one that polishes easily and quickly without scratching; it's the only perfect silver polish. Send for a sample and try it yourself.

ELECTRO-SILICON

Post paid, 15c. It's sold everywhere.

THE ELECTRO SILICON CO., 72 John St., New York.

—A—

Delicate, Delicious Dish

For Breakfast.

Superior to Oatmeal as Wheat does not overheat the blood; Economical, costing less than 1 cent each person when cooked as mush,

WHEATLET

Is absolutely the Best Cereal Food in the world. Uncooked by steam it retains the Rich Nut-like Flavor of wheat in its natural condition.

Sold in 2 lb packages by All Leading Grocers.

FRANKLIN MILLS CO., LOCKPORT, N. Y.

Miss Maria Parloa

is admitted to be a leading American authority on cooking; she Says "Use

a good stock for the foundation of soups, sauces and many other things, and the best stock is

Liebig Company's Extract of Beef"

100 of Miss Parloa's recipes sent gratis by Dauchy & Co., 27 Park Place, New York.

CLEAR AS CRYSTAL

Your drinking water should be—may be, if you use a "Crystal Fountian" Germ-proof Filter. A porous rock tube filter with a perfect automatic cleaner. Send for a book, free by mail, and learn all about it. Also Gravity Filters, in which we use the Crystal Fountain Rock Tube.

Sectional view of Filter.

THE GEO. L. SQUIER MFG. CO.,
Filter Dept. "F," Buffalo, N. Y., U.S.A.

"Just the Thing"

That's what every woman says who sees the Lounging Robe

shown here in cut, for it is Inexpensive, Comfortable, Pretty.

The complete line of Knit Goods shown in our catalogue, for mothers, children, and babies, will interest you. We send it free.

NOVELTY KNITTING CO.
312 Broadway, Albany, N. Y.

794
LADIES' TEA GOWN.
Sizes 32, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42.

A PAPER PATTERN

like this cut mailed for 10 cents. Fit guaranteed. Catalogue "O"—500 designs—5 cents. Fashion Sheet Free.

NEW IDEA PATTERN CO.
190-196 West Broadway, New York

Nursery Cloth.

An absolute necessity for every modern nursery. Made of bleached muslin on both sides, with white wadding between, firmly quilted, and 34 inches wide. Highly recommended by physicians for bed pads. Thoroughly absorbent and easily washed.

MATTRESS PROTECTORS

made of it are indispensable, absolutely preventing damage from stains, etc. Made for any size bed, bound and ready for use.

Both articles kept by leading dry goods houses. If your dealer don't keep them, write for sample.

Excelsior Quilting Co., Laight St., New York.

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE ROLLERS
NOTICE NAME THUS
Stewart Hartshorn
ON LABEL AND GET THE GENUINE
HARTSHORN

THE HAIR 24th edition, 25c. (or stamps). Why it Falls Off, Turns Grey, and the Remedy. By Prof. HARLEY PARKER.
W. E. LONG & CO., 1013 Arch St. Phila., Pa.
"Every one should read this little book."—Athenæum.

General Howard Roll of Honor

The following is a supplementary list of names that have been entered upon the General Howard Roll of Honor of the Congregational Home Missionary Society. There have been previously reported 735. The number of shares included in the accompanying list is 22, making a total of 757:

The First Congregational Church, West Hartford, Conn.
"M. E. C.," Bloomfield, N. J.
Rev. H. L. Chase, Minneapolis, Minn.
Ladies' Union Meeting, First Church of Christ, New London, Conn.
First Church, Albany, N. Y.
Florida East Conference.
Woman's Home Missionary Society, First Church, Keene, N. H.
Rev. Burton W. Lockhart, by Ladies' Home Missionary Society, Franklin Street Church, Manchester, N. H.
Mrs. Peter McCartee, by Woman's Home Missionary Society of Church of the Pilgrims, Brooklyn, N. Y.
Ladies' Benevolent Society of South Church, New Britain, Conn.
Ellen Tyler Chapman, New London, Conn.
Sunday-School of South Church, Middletown, Conn.
Mrs. Arthur E. Childs, Boston, Mass.
Old South Church, South Weymouth, Mass.
First Congregational Church, Great Barrington, Mass. Two shares.
In Memory of Mrs. Maria H. Clark, by High Street Church, Lowell, Mass.
Plymouth Church Sunday-School, Worcester, Mass.
Mrs. Cynthia S. Campbell, Hartford, Conn.
First Congregational Church, Keene, N. H.
William S. Carter, Lebanon, N. H.
Westfield Congregational Church, Danielson, Conn.

And

Among many sins of the lazy and shiftless penman the most flagrant is the overworking of that humble but indispensable word and. This abuse is growing rapidly, even with some who might otherwise claim to be good writers. Nothing is gained by it, of course, and a great deal is lost. There is neither sense nor humanity in breaking the back of a harmless and helpful beast of burden, so that it becomes an object of horror to the fastidious and of commiseration to the charitable. For such cases another Bergh should arise and form a new society, which might protect the injured and prosecute the offenders. A critical journal, noticing the last amusing work of a popular novelist, pointed out a sentence containing twenty-two (or was it twenty-seven?) inflictions of this mild connective. The proof-reader was evidently in abeyance here, or he would have suppressed most of the ands, displaced the commas by periods or colons, and cut the overgrown sentence into six, or perhaps thirteen. This way of writing is like that of the preacher who does not know when to stop, or of the magazinist who exceeds his limits because he had no time to make the article shorter. Any of these calls to mind the youth of six feet and twelve years only, all whose strength had gone into his length. Compression, with consideration, is a good way to gain force, and inconsiderate expansion and repetition, even of the mere copula, a sure way to lose it. When Mr. Fields was editing the "Atlantic," he once offered Dr. Holmes one hundred dollars for an article of six pages (or thereabouts), and less if it was longer. Yet Dr. Holmes could never have indited a sentence like this:

"He rang the bell and was admitted and entered the parlor, and took a chair and waited some time, and at length Clarinda came down and apologized for the delay, and he invited her to ride, and she agreed, and they started, and the horse ran away and they were both thrown out, and she was killed and he badly hurt, and—" so on ad infinitum, through details of the funeral and his subsequent career.

Nobody, it may be presumed, writes this way on purpose; it is because, like the majority of juvenile delinquents, they "didn't think."—Lippincott's Magazine.

—The Czar of Russia has set aside $100,000 to be distributed among the charitable institutions of Moscow in honor of his coronation. His Majesty is taking great interest in the preparations for the ceremony. Among other things, the famous old Kremlin is to be lighted with 500,000 lanterns, and 14,000 small electric lights are to illumine the tower.

take the law in your own hands, ladies, when you ask for

S·H·&M·
REGISTERED TRADE MARK.

Bias Velveteen Skirt Binding

and don't get it. Sentence such a store to the loss of your trade and give it to merchants who are willing to sell what you demand.

Look for "S. H. & M.," on the Label, and take no other.

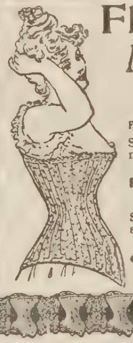
If your dealer will not supply you we will.

Send for samples, showing labels and materials, to the S. H. & M. Co., P. O. Box 699, New York City.



Flexibone Moulded Corsets

For FIT, FAVOR and FANCY

Sent direct, postpaid, if not obtainable of your dealer.

Price $1.50, $2.00
Brocades $3.00.

Send for booklet, "Corsets and How to Select Them."

Coronet Corset Co.
JACKSON, MICH.

The Pleasures of the Dining Table are determined by the character of the silverware.

STERLING SILVER INLAID
Spoons and Forks are always clean and bright. no worn spots on the back of the bowls and handles. Guaranteed 25 years. Fancy pieces in our special quality are stamped
Holmes & Edwards XIV

THE
Holmes & Edwards Silver Co
Bridgeport, Conn.
New York Salesroom,
2 Maiden Lane,
Second Door from Broadway

STAMPED STEEL CEILINGS

DECORATIVE, DURABLE, AND BEST

for Dwellings, Churches, or Business Houses. Ceilings of any shape, old or new. Send for Catalogue.

H. S. NORTHROP, 29 Cherry St., N.Y.

About People

—Rain-in-the-Face, who was a leader in the Custer massacre, is now a policeman at the Standing Rock Agency, and is looked upon as a valuable man.

—President Faure's particular fad is said to be the collection of autographs. His collection is said to embrace the signature of every living sovereign, author, inventor, and actor of importance.

—The family of the late Rev. Dr. S. F. Smith, author of "America," while not objecting to the placing of a bust of Dr. Smith in the Boston Public Library, oppose the suggestion of a national monument. They believe that his "America" and "Poems of Home and Country" should be his best memorial.

—George Meredith, writes a newspaper correspondent, is often ambiguous in his novels, but nobody can fail to understand the following sentence in one of his recent letters: "Since the benignant conclusion of the greatest of civil wars, I have looked upon the American people as the leaders of our civilization."

—The Rev. William I. Nichols has taken the post of Secretary to the Brooklyn Bureau of Charities, made vacant by the death of the lamented Dr. George B. Safford. Mr. Nichols's experience in Philadelphia, while minister of the Spring Garden (Unitarian) Society, conjoined with love of the work and superior administrative ability, amply qualify him for his laborious office.

—A Christiania correspondent says that Mme. Eva Nansen, the wife of the explorer, is at the present hour indisputably the principal concert-singer in Norway. Mme. Nansen is not a brilliant prima donna, but her graceful, refined, and intelligent art never fails to charm Norwegian audiences, assisted as it is by a fine presence and a melodious voice. Mme. Nansen recently achieved great success at Stockholm and Copenhagen.

—The late Monsieur Drury, an eminent French historian, served, when sixty years old, during the siege of Paris, as a private in the National Guard. One day Monsieur Jules Simon, a member of the administration, caught sight of a familiar face belonging to one doing sentry-go in the uniform of a private soldier. "Is that you, Drury?" he cried. "To be sure," gruffly. "And a private!" "Why not?" said the other, laconically. "We can't all be Prime Ministers."

—Sir John Millais, the new President of the Royal Academy, is an enthusiastic sportsman, and prefers fishing above all other diversions. When he makes a noteworthy catch, it is said, he is fond of having himself and his trophies photographed. It is related of him that when as a boy he took his first prize for drawing he had to stand on a chair to make himself visible to the audience. He was asked what he would like to have as a special favor, and answered: "Permission to fish in the Serpentine."

—Ambroise Thomas had at Argenteuil a palace which he named Elsinore, in enthusiastic reminiscence of Hamlet. The King of Hanover made a present to him of an iron gate which had been at Elsinore. After the siege of Paris Ambroise Thomas rushed anxiously to Argenteuil, expecting to find his palace in ruins, but its Elsinore gate even was intact, and under the door was a Prussian Lieutenant's visiting-card, on which was written in pencil, as an explanation of Ambroise Thomas's good fortune, "I am Meyerbeer's nephew."

—Le Menestrel tells an amusing story of the late General Sir Henry Ponsonby, who was for many years Queen Victoria's private secretary. The General was noted for his politeness, and whenever an artist performed at court he always telegraphed the following day to inquire after the performer's health. If a complete troupe performed at the Castle, the General employed a formula, always the same, which included the various members of the company. A short time ago Rogers Prat was sent to court to exhibit his educated geese before Queen Victoria's grandchildren. The day following, the "artist" received the traditional telegram from General Ponsonby, written in the following immutable terms: "Her Gracious Majesty would be delighted to know if the members of your troupe are well, and if they have had an agreeable journey. For my own part I beg you to convey to them the expression of my esteem."

—Donizetti is to have a monument. It will be set up in the little public square of Bergamo, upon which looks the Conservatoire, the nursery of his genius from the age of eight. The great composer, in addition to his musical gifts, possessed a phenomenal memory. In his youth he applied to Mayr, the director of the theater at Bologna, for the score of an opera that was then being played. This request was refused, so Donizetti attended the performance twice, and then wrote out the whole from overture to finish. Another anecdote illustrates the maestro's susceptibility and quick wit. During his long stay at St. Petersburg he played by command before the Czar Nicholas, who entered into conversation with a bystander in the course of the piece. Donizetti at once broke off the performance. "Why have you stopped?" asked the Autocrat. "Sire," was the reply, "when the Czar is speaking, everybody else should be silent."

The Armenian Fund

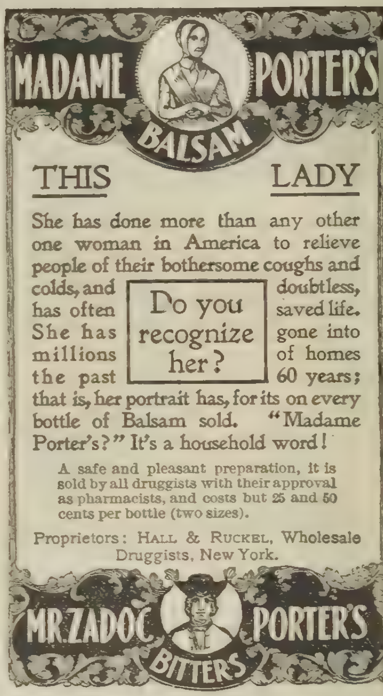
Previously acknowledged	$4,827 35
L. P. A., Rolla. Mo	1 00
H. E. P., Bath, Me	10 00
A. G. Du B., W. New Brighton, N. Y.	25 00
K. L. P.	10 00
Second Congregational Church, Mansfield, Conn	20 00
Additional from Citizens, Grand Rapids, Mich	18 00
B. M. F., Brooklyn, N. Y.	1 00
A. C. S	1 00
X. Y. Z., Grand Lake, Mich	5 00
M. S. W., Detroit, Mich	5 00
Miss F. Z. N	25 00
Mrs. D. A., Statesville, N. C	1 00
A Friend, East Otto, N. Y	5 00
H. Y. E., New York, N. Y	25 00
M. S., Norwich, N. Y.	2 00
M. M. G., Zanesville, O	10 00
J. H. G	25 00
A Friend, Austinburg, O	3 00
M. L. K	2 00
E. E. T., Binghamton, N. Y	5 00
Chautauqua Chapel, Chautauqua, N. Y.	12 00
Mrs. E. H. L., Oakland, Cal	10 00
F. M. E., Fredonia, N. Y	1 00
E. S. S., Washington, D. C	1 00
L. J. P., Glen Ebon, O	2 00
Young People's Christian Endeavor Society, Brackettsville, Tex	5 00
Mrs. J. W. S., Augusta, Ill	5 00
A Lady of Virginia	5 00
Total	$5,067 35

THROAT DISEASES commence with a Cough, Cold, or Sore Throat. "Brown's Bronchial Troches" give immediate and sure relief.

Lamp-chimney sellers can't give you the shape for your lamp, without the Index. They have it; but some don't care. Let us send you one; free.

"Pearl top" and "pearl glass" are trade-mark names for tough glass and fine work.

Geo A Macbeth Co
Pittsburgh Pa



MADAME PORTER'S BALSAM

THIS LADY

She has done more than any other one woman in America to relieve people of their bothersome coughs and colds, and doubtless, has often saved life. She has gone into millions of homes the past 60 years; that is, her portrait has, for its on every bottle of Balsam sold. "Madame Porter's?" It's a household word!

Do you recognize her?

A safe and pleasant preparation, it is sold by all druggists with their approval as pharmacists, and costs but 25 and 50 cents per bottle (two sizes).

Proprietors: HALL & RUCKEL, Wholesale Druggists, New York.

MR. ZADOC PORTER'S BITTERS

REX BRAND
Extract of BEEF
Sample, 4 cents. Book free.
CUDAHY - - SO. OMAHA FLAVOR

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY Pittsburgh.
BEYMER-BAUMAN Pittsburgh.
DAVIS-CHAMBERS Pittsburgh.
FAHNESTOCK Pittsburgh.
ANCHOR, ECKSTEIN Cincinnati.
ATLANTIC, BRADLEY, BROOKLYN, JEWETT, ULSTER, UNION New York.
SOUTHERN, SHIPMAN Chicago.
COLLIER, MISSOURI, RED SEAL, SOUTHERN St. Louis.
JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS. CO Philadelphia.
MORLEY Cleveland.
SALEM Salem, Mass.
CORNELL Buffalo.
KENTUCKY Louisville.

MONEY IS MADE by saving it, and there is no better way to save it than in preserving your buildings by having them well painted with Pure White Lead and Pure Linseed Oil. They cannot be well painted with anything else. To be sure of getting examine the brand (see list genuine brands). For colors use NATIONAL LEAD CO.'s Pure White Lead Tinting Colors; they are the best and most permanent; prepared expressly for tinting Pure White Lead.

Pure White Lead

Pamphlet giving valuable information and card showing samples of colors free; also cards showing pictures of twelve houses of different designs painted in various styles or combinations of shades forwarded upon application to those intending to paint.

NATIONAL LEAD CO.,
1 Broadway, New York.

$1 LINCOLN FOUNTAIN PEN $1

Solid Gold Pen - Hard Rubber Engraved Holder - Simple Construction - Always Ready - Never Blots - No better working pen made - A regular $2.50 pen.
To introduce, mailed complete, boxed, with filler, for $1.00. Your money back—if you want it. Agents Wanted.
LINCOLN FOUNTAIN PEN CO., Room 5, 108 Fulton St., New York

Books Received

AMERICAN BOOK CO., NEW YORK

King, Robert M. School Interests and Duties. $1.

D. APPLETON & CO., NEW YORK

Curtis, H. Holbrook, M.D. Voice Building and Tone Placing. $2.

Gissing, George. Sleeping Fires. 75 cts.

Crockett, S. R. Cleg Kelly, Arab of the City. $1.50.

EDWARD ARNOLD, NEW YORK

Berringer, Mrs. Oscar. The New Virtue. $1.

THE CHRISTIAN LITERATURE CO., NEW YORK

Vincent, Marvin R., D.D. The Age of Hildebrand. $1.50.

CONGREGATIONAL SUNDAY-SCHOOL AND PUBLISHING SOCIETY, BOSTON

Cheever, Harriet A. A Rescued Madonna. 60 cts.

COPELAND & DAY, BOSTON

Scollard, Clinton. Hills of Song. $1.25.

T. Y. CROWELL & CO., NEW YORK

Dixon, Frank H. State Railroad Control. $1.75.

DODD, MEAD & CO., NEW YORK

Thacher, John Boyd. Charlecote; or, The Trial of William Shakespeare. Illustrated by Charles L. Hinton. $5.

Dixon, William Macneile. A Tennyson Primer. $1.25.

Smith, Gertrude. Deodora Heywood. 75 cts.

In a Silent World: The Love Story of a Deaf Mute. By the Author of "Views of English Society." 75 cts.

E. P. DUTTON & CO., NEW YORK

The Gate of Paradise. (Easter Booklet.) $1.25.

Violets. (Easter Booklet.) 75 cts.

Te Deum Laudamus. (Easter Booklet.) 80 cts.

Vesper Songs. (Easter Booklet.) 80 cts.

GINN & CO., BOSTON

Grimm's Fairy Tales. Edited by Sara E. Wiltse. Illustrated by Caroline S. King. Part II.

DuBois-Reymond, Emil. Wissenschaftliche Vorträge. Edited by James H. Gore.

THE HEALTH-CULTURE CO., NEW YORK

Novus Homo. Ye Thoroughbred. 50 cts.

HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., BOSTON

Phelps, Elizabeth Stuart. The Supply at Saint Agatha's. Illustrated. $1.

Hearn, Lafcadio. Kokoro. $1.25.

A Satchel Guide to Europe. $1.50.

THE INTERNATIONAL NEWS CO., NEW YORK

Riddell, Mrs. J. H. A Rich Man's Daughter. 50 cts.

E. MARGUERITE LINDLEY, MURRAY HILL HOTEL, NEW YORK

Lindley, E. Marguerite. Health in the Home.

J. B. LIPPINCOTT CO., PHILADELPHIA

Sergeant, Adeline. The Failure of Sibyl Fletcher. 50 cts.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., NEW YORK

Sanday, W., D.D. Inspiration. (Bampton Lectures for 1893.) $2.50.

Edersheim, Rev. Alfred, D.D. History of the Jewish Nation. $5.

Coleridge, Samuel Taylor. The Rime of the Ancient Mariner. Edited by Herbert Bates. 45 cts.

MACMILLAN & CO., NEW YORK

Turgenev, Ivan. Smoke. Translated by Constance Garnett. $1.25.

Corson, Hiram. The Voice and Spiritual Education. 75 cts.

Lawton, William Cranston. Art and Humanity in Homer. 75 cts.

Willoughby, Westel W. An Examination of the Nature of the State. $3.

Tennyson, Alfred Lord. Poetical Works. In Memoriam. Maud and other Poems. (People's Edition.) 45 cts. each.

Del Mar, Alexander. The Science of Money. $2.25.

Carleton, William. Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry. $1.50.

Pepys, Samuel. Diary. Edited by Henry B. Wheatley. Vol. VII. $1.50.

Maclaren, Alexander, D.D. The Beatitudes and other Sermons. $1.50.

Björnson, Björnstjerne. A Happy Boy. Translated by Mrs. W. Archer. $1.25.

Spenser, Edmund. Faerie Queene. Edited by Thomas J. Wise. Illustrated by Walter Crane. Part XII. $3.

THE METAPHYSICAL PUBLISHING CO., NEW YORK

Diaz, Abby Morton. The Religious Training of Children. $1.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, NEW YORK

Greene, Frederick Davis. The Rule of the Turk. 40 cts.

Armstrong, Edward. Lorenzo de' Medici. $1.50.

ROBERTS BROS., BOSTON

Blackwell, Alice Stone. Armenian Poems. $1.25.

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, NEW YORK

Statham, H. Heathcote. Architecture for General Readers. $2.

Johnston, Henry. Doctor Congalton's Legacy. $1.25.

—"Viscount Midleton, the new Lord-Lieutenant for Surrey," says the "Westminster Budget," "spends a considerable portion of his time at Peper Harow Park, Godalming. The story is told that on one occasion the late Poet Laureate was attending a garden-party there, and with characteristic frankness expressed his views on sandwiches. 'Don't like those dry things,' said Lord Tennyson to the footman as he held the dish. 'You need not be so rude,' replied a lady sitting beside him. 'This is the first time I knew it was rude to speak your own mind,' was his blunt rejoinder."

Too Tired to Sleep.

Take Horsford's Acid Phosphate

The weariness from brain work and nervous excitement is the most enervating fatigue there is. Horsford's Acid Phosphate quiets the nerves and induces sleep.

YOUR DOCTOR WILL TELL YOU

That the last objection to bicycle riding for woman and man is removed by the use [illegible]

MESINGER BICYCLE SADDLES

Wide and flat in the back.
The opening makes it healthful and harmless

It prevents [illegible]. Do not take [illegible]. None as ha[illegible].

The base [illegible] the lasting [illegible] fully demon[illegible]. [illegible] an inch th[illegible] leather [illegible] tion of fe[illegible] [illegible] bicycle rider.

SENT PREPAID UPON RECEIPT OF $4.00

HULBERT BROS. & CO.

MANUFACTURERS OF

Firearms, Majestic Bicycles, Sporting Goods

26 WEST 23d STREET, NEW YORK CITY

Take a Combination Case of the LARKIN SOAPS

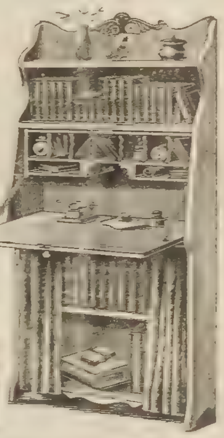
and a "Chautauqua"

Reclining Easy Chair or Desk

ON THIRTY DAYS' TRIAL.



CASE CONTAINS . . .

100 Bars Sweet Home Soap. 10 Bars White Woolen Soap.
9 Packages Boraxine. 18 Cakes Finest Toilet Soaps.
Perfumes, Cold Cream, Tooth-Powder, Shaving Soap.

If changes in contents desired, write.

The Soaps at retail would cost $10.00
Either Premium is worth . $10.00
Both if at retail . . . $20.00

From factory to family, Both $10.

AND ON THIRTY DAYS' TRIAL. IF SATISFIED, YOU REMIT $10.00; IF DISAPPOINTED, HOLD GOODS SUBJECT TO OUR ORDER.

The Larkin Soap Mfg. Co., Buffalo, N. Y.

Our offer explained more fully in The Outlook Nov. 16th, 23d, and 30th.

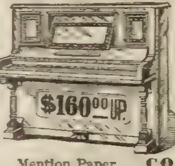
NOTE.—We are personally acquainted with Mr. Larkin, of the Soap Manufacturing C[illegible] [illegible]ted their factory; seen their goods and premiums offered, and we know that they are [illegible] that they are able to give so much for so little money. The Company are perfectly [illegible] from The Churchman.—We have investigated the propositions in [illegible] goods offered are worth more than price charged, and that the Company will d[illegible]

PIANOS! ORGANS! FREE!

TEST TRIAL FOR 30 DAYS IN YOUR OWN HOME. NO MONEY REQUIRED



PIANOS-ORGANS FROM $25.00 UP

Including a Complete Musical Outfit. CASH or EASY PAYMENTS.

NEW SOUVENIR CATALOGUE

A work of art illustrated in 10 colors. Worth its Weight in Gold. We pay charges on it and send it FREE, all y[illegible] have to do is to ask for it to-day please. Reme[illegible] this is the old established house of CORNISH & C[illegible] the only firm in the wor[illegible] exclusively [illegible] to Family direct. A [illegible]. We save you from $[illegible] to Mention Paper. CORNISH & CO., Est. [illegible] Washington, N. J.

Special Offers Now Ready

CRITERION

J. B. COLT & CO., 115-117 NASSAU ST., AND 59 FIFTH AVE., NEW YORK. SEND FOR CATALOG.

STEREOPTICONS, MAGIC LANTERNS, ELECTRIC FOCUSING LAMPS, &c.

AGENCIES: [illegible]

"A FAIR FACE CANNOT ATONE FOR AN UNTIDY HOUSE." USE SAPOLIO

A Thankful Soul

By Frank L. Stanton

I take life jest as I find it.
If it's hot I never mind it;
Hunt around fer shady trees
An' jest whistle up a breeze!
If it's snowin', why—I go,
Jest go a-skimmin' 'crost the snow!
(Ever try how good it feels
In a wagon off the wheels?)
Spring or winter, summer, fall,
I'm jest thankful fer 'em all!

Folks say this world's full of strife;
That jest 'livens up my life!
When the good Lord made it, he Done the best fer you an' me—
Saw the sky had too much blue,
An' rolled up a cloud or two.
Give us light to sow an' reap,
Then throw in the dark fer sleep.
Every single drop of dew
Twinkles on a rose fer you.

Tell you! this world's full o' light—
Sun by days and stars by night;
Sometimes sorrow comes along,
But it's all mixed up with song.
Folks that always make complaint
They ain't healthy—that they ain't!
Some would jest live with the chills
If it warn't fer doctors' bills!
Always findin' fault with things—
Kill a bird because it sings.

I take life jest as I find it;
If it's a sunshiny day,
Hot or cold, I never mind it—
That's my time fer makin' hay;
If it's rainin', fills my wish—
Makes the lakes jest right fer fish;
When the snow falls white as foam,
Then I track the rabbits home.
Spring or winter, summer, fall,
I'm jest thankful fer 'em all!

—Demorest's Magazine.

A Scholar in Disguise

A correspondent of the "Canada Presbyterian," who was a student in Scotland in 1865, tells a story of the late Professor John Stuart Blackie which well illustrates the way in which this famous teacher, who could sometimes be very severe, could also be cordial when he came in contact with serious students.

The correspondent was preparing for his degree in classics, and was spending a little time at Braemar. He had gone up to a great rock called the Lion's Face, and was lying beside a path reading the third book of Virgil's "Æneid" aloud. Suddenly he felt the touch of a stick on his shoulder, and, turning about, saw a man by his side.

It was a tall, lean man, with a shepherd's plaid thrown loosely around his shoulders. In his right hand he held a shepherd's crook, and on his head was a "wide-awake" hat, almost as wide of brim as the cowboy hat of the American plains.

"Ye're reading Virgil, laddie," said the man.

"Yes, sir."

"Let me hear ye translate this," he continued; and in a wonderful way he rolled off a dozen lines of the poet, chosen at random.

The young man did his best to render it into English, and then parsed and scanned the lines, in a faulty way he thought. But the unknown man in the guise of a shepherd was pleased to commend the student's effort.

Then the two walked together down to Castleton, the stranger talking eloquently and most instructively of the writings of the Greeks and Romans. When their ways parted the man said:

"I suppose you don't know who I am?"

"No, sir," answered the student.

"Well, I am Professor Blackie, of Edinburgh. I dare say you have heard of me."

"Oh, very often indeed."

"Aye, aye," said the Professor, slowly and thoughtfully. "And I dare say ye've heard that many folk think I'm a wee bit cracked," tapping his forehead with his finger; "but never forget, laddie, that, as Tam Chalmers once said, a crack often lets in the light!"

Why Latin is Used

"Why doesn't the doctor write his prescription in English instead of Latin?" asked a man of a druggist, whose reply the New York "Herald" publishes:

In the first place, Latin is a more exact and concise language than English, and, being a dead language, does not change, as all living languages do.

Then, again, since a very large part of all drugs in use are botanical, they have in the pharmacopœia the same names that they have in botany—the scientific names. Two-thirds of such drugs haven't any English names, and so couldn't be written in English.

But suppose a doctor did write a prescription in English for an uneducated patient. The patient reads it, thinks he remembers it, and so tries to get it filled from memory the second time. Suppose, for instance, it called for iodide of potassium, and he got it confused with cyanide of potassium. He could safely take ten grains of the first, but one grain of the second would kill him.

That's an extreme case, but it will serve for an illustration. Don't you see how the Latin is a protection and a safeguard to the patient? Prescriptions in Latin he can't read, and consequently does not try to remember.

Now for a final reason. Latin is a language that is used by scientific men the world over, and no other language is. You can get a Latin prescription filled in any country on the face of the earth where there is a drug-store.

We had a prescription here the other day which we had put up originally, and which had since been stamped by druggists in London, Paris, Berlin, Constantinople, Cairo, and Calcutta. What good would an English prescription be in St. Petersburg?

The man that sings the loudest in church throws his head so far back that he can't see the collection-basket when it comes along. Some folks are so fond of trouble they can't enjoy honey for thinking of what might have happened if the bee had stung 'em. The road to heaven is so narrow that some people have about decided there is not room for two at a time. When you hear a man saying that this is a hard world, ten to one but he's broken his leg trying to fly when he should have been walking.—Atlanta Constitution.

Not a Patent Medicine.

Constipation

is an actual disease with thousands. Cathartics give only temporary relief. The cause of the disease. some obscure nerve trouble, must be reached by a nerve tonic, one containing phosphorus, in order to obtain action upon the brain and spinal cord.

Freligh's Tonic

A Phosphorized Cerebro-Spinant

is the only tonic containing phosphorus, chemically pure, perfectly harmless. Prompt, concentrated, powerful. IT WILL CURE CONSTIPATION permanently.

Regular bottle, $1.00, 100 doses. All druggists, or by mail. Sample by mail, 25 cents. Descriptive pamphlet, formula, testimonials. etc., mailed to any address.

I. O. Woodruff & Co.,
Manufacturing Chemists,
106-108 FULTON STREET, NEW YORK CITY.

Formula on Every Bottle.

HARTFORD TIRES ARE THE STANDARD SINGLE TUBES

Fastest. Easiest to Repair. Safest.

THE HARTFORD RUBBER WORKS CO. HARTFORD CONN.
BRANCHES NEW YORK CHICAGO.

Absolutely Pure—
Delicious—Nutritious

THE

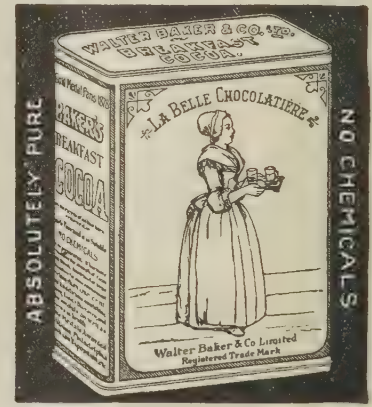
BREAKFAST COCOA

Made by

WALTER BAKER & CO. LIMITED

Established at Dorchester, Mass., 1780

Costs less than one cent a cup. No chemicals.



Always ask for Walter Baker & Co.'s BREAKFAST COCOA

Made at Dorchester, Mass.

It bears their Trade-Mark, "La Belle Chocolatière," on every can.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS

The Uses of Poetry

Poetry, as at present practiced in this country, has several important functions that are not put down in the books. It is very good gymnastics for a young writer, giving him exercise in the choice of words with precision, and in their melodic value and significance. This is invaluable at a time when the young writer has few ideas but abundant energy. Moreover, poetry is a very safe outlet for youthful sentiment. You can say almost anything to a young woman in rhyme, without entangling yourself in a promise of matrimony. It is as safe a present as a box of candy. Then, too, in the modern magazine, poetry is an indispensable gap-filler. It is just as useful as mud in filling up the chinks in a log house. But its most ornamental office of recent years is to furnish material for pretty little books to young publishers, who of course desire to make a good showing on a small investment. Nothing has been discovered that will so handsomely adorn two ounces of hand-made paper and an eccentric book-cover as a sprinkling of verse here and there. Even a pastel does not balance on a page quite so artistically. Chicago has been the leader in what might be called the Deckle-Edge Renascence.

An examination of many of these recent books of poetry shows that hexameters and iambic pentameters are very much out of style. The lines are too long, and eliminate or curtail the wide margins that are the chief delight in book-making. To all young poets who want to be published we say most earnestly, do not make your lines over four feet, and taper them down to a single explosive syllable. Then give them a crescendo ending with a large cap line and three!!! We used to hear of the poetic ear; it has been superseded by the typographic eye.—"Droch" in "Life."

Two Phases of Home Mission Work in a New Territory

To the Editors of The Outlook:

The story of the beginnings of missionary work by Christian ministers in Oklahoma is one of the most stirring of the many astonishing things which occurred at the successive "openings" in which thousands of men frantically sought and found homes; in which claims were made for almost every 160 acres of land over thousands of square miles of prairie literally in a day. Among the first to come to almost every projected town-site were ministers of the Gospel. In very many cases there were preaching services within a day or two after settlers were permitted to enter the territory. Very soon church organizations were established, church buildings erected, and missionaries began regular, persistent, and energetic work. Most of the funds for the erection of the buildings and for the support of the ministry were supplied by Christian people in other parts of the country. One missionary told me he received only fifty cents "from the field" during his first year of work.

This work was not that of any one denomination. Most Protestant denominations actively participated. Each of the leading denominations has spent money and effort freely. Many thousands of dollars will be expended this year by each of several such denominations. Much good has been done and is being done. The missionary spirit is not dead. Belief in the value of their distinctive principles or practice is not abated among the membership of our churches.

That more good could have been done, that there would be more effective work now and a better prospect for the future, if there had been and were now a wiser distribution of work and less division of the Christian forces in a community, seems evident.

For eight months I have lived in a pleasant county town of twelve to fifteen hundred population, these mainly white, English-speaking Protestants. The town is six years old. It has five church buildings, belonging to orthodox Protestant denominations; another such denomination is preparing to erect a building. It is said there are as many more religious denominations maintaining distinct organizations and holding occasional services. Two of the denominations with church buildings or regularly holding services have the same name—one "North," one "South." Two others are so nearly alike that ministers freely pass from one to the other. Two have "special peculiarities" which tend to keep them separate from other Christians. The total active resident membership is perhaps two hundred. Probably not a larger number have attended all the churches at any one time in months. The six societies do not feel able to give more than $1,000 per year for the support of the ministry.

The condition in this town is not unlike that in others in the Territory, except that there is here a college endowed by the United States. The writer feels a special responsibility for the moral and religious training of the students of this college. Neither for them, for the few Christian people, nor for the irreligious mass of the population does the present condition seem a fortunate one. An effort has been made to secure a consolidation of two of the churches. This has been strongly opposed by the membership of one. It has been suggested that the responsibility does not rest alone on the Christian people here, but on the official representatives of the different denominations, and especially on those who apportion and distribute the money contributed for home mission work. A thoughtful pastor in the Territory recently said: "Each denomination has acted as if there were no other Church to preach the Gospel in Oklahoma."

Is there anything to be done?

G. E. Morrow.

Oklahoma Agricultural College, Stillwater, Okla.

An Ounce of Prevention is cheaper than any quantity of cure. Don't give children narcotics or sedatives. They are unnecessary when the infant is properly nourished, as it will be if brought up on the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk.

Associated Artists
115 East 23d St., New York
MARCH SALE of DRAPERIES
For Country Houses
Special Designs in Chintzes for cottages by the sea.
Silks and Linens in soft and durable shades for summer Dress Goods.

Palatable, Nourishing,
Strengthening
—three qualities that go to make Somatose
a perfect food for the pale, thin anæmic, dyspeptic and overworked, and those needing improved nourishment.
Somatose-Biscuit, 10% Somatose. A valuable addition to the diet.
Runkel Bros.' Somatose-Cocoa (10% Somatose), for nursing mothers, invalids and convalescents. A pleasant and strengthening beverage for table use.
Runkel Bros.' Somatose-Chocolate (10% Somatose), for eating and drinking.
All druggists. Descriptive pamphlets free of Schieffelin & Co., New York, Sole Agts.

THE NEWTON REST CURE
WEST NEWTON, MASS.
A private house in a fine situation has been arranged by a physician to receive a limited number of ladies temporarily disabled through nervous diseases.

TYPEWRITER HEADQUARTERS,
45 Liberty st., New York, sells all makes under half price. Don't buy before writing them for unprejudiced advice and prices. Exchanges. Immense stock for selection. Shipped for trial. Guaranteed first-class. Largest house in the world. Dealers supplied. 52-page illus cat. free

25 CTS. PISO'S CURE FOR 25 CTS.
CURES WHERE ALL ELSE FAILS.
Best Cough Syrup. Tastes Good. Use in time. Sold by druggists.
CONSUMPTION

ALFRED PEATS
PRIZE
WALL PAPER
SAMPLES FREE—FREIGHT PREPAID.
We will mail you samples free of our Prize Patterns, 1896 Series, and our "Guide, How to Paper," if you will send us a description of your rooms to aid us in selecting suitable patterns and colorings.
OUR NEW $1,000 PRIZE DESIGNS are the handsomest and most artistic papers manufactured and are only 10c. and up per roll.
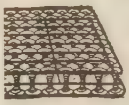
The New York World says:
None so beautiful, so perfect, or offered so cheap.
The Chicago Tribune says:
They will be in great demand by people of artistic taste.
Over 2,000,000 rolls of other paper,
3 cents per roll and up.
WE PREPAY THE FREIGHT.
Agents Wanted.—One Agent in each town who can furnish good references, to sell from our large sample books on commission, and to whom we can refer all requests for samples in their vicinity. Experience not necessary. Agent's outfit complete, $1.00.
Write to nearest address.
ALFRED PEATS
CHICAGO 143-145 Wabash Ave.
NEW YORK 41-43 W. 14th St.

Ideal Spring Beds


"Wide awake facts about sleep."
Our booklet, illustrating and describing them, sent free.
An up-to-date pocket map of your State sent for three 2-cent stamps.
FOSTER BROS. MFG. CO.
137 Broad St., Utica, N. Y.

DEAFNESS
and Head Noises relieved by using Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums.
New scientific invention; different from all other devices. The only safe, simple, comfortable and invisible Ear Drum in the world. Helps where medical skill fails. No wire or string attachment. Write for pamphlet.
WILSON EAR DRUM CO.,
Offices: 155 Trust Bldg., Louisville, Ky.
1122 Broadway, New York.

NEW MAMMOTH POULTRY GUIDE showing colored plate of chickens in natural colors. Finest book ever published. Almost 100 pages. Tells all about Poultry for Profit or Pleasure. Price only 15c.
JOHN BAUSCHER, JR., Box 264, Freeport, Ills.

DEAFNESS & HEAD NOISES CURED by my INVISIBLE Tubular Cushions. Have helped more to good HEARing than all other devices combined. Whispers HEARd. Help ears as glasses do eyes. F. Hiscox, 858 B'dway, N.Y. Book of proofs FREE

HOW DO WE DO IT? $85 buys this elegant Oxford Organ.
5 octaves, 11 stops, guaranteed for 15 years. Instruction book and stool FREE. Wonderful but true! To prove it send for our free illustrated catalogue, at prices that are the lowest for the FINEST ORGANS AND PIANOS. Address OXFORD MDSE. CO., 342 Wabash Avenue, CHICAGO.

SUBSCRIBERS' WANTS

Want advertisements of thirty words or less will be published under this heading at one dollar a week. Four cents a week is charged for each word in excess of thirty.

AN ATTRACTIVE ESTATE to let in Swampscott, Mass.; stone house of twelve rooms, fully furnished; two acres of land; commanding view of ocean; large summer living-room; stable. Address SWAMPSCOTT, 11 Macon St., Cambridge, Mass.

A POSITION desired by middle-aged American woman to care for invalid. Would assist in housework if needed. References furnished as to character and experience. Terms, twenty dollars per month. Address BELLE W. FERRIS, Sound Beach, Fairfield Co., Conn.

ABROAD.—Refined young German desires permanent position with family going to Europe for the summer, as nursery governess or maid. Reliable, experienced, fond of children. Best references. Address 634 Madison Ave., Albany, N. Y.

SHOPPING of every description done with taste and judgment. Will attend strangers in town, saving them time and money. Highest credentials. Address LOUISE M. KIMBALL, 172 West 95th St., New York.

PRIVATE SCHOOL TEACHER, experienced in traveling, speaking German, French, English fluently, desires to go abroad as companion or chaperon in June. References. Miss BABST, 73 Auburn St., Paterson, N. J.

A YOUNG COLLEGE WOMAN, with a good knowledge of Latin and French, wants a position as teacher or companion. Can make herself generally useful. Address Miss B., Box 102, So. Braintree, Mass.

PARISIAN LADY wishes to find pianist, violinist, and singer to sing and play duets. Address B. B., No. 462, care The Outlook.

Recreation Department The Outlook

Health Resorts

Full information in relation to any Health Resort and ways of reaching the same may be had free by mail on request.

Christian Endeavorers

The Y. P. S. C. E. Convention of 1896 will be held at Washington, D. C., about July 9 or 10. Those who took the "Big Four Route" from Western cities to Boston last year well know the superior facilities of that line. The "Big Four" from St. Louis, Chicago, Peoria, Indianapolis, and West and Northwest in connection with the C. & O. Railway, offers the best line to Washington. It is historical and picturesque, and is delightful in every respect. Through palace sleeping-cars run daily from St. Louis and Indianapolis to Washington. Look up the many advantages when you make up the interesting itinerary of your trip. Information cheerfully furnished. E. O. McCormick, Pass. Traffic Mgr.; D. B. Martin, Gen'l Pass. & Tkt. Agent, Cincinnati.

TO HOTEL PROPRIETORS

Proprietors of first-class city or summer hotels desiring a manager, or one to take charge of steward's department, are requested to address the advertiser, who has indorsements of the highest character for either position. Address G., No. 471, care Recreation Department, The Outlook.

TRAVELERS' R. R. GUIDE Formerly Appletons'.
R. R. Maps and Time-Tables. Conveniently Indexed. Monthly—25 cents. 24 Park Place, N. Y.

TOURS AND TRAVEL

International Navigation Company's Lines

SAILING EVERY WEDNESDAY

From Piers 14 and 15, North River, New York (foot of Fulton St.)

AMERICAN LINE

NEW YORK—SOUTHAMPTON (London—Paris)

Paris . . . . . . April 1, 10 A.M.	New York . May 27, 10 A.M.
St Paul . . . . April 8, 10 A.M.	St Louis . . . June 3, 10 A.M.
New York, April 15, 10 A.M.	Berlin (Sat.) June 6, 10 A.M.
Paris . . . . . April 22, 10 A.M.	St Paul . . . . June 10, 10 A.M.
St Paul . . . April 29, 10 A.M.	Paris (Sat.) June 13, 10 A.M.
New York . . May 6, 10 A.M.	New York, June 17, 10 A.M.
Paris . . . . . May 13, 10 A.M.	St Louis . . June 24, 10 A.M.
St Paul . . . . May 20, 10 A.M.	St Paul . . . . July 1, 10 A.M.

RED STAR LINE

NEW YORK—ANTWERP

Southwark, April 1, 12 noon	Southwark, May 6, 12 noon
Noordland, April 8, 12 noon	Noordland, May 13, 12 noon
Friesland, April 15, 12 noon	Friesland, May 20 . . 12 noon
Kensington, Apr. 22, 12 noon	Kensington, May 27, 10:30 AM
Westernland, Apr. 29, 12 noon	Westernland, Jne. 3, 12 noon

INTERNATIONAL NAVIGATION COMPANY
6 Bowling Green, New York
305-307 Walnut St., Philadelphia.
32 So. Clark St., Chicago.
609 Market St. (Grand Hotel Bldg.), San Francisco.

"SEA ROUTE TO SAN FRANCISCO"

A Trip for HEALTH, REST, and PLEASURE

passing within view of Cuba, crossing the historic Isthmus of Panama, and calling at ten Pacific ports of Central America and Mexico, with opportunity to visit these Spanish-American Countries. The educational advantages of this trip, in addition to the pleasures of the journey, render it peculiarly attractive, so much so that tourists repeat the voyage year after year. THIRTY-DAY TRIP FOR $120. EXCURSION, $216. All expenses included. Steamers have superior accommodations and leave New York every ten days. For full particulars apply at Company's Office, 29 Broadway.

JOHN MUIR, Traffic Manager.
Steamers sail from Pier foot West 27th St., N. Y.

Cook's Tours to Europe

All Traveling Expenses Included

Our Annual May Party, the first of our high-class parties to Europe, will sail by the White Star Line S.S. "Majestic" on May 6. Succeeding departures May 16, 23, 28, June 10, 17, 27. All the arrangements for these parties are in every respect first-class.

Illustrated programmes free. Railroad and steamship tickets for individual travelers everywhere.

THOS. COOK & SON, 261 & 1225 Broadway, New York.

KIMBALL'S TOURS

in Europe (8th season). Limited party sails June 24, on "St. Louis." Moderate price, comprehensive route.
EDWIN C. KIMBALL 56 Summer St. Boston, Mass.

Tours and Travel

Under the American Flag

The Cruises of the S. S. "Ohio"

The largest and finest and only steamer specially fitted as a pleasure yacht. Dining saloon holds 200, the full limit of any party.

March 28th.—A 70-days' cruise to the Mediterranean, visiting Spain, Egypt, Palestine, Turkey, Italy, France, etc. Rate, from $425 upwards.

June 27th.—A 60-days' cruise to Russia, Sweden, Norway, and the Midnight Sun, stopping at Bodo to see the total eclipse of the sun on August 8th. Rate, $475 and upwards.

September 16th.—A four months' cruise as far east as India. Rate, $950 and upwards.

Send 3 cts. postage for prospectives of any of these cruises to the
THOMAS FOREIGN TOURIST CO.,
1715 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

High Class Escorted Private Party to Europe

By popular Mediterranean route, sailing from New York Saturday, July 11th, by the elegant North German Lloyd express SS. "Ems," accompanied throughout by the Rev. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D., 11 Hanson Place, Brooklyn, N. Y., assisted by thoroughly efficient European conductors, visiting the principal cities of Italy, Switzerland, Germany, Holland, Belgium, France, England, Scotland, and Ireland; sixty days' tour; all included: three meals daily, transportation, carriage drives, sightseeing. $465.00. Membership limited. Correspondence invited. Apply to Dr. Banks, or HENRY GAZE & SONS, Ltd., 113 Broadway, New York; 201 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.; 220 South Clark St., Chicago, Ill.; 135 South Fifth Street, Philadelphia, Pa. Early application desirable owing to the popularity of the steamer.

(Bridge of Sighs)

The FRAZAR TOURS TO EUROPE

Tenth Season

Eight Comprehensive Tours, sailing May 9, June 6, 20, 24, and 27, July 4. Including British Isles, Holland, Belgium, Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Italy, and France. Send for itineraries and references to

Mrs. M. D. FRAZAR & CO.
Managers of Foreign Tours,
74 Globe Building, Boston.

Bicycle Tour Abroad

Party of 6 gentlemen, to sail June 24th for 3 months' absence; route to include England, Normandy and Brittany, Valleys of Moselle and Rhine, Holland, and Belgium. Price, $550.00. Address CHANNING ELLERY, 228 W. 38th St., New York City.

MALLORY STEAMSHIP LINES
Delightful Ocean Trips to the Ports of Texas, Georgia, Florida.
Tourists' Tickets to all Winter Resorts in Texas, Colorado, California, Mexico, Georgia, Florida, &c., Our 64-page "Satchel Handbook" mailed free. C. H. MALLORY & CO., Pier 20, E. R., N. Y.

VACATION TRIP TO EUROPE

A lady is forming her twelfth European party; the route is very attractive, and includes the principal Art Cities; also one cycle of the Bayreuth Festival; ladies desiring to join such a party can apply for itinerary and information to Mrs. M. J. YOUNG-FULTON, 23 Union Square, New York.

EUROPE, 1896 11th SEASON

38 Days, all expenses	$175
66 " " "	$400

Circulars upon application.
ELIAS BROOKINGS, 54 Madison Ave., Springfield, Mass.

A.—EUROPE.—THIRTY EXCURSIONS.— Popular prices. $200 and up. Ocean tickets by all lines. Parties to Holy Land, March 21, Sept. 6.
F. C. CLARK, 111 Broadway, New York.

EUROPEAN TOURS

Limited party, personally conducted by Dr. and Mrs. Paine, now forming. Unequaled arrangements. Terms reasonable. Address H. S. PAINE, M.D., Glens Falls, N. Y.

DR. CHENEY'S PARTY

TO EUROPE. (9th season.) Personally conducted by O. D. Cheney, M.D., and wife, of Haverhill, Mass. Limited to 25. 78 days. Cunard steamer, June 27.

EUROPE Ideal Tour. 250 miles of Coaching. Limited party by Cunard steamer. SCOTLAND to SWITZERLAND. Also ITALY
Rev. H. A. Todd, A.M., Corona (L. I.), N. Y.

Tours and Travel

Going To . . . EUROPE?

H. Gaze & Sons (Ltd.)
The Universal Tourist Agts. (Est. 1844) will send out

67 Escorted Parties of the highest-class. Write for the details. Individual Tours Everywhere, and choicest berths on all steamship lines. Tourist Gazette—Post Free.

113 Broadway, N.Y.
or 201 Washington Ft., Boston; 220 So. Clark St., Chicago; 135 So. Fifth St., Philadelphia.

85 Days in Europe

Few vacancies in limited party to visit England, France, Germany, Belgium, Switzerland, Italy, Gibraltar. Address Prof. CAMILLE THURWANGER, 31 Pierce Building, Boston.

EUROPE.—A small family party is being organized for spending the summer in European travel. Leave June 17, return in September. Route to include Belgium, Holland, the Rhine, Germany, Switzerland, Italian Lakes, Italy, France, England. Price, $600. References exchanged. Mrs. L. E. Schmeider, 138 W. 4th St., Mount Vernon, N.Y.

BAKER'S EUROPEAN TOURS.—$380 to $395, embracing England, France, Germany, the Rhine, Austria, Switzerland, Italy, etc. All expenses paid. Swiss tour, $255. Short tour, $132 and $185. Send for program. FRANK BAKER, 314 Bennett Building, New York.

EUROPE for 67 days, or less, starting June 27. Finest Tour going; includes coaching trip. Economical. Write for circulars to Box F, Plainfield, N. J.

FRENCH LADY, having traveled all over Europe and Africa, wishes to chaperon one or two ladies for the summer. Highest certificates from best schools and families. PARISIAN, No. 461, The Outlook.

FOREIGN HOTELS

England

Chester, England

Queen Hotel First-class Hotel, connected with the General Railway by covered way. Lift. The Hotel is largely visited by Americans. H. T. GOULD, Manager.

Holland

HOLLAND AMSTERDAM

AMSTEL HOTEL The largest hotel in Amsterdam. Strongly recommended to families. Every moderate comfort. Moderate prices.

Italy

Lake of Como, Italy

GRAND HOTEL BELLAGIO

AND DEPENDANCE

HOTEL VILLA SERBELLONI

One of the finest Hotels in Europe. The most beautiful site on the Italian Lakes. Perfect sanitary arrangements. Electric light. Telegraph in the hotel. L. Breitschmid, P.

Switzerland

LUCERNE, SWITZERLAND

Hotel d'Angleterre First class; lift; finest situation in Lucerne; arrangement de pension; prices moderate; opens April 1st. F. HEFFEN, Prop.

INTERLAKEN, SWITZERLAND

Hotel and Pension St. George

Situated directly on the main promenade, opposite the park and the mountains. Cable-cars connect with steamboats and railroads. Highly recommended. C. Lichtenberger.

NORTH CAPE

GUDVANGEN

STALHEIM

SOGNEFJORD

HARDANGER FJORD

ODDE

HARDANGER FJORD WATERFALL

TO THE LAND OF THE MIDNIGHT SUN

SUMMER CRUISE

TO

NORWAY, The NORTH CAPE,

AND TO

SPITZBERGEN

By Hamburg-American Line's Twin-Screw Express Steamer

COLUMBIA

THE tour of Norway and the North Cape of Europe offers a series of unrivaled attractions, which include every variety of Alpine and coast scenery, and present the wildest and most beautiful effects. The cañon-like inlets from the sea—fjords, in Norwegian—spread inland like the branches of a tree, and are bounded by lofty and precipitous mountains, while at places there are stretches of flat and well-cultivated banks, which present a smiling and picturesque contrast to the forest of the rising slopes and the glistening snow of the higher mountains in the background. Most of these fjords are navigable, and the traveler may enjoy their beautiful scenery in comfort from the deck of the steamer, which takes him past precipitous cliffs nearly a mile in height, to view mighty glaciers and thundering waterfalls.

Passengers will leave by the twin-screw express steamship COLUMBIA, sailing from NEW YORK July 2, 1896, due in HAMBURG July 10, 1896.

Upon arrival at Hamburg a special train will be in waiting and convey passengers to Berlin, where a stay of about four days is proposed. Arrangements will also be made for a special train from Berlin to bring passengers back in time for the sailing of the COLUMBIA, from HAMBURG, on July 15.

The cruise to the "Nordland" begins at Hamburg, and the following itinerary has been arranged:

From Hamburg to Hardanger Fjord,
Odde,
Molde,
Romsdalsfjord,
Veblungsnaes,
Trondhjem,
North Cape, and
Spitzbergen, lying between 76° 30′ and 80° 30′, N. lat. This will insure passengers the opportunity of enjoying the glories of the midnight sun, which, after July 30, is not visible at the North Cape. Returning, the first stop is made at Tromsoe, thence on to the Lofoten Islands,
Raftsund,
Digermulen,
Vestfjord,
Storfjord,
Geirangerfjord,
Marok,
Sognefjord,
Gudvangen,
Stalheimsklev, to Vossevangen, and thence by rail to Bergen. Here they again board their steamer and return to Hamburg.

The cruise from Hamburg to the "Nordland" and return to Hamburg will occupy about twenty days. Close connection may be made by the FUERST BISMARCK, leaving HAMBURG for New York Aug. 6, 1896.

Our passengers have the privilege of extending their stay in Europe and returning from Hamburg, Southampton, Cherbourg, Genoa, Naples, Algiers, or Gibraltar to New York by any of the express steamers of the HAMBURG-AMERICAN LINE during 1896.

For further particulars, descriptive pamphlet, rates, etc., address

Hamburg-American Line

NEW YORK, 37 Broadway
CHICAGO, 125 La Salle St.
BOSTON, 70 State St.
PHILADELPHIA, 337 Walnut St.

Please mention The Outlook when you write.

SUMMER COTTAGES

FOR RENT FOR SUMMER MONTHS—A Furnished Cottage of eleven rooms, delightfully situated on high ground. For particulars address Box 407, Litchfield, Conn.

LAKE GEORGE Three Cottages to Let for the Summer at SILVER BAY

Finely finished and completely furnished for housekeeping. Near hotel where meals can be furnished. For particulars address SILAS H. PAINE, The Dakota, 72d St., New York.

FOR SALE—At "Twilight Park," in the Catskills, a desirable cottage, furnished, ready for occupancy, with ample water supply; picturesquely located and fine mountain view. Price reasonable. Address D., 27 West 128th St.

FOR SALE OR TO RENT—Cottage of eight rooms on ocean beach; "Pleasant View," near Watch Hill, R. I. For particulars apply to E. C. HALE, 4833 Kimbark Avenue, Chicago, Ill., or after April 1st to Mrs. A. R. HALE, Watch Hill House, Watch Hill, R. I.

HOTELS AND RESORTS

California

HOTEL GREEN PASADENA, CAL. Accommodation for 400 guests. Occupies an entire block. Souvenir mailed.
G. G. GREEN, Owner. J. H. HOLMES, Mgr.

Colorado

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colo.: The Antlers
Illustrated book, describing Colorado Springs, sent on request by E. BARNETT, Proprietor.

District of Columbia

EBBITT HOUSE

WASHINGTON, D. C.

H. C. BURCH, Manager.—Popular prices. Regular rate, $4 per day up; 50 rooms on sixth floor, steam heat, electric light, reduced to $2.50 and $3 per day; 50 rooms on other floors, reduced from $4 to $3.50 per day; parlors and alcove parlors at equally low rates.

Special rates for Army and Navy Officers and Clergy.

Illinois

Chicago Beach Hotel 51st St. & Lake Shore
CHICAGO, ILL. HARVEY S. DENISON, Mgr. Demonstrated the most delightful and comfortable abiding-place throughout the year in Chicago.

Maine

MT. DESERT -Seal Harbor.—Furnished houses for $175, $250, $350. Hot-water bath in second story. W. M. GRISWOLD, Cambridge, Mass.

Massachusetts

DR. RING'S SANATORIUM
8 miles from Boston. Arlington Heights, Mass.
For Change, Rest, Care, and Treatment

New Hampshire

BOYS' Summer Camp, White Mountains Manhannock Island, Lake Winnepesaukee, N. H.—Nicely floored tents, entertainment hall, steam launch, two ten-oared barges, rowboats, tennis courts, baseball and athletic field, etc. Tutoring in all branches (optional). Opens July 1st. Illustrated prospectus free. Reference by permission: Pres. Dwight, of Yale; Gov. Coffin, of Conn.; Hon. Chauncey M. Depew; Dr. Philip S. Moxom. Address Rev. JOHN M. DICK, B.D. (Yale), New Haven, Conn. SPECIAL.—Mr. Dick spends five months abroad, going in September, and will take a few boys for part or all of the time. Wheeling tour in September and October.

New Jersey

TRAINS FOR LAKEWOOD leave New York, via Central Railroad of New Jersey, foot of Liberty Street, North River, at 4:30, 8:15 A.M.; 1:45, 3:40, 4:40 P.M.

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
THE SHELBURNE
On the Ocean Beach
Open throughout the year. Every convenience, including hot and cold sea-water baths, passenger elevator, etc. J. D. SOUTHWICK, Manager.

Haddon Hall Atlantic City, N.J.
ON THE OCEAN FRONT
Has enlarged to more than its former capacity. Will hereafter remain open throughout the year. Complete and modern in every detail. Rooms en suite; baths attached.
LEEDS & LIPPINCOTT.

WALTER'S SANITARIUM

Walter's Park, Wernersville, Pa.

In the mountains of Pennsylvania, 1,000 feet above tidewater, only 2 hours from Philadelphia, 4¼ hours from New York. The most beautiful of locations. No Malaria, Mosquitoes or Dew. Air, Water, and Scenery unexcelled in Europe or America. Buildings of mountain granite. Electric Light and Bells, Hydraulic Elevator, Steam Heat and Open Grates, Sun Parlor, Livery, Dairy; Baths, Massage, Swedish Movements, Electricity, Oxygen. Physicians of 25 years' experience. Billiards, Pool, Lawn Tennis, Bowling, Croquet. Circulars free.

Be sure to address correctly, WALTER'S,
Always, WALTER'S SANITARIUM, Walter's Park, or Wernersville, Pa.

New Jersey

Galen Hall—A Sanatorium
With all the conveniences of a first-class, quiet hotel. Elevator, steam heat, open-grate fires. Massage, electricity, baths, etc. Table unexcelled. Open all the year. Address Dr. WM. H. H. BULL, Atlantic City, N. J.

THE CHALFONTE
OCEAN FRONT, ATLANTIC CITY, N. J. Sea-water baths in house. Elevator and every modern convenience. Send for illustrated booklet. E. ROBERTS' SONS.

Seaside House Atlantic City, N. J.
Enlarged and refurnished throughout. Open all the year. Elevator, sea-water baths in house, &c. CHAS. EVANS.

THE IRVINGTON
ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
A cheerful, homelike hotel on the Beach; excellent table; reasonable terms. CHAMBERS & HOOPES.

New York City

ST. DENIS

Broadway and 11th St., NEW YORK

Opposite Grace Church EUROPEAN PLAN

Rooms $1.00 per Day and Upward

In a modest and unobtrusive way there are few better conducted hotels in the metropolis than the St. Denis.

The great popularity it has acquired can readily be traced to its unique location, its homelike atmosphere, the peculiar excellence of its cuisine and service, and its very moderate prices.

WILLIAM TAYLOR & SON.

New York

Dr. Strong's Sanitarium

Saratoga Springs, N. Y.

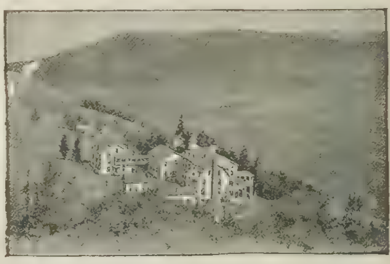
For health or pleasure. The appointments of a first-class Hotel. Elevator, electric bells, steam, sun-parlor, and promenade on the roof. Suites of rooms with baths. Massage, Electricity, all baths and health appliances. New Turkish, Russian, and Natural Sulphur-Water baths. Dry tonic air, Saratoga water, and winter sports. Open all the year. Send for illustrated circular.

New York

Gleason Sanitarium

ELMIRA, N. Y.

1852 (Formerly Elmira Water Cure) 1896



A comfortable winter home for invalids of both sexes. All modern improvements. All forms of aths, massage, electricity, etc.; pure spring-water; under care of regular medical graduates of long experience. Send for illustrated booklet.

North Carolina

ASHEVILLE, N. C., THE SWANNANOA
First-class; central; family and transient hotel; $2 to $3 per day. R. R. RAWLS, Owner and Prop

Pennsylvania

GrandView Sanitarium

WERNERSVILLE, PA.

Unequaled as a four-season sanitarium. Dry and bracing mountain air. Dew unknown. Send for illustrated pamphlet. Drs. WENRICH & DEPPEN.

The Outlook

A·Family·Paper

New Series of The Christian Union

Copyright, 1896, by The Outlook Company.

Entered as second-class matter in the New York Post-Office.

The Outlook is a weekly Family Paper, containing this week seventy-two pages. The subscription price is Three Dollars a year, payable in advance.

Postage is Prepaid by the publishers for all subscriptions in the United States, Canada, and Mexico. For all other countries in the Postal Union add $1.56 for postage.

Changes of Address.—When a change of address is ordered, both the new and the old address must be given. The notice should be sent one week before the change is to take effect.

Discontinuances.—If a subscriber wishes his copy of the paper discontinued at the expiration of his subscription, notice to that effect should be sent. Otherwise it is assumed that a continuance of the subscription is desired.

How to Remit.—Remittances should be sent by Check, Draft, Express-Order, or Money-Order, payable to order of THE OUTLOOK COMPANY. Cash should be sent in Registered Letter.

Letters should be addressed:

THE OUTLOOK,
Clinton Hall, Astor Place,
New York.

Contents for 28 March, 1896

EDITORIAL:

England in Egypt 541
The Advance in Africa 541
Bimetallism Abroad 542
International Arbitration 542
Cuba 543
Direct Election of Senators 543
Louisiana Politics 543
School Reform in New York 544
Death of Thomas Hughes 544
Hints to Some Contributors 545
The Truth in Agnosticism 546
Call Out the Reserves 547

CONTRIBUTED ARTICLES:

The Spectator in New Orleans 548
Bicycling for Women 550
By R. L. Dickinson, M.D.
The Higher Life of Boston 554
By Edward Everett Hale
A Visit to Penzance 561
By A. R. Kimball
Martin Luther, the Prophet of the Reformation 564
By Adolph Harnack
Martin Luther's Life 567
By the Rev. James M. Whiton, Ph.D.
Adolph Harnack: A Sketch 569
By Elbert F. Baldwin
From Atlanta to the Sea.—III 569
By Willis J. Abbot
Kate Carnegie.—Chapters VII., VIII 573
By Ian Maclaren

THE RELIGIOUS WORLD:

The American University 580
Young Women's Christian Association 580
United Work in New York 580
The Men's Club 580
Reform of the Sunday-School, etc., etc 581

BOOKS AND AUTHORS:

Life of Cardinal Manning (Purcell) 582
The Paintings of Venice, etc., etc 583

FOR THE LITTLE PEOPLE 579
NOTES AND QUERIES 586
CORRESPONDENCE 587
THE HOME CLUB 596
BOOKS RECEIVED 599

THE

HANDY BINDER

for The Outlook, made to hold compactly and conveniently twenty-six numbers, will be sent by mail on receipt of sixty cents.

THE OUTLOOK CO. - NEW YORK

Arnold Constable & Co.

SPRING STYLES.

Dress Fabrics

Mohairs.

Plain and Glacé Mohairs,
Fancy Figured Mohairs.

Suitings.

Silk and Wool Mixed Effects.

Check Suitings.

Plain Colored Fabrics.

Canvas Grenadines.
Cheviots, Armures, Serges,
Diagonals.

Printed and Satin Stripe Challies.

Plaid, Stripe, and Fancy

Grenadines.

Broadway & 19th st.

NEW YORK

Embroidery Collars

New, Chic, Stylish.

Can be worn with any style dress. Made of the most exquisite embroideries, at three prices—

$1.00,

$1.25 and $1.50—the same qualities are selling generally for $2.00, $2.25 and $2.50. Postage prepaid. Money refunded, if desired.

Strawbridge & Clothier.

Dry Goods. Philadelphia.

EVERY INCH OF IT FITS

At your dealers or sent post-paid on receipt of price, $1.25, in white, drab, or black.

Aurora Corset Co. 465 La Salle St., AURORA, ILL.

Your House and Stable can be stained for less money than it would cost to paint the house alone, if you use

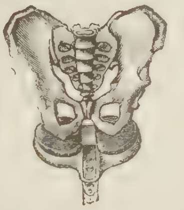
Cabot's Creosote Shingle Stains

To buy and apply they are 50 per cent. cheaper than paint, and 100 per cent. better.

Send for Stained Wood Samples and Colored Sketches.

SAMUEL CABOT, Sole Mfr.
81 Kilby St., Boston, Mass.
Agents at all Central Points



Shows Pelvis as it rests on the Christy Saddle

CHRISTY ANATOMICAL SADDLE

Perfection in Saddle Construction

The only saddle that is built on anatomical principles. Used, recommended, and endorsed by all physicians. Has thick cushion pads where pads are needed. If it is fitted to your bicycle, there will be no chafing, stiffness, or soreness, and riding will be made a pleasure.

Especially Adapted for Women Riders

BOOKLET on Christy Saddle sent free to any address.

PRICE, $5.00. Catalogue Free.

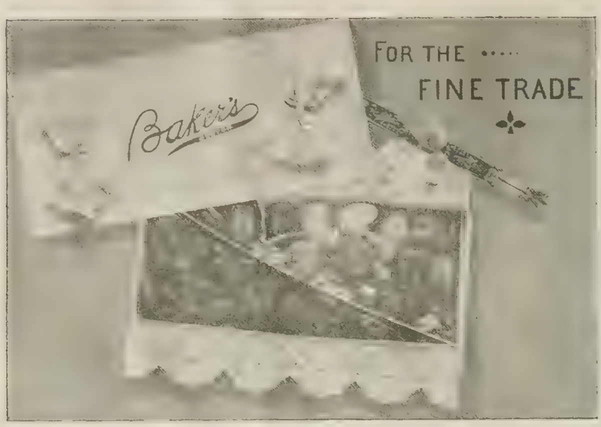
A. G. SPALDING & BROS.
New York Chicago Philadelphia

Quick as a Flash!

WHITMAN'S INSTANTANEOUS CHOCOLATE.

HOW TO USE IT. Take three dessert spoonfuls to a cup of boiling water or milk. Stir briskly a moment, and your Chocolate is ready to serve. Put up in 1 lb. and ½ lb. tins.

Stephen F. Whitman & Son,
Sole Mfrs., Philadelphia.



Princess Style

A box of the highest grade Chocolates and Bonbons, expressly prepared for the fine trade—those who desire something superior in quality. Note the style of the package. Ask for

Baker's "Princess Box"

If you cannot obtain it from your dealer, send us one dollar for a pound box by mail.

SMALL PACKAGE ON RECEIPT OF 10 CENTS

WINTHROP M. BAKER, 545 Atlantic Ave., Boston

Baker's are Superior in Quality. A trifle more expensive.

PERFECT STYLES IN HUMAN HAIR GOODS

We make to order, thus insuring entire satisfaction to our patrons, everything in hair goods in the latest styles.

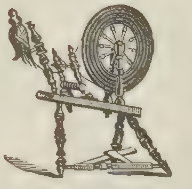
OUR OFFER

We will mail to any responsible party in the United States such hair goods as may be desired. You can inspect the same. If for any reason goods are not satisfactory they may be returned to us. No remittance required until goods are accepted.

SEND FOR CIRCULAR

JOHN MEDINA No. 451 B. Washington St.
BOSTON, MASS.

A BABY'S instinct naturally causes it to turn to that nourishment which satisfies the demand of its system. That is the reason why all babies love Ridge's Food. A food easily assimilated, every particle of which is absorbed by the system. It nourishes, and not merely "fills up." Thirty years manufactured by Woolrich & Co., Palmer, Mass.



Registered Trade-Mark

For Golfing and Cycling Wear

REAL RUSSIA CRASH

is one of the most desirable materials both for ladies and gentlemen.

It is all linen, hand-made throughout of round, coarse threads, quite heavy in weight, yet soft and pliable, so that it drapes nicely. For durability it is unequaled, and launders beautifully.

We have now on hand a large stock imported specially for these uses. Width, 27 inches; price, 30c. and 35c. per yard.

A full line of the most desirable wash fabrics, Linen Lawns, Dimities, Organdies, Linen Batistes, Galatea Cloths, etc., now displayed in our wash goods department.

James McCutcheon & Co.
14 West 23d St., N. Y.
(Opposite Fifth Avenue Hotel)

The Praises of SOZODONT

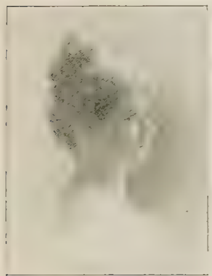
have been sung by connoisseurs in this country and abroad for half a century, and to-day distinguished artists indorse it warmly. One very famous woman says:

"I regard SOZODONT as most delightful and indispensable in the care of the teeth—the only dentifrice of international reputation."

Other indorsements from the highest sources have also been received recently by the Proprietors of Sozodont. If you have never tested those qualities which have made SOZODONT THE KING OF DENTIFRICES, a sample of the liquid and a cake of Sozoderma Soap, for the skin, will be sent on receipt of three cents for postage, provided you mention THE OUTLOOK. Address Hall & Ruckel, Wholesale Druggists, New York.

PERFECT STYLES

IN



HUMAN HAIR GOODS

We make to order, thus insuring entire satisfaction to our patrons, everything in hair goods in the latest styles.

OUR OFFER

We will mail to any responsible party in the United States such hair goods as may be desired. You can inspect the same. If for any reason goods are not satisfactory they may be returned to us. No remittance required until goods are accepted.

SEND FOR CIRCULAR

JOHN MEDINA No. 451 B. Washington St.
BOSTON, MASS.

"Most Delicious"

signifies the highest possible quality. The expression is often used in connection with Baker's Chocolates and Bonbons. A special package, illustrated above, termed the is expressly prepared for the fine trade. Leading dealers carry the "Baker" goods. If you cannot obtain this style package from your dealer, send us one dollar for a pound box by mail.

"PRINCESS BOX"

SMALL PACKAGE ON RECEIPT OF 10 CENTS

WINTHROP M. BAKER, 545 Atlantic Ave., Boston

Baker's are Superior in Quality. A trifle more expensive.

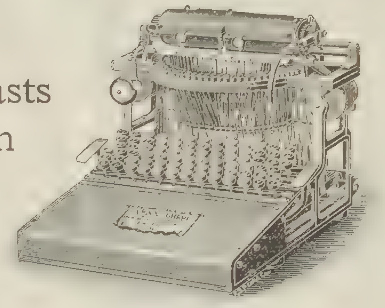
Actual Experience
Discounts any amount of talk

The Caligraph

is the simplest and most durable

Typewriter

"It Outlasts Them All"



Our BOOKLET will give you some candid and unsolicited testimonials that are worth careful consideration.

Send also for our 1896 CATALOGUE and SAMPLE BOOK OF TYPEWRITER PAPERS.

AMERICAN WRITING MACHINE COMPANY
237 Broadway, New York, U. S. A.

A Great Silk Sale at Retail.

In Both Our Stores.

Comprising much of our very large Wholesale Silk Stock; the reserve product of our Clifton Silk Mills; late deliveries from other domestic manufacturers, and consignments from France and Switzerland.

This immense collection of Silks is on sale in both our stores.

James McCreery & Co.,

Broadway & Eleventh Street,
Twenty-third Street,
New York City.

In Support of well tried rules for health and comfort notice the straps of the Ferris Waist. The weight of heavy skirts, damaging to the strongest woman's constitution, is transferred from waist to shoulders, leaving the body free and untrammelled.

FERRIS'

Good Sense
CORSET WAIST

is made to suit all tastes in high or low bust, long or short waist. Children's 25 cents to 50 cents. Misses' 50 cents to $1.00. Ladies' $1.00 to $2.00.

FOR SALE BY ALL RETAILERS.

Grace of Figure

Angularity and awkwardness are more often the fault of habit than of nature. Aim to start right; the rest is easy. The R & G Corset is the starting-point of a perfectly gowned woman.

Price, $1.00, $1.25, $1.50, $1.75, $2.00, $2.50.
If your dealer does not carry it in stock, write R. & G. Mfg. Co., 361 Broadway, New York.

The Outlook
A·Family·Paper

Volume 53 Saturday, 25 April, 1896 Number 17

MOST important among the political conventions last week was that of the Maine Republicans, whose platform places Speaker Reed before the party as the leader of the anti-silver forces opposed to further compromise or evasion upon the currency issue. The entire platform was a characterization of Mr. Reed, and its important clause ran as follows:

> "He is opposed to the free and unlimited coinage of silver, except by international agreement, and until such agreement can be obtained he believes the present gold standard should be maintained. He has always been uncompromisingly for the maintenance of the highest National credit by the utmost good faith towards the public creditor, not for the creditor's sake, but for the Nation's sake, for the sound reason that the most valuable possession of any Nation in time of war or distress, next to the courage of its people, is an honorable reputation. Whoever pays with honor borrows with ease."

This declaration is in sharp contrast with the currency plank adopted by the Maine Republicans two years ago, explicitly indorsing "bimetallism," and demanding "a suitable currency, abundant for all wants." It is also in sharp contrast with the somewhat confused concessions to the advocates of silver made by Speaker Reed when the wave of silver sentiment swept over the Republican party after the repeal of the Sherman Act. It is certainly another striking sign of the general feeling that the time for compromise is past. The same feeling was manifested by the Republican conventions in New Jersey, Kentucky, and North Dakota. In the last two States the platform opposed the free coinage of silver until international co-operation could be secured, while in New Jersey no reference was made to so much as the possibility of international action. In the New Jersey Convention the McKinley element was surprisingly strong, but was unable to instruct the delegates at large to the National Convention to support its candidate. In Kentucky the supporters of Governor Bradley were slightly in the majority, the McKinley supporters having met with a series of defeats near the close of the campaign. In North Dakota the delegates were instructed to support Mr. McKinley. So also were they in Nebraska, where the platform was of the Ohio type. In the Democratic conventions which were held last week in Washington, Colorado, and Missouri, the free-coinage element was everywhere in the majority. In Missouri this element was even able to elect twenty-four of the twenty-eight delegates from St. Louis, and the Convention was practically unanimous. Mr. Bland was nominated for the Presidency. In the Prohibition Convention in Michigan the majority of the committee on resolutions reported a platform ignoring the silver question, but the minority report in favor of free coinage at the old ratio was adopted by an overwhelming majority.

◆

The vote in the House Committee on Territories in favor of Statehood for Arizona is even more surprising than the vote a week earlier in favor of Statehood for New Mexico. It is true that Arizona is only half as illiterate as New Mexico, but, in spite of that, her percentage of white illiteracy is three times as great as the average for the rest of the Union. More than one adult out of five can neither read nor write, and a large part of those possessing the specified degree of education are Mexican in speech, in thought, and in sentiment. What makes the vote in favor of Arizona more surprising than the vote in favor of New Mexico is that her population is less than half as great. Upon the basis of population she would be entitled to only one-half of one Representative in the lower House of Congress; yet it is proposed to give her the same number of United States Senators as is possessed by the largest States. What is singular about the House Committee's vote is that the extension of the privilege of Statehood to Arizona as well as New Mexico received the support of representatives of New York, Pennsylvania, and Iowa. As was noted last week, these are the States of Platt, Quay, and Clarkson, and the signs multiply that these party managers have decided upon the admission of these two Territories as a piece of party strategy. As New Mexico would probably be a free-coinage State, and Arizona would almost certainly be one, there is some doubt as to the motive prompting anti-silver leaders to urge this policy. It seems possible, however, that some agreement has been reached as to the way in which the Representatives of the proposed States shall vote in case the choice of the next President is thrown into the House of Representatives.

◆

It is not often that a State official blocks a plan of his party colleagues to increase the amount of patronage at their disposal, but State Comptroller Roberts, of New York, has a second time rendered this inestimable service. After consulting four prominent lawyers, he has decided not to pay the salaries of subordinates of the State Excise Commissioners appointed without competitive examinations. The Constitution, Comptroller Roberts is advised, requires that appointments shall be governed by competitive examinations whenever practicable, and therefore the legislative act making appointments upon the excise force "confidential" was a violation of the fundamental law of the State. In order to avoid the difficulty presented by the Comptroller's public-spirited position, the party managers are urging a measure to take the payment of the Excise Commissioners' force out of the Comptroller's hands. It is to be hoped that this thoroughly vicious expedient can be defeated before the Legislature or through the Governor's veto; but, if not, the Constitution remains, and private citizens have power to appeal to the highest courts to prevent any public official from making the proposed payments. Reliance upon the courts, however, is not the general attitude to be assumed by Civil Service Reformers at the present crisis. Measures are being pushed to take the offices already classified as competitive out of the control of the general Civil Service Commissioners of the State and the principal cities, and place them under the control of special boards of examiners in each department of the service. This is simply the spoilsman's policy of divide and conquer. It is impossible for the public in State or city to watch the character of appointments to half a dozen different boards, and the examinations that would shortly be in use would let in every one whom the head of the department wished to let in, and keep out every one he wished to keep out. Civil Service Reform means the control of appointments by general qualifications as opposed to personal favoritism, and in case the appointing officer is allowed to prescribe the examinations to govern his appointments, personal favoritism becomes intrenched behind the supposed bulwarks of reform.

⁂

The consolidation of the Astor and Lenox Libraries with the Tilden Library Fund will give New York City a magnificent reference library for the use of scholars, special students, and literary workers. So far as is known, however, this great library will not undertake the work of furnishing home reading for the general public. New York and Brooklyn are in this respect a generation behind Boston and Chicago. In both the former cities free circulating libraries exist, but they are wholly inadequate to supply the increasing demand, and they have been maintained by private enterprise and beneficence; while Boston is circulating nearly 2,000,000 volumes a year from its splendid Public Library, and Chicago about 1,000,000 volumes. The history of the New York Free Circulating Libraries shows that every facility for home reading which has been offered has been most eagerly improved. Judge Howland, in an address before a meeting lately held to present the needs of these libraries, pointed out that while sixteen years ago no one in New York could procure a book to read except by buying, stealing, or borrowing from a friend, last year 81,000 books were lent by the circulating libraries to 654,000 readers. Beginning with a slender collection of books, brought together by a few ladies who were trying to interest working-girls in reading, branch libraries, one after another, have been established in different parts of the city. Liberal gifts from Mr. Ottendorfer, Miss Catherine Bruce, Mr. George Vanderbilt, and others have made possible large extensions of the work. So great has been the popular demand for books that when the Harlem branch was started, Judge Howland tells us, "on one Saturday night there was nothing left on the shelves except a book on pickles, a dictionary and a directory, which one applicant said were wanting in interest and lacking in continuity of thought." In every way it is made easy for the common people to obtain the privileges of the libraries; and that the confidence shown has been justified is proven by the fact that last year only one book was lost by theft. Some assistance is given to the circulating libraries by the city, but there has been no fair and just recognition of the duty of the public to suitably maintain this form of educational work. The time has now come when this work must be radically extended by the formation of new branches and the improvement of existing libraries. The system of local branches is undoubtedly the correct one for circulating libraries, but a central organization and intelligent co-operation are imperative. It is of the utmost importance that the metropolis should no longer be distanced by many of the smaller cities of the country in the matter of a free public library. Whether in connection with the consolidated reference libraries or independently, provision must be made for an adequate system of furnishing books to be read at their homes by the people.

⁂

Citizens of New York who care for the higher life of the city have now the opportunity of showing their interest in a practical way. Nearly four years ago a friend of Barnard College offered that institution $100,000 to be used in erecting a building for college purposes, on condition that the College should possess itself of an unencumbered property upon which to make its permanent home within the term of four years. In three weeks that term will expire. Meanwhile the College has purchased a noble property on Morningside Heights, in the neighborhood of Columbia College and of the other institutions which are to make that part of the city the crown of New York. The property was purchased advantageously, but it had to be taken at very short notice, and a mortgage of $100,000 was left upon it. This mortgage must be paid in order to secure the gift of the building. $65,000 remains to be raised within the next three weeks. Those who know how well Barnard has already done its work, how necessary it is to the completion of the educational opportunities of the city, how many girls have received at its hands a college education which would otherwise have been denied them, will find it hard to believe that the opulent city of New York will be deaf to this appeal. Barnard has long passed the experimental stage. It has demonstrated its right to live; first, by showing that its life is essential to the higher life of the city; and, next, by showing that it knows how to make the best of its life.

⁂

Austin Abbott, LL.D., Dean of the New York University Law School, died at his home in this city on Sunday morning last. He was the second of the four sons of Jacob Abbott, his brothers being the late Benjamin Vaughan Abbott; the Rev. Lyman Abbott, pastor of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, and editor-in-chief of The Outlook; and the Rev. Edward Abbott, rector of St. James's Church, Cambridge, Mass., and editor of the "Literary World," of Boston. Aside from personal ties, he stood in a very close relationship to The Outlook. He was a frequent contributor to its columns, and his advice and counsel were often sought in the field in which his experience was so wide, his knowledge so ample, and his judgment so sound. Dr. Austin Abbott inherited from his father, Jacob Abbott, tireless industry, steadiness of will, a judicial temper, and a clear, simple, and unaffected style. Born in Boston in December, 1831, he received his early education in that city, in Roxbury, and in Farmington, Me., removing to this city in 1843. Here, under his father's direct supervision, he prepared for college, entering the University of the City of New York, and graduating from that institution in 1851. Two years later he was admitted to the bar of this State, and began the practice of law in partnership with his brother Benjamin Vaughan, Lyman joining the firm not long afterward. He had no sooner entered upon his active career as a lawyer than he began that work of annotation, digest, and comment in the department of jurisprudence which he kept up, almost without intermission, to the day of his death. He was an indefatigable student, and he kept himself thoroughly abreast both of the development of the law and of the practice by statute and by decision. His books on legal procedure have long been text-books in the hands of law students throughout the country. His unusual legal scholarship was constantly drawn upon in the active practice of his profession, and he was associated with the trial of many notable cases.

Five years ago he became Dean of the Law Department of the University of the City of New York, and gave himself to his new work with characteristic ardor and devotion. Under his direction the course at the University Law School was revised and enlarged, a graduate course was added, and other new features were introduced. Under his leadership the school came very rapidly to the front, and the number of its students was very materially increased. Dr. Abbott was active in reform and religious work. For more than a quarter of a century he was Deacon of the Broadway Tabernacle, and the progress and prosperity of the Congregational body were always dear to him. His interest in the cause of the Indian and in international arbitration was both ardent and practical. With him belief in a cause carried with it the compulsion of working for it, and the depth and sincerity of his religious convictions were evidenced by the continuity and ardor of his work for his fellow-men.

⁂

Again this year the English Budget is in striking contrast with the budgets of other nations. Instead of the deficit so customary elsewhere, there is again a surplus, and one of unprecedented magnitude. As Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, stated in his speech before the House of Commons on Thursday of last week, the English public debt was reduced during the year ending with March by $40,000,000, and there still remained a surplus of $20,000,000 to be applied to increasing the nation's armament. A large part of the credit for these favorable returns belongs to Sir William Harcourt and the Liberals, whose revision of the inheritance taxes, making them sharply progressive, resulted in a revenue of $70,000,000 for last year, as against $40,000,000 two years ago. This new revenue, together with the $80,000,000 received from the income tax, comes entirely from the propertied classes, which now bear directly one-third of England's national taxes, besides sharing in the indirect taxes resting on the whole body of consumers. The revenues from these indirect taxes did not increase so much during the year just ended as those from the direct taxes. Nevertheless there was an increase even here, and it is not to be wondered at that the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech was an extremely boastful one. The speech was, however, too boastful. After stating with truth that the national credit was never so high, he exaggerated the progress made by declaring that the rate of interest paid upon English bonds was only half as great as a century ago. In one sense this statement was accurate, for a century ago was the period of the French wars; but a century and a half ago England's bonds sold at almost as low a rate as at present. After declaring with truth that the deposits in banks and in savings-banks had reached an unprecedented point, he went on to declare that the position of the working classes had never been so satisfactory. Upon this point his statement is directly refuted by the comprehensive evidence presented in the last issue of the "Labor Gazette," published by the Board of Trade, and edited by Mr. Giffen. In reviewing the changes in wages during 1895 in the trades covered, that journal reports that 82,000 persons gained a rise in wages, while 355,000 persons sustained a fall, and that the net change for the men affected was a fall of "over one shilling a week." As English wages for men average but twenty-five shillings a week, this means a decline of at least four per cent.; and as it took place in the most highly organized trades in Great Britain, it indicates that an immense number of workmen were out of employment, or the labor organizations would not have submitted to such reductions. It is true that the propertied classes in England have in a considerable degree been enriched by the fall in prices during the past three years, but the working classes in her cities have suffered from reduced employment only less than her farmers have suffered from reduced returns.

⁂

The result of general elections in Spain can always be confidently predicted in advance, because the party in power has such complete control of the electoral machinery that it never fails to secure for itself a large majority in the Cortes. The election held two weeks ago is a striking illustration of this state of things. The Cortes contains about 430 Deputies. Three years ago, in March, the Liberals seated 338 representatives in that body, and the Conservatives 48. In the recent election the Conservatives have secured a majority of about 270. This sweeping victory has apparently astonished the country, and the radical character of the change has awakened widespread suspicions of more than usual governmental interference, with cries of fraud and bribery on the part of the Liberals. The Conservatives, under the leadership of Canovas, have probably overdone the matter, and predictions are already thick that the Conservative majority is too great to be manageable. The Liberals, under the leadership of Sagasta, instead of being disheartened, are apparently encouraged by the unwieldy strength of their opponents. It is difficult to determine to what extent the question of governmental policy in Cuba influenced the votes of the people. If it entered into the struggle to any great extent, the result is a definite announcement that the Spanish people are behind the Spanish Government in upholding the general policy of the Government in Cuba.

⁂

The Outlook has already commented upon the extraordinary diplomatic gains which Russia has made in the Far East during the past few months. Her influence in Constantinople is now supreme; it is also supreme in China, and in all probability it will soon be supreme in Korea. The fight in that country between Russia and Japan promises to be short and decisive. Last October the Queen was murdered, and there seems to be but little doubt that the officials of the Japanese legation were responsible for the crime, in the sense that they had suggested and instigated it. The murder of the Queen was not only a crime, but a diplomatic blunder of the first order. Up to the time of the death of the Queen the Japanese were rapidly gaining ground. Fortune changed instantly with the commission of that crime. It drove the King into the arms of the Russians. In February the Russian force entered Seoul, and no sooner had that force arrived than the King fled to the Russian embassy, issued a proclamation denouncing his ministers as traitors to the country, deposed them from office, and ordered their arrest. Two of these ministers were immediately killed. The others managed to escape. The King meanwhile remains with the Russians, and through their aid is the governing power of Korea; that is to say, he is the instrument through which Russia is now conducting the affairs of the country, a pro-Russian ministry having been formed, the King living at the Russian legation, a strong Russian fleet lying off the coast, and large Russian reinforcements of land forces being on the way to Korea. Under these circumstances there is apparently small chance for the Japanese to regain what they have lost by their mistakes. They are very rapidly building a powerful navy, but before they get it finished and are in condition to fight the Russians the latter will probably be firmly established in Korea, and that country will be a Russian province. If this happens, it will be a curious outcome of the war which Japan undertook in order to secure the independence of Korea. It looks very much as if the Japanese had pulled the chestnuts out of the fire in order that the Russians might enjoy them at leisure.

*

Meanwhile Russia has made material gains in the Balkan States; what is ironically known as the "conversion" of Prince Boris having been followed by many infallible signs of the predominance of Russian influence in that country. The Bulgarian army is being rapidly officered by Russians, and laws are being modified to meet Russian wishes. Under a new arrangement Russia is to enjoy the practical monopoly of trade in Bulgarian markets, and the New York "Tribune," which summarizes recent events, predicts that the time is not far distant when a mysterious outbreak of some kind will occur in Bulgaria which Russian troops will be called upon to quell, with the usual result—that after the disorder is put down the troops, under various pretexts, will remain in occupation. While Russia is prospering in Bulgaria, she is receiving a good deal of annoyance from Roumania. That country, which commands not only one of the most thoroughly fortified cities in the world, and an admirable army, has now gone into the business of making battle-ships and cruisers. Such a navy would command the waterway between Russia and Bulgaria, and might build up a naval power on the Black Sea which would be a constant menace to the great Northern Empire.

*

The situation in South Africa has become more serious during the past week. There seems to be no doubt of the extreme danger which threatens Bulawayo. That town, which in the last two or three years has been transformed from an African kraal into a community of considerable size and great activity, with clubs and opera-houses and other signs of civilization, is guarded by a very small body of troops, and surrounded by a great number of hostile Matabeles, well armed, well trained, and apparently resolved to do all the mischief in their power. The attempt to deal with the situation with the local forces only has been given up, and Mr. Chamberlain has announced the departure of a battalion of the line and a body of mounted infantry to the Cape. It is assumed that this small force is to be followed by a larger one. Mr. Chamberlain has explained to President Kruger, of the Transvaal, that the reinforcements are sent for the purpose of protecting the dockyards and coaling stations of the Cape, but it is very doubtful whether the astute Boer leader will accept this explanation. So long as President Kruger refuses to come to London to formulate a scheme for reform in the Transvaal, and so long as the Boers continue to make active preparations for war, it is hardly to be expected that the English will delay to strengthen their own position. The present situation cannot be indefinitely prolonged. It is very clear that the Boers intend to secure in some way a modification of their present relations to England. That modification will not be made with the consent of the English Government, nor apparently with that of the English people.

*

The next World's Fair, which is to celebrate the opening of the twentieth century, is taking hold not only on the practical energy but on the imagination of the French people. The Government has already committed itself to preparations of the greatest magnitude. In fact, the Exposition at Chicago has made it impossible to treat a World's Fair on anything less than the grandest scale. The Paris Exposition will invade the Champs Elysée, will include both sides of the Seine, and will absorb the Palais de l'Industrie. In area, therefore, the exhibition will far surpass its predecessor which commemorated the fall of the Bastile. Everything will be done to make the Exposition representative of the higher aspects of civilization, including, of course, religion, education, and art in all forms. Nothing better represents the real advance of the world than the difference in conception of what an illustration of the world's progress should be which exists between the first World's Fair in London and the World's Fair of to-day. The first fair was largely mechanical and industrial. At the middle of the century, in England at least, the industrial evidences were generally accepted as the highest evidences of progress. To-day, in spite of the dominance and almost tyranny of industrial interests, the real register of the progress of the world is seen to be spiritual. Hence the vast importance given to the phenomena of religion, to education, and to art. The Chamber of Deputies has decided to guarantee just conditions to the workmen employed on the coming Exposition, but has declined to commit itself to any of the specific promises which some of the Socialist leaders wanted. It has also very wisely refused to make French nationality a test of employment.

Distinctness of Individuality

The distinctive quality of original persons is sharp, clear, definite individuality—unmistakable integrity of type. Minds of the highest rank are characterized, not by immense acquirements, but by adequate self-development, and by complete adjustment to the life about them; by a connection with that life so vital and intimate that they gather it into themselves, and become, in a free and noble sense, its highest products. The man of genius is no more separated from his fellows than is the mountain peak from the earth; on the contrary, the higher the peak the greater the mass of earth which lifts it skyward. Genius involves not less but more humanity in its possessor; it implies, not separation from, but identification with, humanity. Homer stood on the shoulders of the Greek race; he was their debtor quite as much as they were his. But Homer did not annex to his own experience in any external way the experience of his race; he absorbed that experience and made it his own. Moreover, he took only what was vitally related to himself; he was a Greek to the heart—the great typical man of his race. If he had attempted to be also a Persian, an Egyptian, or a Phœnician, his would never have become the clear, resonant voice of all Greece, nor would his work be the common possession of all modern speech.

That which impresses us in writing of the highest order is not miscellaneous knowledge, but flavor, raciness, individuality, the tang of the race and the soil. A secondary writer may have scholarship, skill, talents of various kinds, but his words do not strike home to the imagination; they do not impress us as being inevitable; we are conscious that they might have been written in any climate, under any sky. Burns's songs, on the other hand, are as unmistakably a product of Scotch soil as the heather; and Scott's greater stories are indissolubly welded to local tradition, legend, and history. To take an illustration nearer home, the "Scarlet Letter" could not have been written outside of New England. Its roots are sunk deep in the deposit of centuries of Puritan thought and feeling. Writers of the order of Burns, Scott, and Hawthorne assimilate all the elements of the soil, the atmosphere, and the sky which are vitally related to their own natures and harmonious with their own genius, and perfect their personality by taking on the personality of their race. There is no loss of individuality in this process; on the contrary, there is a vast enlargement and clarification of personality. A notable and beautiful illustration of this clear and victorious development of a type by assimilating what was harmonious in its surroundings is furnished by the career and character of Lincoln, who was not only a complete individual type but a perfect national type as well—

> "New birth of our new soil,
> The first American."

He appropriated from his country, his people, and his time that for which his nature had an affinity, and he became original, creative, typical, by self-unfolding. A man of this temper and methods uses books and technical processes, but is never their product. Whatever he takes of discipline, training, or knowledge, he makes so completely a part of himself that the processes and materials are entirely lost in the final product. His discipline and training leave no trace save in his self-command, his skill, and his effectiveness. His knowledge is so blended with his experience that he completely possesses it, instead of being possessed by it as is the pedant; and when he gives it out in expression, it has taken some new form or received some fresh interpretation. He uses experience, knowledge, all the materials of power which surround him, not to efface the lines along which his nature craves development, but to emphasize them. In every form of expression he gives us, not his acquirements, but himself; and his acquirements return to us so merged in the final product that we cannot trace them. A nature which has this power of drawing upon all the sources of influence, intelligence, and vitality about it becomes clairvoyant and typical. It attains such profound and unconscious harmony with the life in which it is enfolded and by which it is nourished that it speaks at last out of the depths of that life, and reveals its secrets.

A man of this temper knows what is in the heart of his race. He feels every movement of its unconscious life; he divines its thought; and he becomes in the end, on a colossal scale, the man of his time and his people. He is simple, harmonious, individual. Such a man was Tourguéneff—in certain respects the most marvelous race-interpreter of modern times. An artist of subtle and splendid gifts, he seemed to know intuitively all the secrets of the Russian people; and in those compact and impressive stories of his, so free from all extraneous discussion, so concentrated in spirit and action, so swift and deep and powerful in sentiment and movement, the Slavonic nature breathes and suffers and acts. From this point of view a further reference to Lincoln is almost inevitable. Born and bred on the old frontier, with the scantiest formal education, uncouth in figure, he seemed to many, in the critical hour when he became President, fatally untrained for the responsibilities of the time and the place. When the news of his nomination was received in a certain university town, a teacher of high character and wide culture is reported to have said that the country would have a good man in the White House if only some better-trained man could write his messages and speeches for him! Yet those messages and speeches are, with the exception of a few lyrics, the only literature of the great struggle. At least three of these public utterances have already become classics, not only because of their elevation and nobility of thought and feeling, but because of their rare beauty of style. Among all the speakers of his time, accomplished orators, students of rhetoric, masters of the art of eloquence, Lincoln is the only one whose speeches are likely to survive.

This superiority, it is hardly necessary to say, was neither accidental nor spontaneous; like all superiority, it rested on a solid basis of preparation. Lincoln was, in some respects, the most genuinely educated man of his time; but his education was vital, not formal; individual, not academic. There is no antagonism between these two kinds of education; on the contrary, in the ideal training they must always combine and harmonize. There is a disposition, however, to assume that formal education is the only education. From this point of view men like Shakespeare and Lincoln are inexplicable. For every great work of art involves adequate education; chance is as finally barred out of the world of art as it is out of the world of nature.

The more one studies Lincoln's education the more complete is it seen to have been. In his own way he acquired a knowledge of his people, of his time, of himself, and of a few books, which, in its depth and thoroughness, made him the master not only of a great movement but of a great language. Men of the type of Gladstone and Sumner give the impression of having sought near and far for information and illustration. They impress us as having made large conquests in the field of knowledge; but we are soon aware that their gain has been more by conquest than by incorporation. They have annexed rather than absorbed. In the speeches of both these eminent men of affairs we oftener hear the voice of the student than the voice of the man. Lincoln, on the other hand, always gives us a single harmonious impression of himself. We are always in contact with the man. Whatever knowledge he has acquired and whatever training he has received are tributary to the original force of his own personality, and this is true of all men of the creative as contrasted with the secondary order; they are never, under any circumstances, eclectics; they are always, under all circumstances, intensely individual. They are never composite; they are always strongly marked types. Lincoln took the elements for which he had an affinity; all others he left alone.

The Passion for Publicity

In no direction does the average American newspaper sin so grievously as in its violation of the privacies of personal and domestic life. It is at this point that its fundamental irreverence, its disregard of the natural pieties of human existence, is most evident and most repulsive. It is no exaggeration to say that the wanton and unrestricted invasion of privacy by the modern press constitutes in certain respects the most offensive form of tyranny which the world has ever known. There is absolutely no shelter for the unlucky man or woman whose career or circumstances in any way furnish material for sensational report. Uprightness of character, unblemished reputation, eminent public services, great afflictions, appalling calamities—those unusual tragic happenings which used by their very awfulness to shield a man from public curiosity—the helplessness of childhood, the innocence of youth, the sacredness of womanhood, the consideration due to old age—all these appeals to the forbearance, the silence, the respect of men, are absolutely lost on a great number of American newspapers. On the contrary, the more urgent the appeal of the exceptional and tragic condition, the more eager the search for news, the more striking the head-lines, the more shameless the invasion by detective methods of the privacy of home, the more minute the detailed report. The sheer, unmitigated brutality of this invasion of privacy is so constantly illustrated in the columns of many newspapers that a large part of the American people have come to acquiesce in it as one of the fixed conditions of modern life—a tyranny from which there is no escape and against which no successful revolt can be made. A man with the instincts of a gentleman is sometimes tempted to think that nothing but a return to the primitive methods of redressing personal grievances will ever bring certain newspapers to their senses, and that decency will have to be horsewhipped into some newspaper editors and managers. A single incident will illustrate the extent to which this lawless invasion of personal rights is carried. A cultivated and refined woman living in a boarding-house was so unfortunate as to awaken the admiration of a young man of unbalanced mind who was living under the same roof. He paid her attentions which were courteously but firmly declined. He wrote her letters which were at first acknowledged in the most formal way, and finally ignored. No woman could have been more circumspect and dignified. The young man preserved copies of his own letters, introduced the two or three brief and formal notes which he had received in reply, made a story of the incident, stole the photograph of the woman, inclosed his own photograph, mailed the whole matter to a New York newspaper, and committed suicide. The result was a two or three column report of the incident, with portraits of the unfortunate woman and the suicide, and an elaborate and startling exaggeration of the few inconspicuous, insignificant, and colorless facts from which the narrative was elaborated. That a refined woman in American society should be exposed to such a brutal invasion of her privacy as that which was committed in this case reflects upon every gentleman in the country.

It remains to be said, however, and it ought to be said with the utmost frankness, that the passion for publicity which is illustrated in the columns of the American newspaper has also taken possession of a very considerable part of the American people, and that what one sees in the newspaper is the reflection of a very widespread social condition. The interest in other people's affairs in this country is almost measureless. The morning and evening papers make us feel as if we belonged to a great village, and as if what we call National news were nothing more than village gossip writ large; as if our chief interest lay in what is going on at the other end of the street, and our chief curiosity played, not about the great questions of life, but about the doings of people on the next block. This is the vulgar and discouraging side of the matter; but there is another side which the candid critic, who desires to take, not the short and easy, but the long and rational, view of the American newspaper, must take into account. A writer in the April issue of "Scribner's Magazine" puts this other aspect of the matter in the form of a question: "In reality, do we perceive what the vulgarities of the modern newspaper press actually represent? Do we realize that their personalities are the result of the desperate desire of the new classes, to whom democratic institutions have given their first chance, to discover the way to live, in the wide social meaning of the word? The hour belongs to these classes. Their ideals are becoming more and more the ideals of all masses of society, and what they are chiefly eager for is not ideas but palpable realities. What the man wants who newly finds himself with incalculably increased material opportunities before him is not, at first, thoughts that will strengthen his hold upon the eternal verities. No. It is information that will put him in direct touch with the actualities of the passing hour; information that will teach him all about his environment, and what he is to do there, and how he is to conduct himself in order to keep the place that he has got, and to extend it, to push himself farther on." There is unquestionably a great deal of truth in this interpretation of one of the most depressing facts in our life to-day.

There are a host of people under the easier and larger conditions of that life who are stepping out of their old places to find the horizons of comfort and intelligence broadening about them, and who are eager to know how men live, what men are doing. Closeness of contact, by reason of railroads and telegraphs and telephones, has made what used to be local conditions practically National conditions. Every man is now a member of the National as well as of the local community. He is eager to know what is going on. In the exact measure in which his opportunities are new, he wants to know what other people in better conditions are doing. He has a passion for knowing how the other half lives. His interest is very largely instinctive, undiscriminating, and unmoral. He is indifferent to the significance of the things that are told him. He is as ready to see evil as good things. What he wants is facts—facts about life, facts about social habit, facts about individual character and experience. He has no sense of the relative value of these facts. He does not attempt to arrange them by any scale of comparative significance. He has not yet reached that point. What he wants is to get the contents of the drag-net. To his uneducated taste one fact is as good as another. The process is vulgar and has gone far to destroy the reverence which once guarded and fostered the higher and finer aspects of life in the family, the church, the college, and society, but it is not vulgar at the root; it is an instinctive desire to know what is in life. It is part of that democratic movement which is so much vaster in its scope and so much more radical in its spirit than our political fathers perceived, or than most of us understand or are willing to accept. The democracy which is fast coming in modern society is a very different affair from the old New England conception of popular government conducted by the town meeting—the rule of the best in the order of a natural aristocracy. We have, even in this country, a long way still to go before the democratic idea is completely worked out. It is not surprising that some of the most thoughtful students of affairs stand aghast at the changes which they see before society—changes more radical than those wrought by the French Revolution; changes as radical as those through which the transition from antique to modern life was effected. This stirring up of society from the bottom to the top brings many disagreeable things to the surface; but the end will justify the pain and loss by the way. We must be content to wait two or three centuries for the finer fruits of a real popular life. Meantime we may as well recognize the fact that publicity rather than reverence will characterize our life, and, in a rough way, protect and develop it. This is the bright side of the matter; there is another side which is not so bright, and that is the prominence of vulgar people in this country and the degree in which they affect all forms of expression. There is no more vulgarity in America than in Germany or France or Italy; but in Europe vulgarity is largely silent; here it is always in evidence. It flaunts and parades itself; keeps itself continually on the surface; thrusts itself forward as if it were the National characteristic. It is this aggressive vulgarity which dominates a multitude of newspapers, and many newspaper managers apparently assume that it is a National characteristic. We are not a vulgar people, but the vulgar among us are very generally permitted to represent us. The press is too largely edited for them; they explain that monstrosity of vulgarity, the sensational Sunday newspaper. And publicity is the very breath of their being. To be talked about is the end of their social ambition ; to talk about others is at once their recreation and their occupation.

The Increase of Homicide

The clergymen of Charlotte, N. C., and the surrounding country took a step on a recent Sunday that may well serve as an example to clergymen in other districts where lynchings occur. As a result of the local discussion of the appalling extent of this form of lawlessness, they devoted their sermons to a denunciation of it. It would doubtless be well to give pulpit attention to the still more appalling prevalence of homicide in general throughout the whole country. The statistics of crime published by the Chicago "Tribune" every year, and the recent lecture of Dr. Andrew D. White, ex-Minister to Berlin and St. Petersburg, on the increase of murder, make it imperative that public sentiment should be awakened on the subject. Both of these authorities place the number of murders in the United States in 1895 at 10,500. The increase during the past seven years has been so great as to be almost incredible, the number in 1889 being 3,567. The total number during this period is 47,469, which is an increase from 58 to 155 in the million of population.

Taking these figures as a basis of a prophecy, Dr. White thus pictures the fate that awaits thousands of Americans the coming year: "To-day, this 10th of April, 1896, I announce to you that there are doomed to death in the United States, in the year which begins this day, over 10,000 persons, who will be executed murderously, cruelly, without opportunity to take leave of those they love, without opportunity to make provision for those depending upon them ; and all of this multitude of persons, who have committed no crime, will be put to death without the slightest regard for the fearful distress and sorrow and, in many cases, beggary of their families. Fully two-thirds of these murders will be due to this easy-going, maudlin sentiment in the community at large, miscalled mercy, but really most fearful cruelty."

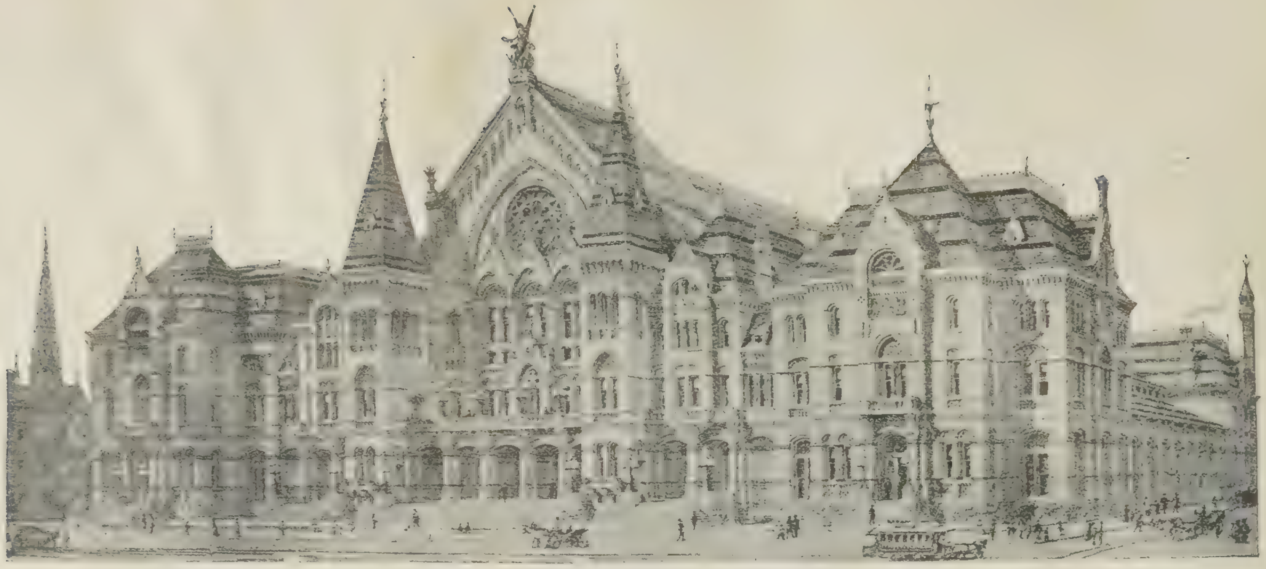
But, shocking as this presentation is, and adequate as it should be to evoke the most powerful sentiment against this prevalence of the spirit of murder, there are other figures that show with the same impressiveness the need of such sentiment. They relate to the inadequate punishment of homicides and the abnormal exercise of "executive clemency." While murders have shockingly increased, the number of legal executions has steadily diminished. In 1890 one murderer in forty-five was legally executed ; in 1895, only one in seventy-four. At the same time there has been an increase of illegal executions, that is to say lynchings, which numbered 171 in 1895 against 132 legal ones. The aversion to capital punishment does not explain the immunity of homicides from all punishment. Of the 42,000 homicides that have escaped legal and illegal execution during the past six years, only 7,351 are in prison. The rest are at large, ready to repeat their crimes. Is it any wonder that some cynical judge once exclaimed that "the taking of life for the highest crime after due process of law seems to be the only way of taking life to which the average American has any objection"!

Even when murderers escape from the gallows to imprisonment for terms ranging from life to a few years, society has no assurance that they will be called upon to suffer the milder penalty pronounced against them. Owing to the lack of a powerful public opinion against the practice, Governors are too prone to accede to the request of the multitude of petitioners that any criminal, however odious, appears to be able to get presented in his behalf. Dr. White mentions the case of Governor Taylor, of Tennessee, who went out of office in 1892. One of his last acts was to pardon eighteen men, several of whom had committed willful and brutal murders. During the four years that he served as Governor he pardoned 801 men, the list of whose offenses "includes every crime in the calendar." But Southern Governors are not the only offenders. Dr. White cites acts of Governors of Illinois, Michigan, and New York. During the last month of Governor Hill's term of office he pardoned fifteen men from prison, and during the last day of his term, six, two of whom were murderers serving life sentences.

The creation of a proper public sentiment, a "deep, determined, fruitful indignation toward wrong and crime," such as President Woolsey sought to arouse in his sermon on "Righteous Anger," would produce the most beneficent results. In the first place, it would bring to an end that repulsive sympathy for murderers that takes the form of floral contributions to them and notes of maudlin sympathy. In the second place, it would make impossible the getting up of monster petitions like that in behalf of "Bat" Shea, which is said to have been signed by 25,000 persons. In the third place, the executive power would feel it incumbent upon it to exercise clemency very sparingly. In the fourth place, there would be a reform of judicial procedure that would make it impossible for men guilty of murder to escape upon technicalities. In the fifth place, the creation of a proper public sentiment would effect a general curbing of the homicidal instinct. And, finally, it would furnish a necessary basis for those preventive and reformatory measures which to be effective must always be founded on a righteous but not revengeful justice.

The Hem of the Garment

Very few readers of the New Testament probably ever stop to think how brief the biography of Christ is, and how much must have been omitted from the narrative. There must have been another history of the divine teacher, written, not by the hands of his disciples, but in the hearts of those whom he had cheered and helped and healed by the way. There must have been a beautiful unwritten gospel passed from mouth to mouth for many generations, the light of which faded very slowly as the night of barbarism and wandering came on. For a personality like Christ's, filled with divine compassion and love, must have poured itself out in a thousand unseen rivulets as well as in the great channels so definitely marked in the New Testament story. There must have been thousands to whom he spoke words which were not recorded ; there must have been multitudes whose lives were renewed by his power of whom no mention is made. As this was true of the divinest personality known to men, so it is also true of every human personality. The most searching and influential power that issues from any human life is that of which the person himself is largely unconscious. It flows from him in every form of occupation, in every relationship, in rest or in work, in silence or in speech, at home or abroad. There are hosts of men and women who are healers and teachers and helpers almost without consciousness of the fact. Light shines from them and help flows from them at times when they are utterly unconscious that the hem of the garment is being touched. The real test of the possession of the highest power of character and the most perfect devotion to the noblest things in life is not the quality of the direct touch ; it is the presence of the virtue even in the hem of the garment.



THE CINCINNATI MUSIC HALL

The Cincinnati Music Festivals

By H. E. Krehbiel

Theodore Thomas
Musical Director

For twenty years the music festivals which are held biennially in Cincinnati under the direction of Mr. Theodore Thomas have been looked upon as the most notable musical affairs in the United States. There are respects in which their reputation is justified only in part by their achievements; and, unhappily, as the present writer can testify, these are the things which force themselves upon the notice of a reviewer who chances to have another outlook than the merely local. But one who can stand the rebuffs with which all criticism that is not adulation is apt to be received when the people of Cincinnati put on their smart spring garments and surrender themselves to the enjoyments which their most cherished institution brings, can also see that when the balance is struck the credit side has so much the better of the debit that it is scarcely worth the while to store the faults up in one's memory. After all, the defects are only locally harmful, while the country at large has benefited wonderfully by the influence which has gone out from the festivals ever since they became established features of Cincinnati's life. That influence has been sound and wholesome and marvelously potent from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

The May festivals began in 1873, and have been held every second year since, except when a year had to be added to the interregnum between the second and third festivals to allow time for the completion of the magnificent Music Hall, which is their proudest architectural monument. The stability exemplified in this record is one of the extraordinary phenomena connected with the Cincinnati festivals. The annual gatherings at Worcester, Mass., are older, but their genesis is very different, and their accomplishments, however praiseworthy in themselves, incomparably less significant.

The Worcester festivals grew out of the old New England musical conventions, which might be described without irreverence as musical "revivals." Professional teachers not being numerous, when one came to a town he held a "protracted meeting" with the choir singers of the vicinity, and finally united them all in a concert. Everything was amiable about these meetings so long as the peripatetic convention leader was intelligent and sincere, and it would be churlish to refuse recognition to the good which they accomplished; but they never could occupy the plane to which the Cincinnati festivals were lifted at the beginning, and on which they have remained ever since. In the Western city the highest possible results were striven for at the outset, as if the soil had been prepared by long and diligent cultivation on the most advanced lines. It was a union of German and American qualities in Theodore Thomas which was responsible for this, just as it has been a union of Mr. Thomas's devotion to a high ideal and the readiness of the people to advance his efforts that has made progress possible. Had Mr. Thomas been all German, he would in all likelihood have been impracticable in his first plans; had he been all American, he probably would have been satisfied with popular success, and so trimmed his sails to the shifting winds as to command that regardless of all else. He has not always produced results commensurate with the dignity and claims of the festival organization, but he has not yet lowered the standard set up at the beginning, and for that reason more than any other he has maintained the festivals as potent influences in American musical culture.

Wm. H. Hobart
President Cincinnati Music Festival Association

Otto Singer
Assistant Conductor and Chorus-Master

Arthur Mees
Organist Music Festival

To appreciate how great the influence is which has gone out from these festivals one

Lawrence Maxwell
Vice-President Festival Association

George Ward Nichols
Late President Cincinnati Festival Association

[illegible]

[illegible]
Composer of "St. Francis," to be sung this year must know something of their origin. That their home should be Cincinnati is not mere chance, but a logical outcome of earlier strivings. Study of the history of music in the United States discloses that the impulses which were directed toward the development of its three principal phases went out from three centers of culture. Psalmody and the choral culture which came as its fruit had its home in Boston; instrumental music and the opera, in New York; the German Männergesang, in Cincinnati. For reasons which need not be curiously studied here, the psalmody of New England had less to do with the creation of the festival spirit illustrated in the Cincinnati gatherings than the fondness of the Germans for part-song singing. The two influences were complementary. If Cincinnati from its earliest days had not had a strong musical bent, which it derived from the excellent character of its settlers, Mr. Thomas would not have found such admirable soil when he came to develop his festival scheme in 1873; had Cincinnati not been the pioneer Sängerfest city in the United States, it is doubtful if the festival idea which has borne such lovely fruit would ever have originated. The first German Sängerfest ever held on this side of the Atlantic Ocean was held in Cincinnati in 1849. It was a small gathering in which only a few Western communities participated, but it was the parent of sturdy offspring. Soon the entire country was concerned in the meetings which were held now here, now there, and it was found necessary to divide the Bund which gave the festivals, because it had grown too unwieldy. Before these, however, a Sängerfest was given in Cincinnati (it was in 1870) in which two thousand German singers participated, and to accommodate which a hall had to be built. Though designed only for temporary use, it was a well-built structure, and the merchants of the city, who had got interested in the exposition idea, preserved it from destruction and dedicated it to exhibition purposes. Moreover, its acoustic properties were admirable, and when Mr. Thomas, on one of his concert tours in the spring of 1873, talked over the idea of a festival with a mixed instead of a male chorus, Cincinnati supplying the nucleus of the chorus and his orchestra the nucleus of the band, it was the existence of the hall that helped to make the enterprise feasible.

In another respect the history of the Cincinnati festivals is intimately bound up in that of the German Sängerfeste. Every one who is familiar with German customs knows that Gemüthlichkeit, or conviviality, is quite as assiduously cultivated in them as art—perhaps a little more assiduously—and there was a time, when the American element of our population was less tolerant of German things than it is now, that a strong prejudice existed against them on that account. When the first Sängerfest was held in Cincinnati, a newspaper charged that the "Dutch singers, with their intemperate jubilee, drinking the sour wine," had brought an epidemic of cholera upon the city. When the great Sängerfest was held, in 1870, an immense bar occupied the space under the stage. When the first festival under the new régime was held, the rehabilitation of the bar was not dreamed of. Other times, other peoples, other manners. The festival was musical, not Bacchic. A year later, in 1874, the effect of this good example—due, of course, to the fact that the choir consisted of men and women, not men

INTERIOR OF THE REMODELED MUSIC HALL
Drawn for The Outlook by Otto W. Beck

MADAME LILLIAN NORDICA

(From a recent copyrighted Photograph by Aimé Dupont, 574 Fifth Avenue, New York)

alone—was felt at the Sängerfest given in Cleveland. Thither Mr. Bergmann and the New York Philharmonic Orchestra had traveled to make music; but when the hours for rehearsal came, the singers were not to be found in the temple of Apollo, but in the groves of Gambrinus. Immediately a plan of reorganization was adopted which aimed to elevate the character of the Sängerfeste artistically and socially by admitting women to the festival chorus. The first experiment under the new régime was made in 1877 in Louisville, the second in 1879 in Cincinnati, with results that made much for music. Unfortunately, however, the notion of giving music a preference over Gemüthlichkeit is not popular with the majority of the members of German singing societies, and the high aims inspired by the first Cincinnati festival have not been pursued by them.

From the beginning the foremost business men of Cincinnati have charged themselves with the management of the business affairs of the festivals. This has been one cause of their success. The very first undertaking came so near meeting expenses that the directors made up the deficit out of their private purses. The second left a surplus in the hands of the treasurer, and evoked such an outburst of popular enthusiasm that it was resolved to build a permanent home for the festivals, and the industrial expositions which had grown with them. In this movement Mr. Reuben R. Springer, a retired merchant, took the lead with characteristic modesty and quietness. He began with an offer of $125,000 on condition that the citizens raise the same amount, and ended with giving between $250,000 and $300,000 toward the undertaking. The result was to stir up a local patriotism and enthusiasm in artistic things such as this country had never seen. The third festival, in 1878, saw the dedication of the Music Hall and its great organ. For more than a week the happy city was in gala dress. Arches spanned the streets; garlands festooned the house-fronts; bunting fluttered gayly everywhere; so numerous were the pictures of the great masters of music that every child could distinguish the features of Bach and Beethoven, Handel and Haydn. Visitors poured into the city from all the adjacent country, and men distinguished in musical circles came from New York and Boston. Mr. Thomas had widened the scope of the festival to make it worthy of so important an occasion. A dedicatory ode had to be written, composed, and performed. Mr. Dudley Buck had to come from the East to play upon the organ. The cost of the affair was enormous, but the receipts were more enormous still. When the treasurer made his report, the directors found themselves in possession of $30,000 profit. They paid the balance of $15,000 due on the organ, distributed $5,000 among the societies composing the chorus, and started a sinking fund with the balance. Like a galvanic shock the influence of this great achievement was felt throughout East and West. First, however, the continued fruition of the lovely enthusiasm in Cincinnati must be noted. A fund for music in one of the public parks established by the Hon. William S. Groesbeck, a College of Music sufficiently endowed to enable it to offer prizes and scholarships to deserving pupils, a superb Art Museum picturesquely planted in one of the parks on the hills overlooking the Ohio River, were the immediate fruit, after the Music Hall and Exposition buildings. As for the fruits outside of Cincinnati, the most obvious were the music festivals given in 1881 and 1882 in New York under the direction respectively of Dr. Leopold Damrosch and Theodore Thomas; festivals in Philadelphia, Chicago, Indianapolis, Buffalo, Cleveland, and other places, all patterned after the Cincinnati affairs and showing the same lofty ambitions. Finally, Music Halls and Exposition buildings erected in Indianapolis, Buffalo, St. Louis, Minneapolis, and elsewhere, some of which disclose their origin in their imitation of the lines and material of the Cincinnati building.

It would be glory enough for one city and one decade to have so thoroughly leavened the musical lump of the United States, had the Cincinnati festivals lived themselves out, as most of their imitators have since done; but instead of doing this they have gone on, maintained still on the high artistic level on which they were placed twenty-three years ago. It is plain only to one who is intimately acquainted with the men who are at their head, and the city which supports them, why this should be so. Under Mr. Thomas's inspiring guidance the policy of the directors has been energetic, uncompromising, and, in the best sense of the word, conservative. From 1873 to 1881 Mr. George

MADAME KLAFSKY

Ben Davies

Marie Brema

Lilli Lehmann

Medora Henson

R. Watkin Mills

Ward Nichols, one of the hardest workers of the original coterie, a restless spirit who devoted himself wholly to it and kindred enterprises, was the President. He was the mentor and the executive officer of Mr. Springer, the founder of the College. The present President, William N. Hobart, has been in the Board of Directors since 1880, and it is to him, after Mr. Thomas, that credit is due for the fact that public interest, which flagged occasionally, was never permitted utterly to die. Mr. Lawrence Maxwell, Jr., the Vice-President, entered the Board of Directors with Mr. Hobart, but long before then he was a member of the chorus. During the first two years of President Cleveland's administration Mr. Maxwell was Solicitor-General of the United States, and probably the only official in the service of the Government at Washington who could, on a moment's notice, have left his pew and played the organ of the President's church. So, too, in the artistic department of the festival administration. Otto Singer, who had come to New York to join Mr. Thomas in carrying out a conservatory project on the recommendation of Liszt, became chorus-master in 1873, composed the festival ode in 1878, and continued his connection with the association till after the festival of 1880. Mr. Arthur Mees was organist of the first festival, and became chorus-master in 1882. At every festival since he has been Mr. Thomas's trusted assistant. Annie Louise Cary was as much a factor in the earlier festivals as Mr. Thomas, and when she declined to accept the regular

Myron W. Whitney

Madame Nilsson

Annie Louise Cary

Plunket Greene

Edward Lloyd

Adelina Patti

Madame Materna

engagement as principal solo contralto in 1884, because she had retired from public life to be Mrs. C. Munson Raymond, it was felt to be so necessary to have her present at the festival that the directors invited her to come and sit in the audience as their guest. Myron W. Whitney was just as intimately connected with the festivals. He sang at every one from 1873 till his retirement in 1890, except the festival of 1884.

The artistic significance of the Cincinnati festivals has rested upon the magnitude and dignity of the musical schemes planned for them by Mr. Thomas and the forces enlisted in their exposition. At the first meeting a large number of choirs took part, some coming from such distant cities as Des Moines and Milwaukee. At the second, half a dozen cities and towns in Ohio joined Cincinnati in providing the choral contingent, but since 1880 the festival chorus has been an organized body whose affairs are administered all the time by the Festival Association. The orchestra generally numbers about one hundred and fifty men; the chorus, five hundred voices. With these masses are always associated the best solo talent obtainable. When the enthusiasm inspired by the festivals in other cities was at its height, Mr. Thomas found it possible to bring the three representative singers of Wagner's music from Vienna—Madame Materna, Herr Winkelmann, and Herr Scaria; and, as if this were not enough, Madame Nilsson was also enlisted. By this means communities never visited by traveling opera and concert singers have been enabled to hear the greatest singers of the age—Lehman, Nilsson, Materna, Cary, Eames, Lloyd, Whitney, Winkelmann, Scaria, and many others. The same policy has characterized the preparations for the twelfth festival, to be held from the 19th to the 23d of May this year. The German prima donna Frau Klafsky, the American Nordica, the Englishwoman (by courtesy so called—as a matter of fact she is half German and half American) Brema, and the Englishmen H. Plunket Greene, Ben Davies, Ffrangcon Davies, and R. Watkin Mills, will all take part, besides a number of singers of local fame. Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which had its first performance in the United States just fifty years ago this month, and was introduced to the West at the first festival in 1873, will be repeated. The other choral works will be "St. Francis," by Edgar Tinel, a young Flemish composer; Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah" (an opera that is oftener given in oratorio form than operatic), Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," and a dainty secular cantata, "The Swan and the Skylark," by A. Goring Thomas. The Music Hall, which till now has been serviceable only for festival, convention, and exposition uses, has been remodeled in its interior arrangements and changed into a large theater, comparable with the Metropolitan Opera-House in New York and the Auditorium in Chicago.

Our Travelers' Club

By Lucy A. Martin

The autumn days had come, the winter would soon be upon us, and how were we to make some of its evenings profitable and enjoyable? Our village was a small one, and, though near New York, its country store and post-office combined was the chief center of trade, with but one rival a little way down the road, opposite which stood the blacksmith shop with its "spreading" elm.

The houses and homes were much scattered, but each of the two churches brought its part of the inhabitants together on Sunday, and the Library, down the hill by the river—it was the noble Hudson on whose banks we were nestled—was an important element in the week-day life of the village. Here, four years ago, was started the "Travelers' Club." We met every three weeks on Monday evening, and, gathered about the long reading-table, took our imaginary trip to Europe. Our Secretary, together with our President and Treasurer, planned each meeting, and we first made a truly American trip abroad, traveling hurriedly through England, France, Germany, and Italy, and at the close of the eight meetings we had each done our part in contributing a short paper on some given place or topic—country, town, city, or some point of interest in one of these.

The second winter we traveled more slowly, and at the beginning of the season voted to spend our time in Scotland. We all remember with especial pleasure our evening with Robert Burns, when we renewed our acquaintance with the literature of the country. Our club, now numbering twenty, bought a good oil lantern and a screen, which, with the slides, procured as we required them, added greatly to the pleasure of the evenings. These slides we hired at a place in New York City where they have a large collection, at a cost of one and a half cents apiece for one evening. Thirty pictures, accompanied by our papers, made us feel as if we had really visited the place described. The slides were selected from a catalogue, and were called for and returned by one of the Club who goes to town daily—an advantage for which we are grateful, since economy is with us a necessity. Each member pays a tax of five cents a meeting to cover the expense of the slides. Our lantern we bought by a special entertainment.

Last fall, when we gathered again to talk over plans for the winter, we decided to make this year's meetings and travels more simple and popular, and to admit some of the younger persons who would enjoy the trips; and with this end in view we adopted a plan for a journey in our own country. First we took "A Summer Pilgrimage," and spent the evening with the views and descriptions of New England watering-places—Bar Harbor, Newport, etc.—closing with an appropriate "Afternoon Tea." Our next programme consisted of papers on "The Hub of the Universe and Her Literary Men," with views, a reading, and a song: menu, Boston brown bread. For our "New England Fireside" we went to the parsonage, where papers were read on "Customs and Home Life" and "Rural Scenery and Outdoor Life," a selection read from "Cape Cod Folks," and we had a merry time popping corn before the open wood fire, closing the evening by singing in concert "Home, Sweet Home." "Our Wedding Trip" found us at Washington, and the views of that city, together with those of Philadelphia and Baltimore, which we were supposed to pass through en route, were fine. A paper on Baltimore and a selection on Social Life in Washington filled our evening, and we closed the meeting with some "truly" wedding-cake—of which, to be sure, there was only a square inch for each of us—from two boxes brought by one of the members from a large wedding in New York. The boxes, which were unusually pretty, were given to the two brides of the Club. The evening was opened by the Wedding March, played by one of the members, and this simple feast completed a harmonious programme. "The Orange and Palmetto" took us to Florida, and the slides gave us an excellent idea of the palatial hotels and the quaint town of St. Augustine and the weird river scenery of that region. Some of the golden fruit from that State served as a light refreshment with which to close the evening. The subject for the next meeting, "'Way Down in Dixie," gave an opportunity to consider New Orleans and the Creole, the Negro, the "F. F. V.'s," and to hear a reading from "Uncle Remus" and the song "Dixie Land." Menu, peanuts.

The programme for the rest of the year includes "The Blue-Grass Region," and an evening studying the historic Hudson, preparatory to the celebration by the Club of the close of its season by taking an actual trip up the river on Decoration Day.[1]

Sunset

By Mary Laura Mason

The west is a mass of color,
  A glow of golden light,
That resolves like a chord of music
  The day into the night.

---

[1] The Outlook is glad to furnish through its Recreation Department circulars, descriptive pamphlets, time-tables, and other printed information which will enable members of Travelers' Clubs, like that described in this article, to put themselves in close personal touch with places to be visited and routes to be traversed.—THE EDITORS.

WILLIAM HICKLING PRESCOTT

From the Crayon Drawing by George Richmond, R.A. Done in 1850. Now in the possession of the Earl of Carlisle

William Hickling Prescott[1]

By Kenyon West

ON the 4th of May occurs the centenary of a man who has not only won a high place in American literature, but who challenges comparison with the very greatest historians of the world. Not without justice did a famous English critic assert that Horace Walpole's prophecy that the next Augustan age would dawn on this side of the Atlantic had been verified, "for Mr. Prescott's 'History of Ferdinand and Isabella' may rank among the first in the English language."

In one of Keats's delightful letters he wrote these significant and stimulating words: "I must think that difficulties nerve the spirit of a man; they make our prime objects a refuge as well as a passion." To the career of no man of letters are these words so applicable as to that of William Hickling Prescott. His life affords a striking example of enduring work achieved in spite of overwhelming odds. The gift of genius is a marvelous thing! Seldom can its ancestry be traced, more seldom is it possible to understand how it flourishes under certain conditions. I can understand how a poet, amid suffering, poverty, even darkness, can give magic expression to the beautiful forms which throng before his inner vision, giving out from his own sad heart his sweetest songs. I can imagine a romancer, sitting in darkness and alone, weaving his tales of love or of chivalry to thrill and charm the great world. A musician, too, can, even in darkness, have his solitude vocal with divine harmonies, and embody them in enchanting creations which will live after he himself has passed beyond the whirl and stress of time. But a historian, who must depend upon facts, not upon his glowing creative imagination, whose material is drawn from out-of-the-way sources of information, not from ideas current in his own age, from ancient records which must be studied and compared, upon conflicting authorities whose claims must be weighed—how is he to do his appointed work without the blessing of sight?

We are told by Johnson that Milton felt obliged to abandon a cherished plan of writing a history of England, as he found it scarcely possible for a man without eyes to pursue a historical work. Prescott said: "This remark, although discouraging at first, in the end stimulated me. If my ears are spared me, I will disprove the assertion that no man can compile a history who is blind."

PRESCOTT'S MOTHER

From the Picture taken for Mr. Arthur Dexter and never before published

JUDGE PRESCOTT

From the Portrait by Gilbert Stuart

The interest of Prescott's work is undoubtedly much enhanced by a knowledge of the difficulties in his path. Admiration for the magnificent products of his genius is blended with admiration for the indomitable spirit of the man. In this brief tribute to Prescott's memory I can enter into no critical exposition of the distinctive features of his genius, nor have I space to even allude to much which is of value and interest in his life; but I wish to lay especial stress not only upon the winsomeness, the

---

[1] For the illustrations to this article The Outlook is especially indebted to Mrs. Roger Wolcott and Mr. Arthur Dexter, of Boston, who have been most kind in lending to the author of the article many valued treasures. Of these the rarest have been selected—some never before published, and all comparatively unknown. There are many other portraits of Prescott, beautiful though not so rare. The drawings are done by kind permission of Miss Ticknor.

APPROACH TO THE ANCESTRAL HOUSE AT PEPPERELL

beauty of his character, but upon his victory over those difficulties which beset him on the very threshold of manhood. Prescott, in character and in achievement, belonged, indeed, to that race of great men of whom Hector Berlioz spoke—men who by their struggles and their pain purchase light and movement for humanity.

It is not alone as a faithful chronicler of events which were momentous in their influence upon civilization, it is not as the painstaking gleaner in a field hitherto untrod, that Prescott has won so great a fame. Accuracy, trustworthy statement, sanity of view, are of inestimable value in a historian; but if his work is to have perennial vitality, to be a source of delight as well as instruction, it must have charm. At the meeting of the Historical Society of Massachusetts held just after Prescott's death, Edward Everett applied to him the words of the Greek poet: "Greatly the Muse loved him, and she gave him both good and evil: she deprived him of his eyes, but she gave him the gift of sweet song."

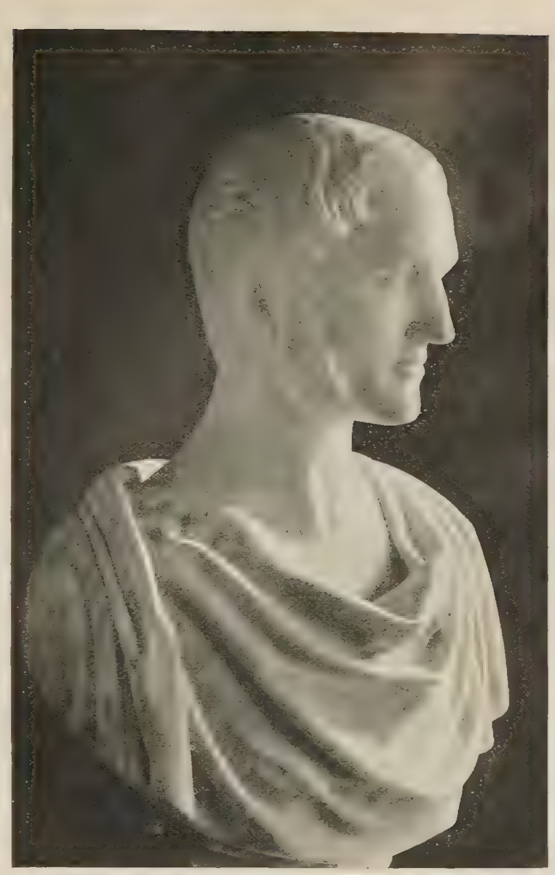
Whatever may be the opinions of scholars in regard to certain aspects of Prescott's work, one thing is certain: his histories have this magnetic and indispensable quality of charm. If we attempt to analyze the secret of his peculiar fascination, we will find it to consist partly in the grace, the richness, the sonorous beauty of his language, and partly in his picturesque power. Prescott is a painter—he has that pictorial quality characteristic of the artist; and, possessing, in addition to this, the swift penetration, the vivifying imagination, characteristic of the poet, he makes the events of which he treats live before our entranced eyes. Where else do we read more vivid descriptions of battles, painting of scenery, of costume, of all the countless details which made up the pageantry of the romantic times of which he writes? Prescott has also a swift and usually unerring insight into character. He shows the depth of his research by his wonderful portraitures. No one without wide and careful study could so thoroughly enter into the very spirit of a man, in fact, know him as if he had been a daily companion, see his motives, his weaknesses, his bold, courageous virtues. If some students of Prescott are disposed to think he shows partisanship, that he too readily sees the excuses for some of the criminal excesses of his conquerors, we must attribute it to that habit of looking at events in the large and catholic spirit which takes into consideration the times in which these men lived, judges them more by the ideas prevalent in those times than by the more humane civilization of the nineteenth century. Prescott's portraitures are, as a rule, clean-cut, direct, vivid, admirably well drawn, the lights and shadows truthfully disposed.

The genius of Prescott was, in fact, creative. It enabled him to mold into a homogeneous and harmonious whole many diverse elements—evolve a new world out of chaos. Thus we can see that not alone because of his charm did he prove that the Muse dearly loved him. And his charm is due not only to his brilliancy and felicity of style, his imaginative insight into the spirit of a far-off time, but to his unwavering enthusiasm. His histories live because he himself was all on fire with life and enthusiasm. It was this divine energy of genius which enabled him to undertake and bring to perfection plans of work which might daunt the spirit of any man, much more one who was hampered as he was.

The touching pathos of Prescott's life should not make us forget how really kind the gods were to him. Aside from the great misfortune of impaired sight—to a man of his tastes and ambitions perhaps the greatest which could befall—his life was happy. He was endowed with a hopeful, vivacious temperament. He was blessed with affectionate parents, and was rich in friends, who did all possible to help him in his privations. He never felt the stress of poverty, never felt the sting of dependence, the stern necessity to work for a mere livelihood. His ample means gave him the best medical advice, and every appliance for the relief of his suffering, for the furtherance of his work. Unlike many other toilers in the field of literature, he won recognition and appreciation by his first book. After that he had something to depend upon besides his own solitary enthusiasm. His home life was beautiful and serene: he had charm of manner, was rich in every personal attraction—in fact, he seemed to have everything but the blessing of sight! It is perhaps idle to speculate what Prescott's life would have been had this misfortune not overwhelmed him. His very joys and his advantages might have been to him a perilous temptation. A study of his childhood and early manhood, of his temperament, of his environment, go far to prove

HOUSE AT PEPPERELL, MASS., BUILT BY COLONEL PRESCOTT, THE HERO OF BUNKER HILL

Now in the possession of the Prescott family



THE BUST OF PRESCOTT BY GREENOUGH

that had this misfortune not overtaken him we might never have had these marvelous histories. He might have shone in society, been a brilliant man of the world, won distinction as a lawyer, written a few critical articles for the reviews; but would he have had the patience to devote himself to the strenuous and exacting study of history? As it was, the loss of his sight seemed to change the whole current of his intellectual energy; it brought out the inherent resources of his genius, gave direction and purpose to many vague tendencies.

The Prescott family was of Puritan stock, and in his sterling virtue, his sensitiveness of conscience, his obedience to high ideals of duty, Prescott proved himself worthy of his lineage.[1] He was unusually happy in his parents; his father, Judge Prescott, was a man of wealth and of distinction in his profession, and was one of the most affectionate of men. His mother had energy and ability and a tender grace of character which endeared her to all. Resembling both his parents in some respects, Prescott gradually developed many traits for which no ancestry can be traced, and which were a manifestation of his own genius—a genius in which temperament formed as much a part as intellectual strength. The house in Salem where, on the 4th of May, 1796, Prescott first opened his eyes is no longer in existence, though an excellent sketch has been preserved.

The boy's childhood was a very happy one. One of his first teachers records that he was bright and merry, with an inquisitive mind, quick perceptions, and a good memory. He was a thoroughly human little fellow; loved play more than books, as every healthy child ought; and of the books he read he preferred those which appealed strongly to the imagination. Sincerity of character distinguished him from the very first; this, in spite of his capacity for friendship, proved often very inconvenient in his relations to other children. A few years more and this characteristic became one of his greatest charms.

In 1808 the Prescotts moved from Salem to Boston. A friend has paid many a tribute to the charm and beauty of their home life; he speaks of the frankness and sincerity of the father and mother, of the love they showed to their son, of his proud and happy position in the home, of how much he was trusted, and how well he bore the test.

At school William plunged into his studies with zest and appreciation; and he soon began to show decided taste for romances and tales of adventure. Nothing very unusual in this, for every bright boy has the same experience. Like many other boys also, Prescott loved in his amusements to represent battles, going over again in imagination the struggles before the walls of Troy, or, coming nearer home, enacting scenes in our Revolution. Had Prescott never become the vivid describer of battles, the writer of histories which are like romances, we might pay little attention to these early tastes; but they are significant in their prophecy of his future.

In 1811 Prescott entered Harvard. He matriculated with honor, though it is well to remember that in neither his school nor his college course did he show any tendency to study more than was required. It was in Prescott's junior year at college that the accident happened which was to change the aspect of the whole world to him, and serve as a cruel spur to drive him into a course of activity which was to tax every intellectual faculty. Turning one day to see the cause of a disturbance among some students at dinner, he received a blow from a large, hard piece of bread, thrown at random. It struck the open eye—a rare occurrence, for the lid usually closes at any approach of danger. But here "the missile, thrown with great force, struck the very disc of the eye itself." Prescott fell at once to the ground, and then was immediately taken home and placed in the care of a physician. The first symptoms were like those of concussion of the brain; then came complete physical prostration, and he had to remain in bed for a time. As the system recovered gradually from the shock, it was found that the sight of the eye was gone. It was a case of paralysis of the retina, and was, of course, incurable. After a few weeks he returned to college and cautiously resumed his work. There was a magnanimity, a noble simplicity in the character of Prescott, and he nowhere revealed it more admirably than in his relations to the young man to whose carelessness his misfortune was due. He never referred to him except in the kindest terms, never allowed others to blame him, and in later life rendered him a most substantial and unostentatious service. This is noteworthy, because the young

HOUSE IN SALEM WHERE PRESCOTT WAS BORN

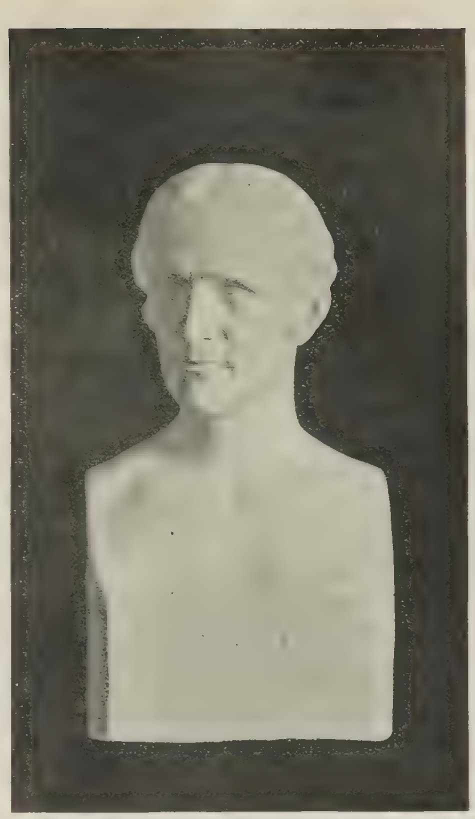
Drawn by H. S. Howland, New York

---

[1] Prescott's grandfather, Colonel Prescott, fought so bravely at Bunker Hill that Washington said he had rendered safe the liberties of the country.

The grandfather of Prescott's wife was Colonel Linzee, who at the time of the Battle of Bunker Hill commanded his Majesty's ship Falcon. The swords which had been worn by the American soldier and the British sailor on that memorable day came finally by inheritance into the possession of the historian. When Thackeray visited Prescott in 1852, he noticed these swords hung over one of the book-cases in the library, and when he wrote "The Virginians" he alluded to them in his opening chapter: "On the library wall of one of the most famous writers of America hang two crossed swords which his relatives wore in the great War of Independence. The one sword was gallantly drawn in the service of the King, the other was the weapon of a brave and honored Republican soldier. The possessor of the harmless trophy has earned for himself a name alike honored in his ancestor's country and in his own, where genius like his has always a peaceful welcome." George Ticknor spoke of this singular trophy, "if trophy that can be called which was won from no enemy, and which is a memento at once of a defeat that was full of glory, and of triumphs in the field of letters more brilliant than those in the fields of war." These swords were given after Prescott's death to the Historical Society of Massachusetts. "There, we trust, they may rest in peace so long as the two nations shall exist—trophies indeed of the past, but warnings for the future."

man himself never expressed regret for his act, nor sympathy with Prescott's suffering.



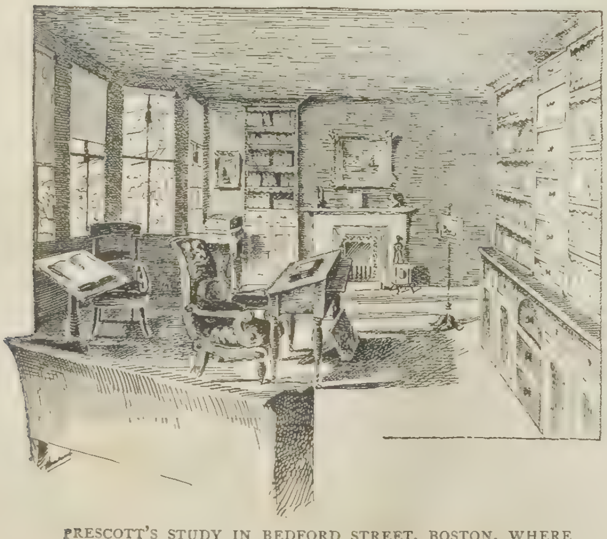
THE BUST OF PRESCOTT BY BALL

Prescott graduated with flying colors; and all his classmates were sorry to part with this vivacious, generous-hearted, winsome youth, and they showered upon him every mark of their esteem.

He became at once a law-student in his father's office, and he began his work with ardor and many bright hopes for the future. At the same time he kept up his classical studies. But in a few months the dark clouds began to obscure for him the brightness of the days. A malignant inflammation of his uninjured eye set in, and no remedy, however desperate or painful, seemed to relieve it. "But nothing was able," says Ticknor, "to affect the natural flow of his spirits—neither pain, nor the sharp surgical remedies to which he was repeatedly subjected, nor the disheartening darkness in which he was kept, nor the gloomy vista that the future seemed to open before him. His equanimity and cheerfulness were invincible." His mother, in speaking of his suffering and his seclusion, said then and often afterwards, "I never, in a single instance, groped my way across the apartment to take my place at his side, that he did not salute me with some expression of good cheer—not a single instance—as if we were the patients, and his place were to comfort us."

That Prescott bore with so much fortitude and equanimity the tedium of dark rooms, and the suffering which was soon to be almost his daily companion, was undoubtedly owing largely to this gift of the gods—a hopeful spirit. And yet it is well not to underestimate the effort which Prescott put forth. His patience was consciously exerted, in obedience to a high and noble ideal. Then, too, it was the result of his deep and tender love for others. His natural vivacity helped to tide over many a depressing hour and to cheer his solitude with many bright and happy thoughts; but we must not forget that such cheerfulness is apt to be severely taxed in the presence of constantly recurring disappointments and privations, and at last ceases to be spontaneous.

When somewhat better, Prescott went to spend the winter at the Azores with relatives; but the inconveniences of the voyage soon made his eye worse, and from November to February, 1815, he had to be in a dark room, "six weeks of the time in such total darkness that the furniture could not be distinguished." The history of these weary months is like that of all his subsequent life. The trouble seemed to be rheumatism of the eye, and any carelessness would usually bring on intense pain and inflammation. One of the few times in which he spoke of his privations was in 1847, when he was contemplating writing the history of Philip II.: "Now that I have discharged Peru, I feel like an idle tar whose ship is laid up in ordinary. But time is a bitter drug, and I feel I shall soon be afloat again on board the good ship 'Philip II.,' though I am but a blind pilot, and have not half an eye to steer her with." Then again, months after: "Here I am with the richest collection that ever fell to a history-monger, scarce old books and manuscripts without end all lying around me, and, alas! without an eye to look at the title-pages. The physicians agree that if I would save it for the vulgar purposes of life, I must wholly abstain from using it in books."



PRESCOTT'S STUDY IN BEDFORD STREET, BOSTON, WHERE "FERDINAND AND ISABELLA" WAS WRITTEN Drawn by H. S. Howland

Prescott left the Azores in April, 1816, for London. A sojourn there for the sake of treatment from eminent physicians was not of much benefit. He had to be so careful that he saw little of the artistic treasures of the great city, but he made good use of his few chances of enjoyment. Paris gave him scarcely more opportunity, but in Italy his eye was stronger, and hence he was able to enjoy things as only a man of his temperament can enjoy. But a return at Paris of his old trouble made him hasten home. Here he found every comfort to help him; the colors of his walls and carpets made to suit his sensitive eye; a devoted friend who spent hours reading the classics with him; a loving sister who insisted upon spending the greater part of every day reading aloud poetry and history![1] Prescott was now twenty-two. He had been obliged to give up all his plans for the profession of law, and many letters testify how hard the struggle was. Prescott's marriage at the age of twenty-four was, however, a cause of great happiness. "At the time of his marriage," says Ticknor, "my friend was one of the finest-looking men I have ever seen. He was tall, well formed, manly in his bearing, but gentle, with light-brown hair that was hardly changed or diminished by years, with a clear complexion and a ruddy flush on his cheek that kept for him to the last an appearance of comparative youth, but, above all, with a smile that was the most absolutely contagious I ever looked upon." And Bancroft said Prescott's voice was like music, and one could never have enough of it.

It was shortly after his marriage that the indecision in regard to what he was going to make of his life changed to a deliberate purpose. His literary tastes, which had been deepening and strengthening ever since he left college, influenced him largely, but at first he had no definite plan as to writing history. He felt that the first thing was to gain a broad and varied culture. He therefore began a systematic course of study, at the very foundations of literature and of language. From English he went on to French, and then to Italian. That Prescott's faculty of literary criticism was well developed is shown by his brief analysis of Dante in one of his letters. In spite of its brevity, it is

---

[1] Since writing this about Prescott's sister, Mr. Arthur Dexter, her son, has sent me a quotation from an unpublished article of his own in relation to his mother. Of Prescott's sufferings, he says, "a great deal has been said and printed. I have sometimes thought it would have done no harm to say a little more about his sister's affectionate care. I doubt if many beautiful young girls would make light of sacrificing almost all their time to nursing a brother."

PRESCOTT AT WORK

"The contraction of the brow," says one of his relatives, "shows his usual concentration of thought when writing."

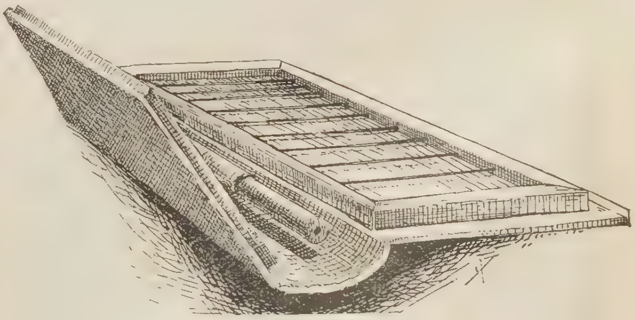
one of the best criticisms he ever wrote. He scores a good point when he says he wishes Dante had made more of the mind as a means of suffering, instead of dealing almost exclusively with physical horrors. Prescott entered heart and soul into Dante's sublime poem. "Every canto," he said, "blazes with a new and increased effulgence. The very reading it by another pained my poor eyes." As a trial of his powers Prescott now began the writing of some critical articles for the "North American Review;" the writing of these extended over a number of years. His estimates of Molière, Scott, Cervantes, show poetic sympathy, wise judgment, discriminating insight. We cannot say that his originality is striking, nor does he often show brilliancy of coloring. But he has none of the poisoned arrows with which critics often fill their quivers. He is calm and impartial, always genial, and most suggestive. Stirling thought that Prescott would have attained great eminence as a critic and essayist had he pursued that path of letters.

It is always of interest to know to what particular influence is due a great man's decision to devote himself to that particular work in which ultimately he excels. Prescott listened with rapt attention to the reading of Mably's "Étude de l'Histoire." This, more than any other one book, tended to give the final direction to his already strong feeling for history. A half-indefinite plan of writing a history of Italian literature led him gradually to narrow his thoughts to that "untried ground," and, in his opinion, "a rich one," the age of Ferdinand. The plans for the study of his materials for "Ferdinand and Isabella" were stupendous, enough to test the courage of any student, much more one hampered as he was. During these studies he spoke of traveling at a very lame gait, and yet even he miscalculated his strength. It took twice as long as he anticipated to bring his labors to a brilliant close. At first it seemed utterly impossible to get a reader who understood Spanish. He therefore had a secretary who read volume after volume without knowing a word of the language, and the awkwardness and constraint can well be imagined. Later, however, his work progressed more happily. A sad bereavement in the winter of 1828 delayed his work. He lost the elder of his two children, a dear little daughter of four, to whom he had been devoted. Unlike many literary men, to whom their work is so important as to shut out from them some of the dearest and sweetest pleasures of life, Prescott had allowed this little child to come into the study and interrupt whatever work was going on there. Many years after, when Prescott was writing to a friend who had just suffered the loss of a child, he referred to his own unforgotten sorrow in simple but pathetic words.

With even tenderer words Prescott spoke of his father, when the loving tie of years was finally broken by death. He had the joy of keeping his mother with him to within five years of his own death. Seldom has there been a happier household than this of the Prescotts in their different homes, especially in the old ancestral house at Pepperell.

"Ferdinand and Isabella" was published in 1837. It met with instantaneous success. The reviews of the book were able and discriminating, and in every case most gratifying.

The history of the composition, the publication and public reception of "Ferdinand and Isabella" is very much like that of "The Conquest of Mexico," of "The Conquest of Peru," of the "Sketch of Charles V.," and of the unfinished "Philip II." The condition of Prescott's eye varied, so that he was enabled to use it sometimes more frequently, but towards the latter part of his life he had to give up even this moderate indulgence. He so cultivated his memory that he could compose sixty pages of printed text and hold it in his mind till he came to write it out on his noctograph. When, in writing "Philip II.," he found that he could remember perfectly only about forty pages, he felt discouraged at the failure of his memory! His style grew continually more flexible, freer, more sustained and beautiful. He never grew careless in his search for truth, never relaxed his vigilance, never made a statement without being sure that, as far as he was able to weigh evidence, that statement was right and just. What this devotion to a high ideal really meant can be understood only by remembering his natural temperament. There was no cant about William H. Prescott. He seldom spoke the word duty, but after he had decided on his literary course his whole life was molded according to the dictates of what he conceived to be the obligations imposed by his worldly advantages and the intellectual gifts bestowed upon him. He often worked when he did not want to; indeed, there was a constant struggle with a natural tendency to desultory pursuits—to, as it were, drift with the tide rather than stem the current. Prescott was a man of genius, for without that inspired and magnetic quality his



PRESCOTT'S NOCTOGRAPH

Now in the archives of the Massachusetts Historical Society. Drawn by H. S. Howland work could not have its perennial vitality, but his genius largely showed itself in what George Eliot called an infinite capacity for taking pains.

Prescott's home life during these busy years when he was working for this immortal fame was most beautiful and noteworthy. There was perfect concord and sympathy between him and his wife, between him and his father and mother, and all the others who made up this joyful household. Prescott's winsomeness of character endeared him to all his friends, while his social attractions, his vivacious conversation, made him much sought by the world. A man of wealth and of intellectual eminence who has a town house in Beacon Street, and a country house at Pepperell, and a house by the sea at Nahant or Lynn, is not apt to be neglected by the world! Prescott saw these things clearly; he took the good the gods provided with hearty thanks, but no success had power to spoil the lovely sincerity of his nature. He showed his friendship and his hospitality the most freely to those who lived obscure lives or to whom fortune had not been kind. His acts of charity were frequent, unostentatious, munificent; sometimes to perform them he gave up some of his cherished plans. Prescott's social instincts were strong, and therein lay one of his temptations. His infirmities and his literary purposes changed his life greatly, but he never allowed them to "shut him from his kind." He dined out frequently, he made many friendships with men of rank and literary eminence, he was the charming playmate of children, the boon companion of young men and maidens.

PRESCOTT

From an unpublished Portrait made towards the end of his life

A visit to England in 1850 was most congenial to one of his temperament. It was, says Ticknor, the most brilliant visit ever made to England by an American citizen not clothed with the prestige of official station. Prescott was the literary lion of the hour, fêted by men of letters, flattered by the nobility, made much of by the Queen and Prince Albert. The letters he wrote home show most delightfully his vivacity, his descriptive powers, and his keen zest of life.

As for Prescott's religion, it lay deep at the very root of his character. "To do well and act justly," he wrote once after he had been passing through some intellectual conflicts, "to fear and to love God, and to love our neighbor as ourselves—in these is the essence of religion. . . . For what we can believe we are not responsible, supposing we examine candidly and patiently. For what we do we shall indeed be accountable. The doctrines of the Saviour unfold the whole code of morals by which our conduct should be regulated. Who, then, whatever difficulties he may meet in particular incidents and opinions recorded in the Gospels, can hesitate to receive the great religious and moral truths inculcated by the Saviour as the words of inspiration? I cannot, certainly. On these, then, I will rest, and for all else

"Wait the great teacher Death, and God adore."

The great Unfolder of mysteries came to Prescott suddenly and mercifully on the 28th of January, 1859. But it came as a blow to friends on two continents. Not only the friends who loved him, but the different societies of America and Europe which had distinguished him with their highest honors, the faculty and students of Harvard College, all who cherished Prescott's work even when they had never seen his face, bore their part in the common mourning. "There was no division of opinion. There was no dissentient, no hesitating voice on either side of the Atlantic. All sorrowfully felt that a great loss had been sustained, that a brilliant and beneficent light had been extinguished."

In an article like this no justice can be done to a man like Prescott. But I have purposely dwelt more upon his character than upon his work, because at this centennial time it seems as if our tributes should be paid more to what Prescott was than to what he did. His work is imperishable; but as the years pass we are perhaps too apt to lose sight of the man in his work, to forget in the splendor of the fame he has won the peculiar value of the message which his beautiful life has for us. That message could be summed up in Carlyle's significant words, "Work, and despair not." Prescott's spirit was indomitable. It gave him power over suffering, it made him the conqueror of his fate. He had that grace of genius which transmuted a lifelong misfortune into a bright and beautiful blessing.

Very truly yours,
Wm H. Prescott

PRESCOTT'S AUTOGRAPH

St. Michael the Weigher

By James Russell Lowell

Stood the tall Archangel weighing
All man's dreaming, doing, saying,
All the failure and the pain,
All the triumph and the gain,
In the unimagined years,
Full of hope, more full of tears,
Since old Adam's hopeless eyes
Backward searched for Paradise,
And, instead, the flame-blade saw
Of inexorable Law.

Waking, I beheld him there,
With his fire-gold, flickering hair,
In his blinding armor stand,
And the scales were in his hand.
Mighty were they, and full well
They could poise both heaven and hell.

"Angel," asked I humbly then,
"Weighest thou the souls of men?
That thine office is, I know."
"Nay," he answered me, "not so:
But I weigh the hope of man
Since the power of choice began,
In the world, of good or ill."
Then I waited and was still.

In one scale I saw him place
All the glories of our race,
Cups that lit Belshazzar's feast,
Gems, the lightning of the East,
Kublai's scepter, Cæsar's sword,
Many a poet's golden word,
Many a skill of science, vain
To make men as gods again.

In the other scale he threw
Things regardless, outcast, few,
Martyr-ash, arena sand,
Of St. Francis' cord a strand,
Beechen cups of men whose need
Fasted that the poor might feed,
Disillusions and despairs
Of young saints with grief-grayed hairs,
Broken hearts that broke for Man.

Marvel through my pulses ran
Seeing then the beam divine
Swiftly on the hand decline,
While Earth's splendor and renown
Mounted light as thistle-down. —Selected.

Bicycling for Women

The Puzzling Question of Costume

By R. L. Dickinson, M.D.

THERE are four critics before whom woman's dress must pass—fashion, fitness, health, and artistic beauty. The first is at odds with all the rest. As for art in personal adornment, it cannot be said to exist in a nation tolerating our masculine evening dress, or the deformed woman of our fashion journals. Yet the principle at the foundation of the dress question seems simple. Is it not—shaped clothes for work, draped dress for leisure? For muscle-play, freedom is the first requisite, whether in skating or in scrubbing a floor. It would seem that the principles said by Veblen to govern modern dress, conspicuous expensiveness, novelty, and ineptitude — waste and unfitness in order to prove wealth and leisure—need not apply at all to our subject. But they do, and we shall have to try to adapt them and to secure, notwithstanding, the greatest possible good from this fine exercise. The physician willingly studies details to understand any treatment. He is met with no problem that troubles him more than the prescription for outdoor exercise for woman; for her chances for physical development outside her household duties are limited to a degree that would be ridiculous if it were not pitiable. For instance, in the Greater New York there is no opportunity for a woman to swim in the cooler months except in a poor little tank of very cold water in the cellar of a Turkish bath. House habits, dress habits, and resignation have brought it about that the demand for body-building facilities is small. It is supposed to be sufficient exertion for the sister to wave her handkerchief from the grand stand. With growth comes weakness instead of strength. The physical director tells us that the girls of fourteen can jump one foot higher than the girls of eighteen. The gymnasium, with all its games, is voted dull; the bowling-alley means broken corset-bones under one-sided, sudden strain; dancing is done in a close atmosphere, in wrong dress, during sleep-hours; and horseback riding, especially at a trot or with the close seat, involves a certain jouncing within the snug corset that the tailor-made basque demands. Only the summer presents opportunities that attract, but most of these require much time, and the cost of long vacations. So we turn to wheeling.

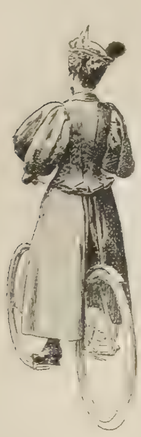

FIG. 1

Skirt smooth over hips; pleats front and back. Tam. with brim.

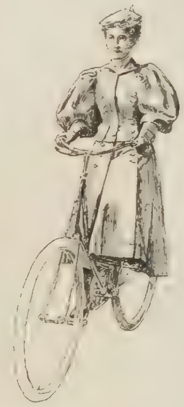

FIG. 2

The Silvia, with front flap half turned back and buttoned.

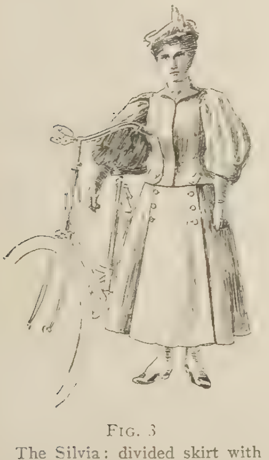

FIG. 3

The Silvia: divided skirt with front flap that can be folded back. A jacket loose in the front is better than the shaped form.

There are four types of bicycling costume for women—the full knickerbocker, resembling the regulation wheelman's suit; the fuller, longer bloomer; the short skirt with leggings; and the skirt to the top of the shoe.

The last is the one decreed by fashion. For the woman who is too thin, for the leisurely rider on level roads in fair weather, and for the woman shy of comment, it gives a suitable garb, together with that comfort which conformity brings. Its convenience at present is that the cyclist can step off her wheel into the shop or house and be clad as her uniformed sisters are.

Even though the skirts measure no more than two and one-half to three yards about the bottom, there is some danger of catching in the rear sprocket; there is always the discomfort of the knee that must tug to lift forward and upward one-half of the garment; and whether there is wind or not, there is with all skirts a certain flop or swing hardly pleasing to the eye. All these difficulties are overcome in some measure by the cut of the skirt falling in two equal pleats, box or folded, on each side of the rear wheel (Fig. 1), by the satin or silk knickerbocker underneath, or by a slippery lining, and by certain recent improvements in the hang of the skirt and the fit in front. Moreover, a broad band of leather or rows of stitching help to keep the skirt down, and lessen the chance of accident.

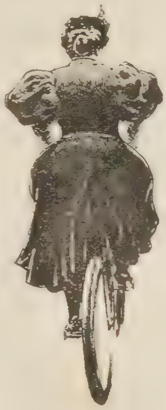

FIG. 4

The stout rider emphasizing her defects by wide sleeves and horizontal lines.

The skirt, the separate jacket, and the shirt-waist form the best combination for comfort. The body-covering that can be taken off on hot rides is hygienically desirable. Here the stout rider, who must shun the horizontal lines that emphasize breadth, and whose success in all costume lies in lines carrying the eye from shoulder to heel, encounters difficulty. For cooler weather it may be overcome by the princesse idea, with the long perpendiculars behind, where breadth most shows, and by a false jacket in front to conceal abdominal prominence (Fig. 5). With these riders it is especially important that no fullness of the skirt should be placed over the hips, but that it should lie in pleats front and rear. The low position of the waist-line of usual street dress has resulted in a figure that is disproportionally short from hip to heel, as shown by the impossible length of leg and skirt in every fashion-plate (Fig. 9). Now, if the skirt is curtailed, the result is a squareness of effect disastrous to the stout woman. The root of the difficulty is that nature ran no horizontal division across the body, and all our attempts to do it result in cutting the dress into parts that cannot be fitted together or designed alike. For the thin woman, however, the skirt stitching and the cross-line of a longish jacket make a broader appearance, and the baggy shoulders are allowable.

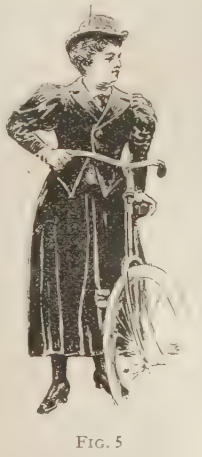

FIG. 5

The gown in one piece, with false jacket for stout woman.

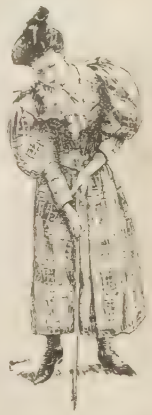

FIG. 6

The long bloomers.

(By permission of the "Metropolitan Magazine.")

Many devices are pictured in the cycling columns of the papers and "The Wheelwoman" for changing the long into the short skirt, and for converting the skirt into bloomers by means of tapes or cords running through eyes. In some the lower edge of the skirt is gathered in at the bottom, and a front piece unbuttoned and removed. In others the center of the lower edge, front and back, may be drawn together. The latter practice, however, produces an undesirable bagginess.

The bloomer falling to the top of the calf, well hung, moderately full, with leggings or stockings below—is not this modest, well adapted to its use, and, to the right women, rightly designed, also becoming? Our standards will shift in that direction, it is safe to predict, and we shall see, as we have not often seen in the past, a happy adaptation of color and design, in this as in all other dress, to increase and set off the beauties of the wearer while masking her defects. It is simply out of artistic question that all women be arrayed after the same pattern or style. Indeed, the writer believes that with the right honor to the body that is sure to come with the lessening of prudery, the closer-fitting clothes for arduous work or play will find their natural place, and that at no distant day.

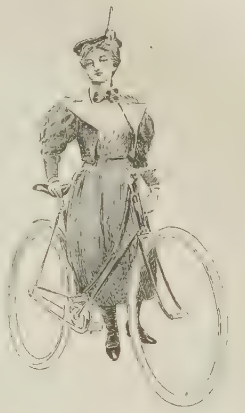

Fig. 7
Tam, Eton jacket, shirt-waist, and short skirt.

How long a time will pass before we shall laugh at the idea of baggy sleeves on the wheel? The Eton jacket is not ungraceful, but hardly as useful as the longer jacket fitted at the back but loose in front. Coat-tails falling below the saddle, on the other hand, blow in the wind.

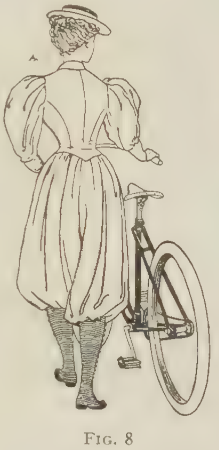

Fig. 8
Well-designed bloomers with ugly waist lines.

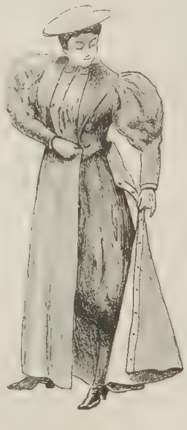

Fig. 9
A removable skirt.

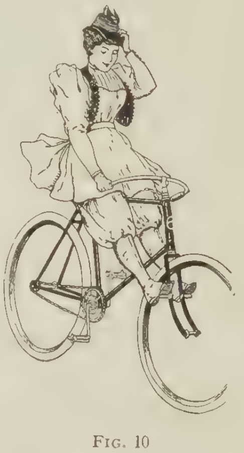

Fig. 10
Short skirt over bloomers flies up.

As for the head-covering, a doctor makes but one point. He speaks for protection for the eyes. The so-called "bicycle face" is mainly a sun-glare scowl. A variety of brims offer sufficient choice: the Alpine hat, the Tam O' Shanter with visor, or with soft, stitched brim all around like the "Beefeater's," or the plain "Tam;" the narrow-brimmed felt often seen with hunting costumes; and, if one dared to say it, the golf cap, and the forbidden yachting cap. Only the usual feminine street hat, compounded of nothing and feathers and flowers, is artistically and practically unsuitable. For sensible foot-coverings there is need of less and less pleading. The high shoe is warmest, and keeps out sand and wet, but its top makes an ugly line. The low shoe with a gaiter fits the need and looks well, and now one can buy high-reaching shoes with long cloth tops. The foot is our one deformed feature, and it claims room. Corns and blisters belong to wheeling as well as to walking.

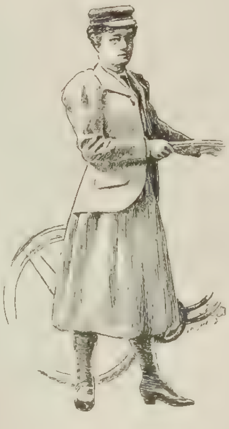

Fig. 11
Shorter bloomers.

You know what I am going to say about corsets? Doctors and artists tell the same old tiresome story? True enough. For in the end the glory and beauty of health will turn all doctors into artists, except for the sanitarians and surgeons, the preventers of disease and menders of accidents. Meanwhile, we who are told that our medicines (without fresh air) and our operations (with no regular muscle-training following) do not cure, are smiling to see the general adoption of a body-swaying exercise that will do more to break corset-bones than all our preaching. To wheel far one must breathe. One-fifth of the breathing capacity is done away with by the loose corset or health waist; the sweep of the diaphragm with each breath, that is wrongly said to belong only to men, is nearly stopped, with all the sluggish action and circulation that follows. Better clothing will develop in civilized women what all savages or animals of either sex practice, and that is like habits of respiration and muscular activity.

Practically, the steps of the change are, when taken gradually, these: Loosened corset, waist-bands, and basque; health waist, union undergarments, and substitution of equestrian tights for the woolen petticoat; and, lastly, abolition of waist-bands except for light skirts, though leaving the hips a certain share of weight to carry, by the general princesse or Empire form for heavier dresses, or a gown-form for every heavy skirt, the dress lining being carried up into a skeleton basque, and the breasts being supported from above, not from below.

Abroad, both in England and on the Continent, the short corset is in general use. Redfern says he can persuade no woman to wear them in New York. It may be noted here that at a meeting of prominent specialists at the New York Academy of Medicine, in the discussion of bicycling for women by men who rode themselves, each speaker had words of strong commendation for this exercise, but each emphatically added his warning against riding in corsets and tight clothing.

My random sketches are chiefly from photographs. Therefore they look stocky beside the woman in "Life" and the "Bazar," whose figures are often drawn nine heads high (Figs. 8, 10) instead of six.

We must see ourselves as the camera sees us before we shall demand art in dress, and we must know ourselves as the trainer and physician know us if we care to grow vigorous, comely, and free from disease, defect, and deformity.

A New Philanthropy

By Frank A. Hutchins

The free traveling libraries which have grown to be very successful branches of the State libraries in the cities and villages of New York and Michigan are being developed in a somewhat new line in Dunn County, Wisconsin. Senator J. H. Stout, of Menominee, Wis., is now putting into operation a system of free traveling libraries intended to give each rural resident of the county something of the same library privileges which residents of the cities enjoy. He has purchased a library which will be subdivided into sixteen smaller libraries of thirty volumes each. Each small library will be put up in a strong, substantial case, with doors, shelves, lock and key, a library record, and, with all its equipments, will be ready to be set up anywhere and managed independently as a complete library.

To secure one of these libraries the people of any neighborhood in Dunn County have only to organize a local library association of responsible people, who will agree to care for the library and return it safely. Each association will pay a fee of $1, and Mr. Stout will bear the expense of transportation both ways. This fee may be paid by an individual, by a round-up of neighborhood nickels, by a society, or in any convenient way; but the books of the library are to be free to all individuals of the community who use them properly, whether they contribute or not. A library will remain in a neighborhood for four months, and will then be exchanged for another.

In putting the scheme into practical operation, Mr. Stout asked the counsel of the Wisconsin Free Library Commission, which sent the writer as its representative to Dunn County. He spent some time traveling about the country districts to find out whether the people were willing to do their part of the work, what books were most wanted, and what were most commonly found in the school and home libraries. He found everywhere an intense book-hunger and an eagerness for the libraries. Nearly all of the country schools have libraries, but the volumes are mainly for children and for reference in school work. Only a few volumes are added each year, so that the books have not the attraction of novelty. Adults rarely go to the schools, which are closed part of the year, and are not open on Saturday or available for library distribution during school hours. These school libraries have, however, sent out young men and women with a desire for good books which they cannot gratify. The canvass showed a general consensus of opinion that in isolated farming neighborhoods and in the smaller hamlets the post-offices would be the most convenient places for keeping the libraries, and the postmasters themselves were willing to accept the responsibilities without extra compensation. It is probable, therefore, that the most of the traveling libraries will be looked after by the postmasters.

In New York and Michigan the avowed purpose of the traveling libraries is to cultivate a taste for good reading that shall lead to the establishment of permanent libraries. Mr. Stout's main purpose is to go to communities so small that they cannot have large permanent libraries, and to give them access to the best books with the least possible cost. He is attempting an experiment which, if successful, will put the rural world into much closer relation with the outside world of thought and action, and solve a problem that has perplexed many philanthropists. Many permanent libraries have been bought for rural communities in New England and New York, but they have failed to hold the popular interest because so few new books are added from time to time.

The books for these libraries will be chosen mainly from those great volumes which the experience of all libraries shows are read with avidity by all classes of people. Something there will be for the occasional student, but the main purpose will be to cheer, amuse, uplift, and instruct the average man and woman whose waking hours are mainly given to work. The books of a sample library may show better than a general description the plan upon which these libraries will be made. They are as follows: "Ivanhoe," "John Halifax," "Twice-Told Tales," "Charles O'Malley," "Wreck of the Grosvenor," "Ramona," "A War-Time Wooing," "A Singular Life," "Old-Fashioned Girl," "The Jungle Book," "Cruise of the Ghost," "Little Jarvis," "The Birds' Christmas Carol," "A Flock of Girls," "My Arctic Journal," "Lost in the Jungle," "Mountains of California," Parkman's "La Salle," "Norway" (Story of the Nations), "Famous American Statesmen," Ball's "Starland," "First Principles of Agriculture," "Cyclopædia of Games and Sports," "Boston Cook Book," "Ivory King," "American Citizen," "Franklin Square Song Book No. 1," "College Songs," "St. Nicholas" (two bound parts).

While each library has only a few of the old-time favorites, and while many of the best children's books are omitted because they are found in nearly all the school libraries, it will readily be seen that a number of such libraries will include a very wide range of the best popular books on all subjects of general interest. The library which follows the idea of the one described will probably include a volume of Dickens, one upon an ancient statesman, and one upon hygiene or botany, and one, probably, upon some popular phase of social science.

Mr. Stout has also a plan for circulating magazines, which city readers have read through, among the country patrons of the traveling libraries. He thinks it possible to pick up enough comparatively new periodicals in his city to send out a good supply of the "Harper's," "Century," "Scribner's," "McClure's," "St. Nicholas," "Youth's Companion," and similar publications with each case. These and some other possibilities are only mentioned to show that much is hoped for from the new plan. Already three little hamlets in Dunn County are preparing to establish reading-rooms in connection with their new libraries.

The Broad View

By Lucy Elliot Keeler

> And not by eastern windows only,
> When daylight comes, comes in the light.
> In front the sun climbs slow, how slowly!
> But westward look, the land is bright.

What does it mean, this something in Clough's lines which beyond rhythm and picture appeals to us? And to what does Carlyle refer when he talks fiercely of respectability with its thousand gigs? and Matthew Arnold when he asserts that the occupant of every gig is a Philistine? Is it not a warning to get out of the cramped narrowness of our daily lives? to open more than one outlook on life—else we shall catch but faint and tardy glimpses of the radiance that floods it?

When Honorius was told at Ravenna that Roma was lost, he gave signs of the deepest distress, believing that a pet bird of his called Roma was alluded to; and was greatly consoled on discovering that it was merely the capital of the world! "Rien," wrote Louis the Sixteenth, because it chanced that day there was no hunt; and while he wrote, Paris surged on to storm the Bastile. But emperors and kings are not solitary in their narrowness.

All of us know the woman who, after a journey to a distant city, comes back to tell us the minutest details of the room in which she was quartered, the situation of the bureau, the number of shelves in the closet; what she thought about the paper on the wall, and what her husband thought about it, and what her sister to whom she had written thought about it. If we ask concerning the music which we ourselves longed to hear, she is reminded that, returning from a certain concert, her husband slipped and fell, and she had to call a carriage, and how it took them to the wrong hotel, and the exact remarks which she made thereon to the driver; and then follows a list of remedies, the order of hot compresses and cold arnica, until you feel you could perform it all yourself backward and in the dark. If you ask about the university settlement work in which her friends were engaged, she is reminded of her own children, and recounts the number of garments she has made for them and the number of ruffles on each; and offers to send you their photographs and locks of their hair. She tells what carpets she is going to take up at the next house-cleaning, and makes you guess how long they have been down, and floods your brain with her petty concerns until you are irritated and exhausted and her presence becomes intolerable.

We may not all err along this line. Our especial window may not face the domestic side. It may be that philanthropy magnifies the importance of some Borrioboola Gha to the exclusion of our own development or the interests of those about us; it may be even books and self-improvement which narrow our vision to the little strip of sky which we think monopolizes the sunshine of life.

Broad views do not depend upon environment. Go where you will, have what you crave, you can never be anything but what you are. The great question for each of us is, What horizon shall I draw about my life? Because we do not shine in society shall we therefore avoid its softening and enlarging influences? Because we appreciate that we shall never be skilled pianists or painters, shall we therefore hesitate to study harmony and form? Because our acquaintances are uncultured, shall we therefore neglect the quickening atmosphere of books? Because our youth has flown, shall we fall behind the times we are in?

THE H. SOPHIE NEWCOMB MEMORIAL CHAPEL

The Higher Life of New Orleans[1]

By Grace King

THE life of New Orleans for the past thirty years has been, in brief, first a struggle for existence, then a struggle for reform. The ten years following the close of the Civil War were consumed in what was felt by both political parties to be a life-and-death contest for the possession of the State Government. The installation of Francis T. Nicholls as Governor of Louisiana, in 1877, put an end to the revolutionary period of the State's post-bellum history, and opened the way to its financial rehabilitation, to the payment and not repudiation of the debt contracted by its carpetbag government. New Orleans rebounded at once from its tense defensive position into the wholesome activity of its normal commercial pursuits. In 1879 the construction of the jetties guaranteed its future as one of the great ports of the country. In 1882 Paul Tulane, by his endowment of a university in the city, assured its future as an educational and civilizing center. Since then the chronicle of the city's reform is practically the chronicle of its natural growth, its progress through the apparently inevitable obstacles of local conditions and, broadly speaking, human nature, away from the old, worn-out standards of the past, to those necessary for the higher and more complicated requirements of the present.

A glance at the census will assist us in clearly defining both the advantages and disadvantages of New Orleans in its civic evolution, in comparison with other cities. It has not been swamped by foreign immigration. By 1890 the population had crept up only to 242,000. Taking it by vote, however, we find this significant distribution of the working force of the city (in round numbers): Native whites, 29,000; foreign-born whites, 15,000; negroes, 15,000. These are the human elements which practically determine the height of life in New Orleans.

From whatever point of view one regards the city, Tulane University forces itself upon the eye and the

Francis T. Nicholls
Ex-Governor of Louisiana. Chief Justice Supreme Court of Louisiana

James Dillard
Dean College of Arts and Sciences Tulane University

Brandt V. B. Dixon
President H. Sophie Newcomb College

Rev. B. M. Palmer
Pastor First Presbyterian Church

---

[1] Previous articles in this series have been: "The Higher Life of American Cities" (introductory), by Mr. Theodore Roosevelt (The Outlook for December 21, 1895); "The Higher Life of New York City," by Albert Shaw (The Outlook for January 25, 1896); "The Higher Life of Chicago," by Melville E. Stone (The Outlook for February 22), and "The Higher Life of Boston," by Edward Everett Hale (The Outlook for March 28). Other articles will be on Philadelphia, by Mr. Talcott Williams; on St. Louis, by the Rev. John Snyder; and on Buffalo, by the Rev. William Burnet Wright, D.D.

ARTS AND SCIENCE BUILDING, TULANE UNIVERSITY

mind with all the realism and with all the symbolism of a pharos. Its endowment of one million and fifty thousand dollars came from Paul Tulane, a retired merchant of the city, but its foundation is that of the old University of Louisiana, whose School of Medicine dates from 1834, and its Law School from 1847. So quietly has the new University taken its place in the social and civil life of the community, so imperceptible has been the growth of its influence, that there seems as yet but a vague realization of its directing hold upon the city.

Within the decade, therefore, since the University began its active work in the community, the whole framework of intellectual expression in society (or in societies) has received a new and healthy impetus. Scientific, literary, and art circles have sprung into being where before existed only desultory efforts, or, more accurately speaking, longings; old, neglected libraries have been rehabilitated and started on a fresh career of usefulness, new ones have been created; extension lectures have been given, free drawing classes maintained. Four years ago there was no free reading-room for workingmen in the city; now there are four. The old State Historical Society, roused from a seven years' slumber, has gone to work again, with Professor Fortier as President, and Professor Ficklen (of History and Economics) as Secretary. Professor Fortier had already organized a local Folk-Lore Society. Professor Dillard is the President of a Lyceum Lecture Association. The University's free post-graduate courses in English and Latin for teachers, directed by Dr. Sharp and Professor Dillard, have led to the formation of English and Latin Clubs and given the inspiration to other associations among the teachers for self-improvement. And there are besides, stringing out indefinitely all over society, innumerable amateur groups; small classes for specific reading and study; while in the very center of the beau-monde two large literary clubs have taken root and are flourishing. The mere summary of this extra-mural work suggests what must be the personnel of the University. To hasten over details, the selection of Colonel William Preston Johnston as its first President has furnished an endowment of precedent and example to the University as genuine as that given in money by Paul Tulane. That he should be the first President of an institution so charged with the care of the future, not only of a State, but of a vast section of the country, fits into the converging essentials of time and place with that nice adjustment which human fallibility is glad to accept as providential. And, as it has already passed into the consciousness of Tulane students, and become with them a point of honorable pride, that not one cent in the dowry of their Alma Mater has to be apologized for or explained into good morals by the too prevalent end-justifies-the-means argument, so do they feel that an exceptional privilege has been accorded her in starting her presidential lineage with one to whom even in this day can be applied, with all the force and sincerity of original meaning, the old device: Sans peur et sans reproche. Clearly foreseeing the difficulties of organizing the institution demanded within safe limits of its endowment, and determined that lack of wealth should stimulate effort rather than militate against usefulness and prestige, President Johnston, following the example of the Great Napoleon, has chosen his marshals from men in the freshness of youthful vigor and close to the enthusiasms and inspirations of their day. There are few, if any, of his professorial corps who, after ten years of work under him, have passed the meridian of life. These men have brought to the service of the University an amount of volunteer force and warmth which youth only can give, and which money cannot buy. It needs not to be said that the University is progressive in its actions, and perfectly untrammeled in its thought and expression. The academic work has been organized into two colleges—Arts and Sciences and Technology. The former, as has been seen, has widened its scope until it has practically taken in the whole city as a mission field. The College of Technology, which covers all departments of engineering, represents fifteen years of steady devotion by its dean, Dr. Ayers. Recognizing that the great need of the South was the training at home of young men along lines that would fit them to develop the latent possibilities of their section of the country, his aim has been to frame an engineering college on the most approved modern lines, but with features of plan and detail especially suited to the industrial conditions and prospects of the South. The success of the college has more than justified his perspicacity and rewarded his labors. Its graduates are filling important positions, not only in the city and State, but throughout the whole country.

COLONEL WILLIAM PRESTON JOHNSTON
President Tulane University

MOST REV. FATHER JANSSENS
Archbishop of Louisiana (R.C.)

The most popular recognition of Tulane's services comes from hearty appreciation of the great change it has wrought in students' life outside the class-room: in the impetus it has given to open-air sports and athletic exercises as means of recreation. The wholesomeness of this change to general life can be appreciated fully only by those whose experience covers a time when the semi-tropical climate of the city was held sufficient warranty for a semi-languorous state of inactivity even in the young.

The H. Sophie Newcomb College for the higher education of women was founded by Mrs. Josephine Louise Newcomb, as a memorial to her daughter, in 1886, and made a department of Tulane University—a signal and important event in the history of the city.

The location is a happy one, a square in the beautiful garden district; where the college buildings are grouped fraternally with the majestic old oaks, whose wide-spreading, moss-hung branches shade the walks and courts. The contiguous Art Building and Chapel form one of the most picturesque corners in the American portion of the city—that in which architecture and nature more often disagree than harmonize.

Pursuing the same mission as its suzerain Tulane, the Newcomb has been the means of reforming and reorganizing the whole system of female education in New Orleans. The task of remolding the old ingredients of education into the new form, and of leading the requirements of the past up to the standard of the present in a community petrified with feminine conservatism, was one that exacted rare tact, judgment, and skill, and a marvelous amount of patience. This task was confided by the Tulane administrators to Dr. Brandt V. B. Dixon. The Newcomb as it stands to-day, complete in its organization, flushed with life and inspiration, is practically his creation—his answer to the call made upon him, and the result of nine years of concentrated effort towards his ideal.

Graduates from the Newcomb are admitted to the university courses of study in Tulane on the same conditions as young men graduating from the College of Arts and Sciences or Technology. The development of the art department has furnished one of the most gratifying successes of the College, and one of the best, if not the best, testimonials to the correctness of Dr. Dixon's estimate of the latent capabilities of his material. The response he has evoked from the art instinct of women, hitherto limited to music for expression, has been spontaneous and genuine. The conversion of this response into an art movement, free, strong, natural, and painstaking, is due to the genius and single-hearted devotion to art of the professor of drawing and painting, and the director of art instruction of the college, Ellsworth Woodward. In exigencies (as such circumstances in education might be called) where so much depends on the union of individual force and personal character with superior scientific qualifications, it is easier to be prolix than succinct, when the man and the exigency meet, as in this instance. In addition to the usual four years' normal course and special post-graduate classes, a course in ceramic art has been provided, with complete instruction in pottery manufacture and ornamentation. Newcomb has revolutionized the student life of the girls, as Tulane has done with the boys. The old conventional rules and regulations hitherto prevailing have been forced to yield to a generous freedom for both mind and body. Physical training and open-air recreation are now provided by every girls' school in the city.

H. SOPHIE NEWCOMB MEMORIAL COLLEGE FOR WOMEN

In the chronicle of the city's benefactors, three other women follow close after Mrs. Newcomb in good work for the advancement and betterment of their fellow-citizens. The medical department of Tulane now occupies a handsome building, erected and furnished by Mrs. Ida A. Richardson as a memorial of her late husband, for many years Dean of the Medical Department.

The Howard Memorial Library, an invaluable benefaction to scholar and student, is the gift of Miss Annie Howard to the city, and the noble tribute of a daughter to the memory of her father. Limited by its foundation to a reference library, and as such seeking its development in the acquiring of the complete bibliography of Louisiana, there seemed a danger of a serious narrowing of its original philanthropic ideal. An ideal, however, is hard to bind. A surplus library has accumulated around the reference library, formed from its natural pruning and weeding out. These books, numbering many thousands, are being portioned out in small collections, which it is proposed to loan en bloc to the country towns, to be enjoyed by them as circulating libraries.

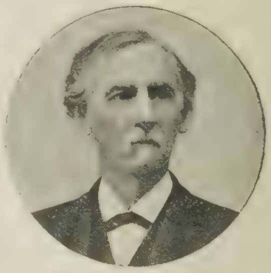
Mrs. J. L. Harris maintains a free kindergarten in one of the poorest and most populous districts of the city—the first institution of its kind in the city, and as such the parent of a zealous progeny of women's missions among women, children, and factory-girls (the latter a comparatively new class and an increasing one, and one which is obtruding itself more and more on the serious consideration of the community). The Christian Woman's Exchange stands at the head of the unendowed philanthropic associations in the city. It was organized in 1881, to aid the large number of gentlewomen in the community who, by the Civil War, had been deprived not only of means of support, but of their protectors as well. The local situation and circumstances called for working methods somewhat different from those adopted by the first Woman's Exchange of New York. The adoption of these methods, their slow and tactful adjustment, and the consequent fair and safe progress of the Exchange, through all obstacles, to success, is attributed to the steadfast resolution and brilliant executive ability of its President, Mrs. Robert M. Walmsley. At present the Exchange owns its building, a valuable piece of property, and owes not a cent of debt. Besides its regular exchange business, it maintains an art embroidery department, which awards annually a gold medal for decora-

Justice E. D. White
Justice of the U. S. Supreme Court
A Leader in the Anti-Lottery Movement

Hon. Murphy J. Foster
Governor of Louisiana

Jefferson Bloom
House Surgeon, Charity Hospital

Alcée Fortier
President Louisiana State Historical Society



Stanford E. Chaillé
Dean of the Medical Department
Tulane University

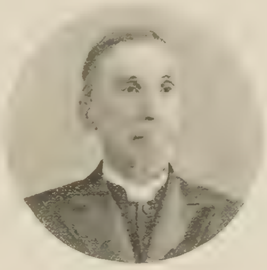
Brown Ayres, B.Sc., Ph.D.
Dean of College of Technology
Tulane University

THE RT. REV. DAVIS SESSUMS
Bishop of Louisiana

tive designs, competed for by local artists; and carries, as a necessary adjunct, a restaurant and lunch-room (with reduced rates for shop-girls and workingwomen), and a lodging department for single ladies. During the first thirteen years of its existence it has paid to gentlewomen, for their work, over two hundred and thirty-two thousand dollars. The Woman's Club, with its strong membership and steadily growing influence in all directions for the advancement of women and the civil and social betterment of their condition as wage-earners, stands shoulder to shoulder with the Christian Woman's Exchange. The "Business Woman's Exchange," W. C. T. U. restaurants and lunch-rooms, and those charitable congeners, the "Hospital for Incurables," "Home for the Homeless," Sophie C. Hart "Day and Night Nursery," the "Memorial Home," a rescue mission, are but a few, and the easiest enumerated, of an infinitely ramifying series of civic responsibilities—duties they may well be called—which women have undertaken in New Orleans within the last decade.

In any such enumeration by a native of the city, pains is always taken to recall the fact that the first statue to a woman in the United States was erected in New Orleans to Margaret Haughery, the humble laundress, milkwoman, and baker, who, although she could not read or write, made fortune enough to build and sustain orphan asylums during her lifetime, and to leave at her death legacies to every asylum in the city, Catholic and Protestant, white and black, alike.

The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children furnishes a striking illustration of the irresistible manner in which a vitally needful charity makes itself known and forces its way into an efficient position. It was not until five years ago that the Rev. Alfred E. Clay, of the Methodist Church, in his ministrations among the poor, was brought face to face with a growing phase of unspeakable misery and evil in the community: the utterly unprotected and unpoliced condition of child life among the lawless and vicious poor. He had but to publish in the daily papers one or two of the cases personally known to him; a society well provided with funds immediately sprang to his assistance; the requisite investment of legal authority was obtained from the Legislature, and from the city full police co-operation and assistance. A Waifs' Home was established, and, to quote the sequel from the fourth and last annual report, the number of children rescued, protected, and otherwise cared for during the Society's existence is 8,879. A "Fresh-Air Outing," inaugurated last summer, gave 340 children an excursion to the seacoast, near Biloxi; and arrangements are now being made to erect on the land given the Society in this locality a number of cottages sufficient to lodge "outing" children during the summer, and to serve as a sanitarium for sickly children and mothers during the winter. The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals antedates the former society by several years. In New Orleans, as in other new fields, it has had to struggle—almost to affront persecution, at first for popular toleration of its merciful mission, and then for popular encouragement in carrying it out. Thanks to a small band of indomitable members, the Society has at last conquered its territory, planted its flag, obtained from State and city full and unreserved powers of action, has enrolled in the city alone over a thousand children in Bands of Mercy, and is working its way into a permanent place in the budget of every humane person's necessary expenditures.



Rev. A. Gordon Bakewell
Rector of Trinity Chapel. A Worker among the Poor

M. Ernest Kruttshmitt
Chairman Anti-Lottery League
President of Board of Directors of City Schools

One of the best uses of adversity in the city (and it has had many good uses) has been its equipping the public schools with a class of teachers such as perhaps no other city in the Union possesses. The turning of the best blood in the city to the best use of good blood—teaching the children of the people—is the primary reason that the periodical reports of the public schools of New Orleans, in comparison with those of other large cities, read more like the hopeful theories of superintendents than their sober realities. Over these providentially sent teachers, as they may be termed, is a School Board whose organization may reasonably be considered the best in the United States. Practically withdrawn from politics since 1888, and thus assured of continuity as well as continuance of system, the directors, through their able and zealous Superintendent, the Hon. Warren Easton, have been enabled to push steadily forward, advancing the grade, until the curriculum offered has at last reached the old standard of 1860, the standard that was then cited with pride as the best in the United States—an achievement ranked locally with that of State bonds attaining a standard above par. Kindergartens have been established in the elementary departments of all but a few districts, which are in process of being supplied. Music has been added in all the schools (French has always been required in all high schools). Numerous scholarships open free Newcomb College and University courses to graduates from the high schools. The constant increase of attendance has more than taxed the accommodation. Indeed, in the bankrupt condition of the public-school fund, brought on by the carpetbag government of the State, the free education of its children would have seemed a hopeless effort for the city had it not been for the remnants saved of the legacy left a half-century ago by the philanthropist McDonogh for the education of the poor. This has built, bought, and equipped thirty handsome school-houses, whose capacity of 16,660 represents annually just so many children who, beyond peradventure, would otherwise have been school-houseless. Within these bare and hurried outlines lies a world of patriotic activity and zealous devotion to progress and reform—or progress with reform, as it really is: the various teachers' associations for mutual improvement or literary exercises and for assistance or relief; the annual courses of pedagogy from distinguished teachers, and lectures; and that most inspiring work, the formation of public-school libraries, purchased entirely by entertainments and enterprises of teachers and scholars (which exemplifies the thorough entente cordiale existing between them).

COLONEL WILLIAM G. VINCENT
President Anti-Lottery League

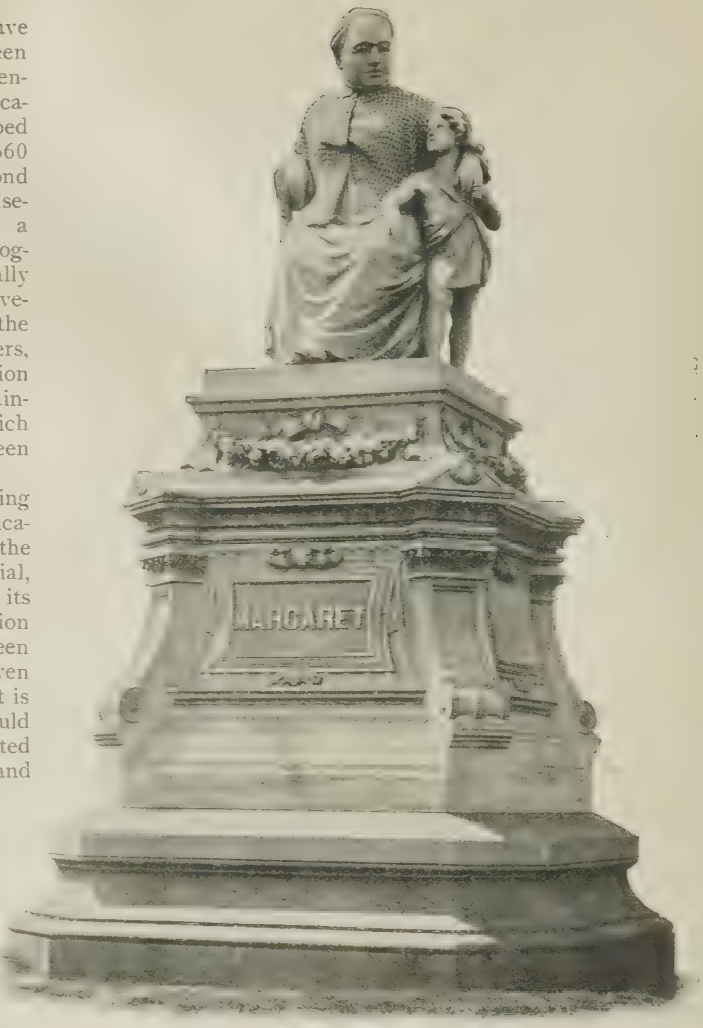
The great problem of the city's health has been working its way towards solution in a parallel line with the educational and industrial problems—starting always from the nominal zero which represents the educational, industrial, and hygienic condition of the city thirty years ago. In its organization the Board of Health shares the distinction claimed for the School Board. It also has practically been withdrawn from partisan or spoils politics since 1888. Even in this era of political pessimism, if not skepticism, it is hard to conceive how a humanly organized board could have performed more faithfully patriotic and disinterested service, or accomplished a more steadily progressive and reforming administration of its official functions. Of its two departments, the Quarantine and the Sanitary, the former, through the vital necessity of circumstances, was forced into a predominance over the latter. Although the wisdom of this predominance has never been questioned in the past, there is a growing restlessness and impatience among the citizens to have the sanitation of their city brought up to the same standard of efficient completeness which the Quarantine Department has finally attained. The biennial reports of the Presidents of the Board of Health, covering the history of the quarantine service of Louisiana, give in detail the slow steps of experimentation and trial by which the theory of quarantine against zymotic diseases fought its way through an obstinate and, as it now seems, criminal opposition into that practical application by which yellow fever is no more expected now in a New Orleans than in a New York summer.



STATUE OF MARGARET

The Louisiana quarantine apparatus and methods of disinfection, perfected under the present President of the Board of Health, Dr. Samuel R. Oliphant, have been adopted generally by all the ports of the Gulf and Southern Atlantic coasts, and the value of this efficient quarantine service to the whole country is incalculable. The moral effect of certain safety against foreign contagious diseases has been as marked as the industrial activity that has resulted from it. And, furthermore, the prompt application of efficient disinfection at infected points inland has put an end to those panics and the barbarities of impromptu quarantine which were as demoralizing to a people as the epidemics were. The steady reduction of the death list, and its comparatively insignificant proportion in comparison with the old ante-bellum mortuary reports, has had the effect of throwing the citizens into the most optimistic sense of security in the city's general superiority of healthiness over other cities in the country. This delusion, as it undoubtedly is, presents one of the most serious obstacles which the Board of Health meets, even in the limited and (for want of means) restricted work of its sanitary department. The upper classes tolerate, at best, with indifferent carelessness the prying and domestic interference of health officials; while police reinforcement is needed for the elementary precautionary measures of house, water, milk, food inspection, vaccination, disinfection of premises, removal or isolation of contagious cases in the overcrowded negro and low white (generally Italian) districts—always the centers and distributing points of moral and physical disease in the community.

There is a vast and discouraging difference between the State and city officials in regard to the health problem. Visitors are so unanimous in pronouncing New Orleans the dirtiest and most foul-smelling city in the Union that it seems surprising that the city administrators should not be a little shaken in their determined conviction of the contrary. Not that there has not been some attempt to adopt the standard of order and cleanliness which civilization has imposed upon cities of far lesser degree elsewhere; there has been more than one such attempt, but it was always the spasmodic effort of a slatternly housewife under the lashing of an irate husband's tongue, promising herself the while the consolation of a reaction into viler laziness than before. A city is no more incurably slovenly than a woman; at least husbands and citizens are not easily brought to believe so. But it must seem at times a desperately despairing undertaking in either husbands or citizens to force a superior standard of decency and cleanliness upon natures (be they in wives or city fathers) in obstinate and obtuse revolt against it. The citizens of New Orleans, year in and year out, seesaw between the heights of desperation and depths of humiliation over the condition of their streets, and here, as elsewhere, a demand for the ordinary cleanliness of life necessary to the comfort of people above the civilization of Hottentots is made a political issue. During the past four years, however, there has been made a record of improvements unsurpassed in any similar period since the war. Miles of streets have been paved—but they are still bordered by reeking gutters of stagnant water; and the elevation of streets and sidewalks in certain localities has condemned others to an amphibious and semi-overflowed condition. A system for the removal of garbage has been adopted, but for want of sufficient police it has not been enforced upon the districts most needing it; a few blocks back from the main thoroughfares one would suppose a system for the non-removal of garbage had been let out by contract. The police force has never in the history of the city received more earnest attention; footpads, however, infest not only every suburb, but the fashionable streets of the garden district, waylaying ladies and children; and the inefficiency of the police in the last labor strikes, as is known, disgraced the city throughout the whole country. There will be opened shortly in the city a Free City Library—the wise consolidation of two small libraries, the Fisk and the McDonogh. Handsomely housed, generously equipped, and to be administered in the widest and most cordial spirit of solicitude for the public good, it must undoubtedly throughout the future of the city evoke the gratitude of all good citizens. Yet grog-shops have so multiplied that, unless counteracting measures can be taken, in that same future of the city a hundred men, and perhaps women, will be found taking a drink, to one taking a book out of the library. Electric cars have been substituted for mule cars, and in architecture there has not been, since the flush days of the fifties, so many notable additions to the number of handsome buildings in the city; and there is every prospect of obtaining (since the jetties) that crowning industrial benefaction to the city as a port, free wharfage.

HOWARD MEMORIAL LIBRARY

WOMEN'S WARD, CHARITY HOSPITAL

JACKSON MONUMENT AND ST. LOUIS CATHEDRAL

That the city has not suffered more from its official neglect, if not utter defiance, of the laws of civic hygiene is due not only to its practically all the year round open-air climate, but to its admirable hospital system, and, first and foremost, to its Charity Hospital. Charitable in the broadest sense of the term, it receives and cares for, without distinction, white and black, foreign and native born. Over twenty thousand patients a year receive treatment in it. Like that of the School Board and Board of Health, the administration of the Charity Hospital is a branch of the public service of which the people of the State speak only with proud satisfaction. The Hebrew Charity Hospital, the Tours Infirmary, which treats over sixteen thousand a year, admirable also in its organization and administration, has been an able assistant in relieving the city in the care of its sick.

As we have seen in this hurried summary, the history of New Orleans during the past thirty years has been the history of a healthy convalescence, the natural recovery of a strong constitution after a painful and dangerous accident. The recovery, as we see it now, was so evident; the progress in every department, industrial, educational, and charitable, so unmistakable, and the city so filled with recuperative energy, that it seems incomprehensible that the ability of the State and city to provide for and maintain their institutions could have been seriously doubted by any considerable number of its population. Nevertheless, it was only four years ago that a powerful faction was formed in State politics in favor of an amendment to the Constitution whereby a recharter of twenty-five years should be given to the Louisiana State Lottery in consideration of the sum of one million dollars annually to be expended on levees, schools, charities, pensions, and drainage. The episode of the struggle of the Lottery party to bring this amendment to the vote of the people is one of the curiosities of the political history of the United States. The resistance of the Anti-Lottery party against readopting the ethical standard of the negro and carpetbag Legislature which incorporated a lottery company into the body of the State, and regiving it the State's name, was heroic. From the vantage-point of after-knowledge one can see that the issue, like all great moral issues, had been silently enlisting its partisans years in advance. When an impassioned divine in the Methodist Church, with language and emotion not to be withstood, preached against the recharter of the Louisiana Lottery Company by the approaching Legislative Assembly, the congregation blazed like tinder under a spark. The sermon was printed and circulated widely. In the city its effect was that of an alarum. A few citizens met together in private and determined to form an Anti-Lottery League. Colonel William G. Vincent, an old soldier and unimpeachable citizen, was chosen President. From the original five members the League grew until it spread all over the State, and counted in its ranks every prominent divine and educator in city and State. The official notice that the amendment was to be proposed was followed by Governor Nicholls's public pledge that he would veto it. Then the campaign opened—if an uninterrupted hand-to-hand struggle can be called a campaign. Each detail of it seemed momentous. The vulgar estimation of the forces was that the Lottery had the power of money, its opponents the power of morality; and it must be frankly confessed that there was very little doubt in the majority of the minds of the citizens—the plain, practical business minds, as they were called—which power would, under these circumstances, gain the victory.

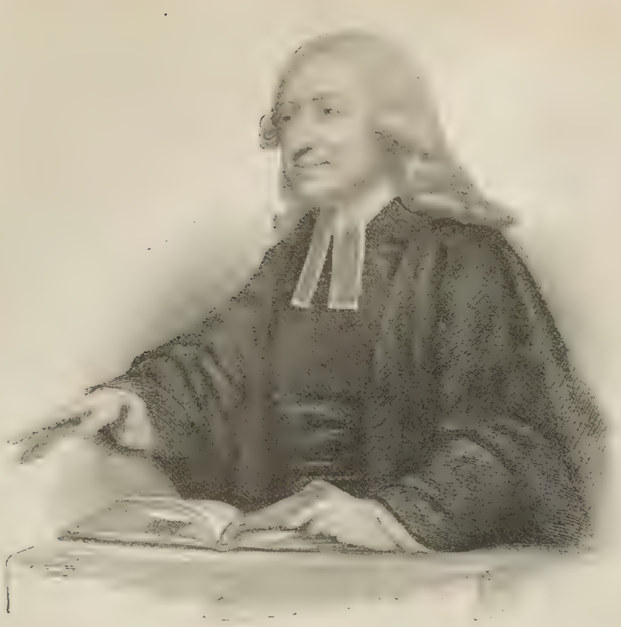
M'DONOGH SCHOOL NO. 14

The Legislature met. The amendment was passed. Governor Nicholls returned it with a ringing veto. The struggle to pass the bill over the veto commenced. The President of the Lottery Company, domiciling himself in Baton Rouge, personally marshaled his forces and directed his campaign. Over against him was Governor Nicholls in the Executive Mansion, and the young Senator from St. Mary, Murphy J. Foster, whose brilliant display of leadership and indomitable courage and integrity made him conspicuous as a fitting successor to Nicholls in the gubernatorial chair. The country press, with only one or two exceptions, was unanimously in favor of the Lottery. In the city not a sheet could be obtained for the Anti-Lottery side. In order to have one organ of communication in the city, and from it to the outside world, a small paper, the "New Delta," was established by private subscription. The vicissitudes of this little privateer journal form one of the most interesting episodes in the great struggle. Twice the requisite last one vote was gained, but before it could be used it was lost—death interposing once, once sudden and no less fearful illness. To sustain the courage of their little phalanx in the Capitol, the Anti-Lottery League crowded meetings upon meetings, taxing themselves over and over again to fill depleted coffers. Judge Edward D. White (now of the United States Supreme Court) made a series of speeches unsurpassable in eloquent denunciation of the proposed scheme. The venerable and beloved Dr. Benjamin M. Palmer, before an august assembly in the Grand Opera-House, gave the most memorable address of the campaign (perhaps the most memorable of his life). Bishop Sessums addressed a similar assembly shortly afterwards. Archbishop Janssens from the first threw the whole force of his personal and official influence against the Lottery.

A Woman's Anti-Lottery League was one of the notable features of the little revolution, and with the women such a cause could not but be a religious, perhaps fanatical, crusade. Their contributions of money were a timely relief to the always struggling but plucky "New Delta." The career of the question of the rechartering of the Louisiana State Lottery through the Union outside of Louisiana, its appearance in Congress, in journals, in magazines, in conclave and debate, in pastoral letters, the famous interposition of Cardinal Gibbons, form another and not less interesting chapter in the history. The dramatic withdrawal of the proposition of recharter terminated the Lottery's official connection with Louisiana, and put an end to its vast traffic in New Orleans. Lottery shops were closed, drawings (grand, golden, annual, semi-annual, monthly, weekly, daily), with their picturesque advertisements and alluring promises of fortune, passed out of the existence of the place; and, for the first time in twenty-five years, the passing eye looked in vain for the white-chalk figures which gave the lucky numbers of to-day and the fluttering blue paper tickets which held the lucky numbers of the morrow. Life in New Orleans had risen above it.

A. B. MILES AMPHITHEATER, CHARITY HOSPITAL

JEWISH ORPHANS' HOME



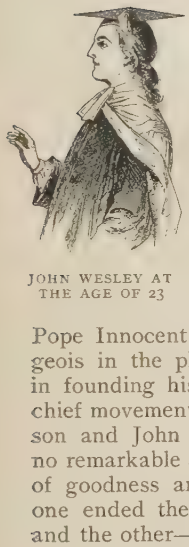
JOHN WESLEY

John Wesley[1]

Prophets of the Christian Faith Series—VII.[2]

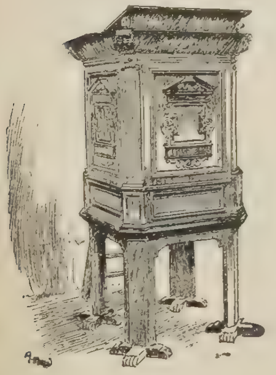
By the Very Rev. F. W. Farrar, D.D.

Dean of Canterbury



JOHN WESLEY AT THE AGE OF 23

It has often happened that the most memorable revolutions or reawakenments in the moral and spiritual world have been achieved by men who were not remarkable either for learning or for genius. St. Francis of Assisi awoke the Church of the thirteenth century from its gorgeous dreams of dominion and luxury, and has eternized his name on the bright lists of sainthood; but the humble brown figure of the poor illiterate wanderer looks absolutely insignificant beside the purpureal stateliness of Pope Innocent III. There was something almost bourgeois in the plain homeliness of St. Vincent de Paul, yet in founding his sisterhoods of mercy he inaugurated the chief movements of social philanthropy. Thomas Clarkson and John Howard were simple country squires, with no remarkable endowments of any kind except the genius of goodness and the sensibility of compassion, yet the one ended the slave trade and emancipated the slave, and the other—traversing Europe, as Edmund Burke said, "to dive into the depths of dungeons, to plunge into the infection of hospitals, to take the gauge and dimensions of misery, depression, and contempt"—purified the prisons of the Christian world from their enormous abuses and dehumanized loathliness. There were many noblemen of the last generation who towered over the late Earl of Shaftesbury in the splendor of their attainments and their oratory, yet none of them, not one of the Archbishops, Bishops, and great ecclesiastics of his day, effected one tithe of his mighty work of beneficence for the poor women of the mines and collieries, for the factory children, for the little "climbing boys," for the waifs and strays and gutter-children of London, for the costermongers, for maltreated lunatics, and for hosts of the oppressed. To this order of men, though he was superior to them in learning, belonged John Wesley. He found a Church forgetful and neglectful of its duties, somnolent in the plethora of riches, and either unmindful or unwisely mindful of the poor. He found churches empty, dirty, neglected, crumbling into hideous disrepair; he found the work of the ministry performed in a manner scandalously perfunctory; he found in the ranks of the priesthood more than enow



WESLEY PULPIT AT OXFORD

JOHN WESLEY

(1765) From the Painting by Hone > of such as, for their bellies' sake,

> Creep, and intrude, and climb into the fold.
> . . . .
> And, when they list, their lean and flashy songs
> Grate on their scrannel pipes of wretched straw;
> The hungry sheep look up, and are not fed,
> But, swoln with wind and the rank mist they draw,
> Rot inwardly, and foul contagion spread;
> Besides what the grim wolf, with privy paw,
> Daily devours apace, and nothing said.

Doubtless in his day, as in Milton's, it might have been said,

> But that two-handed engine at the door
> Stands ready to smite once, and smite no more.

But John Wesley, becoming magnetic with moral sincerity, flashed into myriads of hearts fat as brawn, cold as ice, hard as the nether millstone, the burning spark of his own intense convictions, and thus he saved the Church, which at first had nothing for him but sneers, hatred, and persecution. Wesley never was an enemy to the Church of England. He loved the Church which hated him. He included her name in his daily "grace before meat." He died in her full communion. He would have said, as sincerely as Edmund Burke, "I wish to see the Church of England great and powerful; I wish to see her foundation laid low and deep; I would have her open wide her hospitable gates by a liberal comprehension; I would have her a common blessing to the world, an example, if not an instructor, to those who have not the happiness to belong to her; I would have her give a lesson of peace to mankind, that a vexed and wandering generation may be taught to seek refuge and toleration in the bosom of her maternal charity." And he distinctly saved the Church of England from the Nemesis of just retribution, which but for him would sooner or later have overwhelmed her in indiscriminate collapse, and might not improbably have buried under her heaps of ruin all that was best in the great heritage of English religion. He set her the example of indefatigable activity, of immense and ungrudging self-sacrifice, of that true beauty of holiness which shines in the life of every Christian who "makes his moral being his prime care," and gives the actual, not the merely nominal, sovereignty to the beliefs which he professes to regard as supreme. He saved the Church of England, though at first she so angrily and contemptuously rejected him, and, just as from the mouth of Socrates issued forth

---

[1] Previous articles in this series have been: "What is a Prophet?" by Lyman Abbott (The Outlook for December 14, 1895); "The Apostle Paul," by the Rev. George Matheson, D.D. (December 21, 1895); "Clement of Alexandria," by the Rev. Marcus Dods, D.D. (January 4, 1896); "St. Augustine," by the Rev. A. C. McGiffert, D.D. (February 8); "Wycliffe," by Dean Fremantle (March 14); and "Martin Luther," by Adolf Harnack (March 28). Following articles in the series will be by Principal Fairbairn, the Rev. A. V. G. Allen, D.D., and the Rev. T. T. Munger, D.D.

[2] The illustrations in this article are reproduced by permission of the Methodist Library, 150 Fifth Avenue, New York.

> Mellifluous streams which watered all the schools
> Of Academics old and new, with those > Surnamed Peripatetics, and the sect
> Epicurean, and the Stoic severe, so, from the impulse which Wesley gave, originated almost every form of special religious enthusiasm since his day. Thus he became one of the most disinterested of those benefactors of mankind who "have raised strong arms to bring heaven a little nearer to our earth."

EPWORTH CHURCH

One great virtue in his character was that sovereign religious tolerance which is so infinitely rare amid the divergences of religious shibboleths. In the first century the heathen said, "See how these Christians love one another;" but, long before the third century, the odium theologicum had culminated in those execrable forms of religious virulence which, if "love" be indeed the fulfilling of the law, are the very antithesis of the Christlike spirit, at which all profess to aim who take Christ for an ensample that they should walk in his steps. It is a splendid testimony to Wesley's moral insight and spiritual greatness that "no reformer the world has ever seen so united faithfulness to the essential doctrines of Revelation with charity towards men of every Church and creed." This spirit of John Wesley has been found, theoretically at least, only in the best and greatest Christians.

Bishop Sanderson pointed out to some of the narrowest of the post-Reformation sectaries that "the Church was not to be confined to the narrow pingle of a room in Amsterdam." William Penn uttered the great sentiment, so dear to the heart of Abraham Lincoln, that the meek, the just, the pious, the devout, are everywhere of one religion, and that when death hath taken off these masks they will know and love one another. The devout Dominican Henri Feyrrane saw, as Lacordaire also saw, that the worst possible policy is "to make the gate of the Church bristle with anathemas, as with razors and pitchforks." But too many nominal Christians have forgotten that all these words and actions tend to reduce the Church to the same deplorable chaos of mutual hatreds and fierce disdain which Christ found among the Pharisees and Sadducees of Jerusalem, when he chose the hated and heretical Samaritan as his exemplary type of the goodness which loved its neighbor.

I dwell on this high virtue of Wesley because it is so exceptional, and because it was never more needed than in these days. Writing in advanced age to the Bishop of Lincoln, he said: "Alas! my Lord, is this a time to persecute any man for conscience' sake? I beseech you do as you would be done to. You are a man of sense; you are a man of learning; nay, I verily believe (what is of infinitely more value) you are a man of piety. Then think and let think." Again, how wise are the remarks in the preface to his Sermons: "Some may say I have mistaken the way myself, though I have undertaken to teach others. It is very possible that I have. But I trust, whereinsoever I have been mistaken, my mind is open to conviction. I sincerely desire to be better informed. What I know not, teach thou me. 'Da mihi scire,' as says St. Augustine, 'quod sciendum est.' If I linger in the path I have been accustomed to tread, . . . take me by the hand and lead me. . . . But be not discouraged if I ask you not to beat me down in order to quicken my pace. May I request you further not to give me hard names in order to bring me into the right way? . . . For God's sake, if it be possible, let us not provoke one another to wrath. Let us not kindle in each other this fire of hell. If we could discern truth by that dreadful light, would it not be loss rather than gain? For how far is love, even with many wrong opinions, to be preferred before truth itself without love! We may die without the knowledge of many truths, and yet be carried into Abraham's bosom. But if we die without love, what will knowledge avail? Just as much as it avails the devil and his angels!"

THE FOUNDRY, MOORFIELDS

The ground for this wise and noble tolerance, which is one of Wesley's special lessons to this religiously distracted age, was his clear realization of the truth—demonstrated by all history—that while unity of spirit is attainable, uniformity of organization is not; that while there can be but one flock of the Good Shepherd, there always have been and to the end of time there will be many folds. Dean Stanley delighted in a story—I know not its source and will not vouch for its authenticity—which he called "Wesley's Dream." It told how Wesley dreamt that, wandering to the gate of Gehenna, he asked whether there were any Romanists, any Anglicans, any Baptists, any Calvinists, any Independents there, and was told in each case, "Yes, a great many," and was yet more deeply pained when, asking, "And are there any Wesleyans here?" it was still answered, "Yes, a great many." Then, returning to the gate of Heaven, he asked, "Are there any Romanists here?" "None whatever." "Any Anglicans?" "None whatever." "Any Baptists?" "None whatever." "Any Calvinists?" "None whatever." "Any Wesleyans?" Still none whatever. "Whom then have you here?" he asked in amazement. "We have none but Christians here," was the answer; "we know no other name." Whether the story was a pleasing allegory of the Dean's or not, I cannot tell; but this I know, that Wesley's sermon on the Catholic Spirit would have the honor of being thought shockingly lax by bigots of every denomination, yet all true Christians might well say with him, "I desire to have a league, offensive and defensive, with every soldier of Christ. We have all not only one Lord, one faith, one baptism, but we are all also engaged in one warfare."

THE HOUSE IN WHICH WESLEY DIED
City Road, London

As another of Wesley's exemplary qualities I would single out his sovereign common sense, which is also an endowment much liable to overthrow by the violences of egotistical dogmatism. Though many have identified his teaching mainly with certain formulæ, Wesley had no faith in the bare reiteration of shibboleths. His idea of a "Gospel sermon" was not the narrowly ignorant one which supposes it to consist in the incessant repetition of phrases —phrases often originally meaningless to many of those who used them, or which have become stereotyped into mere inanity and fetichism. In his diary for November 20, 1785, he writes: "I preached in Bethnal Green, and spoke as plainly as I possibly could, on having a form of godliness but denying the power thereof. And this I judged far more suitable to such a congregation than talking about justification by faith." How free, again, from all hysteric excitability was the entire attitude of his religion! Some one had been talking in an exaggerated and fantastic way about death, and asking what he would do if he knew that he would die the next day. "What should I do?" he said. "Exactly what I shall do now. I should call and talk to Mr. So-and-so, and Mrs. So-and-so; and dine at such an hour, and preach in the evening, and have supper, and then I should go to bed and sleep as soundly as ever I did in my life." His feeling about death was that, so far from being terrible, it was man's great birthright; and he would say, with the poet:

> To you the thought of death is terrible,
> Having such hold on life; to me it is not;
> No more than is the lifting of a latch,
> Or as a step into the open air
> Out of a tent already luminous
> With light that shines through its transparent folds.

Again, it was no small matter that, in an age so corrupt and decadent as his, in which the dregs of sensuality and worldliness poured over the glorious England of Puritanism by the despicable epoch of the Restoration had reduced religion to a Dead Sea of torpid unreality, Wesley, like the great Hebrew prophets of old, should have stood forth as a preacher of righteousness. No preacher or reformer can effect great results unless he insists upon Christ's plain teaching that, if we would ever enter into the kingdom of heaven, we must keep the commandments. Late in his career he said: "Near fifty years ago a great and good man, Dr. Potter, then Archbishop of Canterbury, gave me an advice for which I have ever since had occasion to bless God. 'If you desire to be extensively useful, do not spend your time and strength in contending for or against such things as are of a disputable nature, but in testifying against open and notorious vice and in prompting real spiritual holiness.' Let us keep to this, leaving a thousand disputable points to those that have no better business than to toss the ball of controversy to and fro, and let us bear a faithful testimony in our several stations against all ungodliness and unrighteousness, and with all our might recommend that inward and outward holiness without which no man shall see the Lord."

It may be, as I have said, that in talent, in imagination, in learning, in the pure and undefinable quality of genius, Wesley was not the equal of many of his contemporaries; but which among them all equaled him in versatility of beneficence, in zeal of self-sacrifice, in the munificence of his generosity, or in the luster of the example which he has left to all the world? Consider his supreme disinterestedness, his unparalleled courage, his indefatigable toils. How many have there been in all the centuries who made such an absolute offering of his money to God, and, living on less than many a curate's salary, gave away £40,000? Consider, again, his unparalleled courage. How many have shown equal undauntedness? Men admire the courage of the soldier who heads the forlorn hope through the cross-fire of the batteries, of the sailor or of the fireman who, at personal risk, plucks from destruction an imperiled life; but such physical courage is a million times cheaper and more common than that of the scholar, the gentleman, the clergyman, who, in that age, day after day, month after month, year after year, in England, in America, in Scotland, in Wales, in Ireland, even in the Isle of Man, could, voluntarily and out of the pure love of souls, face raging mobs and descend to what was then regarded as the vulgar humiliation of preaching in the open air. And higher even than this was the moral and spiritual courage which, in the calm of blameless innocence, could treat the most atrocious and the most persistent calumnies with the disdainful indifference of unblemished rectitude. When even Charles Wesley was thrown into a fever of agonized excitement by the scandal against his brother caused by his wife's publication of stolen, forged, or interpolated letters, and wanted him to stay in London and expose the slander, John Wesley remained perfectly calm, knowing that no real harm can befall

> The virtuous mind that ever walks attended
> By a strong-siding champion, Conscience.

"Brother," he said, "when I devoted to God my ease, my time, my life, did I exempt my reputation?" Then consider his indefatigable toils—those sixty-eight years of service; the 4,400 miles which he traveled yearly on the execrable roads of those days; the 225,000 miles which he traversed in his lifetime; the 42,400 sermons—sometimes as many as fifteen a week—which he preached even after his return from Georgia—preached mostly in the open air, and sometimes to as many as 20,000 souls; those endless meetings, those burdensome anxieties, those numerous publications, that love of so many communities, continued amid incessant attacks of the mob, the pulpit, and the press, and scarcely ever relaxed till the patriarchal age of eighty-eight. Could a clergyman of any denomination, amid the work which, in comparison to his toils, is but ease and supineness, think it anything but an honor to profess reverence for the memory of one who so heroically lived and so nobly died? Although the world and the Church have learned to be comparatively generous to Wesley now that a hundred years have sped away, and though the roar of contemporary scandal has long since ceased, I doubt whether even now he is at all adequately appreciated. I doubt whether many are aware of the extent to which to this day the impulse to every great work of philanthropy and social reformation has been due to his energy and insight. The British and Foreign Bible Society, the Religious Tract Society, the London Missionary Society, even the Church Missionary Society, owe not a little to his initiative. The vast spread of religious instruction by weekly periodicals, and the cheap press with all its stupendous consequences, were inaugurated by him. He gave a great extension to Sunday-schools and the work of Robert Raikes. He gave a great impulse both to national education and to technical education, and in starting the work of Silas Told, the Foundry Teacher, he anticipated the humble and holy work of John Pounds, the Portsmouth cobbler. He started in his own person the funeral reform, which is only now beginning to attract public attention, when in his will he directed that at his obsequies there should be no hearse, no escutcheon, no coach, no pomp. He visited prisons and ameliorated the lot of prisoners before John Howard; and his very last letter was written to stimulate William Wilberforce in his Parliamentary labors for the emancipation of the slave. When we add to this the revival of fervent worship and devout hymnology among Christian congregations, and their deliverance from the drawling doggerel of Sternhold and Hopkins, and the frigid nullities of Tate and Brady, we have indeed shown how splendid was the list of his achievements, and that, as Isaac Taylor says, he furnished "the starting-point for our modern religious history in all that is characteristic of the present time."

FIRST METHODIST CHURCH BUILT IN NEW YORK CITY
John Street

To the Reader

The strong Sense in ye following tract, wch I apprehend, makes it worth all for the roughness of ye style I recommend it to ye intelligent Reader, as containing ye very marrow of the controversy

John Wesley

Liverpool
April 11. 1782.

A PREFACE BY WESLEY

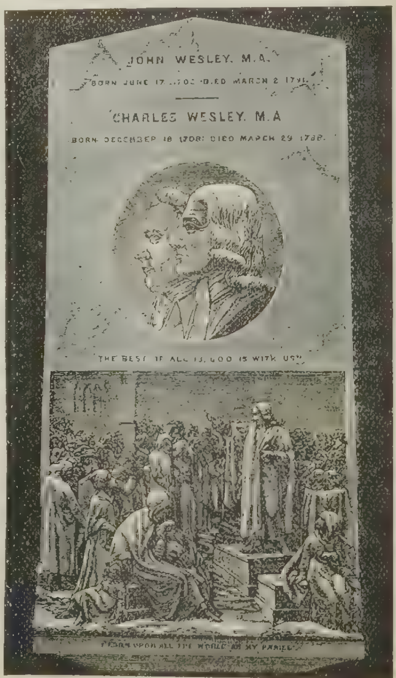
And yet, even in this long and splendid catalogue, we have not mentioned his greatest and most distinctive work, which was that through him to the poor the Gospel was again preached. Let Whitefield have the credit of having been the first to make the green grass his pulpit and the heaven his sounding-board; but Wesley instantly followed, at all costs, the then daring example, and, through all evil report and all furious opposition, he continued it until at last, at Kingswood, at the age of eighty-one, he preached in the open air, under the shade of trees which he himself had planted, and surrounded by the children and children's children of his old disciples, who had long since passed away. Overwhelming evidence exists to show what preaching was before and in his day; overwhelming evidence exists to show what the Church and people of England were before and in his day—how dull, how vapid, how soulless, how Christless was the preaching; how torpid, how Laodicean was the Church, how godless, how steeped in immorality was the land. To Wesley was mainly granted the task, for which he was set apart by the hands of invisible consecration, the task which even an archangel might have envied him, of awakening a mighty revival of the religious life in those dead pulpits, in that slumbering Church, in that corrupt society. His was the religious sincerity which not only founded the Wesleyan community, but, working through the heart of the very Church which had despised him, flashed fire into her whitening embers. Changing its outward forms, the work of John Wesley caused first the Evangelical movement, then the High Church movement; and, in its enthusiasm of humanity, has even reappeared in all that is best in the humble Salvationists, who learned from the example of Wesley what Bishop Lightfoot called "that lost secret of Christianity, the compulsion of human souls." Recognizing no utterance of authority as equally supreme with that which came to him from the Sinai of conscience, Wesley did the thing and scorned the consequence. His was the voice which offered hope to the despairing and welcome to the outcast. His was the voice which, sounding forth over the Valley of Dry Bones, cried, "Come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon these slain that they may live." The poet says:

> Of those three hundred grant but three
> To make a new Thermopylæ.

And when I think of John Wesley, the organizer, of Charles Wesley, the poet, of George Whitefield, the orator of this mighty movement, I feel inclined to say of those three self-sacrificing and holy men, Grant but even one to help in the mighty work which yet remains to be accomplished! Had we but three such now,

> Hoary-headed selfishness would feel
> His death-blow, and would totter to his grave;
> A brighter light attend the human day,
> When every transfer of earth's natural gift
> Should be a commerce of good words and works.

We have, it is true, hundreds of faithful workers in the Church of England and in other religious communities. But for the slaying of dragons, the rekindlement of irresistible enthusiasm, the redress of intolerable wrongs, a Church needs many Pentecosts and many Resurrections. And these, in the providence of God, are brought about, not by committees and conferences and common workers, but by men who escape the average; by men who come forth from the multitude; by men who, not content to trudge on in the beaten paths of commonplace and the cart-ruts of routine, go forth, according to their Lord's command, into the highways and hedges; by men in whom the love of God burns like a consuming flame upon the altar of the heart; by men who have become electric to make myriads of other souls thrill with their own holy zeal. Such men are necessarily rare,



JOHN WESLEY, M.A.
BORN JUNE 17, 1703; DIED MARCH 2, 1791.
CHARLES WESLEY, M.A.
BORN DECEMBER 18, 1708; DIED MARCH 29, 1788.
"THE BEST OF ALL IS, GOD IS WITH US"
"I LOOK UPON ALL THE WORLD AS MY PARISH"

MEMORIAL IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY

but God's richest boon to any nation, to any society, to any church, is the presence and work of such a man—and such a man was John Wesley.

The bust placed in Westminster Abbey to the memory of John Wesley, more than twenty years ago, was a very tardy recognition of the vast debt of gratitude which England owes to him. It stands hard by the cenotaph of that other illustrious Nonconformist, Isaac Watts, and gives the beautiful presentment of the aged face of the evangelist and the fine features of Charles, his poet-brother. In the solemn aisle thousands of visitors to our great Temple of Silence and Reconciliation may read three of his great sayings—one, so full of holy energy, "I look on all the world as my parish;" another, so full of bright and holy confidence, "God buries his workmen, but continues his work;" the third, when, on his death-bed, uplifting victoriously his feeble and emaciated arm, he said: "The best of all is, God is with us." "Yes!" he exclaimed again, in a tone of victorious rapture, "the best of all is, God is with us."

KATE CARNEGIE[1]

By Ian Maclaren

Author of "Beside the Bonnie Brier-Bush," "The Days of Auld Lang Syne," etc., etc.

CHAPTER IX.—A DAUGHTER OF DEBATE

They met under the arch of the gate, and Carmichael returned with the Carnegies, Kate making much of him and insisting that he should stay to luncheon.

"You are our first visitor, Mr. Carmichael, and the General says we need not expect more than six, so we mean to be very kind to them. Do you live far from here?"

"Quite near—just two miles west. I happened to be passing; in fact, I'm going down to the next parish, and I . . . I thought that I would like to call and . . . and bid you welcome;" for Carmichael had not yet learned the art of conversation, which stands mainly in touching details lightly and avoiding the letter I.

"It is very cruel of you to be so honest and dispel our flattering illusions"—Kate marveled at his mendacity—"we supposed you had come 'anes errand'—I'm picking up Scotch—to call on your new neighbors. Does the high road pass the Lodge?"

"Oh, no; the road is eight miles further; but the Drumtochty people take the near way through the woods; it's also much prettier. I hope you will not forbid us, General? two people a week is all the traffic."

"Forbid them—not I," said Carnegie, laughing. "A man is not born and bred in this parish without learning some sense. It would be a right of way case, and Drumtochty would follow me from court to court, and would never rest till they had gained or we were all ruined.

"Has it ever struck you, Mr. Carmichael, that one of the differences between a Highlander and a Scot is that each has got a pet enjoyment? With the one it's a feud, and with the other it's a lawsuit. A Scot dearly loves a 'ganging plea.'

"No, no; Tochty woods will be open so long as Kate and I have anything to say in the matter. The Glen and our people have not had the same politics, but we've lived at peace, as neighbors ought to do, with never a lawsuit even to give a fillip to life."

"So you see, Mr. Carmichael," said Kate, "you may come and go at all times through our territory; but it would be bare courtesy to call at the Lodge for afternoon tea."

"Or tiffin," suggested the General; "and we can always offer currie, as you see. My daughter has a capital receipt she wiled out of an old Hindoo rascal that cooked for our mess.

"You really need not take it on that account," as Carmichael was doing his best in much misery; "it is only meant to keep old Indians in fair humor—not to be a test of good manners. By the way, Janet has been sounding your praises; how have you won her heart?"

"Oh, very easily—by having some drops of Highland blood in my veins; and so I am forgiven all my faults, and am credited with all sorts of excellences."

"Then the Highlanders are as clannish as ever," cried the General. "Scotland has changed so much in the last half-century that the Highlanders might have become quite unsentimental and matter-of-fact.

"Lowland civilization only crossed the Highland line after '45, and it will take more than a hundred and thirty years to recast a Celt. Scottish education and theology are only a veneer on him, and below he has all his old instincts.

"So far as I can make out, a Celt will rather fish than plow, and be a gamekeeper than a workman; but if he be free to follow his own way, a genuine Highlander would rather be a soldier than anything else under the sun."

"What better could a man be?" and Kate's eyes sparkled; "they must envy the old times when their fathers raided the Lowlands and came home with the booty. It's a pity everybody is so respectable now, don't you think?"

"Certainly the police are very meddlesome," and Carmichael now devoted himself to Kate, without pretense of including the General; "but the spirit is not dead. A Celt is the child of generations of cattle-stealers, and the raiding spirit is still in the blood. May I offer an anecdote?"

"Six, if you have got so many, and they are all about Highlanders," and Kate leant forward and nursed her knee, for they had gone into the library.

"Last week I was passing the cattle market in Edinburgh, and a big Highland drover stopped me, begging for a little money.

"'It iss from Lochaber I hef come with some beasties, and to-morrow I will be walking back all the way, and it iss this night I hef no bed. I wass considering that the gardens would be a good place for a night, but they are telling me that the police will be disturbing me.'

"He looked so simple and honest that I gave him half-a-crown, and said that I was half a Highlander. I have three Gaelic sentences, and I reeled them off with my best accent

"'Got forgive me,' he said, 'for thinking you to be a Sassenach body, and taking your money from you. You are a fery well-made man, and here iss your silver piece, and may you always hef one in your pocket.'

"'But what about your bed?'

"'Tuts, tuts, that will be all right, for I hef maybe got some six or five notes of my own that were profit on the beasties; but it iss a pity not to be taking anything that iss handy when a body happens to be in the south.'

"Capital!" Kate laughed merrily, and her too rare laugh I used to think the gayest I ever heard. "It was the only opportunity left him of following his fathers. What a fine business it must have been, starting from Braemar one afternoon, a dozen men well armed, and getting down to Strathmore in the morning; then lying hid in some wood all day, and collecting a herd of fat cattle in the evening, and driving them up Glen Shee, not knowing when there might be a fight."

"Hard lines on the Scottish farmers, Kit, who might be very decent fellows, to lose their cattle or get a cut from a broadsword."

"Oh, they had plenty left; and, seriously, dad, without joking, you know, what better could a Presbyterian Lowlander do than raise good beef for Highland gentlemen? Mr. Carmichael, I beg pardon; you seem so good a Celt that I forgot you were not of our faith."

---

[1] Copyright, 1896, by John Watson.

"We are not Catholics," the General explained, gravely, "although many of our blood have been, and my daughter was educated in a convent. We belong to the Episcopal Church of Scotland, and will go into Muirtown at a time, but mostly we shall attend the kirk of my old friend Dr. Davidson. Every man is entitled to his faith, and Miss Carnegie rather . . ."

"Forgot herself." Kate came to her father's relief. "She often does; but one thing Miss Carnegie remembers, and that is that General Carnegie likes his cheroot after dinner. Do you smoke, Mr. Carmichael? Oh, I am allowed to stay, if you don't object, and have forgiven my rudeness."

"You make too much of a word, Miss Carnegie." Carmichael was not a man to take offense till his pride was roused. "Very likely my drover was a true-blue Presbyterian, and his minister as genuine a cateran as himself.

"Years ago I made the acquaintance of an old Highland minister called MacTavish, and he sometimes stays with me on his way north in the spring. For thirty years he has started at the first sign of snow, and spent winter spoiling the good people of the south. Some years he has gone home with three hundred pounds."

"But how does he get the money?" inquired the General, "and what does he use it for?"

"He told me the history of his campaigns when he passed in March, and it might interest you; it's our modern raid, and although it's not so picturesque as a foray of the Macphersons, yet it has points, and shows the old spirit lives.

"'She wass a goot woman, Janet Cameron, oh yes, Mr. John, a fery exercised woman, and when she wass dying she will be saying beautiful things, and one day she will be speaking of a little field she had beside the church.

"'"What do you think I should be doing with that piece of ground," she will be saying, "for the end iss not far off, and it iss not earth I can be taking with me, oh no, nor cows."

"'"No, Janet," I said, "but it iss a nice field, and lies to the sun. It might be doing good after you are gone, if it wass not wasted on your mother's cousins twice removed in Inverness, who will be drinking every drop of it, and maybe going to the Moderate Kirk."

"'It wass not for two months or maybe six weeks she died, and I will be visiting her every second day. Her experiences were fery good, and I hef told them at sacraments in the north. The people in the south are free with their money, but it iss not the best of my stories that I can give them; they are too rich for their stomachs.

"'Janet will often be saying to me, "Mister Dugald, it iss a thankful woman that I ought to be, for though I lost my man in the big storm and two sons in the war, I hef had mercies, oh yes. There wass the Almighty and my cow, and between them I hef not wanted, oh no."

"'"Janet, you will be forgetting your field that iss lying next the manse, and the people will be thinking that it iss a glebe; but I am telling them that it iss Janet Cameron's, who iss a fery experienced woman, and hass nefer seen the inside of a Moderate Kirk since the Disruption."

"'Maybe you will be astonished, Mister John, but when Janet's will will be read, that piece of ground wass left to the Free Kirk; which wass fery kind and mindful of Janet, and I made a sermon about her from the text of the "elect lady."

"'It wass a good field, but it needed a dyke and some drains, and it wass not our people that had the money. So I made another sermon on the text, "The boar out of the wood doth waste it, and the wild beast of the field doth devour it," and went down to the south. It wass not a dyke and some drains, but enough to build a byre and a stable I came back with. That wass in '55, and before sixty there will be a new manse with twelve rooms that iss good for letting to the English people. But it wass ten years the church needed, and a year for the porch to keep it warm, for I am not liking stoves, and will not hef one in Crianshalloch.

"'It iss wonderful how much money the bodies hef in Glasgow, and it iss good for them to be hearing sound doctrine at a time. There will be no Arminianism when I am preaching, and no joking; but maybe there will be some parables, oh yes, about the sheep coming in at the manse door for want of a fence, and the snow lying in the pulpit.'

"There is a cateran for you, and, mind you, a good fellow too. It's not greed sends him out, but sheer love of spoil. Would you like to see MacTavish next time he passes up with the cattle?" for Carmichael was emboldened by the reception of his sketch.

"Nothing we should like better, for the General and I want to know all about Scotland; but don't you think that those ministers have injured the Highlanders? Janet, you know, has such gloomy ideas about religion."

"There is no doubt, Miss Carnegie, that a load of Saxon theology has been landed on the Celt, and it has disfigured his religion. Sometimes I have felt that the Catholic of the west is a truer type of northern faith than the Presbyterian of Ross-shire."

"I am so glad to hear you say that," said Miss Carnegie, "for we had one or two west Catholics in the old regiment, and their superstitions were lovely. You remember, dad, the MacIvers."

"That was all well enough, Kit, but none of them could get the length of corporal; they were fearfully ignorant, and were reported at intervals for not keeping their accouterments clean."

"That only showed how religious they were, didn't it, Mr. Carmichael? Hadn't the early Christians a rooted objection to the bath? I remember our Padre saying that in a lecture."

"There are a good many modern Christians of the same mind, Miss Carnegie, and I don't think our poor Highlanders are worse than Lowlanders; but, Catholic or Protestant, they are all subject to the gloom. I cannot give the Gaelic word.

"What is that? Oh, a southerner would call it depression, and assign it to the liver, for he traces all trouble to that source. But there is no word for this mood in English, because it is not an English experience. My mother fell under it at times, and I saw the effect."

"Tell us, please, if all this description does not weary you?" and Kate shone on Carmichael, who would have talked on the Council of Nice or the rotation of crops to prolong his privileges.

"It comes on quite suddenly, and is quite a spiritual matter—a cloud which descends and envelops the soul. While it lasts, a Highlander will not laugh or sing; he will hardly speak, and he loses all hope about everything. One of our men has the gloom at a time, and then he believes that he is . . . damned. I am speaking theologically."

"The regiment must have been fond of theology, dad. Yes, we understand."

"Once he went out to the hill, and lay all night wrestling and agonizing to be sure whether there was a God. You know he's just a small farmer, and it seems to me splendid that such a man should give himself to the big problems of the universe. Do you know," and Carmichael turned to the General, who was smoking in great peace, "I believe that is the reason the Highlanders are such good fighting men. They fear God, and they don't fear any other person."

"I'll vouch for one thing," said the veteran with emphasis; "our men put off the gloom, or whatever you call it, when they smelt powder; I never saw a panic in a Highland regiment in more than forty years' soldiering."

"What's the reason of the gloom? I believe that I have a touch of it myself at times—don't stare at me, dad, it's rude—just a thin mist, you know, but distinctly not indigestion. Is it a matter of race?"

"Of course, but that's no explanation." Carmichael had fallen into his debating society style. "I mean one has to go farther back; all our habits are shaped by environment."

"One moment, please. I have always wanted to ask some clever person what environment meant. I asked Colonel MacLeod once, dad, and he said it was out of the new book on tactics, and he was thankful he had retired. Now Mr. Carmichael will make it plain," and Kate was very demure.

"It is rather stupid to use the word so much as people do now," and Carmichael glanced dubiously at Kate; "scientific men use it for circumstances."

"Is that all? then do pray say environment. Such a word introduces one into good society, and gives one the feeling of being well dressed; now about a Highlander's environment, is it his kilt you are thinking of, or his house, or what?"

"His country"—and Carmichael's tone had a slight note of resentment, as of one ruffled by this frivolity—"with its sea lochs, and glens, and mists. Any one who has been bred and reared at the foot of one of our mountains will have a different nature and religion from one living in Kent or Italy. He has a sense of reverence, and surely that is a good thing."

"Nothing more needed nowadays," the General broke in with much spirit; "it seems to me that people nowadays respect nobody, neither the Queen nor Almighty God. As for that man Brimstone, he will never cease till he has ruined the Empire. You needn't look at me, Kate, for Mr. . . . Carmichael must know this as well as any other sensible man.

"Why, sir," and now the General was on his feet, "I was told on good authority at the club last week by a newspaper man—a monstrously clever man—that Mr. Brimstone, when he is going down to the House of Commons to disestablish the Church, or the army, or something, will call in at a shop and order two hundred silk hats to be sent to his house. What do you call that, sir?"

"I should call it a deliberate—"

"Jeu d'esprit. Of course it is, dad," and Kate threw an appealing glance to Carmichael, who had sprung to his feet and was standing stiffly behind his chair, for he was a fierce Radical.

"Perhaps it was, lassie—those war correspondents used to be sad rascals—and, at any rate, politics are bad taste. Another cheroot, Mr. Carmichael? Oh, nonsense; you must tell my daughter more about your Highlanders. They are a loyal set, at any rate, and we all admire that."

"Yes, they are," and Carmichael unbent again, "and will stick by their side whether it be right or wrong. They're something like a woman in their disposition."

"Indeed," said Kate, who did not think Carmichael had responded very courteously to her lead, "that is very interesting. They are, you mean, full of prejudices and notions.

"If a Highlander takes you into his friendship, you may say or do what you like, he will stand by you, and although his views are as different from yours as black from white, will swear he agrees with every one. If he's not your friend, he can see no good in anything you do, although you be on his own side.

"In fact, he has very little judgment and no sense of justice; and I think you said," Kate went on sweetly, "his nature reminded you of a woman's?"

"You're sure that you like cheroots?" for the General did not wish this lad, Radical though he was, sacrificed on his first visit; "some men are afraid of the opium in them."

"Please do not interrupt Mr. Carmichael when he is making a capital comparison," and Kate held him to the point.

"What I intend is really a compliment," went on Carmichael, "and shows the superior fineness and sensitiveness of a woman's mind."

Kate indicated that she was sure that was his meaning, but waited for details.

"You see," with the spirit of one still fresh to the pulpit, "a man is slower, and goes by evidence; a woman is quicker, and goes by her instincts."

"Like the lower animals," suggested Kate, sweetly, "by scent, perhaps. Well?"

"You are twisting my words, Miss Carnegie." Carmichael did not like being bantered by this self-possessed young woman. "Let me put it this way. Would a jury of women be as impartial as a jury of men? Why, a bad-looking man would have no chance, for they would condemn him at once, not for what he did, but for what they imagined he was."

"Which would save a lot of time and rid society of some precious scoundrels," with vivid recollections of her own efforts in this direction. "Then you grant that women have some intelligence, although no sense of justice, which is a want?"

"Far brighter than men," said Carmichael, eagerly; "just consider the difference between a man's and a woman's speech. A man arranges and argues from beginning to end, and is the slave of connection. He will labor every idea to exhaustion before he allows it to escape, and then will give a solemn cough by way of punctuating with a full stop, before he goes on to his next point. Of course the audience look at their watches and make for the door."

"What would a woman do?" Kate inquired with much interest.

"A lady was speaking lately at Muirtown for an orphanage at Ballyskiddle, and described how Patsy was rescued from starvation, and greatly affected us. 'Patsy will never want bread again,' she concluded, and two Bailies wept aloud.

"Then she went on, and it seemed to me a stroke of genius, 'Speaking about Patsy, has any lady present a black dress suitable for a widow woman?' Before we knew that we had left Patsy, the people were in a widow's home, and the Bailies were again overcome. I mention them because it is supposed that a Bailie is the most important human being in Scotland, and he feels it his duty not to yield to emotion.

"No, a woman speaker never sacrifices her capital; she carries it with her from England to France in her speech, and recognizes no Channel passage. In fact," and Carmichael plunged into new imagery, "a man's progress is after the manner of a mole, while a woman flits from branch to branch like a—"

"Squirrel—I know," came in Kate, getting tired.

"Bird, I meant. Why do you say squirrel?" and Carmichael looked suspiciously at Kate.

"Because it's such a careless, senseless, irresponsible little beast. Have you met many women, Mr. Carmichael? Really, they are not all fools, as you have been trying to suggest for the last ten minutes."

"Highlanders are a safer subject of conversation than women," said the General, good-naturedly, as he bade Carmichael good-by. "And you must tell us more about them next time you call, which I hope will be soon."

Carmichael halted twice on his way through the woods; once he stamped his foot and looked like a man whose pride had been ruffled; the other time he smiled to himself as one who was thinking of a future pleasure.

It was dusk as he crossed Lynedoch Bridge, and he looked down upon the pool where the trout were leaping. Half an hour passed, and then he started off at high speed for Kilbogie Manse. "Please God, if I am worthy," he was saying to himself; "but I fear she is too high above me every way."

CHAPTER X.—A SUPRALAPSARIAN

Jeremiah Saunderson had remained in the lowest estate of a "probationer" for twelve years after he left the Divinity Hall, where he was reported so great a scholar that the Professor of Apologetics spoke to him deprecatingly, and the Professor of Dogmatics openly consulted him on obscure writers. He had wooed twenty-three congregations in vain, from churches in the black country where the colliers rose in squares of twenty and went out without ceremony, to suburban places of worship where the beadle, after due consideration of the sermon, would take up the afternoon notices and ask that they be read at once for purposes of utility, which that unflinching functionary stated to the minister with accuracy and much faithfulness. Vacant congregations desiring a list of candidates made one exception, and prayed that Jeremiah should not be let loose upon them, till at last it came home to the unfortunate scholar himself that he was an offense and byword. He began to dread the ordeal of giving his name, and, as is still told, declared to a household, living in the fat wheat lands and without any imagination, that he was called Magor Missabib. When a stranger makes a statement of this kind with a sad seriousness, no one judges it expedient to offer any remark, but it was skillfully arranged that Missabib's door should not be locked from the outside, and one member of the household sat up all night. The sermon next day did not tend to confidence—having seven quotations in unknown tongues—and the attitude of the congregation was one of alert vigilance; but no one gave any outward sign of uneasiness, and six able-bodied men collected in a pew below the pulpit knew their duty in an emergency.

Saunderson's election to the Free Church of Kilbogie was therefore an event in the ecclesiastical world, and a consistent tradition in the parish explained its inwardness on certain grounds complimentary both to the judgment of Kilbogie and the gifts of Mr. Saunderson. On Saturday evening he was removed from the train by the merest accident, and left the railway station in such a maze of meditation that he ignored the road to Kilbogie altogether, although its sign-post was staring him in the face, and continued his way to Drumtochty. It was half-past nine when Jamie Soutar met him on the highroad through our Glen still traveling steadily west, and, being arrested by his appearance, beguiled him into conversation, till he elicited that Saunderson was minded to reach Kilbogie. For an hour did the wanderer rest in Jamie's kitchen, during which he put Jamie's ecclesiastical history into a state of thorough repair—making seven distinct parallels between the errors that had afflicted the Scottish Church and the early heretical sects—and then Jamie gave him in charge of a plowman who was courting in Kilbogie and was not averse to a journey that seemed to illustrate the double meaning of charity. Jeremiah was handed over to his anxious host at a quarter to one in the morning, covered with mud, somewhat fatigued, but in great peace of soul, having settled the place of election in the prophecy of Habakkuk as he came down with his silent companion through Tochty woods.

Nor was that all he had done. When they came out from the shadow and struck into the parish of Kilbogie—whose fields, now yellow unto harvest, shone in the moonlight—his guide broke silence and enlarged on a plague of field-mice which had quite suddenly appeared and had sadly devastated the grain of Kilbogie. Saunderson awoke from study and became exceedingly curious, first of all demanding a particular account of the coming of the mice, their multitude, their habits, and their determination. Then he asked many questions about the moral conduct and godliness of the inhabitants of Kilbogie, which his companion, as a native of Drumtochty, painted in gloomy colors, although indicating that even in Kilbogie there was a remnant. Next morning the minister rose at daybreak, and was found wandering through the fields in such a state of excitement that he could hardly be induced to look at breakfast. When the "books" were placed before him, he turned promptly to the ten plagues of Egypt, which he expounded in order as preliminary to a full treatment of the visitations of Providence.

"He cowes (beats) a' ye ever saw or heard," the farmer of Mains explained to the elders at the gate. "He gaed tae bed at half twa and wes oot in the fields by four, an' a'm dootin' he never saw his bed. He's lifted abune the body a'thegither, an' can hardly keep himsel' awa' frae the Hebrew at his breakfast. Ye 'ill get a sermon the day, or ma name is no Peter Pitillo." Mains also declared his conviction that the invasion of mice would be dealt with after a Scriptural and satisfying fashion. The people went in full of expectation, and to this day old people recall Jeremiah Saunderson's trial sermon with lively admiration. Experienced critics were suspicious of candidates who read lengthy chapters from both Testaments and prayed at length for the Houses of Parliament, for it was justly held that no man would take refuge in such obvious devices for filling up the time unless he was short of sermon material. One unfortunate, indeed, ruined his chances at once by a long petition for those in danger on the sea—availing himself with some eloquence of the sympathetic imagery of the 107th Psalm—for this effort was regarded as not only the most barefaced padding, but also as evidence of an almost incredible blindness to circumstances. "Did he think Kilbogie wes a fishing village?" Mains inquired of the elders afterward, with pointed sarcasm. Kilbogie was not indifferent to a well-ordered prayer—although its palate was coarser in the appreciation of felicitous terms and allusions than that of Drumtochty—and would have been scandalized if the Queen had been omitted; but it was by the sermon the young man must stand or fall, and Kilbogie despised a man who postponed the ordeal.

Saunderson gave double pledges of capacity and fullness before he opened his mouth in the sermon, for he read no Scripture at all that day, and had only one prayer, which was mainly a statement of the Divine Decrees and a careful confession of the sins of Kilbogie; and then, having given out his text from the prophecy of Joel, he reverently closed the Bible and placed it on the seat behind him. His own reason for this proceeding was a desire for absolute security in enforcing his subject, and a painful remembrance of the disturbance in a south country church when he landed a Bible—with clasps—on the head of the precentor in the heat of a discourse defending the rejection of Esau. Our best and simplest actions—and Jeremiah was as simple as a babe—can be misconstrued, and the only dissentient from Saunderson's election insisted that the Bible had been deposited on the floor, and asserted that the object of his profanity was to give the preacher a higher standing in the pulpit. This malignant reading of circumstances might have wrought mischief—for Saunderson's gaunt figure did seem to grow in the pulpit—had it not been for the bold line of defense taken up by Mains.

"Gin he wanted tae stand high, wes it no tae preach the word? an' gin he wanted a soond foundation for his feet, what better could he get than the twa Testaments? Answer me that."

It was seen at once that no one could answer that, and the captious objector never quite recovered his position in the parish, while it is not the least of Kilbogie's boasting, in which the Auld Kirk will even join against Drumtochty, that they have a minister who not only does not read his sermons and does not need to quote his texts, but carries the whole book in at least three languages in his head, and once, as a proof thereof, preached with it below his feet.

Much was to be looked for from such a man, but even Mains, whetted by intercourse with Saunderson, was astonished at the sermon. It was a happy beginning to draw a parallel between the locusts of Joel and the mice of Kilbogie, and gave the preacher an opportunity of describing the appearance, habits, and destruction of the locusts, which he did solely from Holy Scripture, translating various passages afresh and combining lights with marvelous ingenuity. This brief preface of half an hour, which was merely a stimulant for the Kilbogie appetite, led up to a thorough examination of physical judgments, during which both Bible and Church history were laid under liberal contribution. At this point the minister halted, and complimented the congregation on the attention they had given to the facts of the case, which were his first head, and suggested that before approaching the doctrine of visitations they might refresh themselves with a Psalm. The congregation were visibly impressed, and many made up their minds while singing and while others thought it due to themselves to suspend judgment till they had tasted the doctrine, they afterward confessed their confidence. It goes without saying that he was immediately beyond the reach of the ordinary people on the second head, and even veterans in theology panted after him in vain, so that one of the elders, nodding assent to an exposure of the Manichæan heresy, suddenly blushed as one who had played the hypocrite. Some professed to have noticed a doctrine that had not been touched upon, but they never could give it a name, and it excited just admiration that a preacher, starting from a plague of mice, should have made a way by strictly scientific methods into the secret places of theology. Saunderson allowed his hearers a brief rest after the second head, and cheered them with the assurance that what was still before them would be easy to follow. It was the application of all that had gone before to the life of Kilbogie, and the preacher proceeded to convict the parish under each of the ten commandments—with the plague of mice ever in reserve to silence excuses—till the delighted congregation could have risen in a body and taken Saunderson by the hand for his fearlessness and faithfulness. Perhaps the extent and thoroughness of this monumental sermon can be best estimated by the fact that Claypots, father of the present tenant, who always timed his rest to fifty minutes exactly, thus overseeing both the introduction and application of the sermon, had a double portion, and even a series of supplementary dozes, till at last he sat upright through sheer satiety. It may also be offered as evidence that the reserve of peppermint held by mothers for their bairns was pooled, doles being furtively passed across pews to conspicuously needy families, and yet the last had gone before Saunderson finished.

That man hath perfect blessedness;

Mains reported to the congregational meeting that the minister had been quiet for the rest of the day, but had offered to say something about Habakkuk to any evening service, and had cleared up at family worship some obscure points in the morning discourse. He also informed the neighbors that he had driven his guest all the way to Muirtown, and put him in an Edinburgh carriage with his own hands, since it had emerged that Saunderson, through absence of mind, had made his down journey by the triangular route of Dundee. It was quite impossible for Kilbogie to conceal their pride in electing such a miracle of learning, and their bearing in Muirtown was distinctly changed; but, indeed, they did not boast vainly about Jeremiah Saunderson, for his career was throughout on the level of that monumental sermon. When the Presbytery, in the gayety of their heart, examined Saunderson to ascertain whether he was fully equipped for the work of the ministry, he professed the whole Old Testament in Hebrew, and MacWheep of Pitscourie, who always asked the candidate to read the Twenty-third Psalm, was beguiled by Jeremiah into the Book of Job, and reduced to the necessity of asking questions by indicating verbs with his finger. His Greek examination led to an argument between Jeremiah and old Dr. Dumsday on the use of the aorist, from which the minister-elect of Kilbogie came out an easy first; and his sermons were heard to within measurable distance of the second head by an exact quorum of the exhausted court, who were kept by the clerk sitting at the door, and preventing MacWheep escaping. His position in the court was assured from the beginning, and fulfilled the function of an Encyclopædia, with occasional amazing results, as when information was asked about some Eastern sect for whose necessities the Presbytery were asked to collect, and Jeremiah showed clearly, with the reporters present, that the Cappadocians were guilty of a heresy beside which Morisonianism was an unsullied whiteness. His work as examiner-in-general for the court was a merciful failure, and encouraged the students of the district to return to their district court, who, on this rumor of him, had transferred themselves in a body to a Highland Presbytery, where the standard question in Philosophy used to be, "How many horns has a dilemma, and distinguish the one from the other." No man knew what the minister of Kilbogie might not ask—he was only perfectly certain that it would be beyond his knowledge; but as Saunderson always gave the answer himself in the end, and imputed it to the student, anxiety was reduced to a minimum. Saunderson, indeed, was in the custom of passing all candidates and reporting them as marvels of erudition, whose only fault was a becoming modesty—which, however, had not concealed from his keen eye hidden treasures of learning. Beyond this sphere the good man's services were not used by a body of shrewd ecclesiastics, as the inordinate length of an ordination sermon had ruined a dinner prepared for the court by "one of our intelligent and large-hearted laymen," and it is still pleasantly told how Saunderson was invited to a congregational soirée—an ancient meeting where the people ate oranges and the speaker rallied the minister on being still unmarried—and discoursed—as a carefully chosen subject—on the Jewish feasts, with illustrations from the Talmud, till some one burst a paper bag and allowed the feelings of the people to escape. When this history was passed round Muirtown Market, Kilbogie thought still more highly of their minister, and indicated their opinion of the other parish in severely theological language. Saunderson's reputation for unfathomable learning and saintly simplicity was built up out of many incidents, and grew with the lapse of years to a solitary height in the big strath, so that no man would have dared to smile had the Free Kirk minister of Kilbogie appeared in Muirtown in his shirt-sleeves, and Kilbogie would only have been a trifle more conceited. Truly he was an amazing man, and, now that he is dead and gone, the last of his race, I wish some man of his profession had written his life, for the doctrine he taught and the way he lived will not be believed by the new generation. The arrival of his goods was more than many sermons to Kilbogie, and I had it from Mains' own lips. It was the kindly fashion of those days that the farmers carted the new minister's furniture from the nearest railway station, and as the railway to Kildrummie was not yet open, they had to go to Stormont Station on the north line; and a pleasant procession they made passing through Pitscourie, ten carts in their best array, and drivers with a semi-festive air. Mr. Saunderson was at the station, having reached it by some miracle without mistake, and was in a condition of abject nervousness about the handling and conveyance of his belongings.

"You will be careful—exceedingly careful," he implored; "if one of the boxes were allowed to descend hurriedly to the ground, the result to what is within would be disastrous. I am much afraid that the weight is considerable, but I am ready to assist;" and he got ready.

"Dinna pit yirsel' intae a feery-farry (commotion)," but Mains was distinctly pleased to see a little touch of worldliness, just enough to keep the new minister in touch with humanity. "It 'ill be queer stuff oor lads canna lift, an' a'll gie ye a warranty that the'll no be a cup o' the cheeny broken;" and then Saunderson conducted his congregation to the siding.

"Dod, man," remarked Mains to the station-master, examining a truck with eight boxes; "the manse 'ill no want for dishes at ony rate; but let's start on the furniture; whar hae ye got the rest o' the plenishing?

"Naething mair? havers, man, ye dinna mean tae say they pack beds an' tables in boxes; a' doot there's a truck missin'." Then Mains went over where the minister was fidgeting beside his possessions.

"No, no," said Saunderson, when the situation was put before him, "it's all here. I counted the boxes, and I packed every box myself. That top one contains the fathers—deal gently with it; and the Reformation divines are just below it. Books are easily injured, and they feel it. I do believe there is a certain life in them, and . . . and . . . they don't like being ill-used," and Jeremiah looked wistfully at the plowmen.

"Div ye mean tae say," as soon as Mains had recovered, "that ye've brocht naethin' for the manse but bukes, naither bed nor bedding? Keep's a'," as the situation grew upon him, "whar are ye tae sleep, and what are ye tae sit on? An' div ye never eat? This croons a';" and Mains gazed at his new minister as one who supposed that he had taken Jeremiah's measure and had failed utterly.

"Mea culpa—it's . . . my blame," and Saunderson was evidently humbled at this public exposure of his incapacity; "some slight furnishing will be expedient, even necessary, and I have a plan for book-shelves in my head; it is ingenious and convenient, and if there is a worker in wood . . ."

"Come awa' tae the dogcart, sir," said Mains, realizing that even Kilbogie did not know what a singular gift they had obtained, and that discussion on such sublunary matters as pots and pans was useless, not to say profane. So eight carts got a box each; one, Jeremiah's ancient kist of moderate dimensions; and the tenth—that none might be left unrecognized—a handbag that had been on the twelve years' probation with its master. The story grew as it passed westward, and when it reached us we were given to understand that the Free Kirk minister of Kilbogie had come to his parish with his clothing in a paper parcel and twenty-four packing-cases filled with books, in as many languages—half of them dating from the introduction of printing, and fastened by silver clasps—and that if Drumtochty seriously desired to hear an intellectual sermon at a time, we must take our way through Tochty woods.

Mrs. Pitillo took the minister into her hands, and compelled him to accompany her to Muirtown, where she had him at her will for some time, so that she equipped the kitchen (fully), a dining-room (fairly), a spare bedroom (amply), Mr. Saunderson's own bedroom (miserably), and secured a table and two chairs for the study. This success turned her head. Full of motherly forethought, and having a keen remembrance that probationers always retired in the afternoon at Mains to think over the evening's address, and left an impress of the human form on the bed when they came down to tea, Mrs. Pitillo suggested that a sofa would be an admirable addition to the study. As soon as this piece of furniture, of a size suitable for his six feet, was pointed out to the minister, he took fright, and became quite unmanageable. He would not have such an article in his study on any account, partly because it would only feed a tendency to sloth—which, he explained, was one of his besetting sins—and partly because it would curtail the space available for books, which, he indicated, were the proper furniture of any room, but chiefly of a study. So great was his alarm that he repented of too early concessions about the other rooms, and explained to Mrs. Pitillo that every inch of space be rigidly kept for the overflow from the study, which he expected—if he were spared—would reach the garrets. Several times on their way back to Kilbogie, Saunderson looked wistfully at Mrs. Pitillo, and once opened his mouth as if to speak, from which she gathered that he was grateful for her kindness, but dared not yield any further to the luxuries of the flesh.

What this worthy woman endured in securing a succession of reliable housekeepers for Mr. Saunderson and overseeing the interior of that remarkable home, she was never able to explain to her own satisfaction, though she made many honest efforts, and one of her last intelligible utterances was a lamentable prophecy of the final estate of the Free Church manse of Kilbogie. Mr. Saunderson himself seemed at times to have some vague idea of her painful services, and once mentioned her name to Carmichael in feeling terms. There had been some delay in providing for the bodily wants of the visitor after his eight miles' walk from Drumtochty, and it seemed likely that he would be obliged to take his meal standing for want of a chair.

"While Mrs. Pitillo lived, I have a strong impression, almost amounting to certainty, that the domestic arrangements of the manse were better ordered; she had the episcopal faculty in quite a conspicuous degree, and was, I have often thought, a woman of sound judgment.

"We were not able at all times to see eye to eye, as she had an unfortunate tendency to meddle with my books and papers, and to arrange them after an artificial fashion. This she called tidying, and, in its most extreme form, cleaning.

"With all her excellencies, there was also in her what I have noticed in most women, a certain flavor of guile, and on one occasion, when I was making a brief itinerary through Holland and France in search of comely editions of the fathers, she had the books carried out to the garden and dusted. It was the space of two years before I regained mastery of my library again, and unto this day I cannot lay my hands on the service-book of King Henry VIII., which I had in the second edition, to say nothing of an original edition of Rutherford's Lex Rex.

"It does not become me, however, to reflect on the efforts of that worthy matron, for she was by nature a good woman, and if any one could be saved by good works, her place is assured. I was with her before she died, and her last words to me were, 'Tell Jean tae dust yir bukes aince in the sax months, and for ony sake keep ae chair for sittin' on.' It was not the testimony one would have desired, but yet, Mr. Carmichael, I have often thought that there was a spirit of . . . of unselfishness, in fact, that showed the working of grace." Later in the same evening Mr. Saunderson's mind returned to his friend's spiritual state, for he entered into a long argument to show that, while Mary was more spiritual, Martha must have been within the Divine Election.

Books and Authors

The Soul of a Philosopher[1]

It is only a limited information that thinks of Samuel Taylor Coleridge first of all as a poet. The mind that knows nothing of him beyond the fact that he wrote the Ancient Mariner may customarily think of him only as a poet, but that mind cannot be said to have any opinion about Coleridge that is worth our serious consideration. Coleridge's own title to fame lay in in his being a thinker, a philosopher. He was a poet because he was a philosopher. Yet it is not alone the books that he produced that makes Coleridge a portent in modern life. It is not his conversation, which was more important than his writings. It was the man, the strange, dynamic personality of the man. No one in the modern world of English thought has so pushed on that world as Coleridge—unless it be the late Charles Darwin. Yet all, or nearly all, that Coleridge did was fragmentary and unfinished. Indolence, the vice of the intellectual athlete, or else opium, indisposed Coleridge to carry his efforts to completion. Yet the most fragmentary of his poems, "Kubla Khan," is inspiring. De Quincey incurs contempt when he attempts to excuse his own opium habit by accusing Coleridge of self-indulgence and infirmity of will. Coleridge was habitually a dreamer of dreams; his thoughts were too large for him or for any one to adequately express in a lifetime. His mind embraced almost the whole circle of human knowledge. He perceived by intuition, and is one of the best illustrations that we can find of genius as distinguished from talent. Yet in every way he thought of his world in its spiritual and ethical aspects. First of all, Samuel Taylor Coleridge was a theologian and a metaphysician. One time he said to Lamb, "Charles, did you ever hear me preach?" "I never heard you do anything else!" was the retort. Such was the rôle in which Coleridge always appeared to his contemporaries, and so he appears to us in the extracts from his Note-Books now first published by Mr. Ernest Hartley Coleridge. It was a mistake to entitle the book The Soul of the Poet, "Anima Poetæ;" it is really the Soul of a Philosopher.

In 1801 Coleridge read some of the books of Giordano Bruno; they made a deep impression upon his mind. To the Italian philosopher may be traced the identification of matter and spirit, God and the world, which has been mistaken for pantheism in poetry, theology, and philosophy. It has been adopted by materialist and idealist alike, by Clifford, Romanes, and Carus, as well as our own Professor Royce. It is safe to say that of the modern English thinkers Coleridge was the first monist. To him was due whatever philosophy lay under the Oxford Movement. But the Oxford Tractarians, by accepting in a fashion the regula auctoritatis, were withheld from carrying out this philosophy to its logical extremes. In theology there has recently appeared a recrudescence of this identity of the sacred and secular, of the divine and human, in "Christian sociology" as expounded by Principal Gore, Professor Herron, and others. In fact, Broad Church theology of the present day in all the churches may be traced back to the mind of Samuel Taylor Coleridge. In the year 1805 the problem of the identity of the One and the many he had worked out into this expression: "Space is the name for God; it is the most perfect image of Soul, pure soul, being to us nothing but unresisted action. Whenever action is resisted, limitation begins—and limitation is the first constituent of body; the more omnipresent it is in a given space, the more that space is body or matter; and thus all body necessarily presupposes soul, inasmuch as all resistance presupposes action. Magnitude, therefore, is the intimate blending, the most perfect union, through its whole sphere, in every minutest part of it, of action and resistance to action." This is truly abstruse, though not altogether unintelligible. Later he reflected upon the mystery of the Incarnation in these words: "A bodily substance, an unborrowed self-God in God immanent! The Eternal Word! that goes forth yet remains! . . .

---

[1] Anima Poetæ. From the Unpublished Note-Books of Samuel Taylor Coleridge. Edited by Ernest Hartley Coleridge. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston. $2.50.

"Great genial Agent in all finite souls;
And by that action puts on finiteness.
Absolute Infinite, whose dazzling robe
Flows in rich folds, and plays in shooting hues
Of infinite finiteness."

Verily these things are too high for common clay. Let us then carefully descend. In keeping with this philosophy we find in one note a quaint conceit of metempsychosis: "In the next world the souls of dull good men serve for bodies to the souls of the Shakespeares and Miltons, and in the course of a few centuries, when the soul can do without its vehicle, the bodies will, by the advantage of good company, have refined themselves into souls fit to be clothed with like bodies." Sometimes blank misgivings of a creature moving about in worlds not realized beset our poet-metaphysician, and he cries out, "Good heavens! that there should be anything at all, and not nothing. Ask the blunted faculty that pretends to reason, and, if indeed he have felt and reasoned, he must feel that something is to be sought after out of the vulgar track of Change-Alley speculation." This diction echoes the great Jean Paul, and his disciple Thomas Carlyle. From the notes herein given us it does not appear that Coleridge exercised himself over social and economic questions. His opinion of the human race was that occasionally occurred a man who amounted to 1, while the majority would equal 0000... to any extent, good for nothing if they came before the 1, but signifying vastly if they followed after the 1. The discrepancy between this dictum and the following note is more superficial than substantial: "A time will come when passiveness will attain the dignity of worthy activity, when men shall be as proud within themselves of having remained in a state of tranquil emotion, whether in reading or in hearing or in looking, as they now are in having figured away for an hour."

It must not be supposed that all these notes are of distilled reflections. Many are bald comparisons, crude material for poems, and tales that never got written. Only these similes justify the title that has been affixed to the book. Of such similes we shall furnish a few with which to close: "A rosemary tree, large as a timber tree, is a sweet sign of the antiquity and antique manners of the house against which it groweth." "A man who marries for love is like a frog who leaps into a well. He has plenty of water, but he cannot get out." "I have several times seen the stiletto and the rosary come out of the same pocket." "Lie with the ear upon a dear friend's grave." "The sun at evening holds up her fingers of both hands before her face that mortals may have one steady gaze—her transparent crimson fingers, as when a lovely woman looks at the fire through her slender palms." "Hypocrisy, the deadly crime which, like Judas, kisses hell at the lips of Redemption." We do not find in this book, even in the extremest notes that we have quoted, that Coleridge was amenable to the charge of pantheism. He was not a dualist, that is to say, a materialist; no poet, no philosopher, ever is a dualist. At a few points he approaches Emerson's doctrine of the Oversoul; at others he symphonizes with Tennyson's "Higher Pantheism." S. T. Coleridge saw farther than most men of his day or of ours, and his mind was consistent with itself. The vision of human lives in this world that he saw may be described in the lines—

As souls immerse in space,
Ideals rise and idols fall.

Carefully and reverently as the compiler has selected these notes of Coleridge, it would sometimes seem almost as if one had drawn his frailties from their dread abode. They are fallen leaves from a mighty intellect—rather shall we not say,

These are but the shattered stalks
And ruined chrysalis of one.

Harnack's History of Dogma[1]

Dr. Harnack's volume on the "History of Dogma," in its English dress, is not easy reading. How far this is due to difficulty inherent in Dr. Harnack's style, how far to a too literal fidelity in the translator, we will not undertake to determine. There are two conceptions of translation not clearly discriminated, for either of which there is much to be said. According to the one conception, the translator is to present the thoughts of the author as far as possible in the very form in which the author himself presents them. He must, indeed, have some regard to differences of idioms in the two languages, but, with this exception, his translation cannot be too exact a reproduction of the original. According to the other conception, the translator is to present the thought of the writer in the form of the language into which he is translating it. He is to reproduce the spirit of the original, but in a new incarnation. Literary accuracy is not, according to this conception, the desideratum, but rather thought-transference. Of such translations, Jowett's "Plato" and Professor Palmer's "Odyssey" are well-nigh perfect illustrations. Neil Buchanan appears to us to have followed the former method. His book is not English, it is a German book done into English, and to one unaccustomed to German structure it is difficult reading. On the whole, recognizing the perils of either conception, we prefer the latter, even for a treatise in theology.

The first half of the present volume is taken up with Prolegomena and Presuppositions; the former defining the subject and giving some account of the literature upon it, the second presenting truth in its undogmatic forms as found in the Gospels and the early preaching, before as yet that preaching had been formulated in dogma. For between truth and dogma Professor Harnack draws a sharp distinction. "Every dogmatic formula is suspicious, because it is fitted to wound the spirit of religion; it should not, at least, be put before the living experience in order to evoke it; for such a proceeding is really the admission of the half-belief which thinks it necessary that the impression made by the presence must be supplemented. The essence of the matter is a personal life which awakens life around it, as the fire of one torch kindles another." The general statement of the preaching of Christ and the Apostles appears to us admirable; as is the statement of the element common to all Christians in the first century, out of which grew and on which was based the subsequent development of dogma. This common element includes the Gospel as a revelation of the Supreme God; the message of the resurrection and eternal life mediated by Jesus Christ, the unique son of God; the renunciation of this world; the proclamation by chosen men of the Gospel of the Son of God; Christian worship, not yet formulated in any established ceremonies, and the brotherhood of all Christians in a religious organism which embraces the whole of humanity—as the religious truths to be proclaimed and which concern the whole of humanity. From this as a starting-point Dr. Harnack traces out the development of dogma, bringing it down to the rise of Neo-Platonism, "which assimilated the elements of most of the previous systems, and embodied the results of the history of religion and civilization in the East and West." The key to the understanding of Dr. Harnack's history is his frank recognition of the principle of evolution as applied to the growth of doctrine. He assumes the direct reverse of the doctrine of Lord Macaulay and Dean Burgon that "in divinity there cannot be a progress analogous to that which is constantly taking place in pharmacy, geology, and navigation." We shall reserve the attempt to show how Dr. Harnack applies this principle in tracing the development of doctrine until the next volume is issued, and a better opportunity is afforded to do this with justice.

Novels and Tales

Mr. Hopkinson Smith's latest story, Tom Grogan, is distinctly the strongest piece of work which has come from his hand. It was read with growing interest by a host of the readers of the "Century Magazine," who felt its vitality and appreciated its humor. It is a study of local life under exciting conditions, a chapter torn from the history of the labor agitation and the industrial revolution. The writer's interest centers, not in the revolution or the agitation, but in the plucky, very human woman who admirably fulfills the duty of the heroine, and in the group of men with whom she contends and whose plots and antagonism she successfully meets. There are, of course, many other sides of the question which come to the front in this story. Mr. Smith has seized one side, but he has shown the characteristic quality of the artist in keeping the question subordinate and the concrete fact to the front. He is dealing with persons and incidents, not with abstractions or with general propositions. The peculiar quality of the story is its vitality, its first-hand portraiture of life. The men and women who figure in the tale are drawn with a few vigorous and sharply defined strokes. Every one is clearly realized and stands out before the reader without any wavering or uncertainty of outline. As for Tom herself, it must be frankly conceded that, whatever view one may take of labor unions and walking delegates, she has won the hearts of all her readers, and their sympathies as well. She is both brave and real. She not only might have happened, but she actually did happen. It is such portraiture that makes literature. (Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston.)

Lovers of the fiction of adventure and romance have no cause to complain just now of lack of wherewithal to suit their literary appetite. To the long list of recent writers of this class of romance must be added the name of Mr. A. F. W. Mason, who bids fair to achieve marked success in the field occupied by Anthony Hope, Weyman, Quiller-Couch, Doyle, and others. The Courtship of Morrice Buckler (we see, by the way, no great aptness in the sub-title, "Being the

---

[1] History of Dogma. By Adolph Harnack. Translated from the third German edition by Neil Buchanan. Vol. I. Roberts Brothers, Boston. $2.50.

Record of the Growth of an English Gentleman during the Years 1685–1687," etc.) is not only full of action and stimulating to curiosity, but tells a quite original plot in a clever way. Perhaps in its literary kinship it approaches more closely to "The Prisoner of Zenda" than to any other recent novel, but there is no evidence of imitation; the resemblance is in the spirit and dash of the narrative. The merit of this awkwardly named story is not solely in its grasp on the reader's attention and its exciting situations; it is written in excellent English, the dialogue is natural and brisk, the individual characters stand out clearly, and the flavor of the time is well preserved. As a story-teller, pure and simple, Mr. Mason is sure to receive recognition. The scene of the story shifts from England after the Monmouth rebellion to a wild part of the Tyrol. (Macmillan & Co., New York.)

Mrs. Hinkson (Katharine Tynan) is at her best in those sketches in An Isle in the Water which deal with every-day Irish character and talk. These are truly charming; they reproduce nature with mingled realism and imaginative quality. The tales which have a basis in the supernatural appeal less strongly to us; they are so somber as to be a little disagreeable and fantastic, and the note seems at times a little forced. There is, notwithstanding, much of the author's best work in this book, and the literary quality is distinctly of a high order.

All lovers of the Irish peasant in literature will be pleased that William Carleton's Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry have been republished in two tasteful volumes. A memoir of Carleton and excellent notes have been furnished by Mr. D. J. O'Donoghue. Carleton may be classed as falling half-way between the excessive joviality of the Charles Lever style of Irish writer and the minute realism of the recent school. He is sometimes a little prolix, but he knew his subject thoroughly, was steeped, so to say, in Irish folk-lore and character, and he may be read to-day with both profit and entertainment. Both Mrs. Hinkson's volume and the Carleton sketches are published by Macmillan & Co., New York.

Mr. W. Pett Ridge, in The Second Opportunity of Mr. Staplehurst, gives us a successful, middle-aged literary man who is happily married, but sometimes thinks that if he could live his life over he could do more with it, a chance to try the experiment. It results in moral, intellectual, and financial disaster, and Mr. Staplehurst is only too happy to obtain from Jupiter (who has manipulated the transformation to youth as a reward for Mr. Staplehurst's very handsome references in type to his Olympian Majesty) a quick return to his original status. The idea is humorously worked out, but the lesson is rather too obvious, and the story is but a clever trifle. (Harper & Brothers, New York.)

Mr. Robert Barr tells a lively and entertaining story in A Woman Intervenes. An American woman reporter, an ingenuous mining engineer and his partner, an equally ingenuous skilled accountant, an English "promoter" of the fraudulent type, a rich and business-wise English girl, and other characters are deftly managed, but have little real solidity of existence as characters. The tone is cheerful and the story holds the attention fairly well. (F. A. Stokes Company, New York.)

Mr. George Gissing's Sleeping Fires is a short novel, simply constructed, and with a good deal of real feeling. The methods are those with which his more extended novels have made the reading world familiar, but in this case the atmosphere of hopelessness and realistic oppression is less dense than usual. (D. Appleton & Co., New York.)

Mr. S. Baring-Gould has so many of the qualities of a good novelist that one earnestly wishes that he possessed that of making his characters talk and act more naturally. In The Broom Squire he has a strong plot, faithful local color, decided originality, and an interesting interplay of motive and character, but the dialogue is artificial and dull. Mr. Hardy would have made a great novel out of this same material. (F. A. Stokes Company, New York.)

* * *

Messrs. Ginn & Co. are doing an admirable work in putting a large and choice selection from the best literature and the best thought in forms especially adapted for the reading of children. The abridgment of Long's translation of Epictetus addresses itself, of course, only to the most mature boys and girls. It cannot be said in any way to belong to the literature of childhood, and there is some question whether it will be attractive even to youth of an older growth. It is, however, so noble a work that one is glad to see it reproduced in any form. About Gilbert White's Natural History of Selborne, which is also published in an abridged form with an introduction by Mr. Edward S. Morse, there can be no question. Boys and girls who have a love for nature and for the observation of natural life can hardly fail to be interested in this pioneer of out-of-door literature. The volume contains a brief introductory sketch. (Ginn & Co., Boston.)

Lovers of Dr. Johnson will find a special pleasure in the large, clear type and the convenient form of the new edition of the Lives of the Poets which is now coming from the press of the Messrs. Scribner, and which, when completed, is to fill six small volumes, compact in form, well bound, and admirably printed. The notes and introduction by Mr. Arthur Waugh will add to the value of this excellent edition by helping readers to understand the place in Johnson's life of his most mature and in some respects his most extended literary work. In no other work are the strength and weakness of Johnson more clearly indicated. His sound sense, his practical sagacity, his sanity, on the one hand; on the other, his lack of imagination, his deficient sense of melody, his failure to appreciate the spontaneous elements—all these are strikingly illustrated in this group of brief biographies.

A volume of infinite delight and resource to lovers of English verse is Mr. A. S. Martin's comment On Parody. (Henry Holt & Co., New York.) Mr. Martin has made a collection of the best parodies in English, and prefaced them with a very interesting introduction on the general subject, in which he points out the different kinds of parodies and gives the reader some account of the development of the parody. The selections of verse are in many cases accompanied by prose comments describing the occasion, presenting historical and personal facts, and containing critical comment. The selections are made with admirable taste, and the book is an addition not only to the literature of literary study, but also to the literature of pleasure.

The fourth edition of Mr. John Addington Symonds's translation of The Life of Benvenuto Cellini has recently come from the press of Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, and presents in an admirable form, both as to size and typography, one of the most interesting books of its kind in the literature of the world. The volume contains the mezzotint portrait of Cellini and sixteen reproductions of characteristic works from his hand. It contains also the extremely valuable and interesting introduction from the hand of Mr. Symonds. Of the translation at this late date it is unnecessary to speak.

Those who are looking for a brief manual of ecclesiastical history may find Outlines of Church History, by Rudolf Sohm, translated by Miss May Sinclair, the book that suits their want. It is brief, but it is not a mere outline. The author has chosen to treat only the greater events and personages, omitting matters of lesser interest. In this way he has produced a book that is readable. His standing-point is that of evangelical faith and liberal culture. He discusses the doctrinal movements of the past in a calm and impartial spirit. (Macmillan & Co., New York.)

Literary Notes

—Cardinal Gibbons, of Baltimore, has placed in the hands of his publishers the manuscript of his new book. It will bear the title "The Ambassador of Christ."

—Philip James Bailey, the author of "Festus," is now living at Nottingham. Although in his eightieth year, he is wonderfully hale and hearty. It is considerably over half a century since "Festus" appeared.

—One of Victor Hugo's grandsons was a sailor for three years, and is soon to publish his first book, "The Recollections of a Sailor," some of the chapters of which have already appeared in one of the Paris newspapers.

—The fresh transcription of part of the Sinai Gospels, which was brought by Mrs. S. S. Lewis from Mount Sinai in the spring of last year, will be published by the Cambridge University Press in the course of this month. It will be accompanied by a new and complete edition of her translation, and will take the form of a reprint of about one hundred Syriac pages hitherto defective.

—Mrs. Elizabeth Charles, who died on March 28, at the age of sixty-eight, at Hampstead, England, was born in Tavistock, Devonshire. The list of her works is a long one, and foremost among them stands the famous "Chronicles of the Schönberg-Cotta Family" (which appeared in 1864). Others of her writings are "The Victory of the Vanquished: A Tale of the First Century," "Against the Stream: The Story of an Heroic Age in England," "Joan the Maid," "Three Martyrs of the Nineteenth Century," and "Martyrs and Saints of the First Twelve Centuries."

—A new edition of "The Question of Copyright," compiled by Mr. George Haven Putnam, Secretary of the American Publishers' Copyright League, is in press for immediate publication. The book has been thoroughly revised and brought down to date, and new material has been added. An important feature is the full text of the copyright law of the United States, with the amendments adopted and considered up to March 1, 1896, and a summary of the copyright laws at present in force throughout the world.

—The "Westminster Gazette" says: "Every effort is being made to secure that the forthcoming Burns Exhibition to be held in Glasgow during the summer months shall be a success. A sum of upward of £2,500 has already been subscribed to the guarantee fund. The Committee, of which Lord Rosebery and Lord Provost Bell are respectively President and Vice-President, desire, however, that the guarantee fund should amount to £5,000, and they now appeal for further subscriptions, and also for loans of pictures, manuscripts, relics, books, and other articles likely to enhance the interest and the value of the exhibition. What, one wonders, would the bard himself think of it all?"

—Mr. Clarke, of Apia, Samoa, who conducted the late Robert Louis Stevenson's funeral service, is now in England. Speaking of the novelist in an interview, he said:

> "I met Mr. Stevenson the first day he landed at Samoa, and our friendship dated from that time. Rarely a day passed but some member of his family was at our house." Mr. Clarke said he did not think the religious side of Mr. Stevenson's character had received due recognition. "Every Sunday night he conducted family worship. A chapter from the Samoan Bible was read verse by verse by the members of the household; Mr. Stevenson followed with a collect and the Lord's Prayer from the English Prayer-Book, and then one of the Samoans prayed in the vernacular; finally, Mr. Stevenson read a prayer which he had composed during the week for this service; and the prayer read at his funeral was the one that had been offered the preceding Sunday." Mr. Clarke stated that Mr. Stevenson was a regular attendant at the English church, and, speaking from most intimate acquaintance, characterized him as "a deeply religious man."

[For list of Books Received see Table of Contents]

For the Little People

Marble Time

By Clinton Scollard

Hurrah! hurrah! it's marble time!
And every boy who's got a dime
Or nickel somewhere stored away
Will, after school, be out at play.
What if the wind blows chill?—it's fun!
And there are corners in the sun.

Now bring your "allies" bright, and bring
Your bag of "mibs," and make a ring,
And if it's little or it's big,
There's not a feller'll care a fig;
But if you "hunch," no boy in town
Will play, and you must "knuckle down."

Oh, don't I wish that I might go
Unto the land where marbles grow
Upon the trees like fruit, and pull
Them off, and fill my pockets full!
Though I can't find that country, I'm Just jolly glad it's marble time.

April Sunbeams

By Mary H. Fisk

If there was one thing Father Sun loved, it was the beautiful world where happy boys and girls lived, and where his Sunbeams went every day to work and play.

April was coming, and the dear little April Sunbeams were wild with delight to think it would soon be their turn to go to work.

"Please, Father Sun, let us go first," said some bright Sunbeams.

"You!" said Father Sun; "why, you are hot little Sunbeams, and ought to go last."

"Yes, Father Sun, we know that, but we want to go the very first day of April. The children have such fun on April Fool's Day, and we love to hear them laugh, and see the jokes they play on each other, and then we want to fool them, and make them think summer has come."

And the children were fooled.

"Mother," said one little boy, "I can't keep my coat on another minute; it's as hot as summer out."

The Sunbeams just danced up and down on the wall when they heard that, and could hardly wait till night came to tell Father Sun what a good joke they had played on the dear little boy.

"Now we must go to work," said Father Sun. "Who wants to shine on the trees and call to the buds softly and gently that Jack Frost has gone home, and that April has come, and that it is time they took off their overcoats and began to grow?"

So many Sunbeam Fairies wanted to go to visit the trees that Father Sun's heart was filled with joy at the sight.

Some were dressed in green—such a dainty tint of green—and they spoke lovingly to the leaf-buds, and helped them awaken from their long winter nap. Some were dressed in red, and they whispered their secret to the tiny red flower-buds on the maple and elm trees, and laughed to think such great big trees should have such little flowers. Some went to the willows and called the "pussies" out. I cannot begin to tell you all the different trees they visited, there were so many; but to each one there came a troop of Sunbeam Fairies, and not one little bud was overlooked.

Another set rested lovingly on the ground. Do you think they were going to make the ground grow? "Such funny children to think that!" said these Fairies. "Let us not tell them about it, but make them wait and see what comes up out of the ground after a while, and then see if they can guess why we worked and played there every day."

"I am afraid," said one thoughtful little Fairy—but so softly that the children on the porch could not hear her—"that I am shining so hard on my spot of ground that it will be baked hard, and the dear little seed will never be able to send its stalk up into the air."

"Never mind," said another, "Father Sun told us to shine just as hard as we could, so it will all be right."

"I wish he would send a shower," said another.

"I know what the children would say if he did," said a third. But before the fourth could say anything, down came the rain, and all the children shouted, "April showers make May flowers."

The Sunbeams were so anxious to hear what the children were saying that back they came before it had stopped raining.

"There is the sun, and it is still raining," said one little girl with bright eyes. "There ought to be a rainbow."

"I was so afraid they would not see it," whispered a Sunbeam.

"But they did," said another. "Let us ask Father Sun to send a shower and a rainbow every day—it makes the children so happy."

As Father Sun watched his April Sunbeams, his heart glowed within him.

"They are brave little workers," he said. "The world will soon be ready for the beautiful May flowers."

Gyp

He is a Skye. You wonder, when you look at him, how he can ever see to walk, his hair is in such a tangle over his eyes. His tail is the most amusing part of him. It really seems as if his constant wagging would wear it out. It is never still. When he is glad, you can hardly see it—it goes so fast that it is like a yellow streak. He is full of tricks. He jumps as high as your shoulders when you go to see him. If he has had his bath, he seems to say, "Just see me! Am I not handsome?" Perhaps he has found out how handsome he is from the mirror in the house where he lives. It reaches from the ceiling to the floor; and he has learned, in some way, that this is not another dog he sees jumping about, but a reflection of himself.

Gyp has his trials. One of them is that he cannot run out in the street alone. He stands by the window and sees the other dogs run up and down the block, playing with the children and having a delightful time, but he is not allowed this freedom. Then he has to have a bath every day, and he hates it. He struggles and cries and whines, though he must know by this time that it is useless, that he must submit. Not the least of his trials is caused by the little boys and girls. Why is it that they should do the very thing to Gyp that they hate to have done to them? When Gyp stands in the window, feeling very unhappy because he cannot run out and play, those children lean on the iron fence in front and bark and jump at him until he is nearly frantic. If they would only remember how they feel when all the other children on the block are out playing, and they cannot go, they would not torment dear Gyp as they do. Now what has happened is that Gyp hates little boys and girls. He cannot bear to have them come in the house. The moment one comes in he growls and scowls, and looks as fierce as if he were a big lion instead of a tiny dog about twelve inches long. He thinks all boys and girls are his enemies. They miss a very great pleasure, for Gyp is so affectionate that he is worth having for a friend. If you were his friend, you would not give up the friendly wag of his tail for a large sum of money. How much happier Gyp would be, and the boys and girls on his block, if, when he saw them, he barked in joy as he does at his friends, and wagged his ridiculous tail to show how much he loved them! Now his tail stands out in anger, and he growls and barks his hateful bark the moment a small boy or girl appears.

The Accident

She is such a dear little girl that you cannot resist the temptation to watch her. She is the most loving little mother you can imagine. She pushes before her, as she comes down the street, a beautiful baby-carriage. Some big folks who do not understand little girls might be cruel enough to say that it is a doll-carriage. The little girl avoids all the rough places in the sidewalk, so that her darling baby will not be jarred or annoyed by the roughness. When the sun shines, she carefully adjusts the white silk parasol so that the sun will not shine in her baby's eyes. It is certain that if she knew how very bad for the eyes a white parasol is she would not use one. This little mother and her precious baby are in charge of a big nurse. The nurse is one of those disagreeable big people who will not see what a precious baby a doll is, and she calls the carriage a doll's carriage.

Yesterday there was a sharp cry of distress, and then a sweet little voice full of tears saying, "Save her! save her!" In the street, just over the curb, was the baby-carriage. The beautiful baby in her long white dress lay in the gutter; the lovely little mother stood wringing her hands on the sidewalk. The nurse picked up the baby by her skirts, and jerked the carriage back on the sidewalk, and threw the baby in it, saying to the little mother, "Stop crying! your old doll is not broken." The little mother could not believe it; she cried harder than ever as she smoothed out the pillow and straightened out her baby comfortably in the carriage. She felt her all over, and put her cheek down on her baby's face. Then the nurse, big and coarse and strong, like an ogre in the fairy stories, shook the little girl and said, "Stop your noise," and the little girl gave a frightened sob and pushed the carriage as far from the curb as she could roll it.

Perhaps some good fairy will tell the little mother's mamma how disagreeable the nurse is, and then she will have a good nurse who will believe that little girls' dolls can be just as dear to them as real live babies are to their real mothers. If the fairies would only wave their wands over all the nurses in the land, and make them gentle and kind and good, what a lovely world this would be for children!

Mournful Jane and Happy Sue

By Ruth Underhill

Once on a time there were two twins
Whom everybody knew,
And one of them was Mournful Jane
And one was Happy Sue.

And Happy Sue would laugh and sing,
And run about and play,
But Mournful Jane would mope and groan,
And cry all through the day.

A stranger coming to the town
Was struck by this, and said
To Sue, "What are you thinking of That makes you laugh, my maid?"

And Susan smiled, and happily
And gayly made reply,
"I think of all the cakes and pies
To-morrow will supply."

And then the stranger turned to Jane
And said, "My little one,
What do you think of all the time
That makes you sob and groan?"

Jane answered with a burst of tears
And face all woebegone,
"I think of all the cakes and pies
That are forever gone!"

◆

An exchange says a gentleman invited some friends to dinner; and as the colored servant entered the room, he accidentally dropped a platter which held a turkey. "My friends," said the gentleman, in a most impressive tone, "never in my life have I witnessed an event so fraught with disaster in the various nations of the globe. In this calamity we see the downfall of Turkey, the upsetting of Greece, the destruction of China, and the humiliation of Africa."

The Religious World

A Noteworthy Conference The wish for a closer fellowship between the Congregational churches and those of the Christian connection seems to be in process of realization. On the 14th and 15th of this month, at Piqua, Ohio, a joint Conference, consisting of representatives of two local Conferences of Congregationalists and two of Christians, gave to this movement a strong impetus. The Christian church at Piqua entertained the Conference, and a good delegation from both denominations was in attendance. Two presiding officers, the Rev. J. B. Weston, D.D., of the Christian Biblical School at Stamfordville, N. Y., and the Rev. Washington Gladden, divided the direction of the assembly between them, and the secretaries were the Rev. J. J. Summerbell, D.D., editor of the "Herald of Gospel Liberty," and the Rev. R. S. Lindsay, of Columbus. The opening sermon was delivered by the Congregational president, upon the mission of the Church as the promoter of unity and peace in society. Such questions as "Are Congregationalists Christians?" "Are Christians Congregationalists?" and "How Can we Help Each Other?" and such topics as "The Essentials of Christianity," "Converging Lines," "Unity a Product of Life," "Unity a Condition of Growth," and the gains of unity in the nineteenth and in the twentieth centuries, were discussed in admirable papers and addresses, and the voluntary speaking was extremely vigorous and effective. The spirit of the whole meeting was the very best. From the beginning to the end not one discordant note was struck. The purpose of all seemed to be to find a way of closer fellowship and more practical co-operation. The fact of the essential unity of the two bodies was made so plain that a wayfaring man could not help seeing it. The only obstacle in the way of the complete unification of the two bodies appears to be the question of name; and there were few who were inclined to put emphasis upon this. No attempt was made, however, to secure organic unity. Such action would have exceeded the powers of the local bodies represented, and it was the unanimous feeling that the unity ought to come as the product of life, and not as the result of any well-contrived agreements. The Conference unanimously resolved that meetings similar to this with a larger constituency should be arranged for in the future, and appointed a committee to take the matter in charge. It also recommended that local Conferences of either body should take pains to invite to their meetings members of the other living in their neighborhood; that, when practicable, the local Conferences of the two bodies should be held at the same time and place, and joint sessions arranged for; that fellowship be promoted by exchange of pulpits; and that the home mission boards of the two bodies be requested to confer for the maintenance of comity and co-operation.

A Good Union Work One form of Christian activity which knows no division into orthodox and heterodox in Massachusetts is what is called "The Convention of Congregational Ministers." It has issued its annual appeal in behalf of its charitable fund. The income of this fund it distributes, with such additional sums as may be intrusted to it, to the widows and unmarried daughters of the Congregational ministers in Massachusetts who died without pastoral settlements. About thirty such persons are receiving assistance. Last year the amount which could be given each one was only $34. The committee are anxious to lift it to $100, and to do this they need to have the income considerably increased. The appeal is made to both Trinitarian and Unitarian churches, which for years have united in this work. On the committee we see the names of such a Congregationalist as Dr. Alexander Mackenzie, and such a Unitarian as Dr. E. E. Hale. The treasurer of the fund is the Rev. Henry F. Jenks, of Canton, Mass. Are there not other ways in which not only these churches but all others could co-operate in what surely should be regarded as common work?

Professor H. P. Smith and the Cincinnati Presbytery The "Evangelist" of April 16 contains a courteous and generous-spirited article by the Rev. Rollin A. Sawyer, D.D., in which he makes an appeal to the Cincinnati Presbytery to rescind its action in regard to Professor Henry Preserved Smith. Dr. Sawyer says the sentiment, in brief, is this: The trial was hasty and impassioned, and the sentence was on something which Professor Smith was presumed to represent rather than upon himself. The vote by which sentence was given does not to-day represent the judgment of the Presbytery nor of the Church at large. Why, then, should it be suffered to stand?" He then goes on to show that the Presbytery has the initiative; that the fact that judgment was affirmed by Synod and Assembly does not take from the Presbytery the privilege of reversing the sentence. He then shows that the confidence of the members of the Presbytery of Cincinnati in Professor Smith is unimpaired and freely confessed; that they have urged him to accept a certificate of good standing to be taken to a Congregational church; he shows that the Professor is believed and trusted everywhere; and that his friends in the Presbytery of Cincinnati who are ready to move for a reversal of his sentence, if not in the majority in the Presbytery, surely have the majority of the people of God with them. The article then shows that the feeling throughout the Church is in favor of the action suggested. Dr. Sawyer says: "The good sense of our whole Church demands a change. It would hail such action by the Presbytery of Cincinnati as would show a consciousness of the presence and rights of their brethren." The article is written in the peculiarly strong and vigorous style characteristic of the author. He speaks as a Presbyterian. We have no doubt, however, that in his appreciation of Professor Henry P. Smith he voices the sentiment not only of the members of his own denomination, but of most Christian people who are familiar with the facts.

A Silver Jubilee The Mount Vernon Church of Boston, of which the Rev. Samuel E. Herrick, D.D., is the pastor, has long been one of the landmarks of that city. In recent years it has been removed to the Back Bay, and a new church edifice has been erected. The twenty-fifth anniversary of the settlement of Dr. Herrick as its pastor was celebrated on the 11th of April. Dr. Herrick is one of the most eminent and scholarly as well as one of the manliest and truest men in the ministry of our country. He succeeded the Rev. Dr. Kirk in the pastorate of the Mount Vernon Church. The position was a difficult one, but the work has steadily advanced, and to-day is most encouraging. On Sunday, April 12, Dr. Kirk preached an anniversary sermon, and on the following day numbers of his friends gathered in Mount Vernon Hall to offer him and to the church their congratulations. Professor J. W. Churchill, of Andover, presided. Dr. George A. Gordon declared that the grandeur of Dr. Herrick's ministry lies in the fact that he has saved Mount Vernon Church from the doom that awaited it in its old location. Other speakers were Dr. A. S. Twombly, General F. A. Walker, of the Institute of Technology, Judge Chamberlain, of Chelsea, Dr. Alexander Mackenzie, Dr. Winchester Donald, of Trinity Church, Dr. Edward Everett Hale. The work which Dr. Herrick has accomplished is worthy of all the good words spoken concerning it. After listening to his friends, he said: "These lovely things you have been saying about me are not true, but that you should think them true touches me very deeply."

Dr. Herrick's Sermon One part of Dr. Herrick's sermon on the anniversary mentioned above is particularly worthy of being reproduced in our columns. We quote from the report as it is given in the "Congregationalist:" "The most masterly portion of the discourse, however, was his review of the changes in fundamental conceptions and ruling ideas which he believes have taken general and permanent possession of the thinking of mankind. Formerly men said: Christ died, therefore God is our Father. Our belief now is just the reverse: God is our Father, and therefore Christ died. In the same way men held that the Bible is an inspired book, and must therefore be accepted from beginning to end. Not so; the Bible is a book full of profound truths which appeal to the judgment and conscience, and therefore must be given of God, inspired. The ethical relations of God and man are as parent and child who stand with mutual rights and mutual duties, while the cross is the supreme expression of God's eternal altruism in relation to his children. Heaven and hell are here. 'I have been in both,' said the preacher, solemnly. With a new conception of the corporate unity of mankind, theology has become more altruistic, and a new theory of preaching, which holds that man must be a follower of Christ not merely to save himself, but to be a savior in his own place and measure, has been adopted of inward necessity."

